With this explanation, I shall continue to vote as I voted during the last session, now to repeal, then in opposition to, this section; and in doing so I shall not array myself against the employment either of negro troops or white troops that may be procured in the States in rebellion; and at the same time avoid, as I believe, unpleasant, if not disastrous, consequences resulting from unseemly competition between the agents of these different States going down and overbidding each other, creating a sort of new auction-block, upon which these colored men may be exposed to sale and knocked down to the highest bidder, and thus become the soldier of the State whose coffers are able to pay the highest sum for that class of troops. I want them to be enlisted in the armies of the United States in the regular way. Let the Union have the general benefit of their services, and let each State have its pro rata benefit, as it will have just so far as the employment of these troops will lessen the amount of men to be called upon by draft, just so far as the poor men of the North who cannot raise money to relieve themselves from the draft will be benefited by this general enlistment of these troops in the old way.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, the only equitable way to furnish men in this war is for each State, out of its own population, to furnish its quota. When you put the negroes who are residents of the seceded States, or the rebel States, in the Army, they must be credited to the general quota, and that would lessen the draft upon all the adhering States. That is the only equitable way in which it can be done; and that was the sentiment of the Senate at the last session on more votes than one. If you want three hundred thousand soldiers by draft, and you get fifty thousand from the negroes in the rebel States, then the draft will be only for two hundred and fifty thousand, instead of three hundred thousand, and that distributed equally and properly will tend to relieve every State in the Union from the draft.

The Senator from Massachusetts says there has been no abuse under this law. The Senator from Ohio has told you of the abuses under it. That excellent letter of General Sherman, published some time ago, told the country of the abuses under it. But I will tell the Senator some of the abuses which have fallen under my own observation. In Kentucky, all the negroes are enrolled as the white people are. The draft in that State is based upon the enrollment of both whites and blacks. Under the operation of this law, agents from the northern States have come and located themselves in Indiana and Illinois, right on the borders of Kentucky, and absolutely sent over agents and stolen and taken by force negroes from Kentucky and enlisted them. These are facts that I know. If you take away the negroes from Kentucky and Missouri in that way, do you not see that Massachusetts, or the State that gets them, gets credited for them, and we have to be drafted upon the old enrollment upon which these very negroes were all enrolled? The greatest frauds were committed in that way. When they get these negroes over the river, they make the negro say he is from Alabama or Georgia, or some State in rebellion, not excluded in the law, and that is the way the thing is worked. There is no doubt about these evils existing there; I know them myself; and yet the Senator from Massachusetts says there are no evils resulting from it. On every hand you hear of the evils of it. Why, sir, the border States that have been devastated by this war, and the new States in the West are not able to send out and pay large sums to recruiting agents all over the country to fill up their quota, they have to give their men to the conflict; and why should not the older and richer States do so? If you enlist these negroes, and they are being enlisted everywhere by the general orders of our superior officers, let them go to the general account, where they ought to go, and let each State of the Union be compelled out of its own population to give the quota that is wanted from it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Farwell, Foster, Hale, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Sumner, and Wilson—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Foot, Harding, Hicks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Wade, and Wilkinson—11.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The question now is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. HOWARD. I move further to amend the amendment in section three, line ten, by inserting after the word "dollars" the words "nor less than $200," and after the word "years," in the same line, by inserting the words "and not less than three months;" so that the section will read:

That any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person, who shall enlist, or cause to be enlisted, as a volunteer or substitute, any insane person, &c., shall, upon conviction by any court-martial or military commission, be fined not exceeding $1,000, nor less than $200, or imprisoned not exceeding two years and not less than three months, or both, at the discretion of such court-martial or military commission.

The object is to require some punishment to be inflicted upon conviction. As the bill now stands, it would let off the offender with a nominal conviction and nominal imprisonment. I choose to fix a minimum punishment, which will be something more than a mere formality.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment, as I understand it, is to take from the court that is to try these offenses the discretion as to the punishment as far as the minimum is concerned; that is to say, the party, if convicted, must be punished by a fine of not less than a certain amount, or an imprisonment not less than a certain period of time. It appears to me there may be a great variety of causes existing in cases of this description which would render it proper that the discretion should be as large as possible. Let it be a fine of any amount the commission may think proper to impose, or an imprisonment any number of days only, as they may think proper to impose; but one thing is perfectly certain; I speak, as I think from some experience, not so much professional of my own and others, as from a knowledge of the cases which have been brought before these commissions; they are always sure to fine enough, and they are always sure to imprison long enough to answer the purposes of justice.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to say one word on the subject. The third section of this bill assumes to subject to trial by court-martial or military commission—

Any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person, who shall enlist or cause to be enlisted as a volunteer or substitute, any insane person or persons in a condition of intoxication, or a deserter from the military or naval service, knowing him to be such, or who shall defraud or deprive any volunteer or substitute of any portion of the State, local, or United States bounty, to which he may be entitled—

The clause, as it is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, punishes any one of these offenses, upon conviction, with fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court. My amendment is for the purpose of fixing a minimum of penalty by law below which the court shall not be at liberty to go; and its minimum fine is $200 for any one of these offenses, and its minimum imprisonment is three months. In other words, on conviction, it requires the court absolutely to sentence the offender either to pay a fine of at least $200 or undergo imprisonment for at least three months, or both together, as the court may see fit. It takes away from the court the discretion of imposing a mere nominal penalty, either fine or imprisonment, but requires it absolutely to impose a minimum penalty. As it stands now, on conviction, a court might allow an offender who had defrauded scores of honest soldiers of their honest bounty, and who had cheated them in the matter of recruitment and enlistment, to escape scot-free by payment of six cents fine or imprisonment for an hour. Is that just? If we impose a penalty for such offenses, we should be in earnest, and make it for the interest at least of the individual to do his duty and refrain from the violation of the law. It seems to me that the amendment commends itself to the favor of almost any man.

Mr. HALE. I confess that I differ with the honorable Senator from Michigan. There may be frequently cases where a court would find itself compelled under the evidence to find a judgment against the prisoner, but still the mitigating circumstances might be such that a mere nominal punishment would answer the purpose. I recollect the other day reading an account of a very distinguished trial in the city of New York between two great chieftains of the political world, Thurlow Weed and Mayor O'Dyke; and I understand that in that case there was a division; the jury came to no verdict, and still there was a considerable number of the jury who thought it would be well to find a verdict with damages at six cents. It is true that that was a civil action, but it is frequently the case in criminal actions that the court finds it necessary for the enforcement of the law to sentence a man, but only imposes a nominal punishment. I have seen a case where a very learned court found itself under the necessity, under the law, of punishing a man for assault and battery because he had been found guilty by a jury, but the circumstances were such that the court thought there was no real offense, and fined him a dollar, without costs. That was a court which sat in the State of the honorable Senator from Maine, and I thought at the time its action was very judicious. There may be a great many cases of that sort, and it seems to me we should allow them to be provided for. But, sir, I do not want to take time on this subject.

Mr. HOWARD. Undoubtedly, cases might occur where it would be a hardship to inflict even the least of these penalties on an offender, but the honorable Senator knows perfectly well that in cases of such hardship it is very easy to apply for executive clemency, and it never would be withheld in a case which had merits. There are hardships in every criminal law. If the objection which is raised against this amendment is a good one, why would it not apply in the case of murder? Still, in cases of murder, I am sure there are very few States in the Union that do not fix a specific and minimum punishment for the crime; and we all know that it frequently happens, such is the fallibility of human nature, such is the infirmity of juries and courts, that a person may be convicted of that heinous crime who is absolutely innocent of it. There have been numerous cases of men who have been taken to the scaffold and executed, as innocent as you and I of a charge of murder.

But in this case it seems to me we ought to hold up to the view of the offender the certainty of punishment, the absolute certainty that if he is convicted of any one of these offenses created by the statute he will at least receive some punishment. Otherwise you but hold out to him, as it seems to me, the temptation to use the ill-gotten gains which he has in his pocket, and which he has been filching from the honest soldier, for the purpose of influencing the very court itself which is to try him, for the very purpose of bribing the tribunal before whom he may be brought. It strikes me that we ought to let him understand that he is to undergo some punishment absolutely unless he can make out such a case to the Executive as will entitle him to executive clemency.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The question is, I believe, on imposing a minimum punishment in this case wherever there may be a conviction. In the case of a great many bills that have been before the Senate at this session, a minimum punishment has been stricken out, upon the policy of allowing punishments to be exactly proportioned to the character of the offense as may be shown on the trial. Believing that to be a good policy as a general rule in our legislation, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Farwell, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlisle, Cowan, Davis, Foster, Hale, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Powell, Saulsbury, Trumbull, and Wright—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Doolittle, Foot, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Waide, Wilkinson, and Willey—14.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In that same section, in the second line, I move to strike out the words "or other person." The section now subjects "any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person," who may present an intoxicated or insane man as a substitute with the penalties of military trial by court-martial. I have suggested this amendment to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who does not see any objection to it. It leaves the military law operating on recruiting agents and substitute brokers, and subjects them to a trial by court-martial, and to the penalty presented. Now, as I hear from my friend from Michigan, in an undertone, that he is opposed to the amendment, I want to state my reasons for moving it.

One of the most difficult questions that have ever presented themselves to the judiciary of this country in all the States to settle is, what is insanity? There are so many kinds of insanity, moral insanity and insanity of various sorts, that it has been found to be one of the most embarrassing questions that have been presented to the judiciary in this country in all the States. This question, that taxes the learning of the wisest men in the States, is to be subjected by this section of the bill to the action and decision of a court-martial, and the whole people of the United States who offer substitutes are to be subjected to trial upon the question of the insanity of those substitutes before a court-martial composed of seven members, where four may convict, the judge advocate or prosecuting officer of the Government constituting part of the court and being with them during their deliberations.

Then there is another question equally difficult to settle, when is a man intoxicated? and that is to be subjected to inquiry by a court-martial, and if an individual offers a substitute that a majority of four out of the seven members of a court-martial find was intoxicated, and he knew it, he is to go to the penitentiary for two years, for you must remember that the punishments by imprisonment following the sentences of courts-martial are executed by imprisonment in penitentiaries, and it is just the same as if the law said they should be subjected to imprisonment not exceeding two years at hard labor in any penitentiary. These are the most delicate questions, and the most difficult to be decided that could possibly be presented to any judicial tribunal.

And in addition to these very difficult questions, what is insanity and what is intoxication, there is another question which nobody short of Infinite Wisdom can pronounce certainly upon, and that is, that the individual knew that the substitute he offered was insane or was intoxicated. It seems to me that if you put this penalty upon the substitute broker, upon the recruiting agent, upon those who go into that business, you go quite far enough, without subjecting everybody that offers a substitute to such a penalty before such a tribunal. I remember not many years ago attending a trial where the question was whether a man was intoxicated or not. One set of witnesses on one side testified that he was an intemperate man and had been so for years, that they had known him, and that he had so reduced and impaired his intellect by intoxication that he was not capable to do business. That was the testimony of the witnesses on one side. Then there came up another set of witnesses on the other side who testified that they had known him equally as well as these other witnesses for a long period of time, some twenty years, and that they had never once seen him intoxicated in all their lives. What was the difficulty? They had different ideas of what intoxication was. Some persons judge a man to be intoxicated the moment he takes a single glass of alcoholic drink, and others hold that he is not intoxicated as long as he can walk a track, or very nearly a track.

I do not want to trifle about these things; but I think that this extending of the authority of military tribunals over citizens not necessarily connected with the public service, has been carried quite as far as the public service requires. But in this case a citizen desirous of doing his duty brings a substitute in good faith and offers him and he is accepted; afterward it is alleged that the substitute was intoxicated. There is no measure or standard by which that can be tried; it exists only in the judgment of men. Some men would hold that he was perfectly sober, while other men equally intelligent and equally honest might think he was very much intoxicated. That question is to be submitted to a court-martial, and if a majority, four out of seven, find that the substitute was intoxicated, the man who put him in is to be subjected to two years' imprisonment in the penitentiary or a fine of $1,000. It is an enormous penalty that may be inflicted upon a decision of one of the nicest questions that could possibly be presented to the consideration of any tribunal, and one that, as I said before, has engaged the attention and taxed the faculties of the wisest and best men that have ever tried cases. I think such questions legitimately belong to the civil tribunals, and that it is not safe and prudent to transfer them in the case of citizens, men who come honestly to perform their duty, to the judgment of a court-martial.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope, sir, the words will not be stricken out, but will be permitted to stand. I see no danger such as that which seems to be apprehended by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. Let us read the clause again, and then we shall understand it:

That any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person, who shall enlist, or cause to be enlisted as a volunteer or substitute, any insane person, or person in a condition of intoxication, or a deserter from the military or naval service, knowing him to be such.

The whole question depends upon the knowledge of the offender. If he enlists a drunken person or an insane person or a deserter, knowing him to be drunk or a deserter or insane at the time of committing the act, then he is punishable; and if he does not know him to be such at the time he enlists him or causes him to be enlisted, he is not punishable. It seems to me that there is no danger, under this language, of an innocent person being punished for doing any one of these three criminal acts. The question will be, in each case, did the party know the person enlisted to be a deserter, or know him to be drunk, or know him to be insane at the time he enlisted him? I submit that that language, "knowing him to be such," cannot be misapprehended or misconstrued by anybody. We all know what is meant by it, especially those of us who belong to the profession of the law.

Mr. HALE. The honorable Senator has not practiced before courts-martial.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire remarks that I have not practiced in the military courts. That is very true; but I think I know enough of military law to know that the rules of evidence are precisely the same in a military court as in a civil court. I hope, therefore, as no harm can come of this language, that the clause will be retained and not stricken out.

Mr. COWAN. It is precisely because of the clause of the section relied on by the Senator from Michigan that I think these words should be stricken out. To find the scienter is one of the most difficult questions that ever come before a court, and one that a flaxseed court or an arbitration or a military commission would be just as likely to go wrong on, and perhaps more likely than another.

Mr. President, there is a broader ground on which this section is objectionable. The section relates to a "recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person." I suppose the "recruiting agent" is not technically an officer in our service. He is a person employed by the State, perhaps, to recruit, but he is not an officer in the United States service; because I find that the fourth section provides for the punishment of an officer who musters into service these persons improperly, so that this recruiting agent is simply a private individual. Substitute brokers are private individuals, and "any other person" is unquestionably so. Now, I should like the honorable Senator from Michigan to reconcile the provisions of this section with the provisions of the Constitution I am about to read. If these persons are guilty of anything they are guilty of a crime; if the section is to operate at all, it will be to operate to deprive them of their liberty. The Constitution provides that—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses, against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

Now, Mr. President, this section of the bill is to operate or may operate on any one of us. If we are liable to be drafted, and offer a substitute, as almost all men, all citizens, some time or other during this war, who are liable to be drafted, may be obliged to do, and questions should arise as to whether that substitute was insane, whether he was intoxicated, or whether he was a deserter from the military or naval service, and we knew it at the time we offered him, that constitutes crime. If it was absolutely certain that we were guilty, I would not object to the punishment, and I would not care much who inflicted it. It is the difficulty of ascertaining the guilt which renders the precautions necessary, and which has always rendered all these precautions necessary.

If the honorable Senator from Michigan were charged with an offense of this kind, let us see what safeguards the law has thrown around him for the purpose of securing to him a fair trial. In the first place he could not be put upon his trial until a grand jury of his own immediate neighbors decided that there was sufficient cause to put him on his trial. There is no power in this Government anywhere, there ought not to be any power, to put him upon his trial unless through the intervention of a grand jury. After the grand jury consents that he shall be tried, and after they find the form and manner in which the offense shall be stated, (and it must be stated so perfectly as to protect him from any subsequent prosecution, if he should be either convicted or acquitted, a thing which a prosecution before a court-martial would not do,) then he has the right to be tried by a petit jury; and a petit jury selected how? Selected by the War Department? Selected by his commanding officer? Not at all; that jury is to be selected according to the forms of the common law; and when it is selected he has a right during the impaneling of it to challenge for "fear, favor, and affection;" he has a right to have put upon that jury nobody but true, good, and impartial men; and then he has the right to be confronted with the witnesses; and all that in the district where he lives.

Now, Mr. President, suppose a man in one of the western counties of Pennsylvania is charged with this offense, and he is carried away to Harrisburg to be tried before a military commission, I ask what chance has he to a fair trial, even waiving the protection which the Constitution provides for him, and which he is entitled to invoke, certainly in the United States Senate if he is entitled to it anywhere; what chance has he? He has no voice in the selection of this tribunal; it is appointed by people who may desire his conviction, who may have determined upon it beforehand, and may have determined upon it for many reasons. Are they men learned in the law? Certainly there is no lawyer in the Senate who would trust the trial of a criminal case before any judge, unless he was a man learned in the law. Is there not such a thing as being imbued with the spirit of the law, feeling not only in the brain, but in the heart of the man, all those great principles which have been infused for long ages into English law, and which themselves are the guarantees of English liberty? Surely no man imbued with the spirit of that law would ever for one moment intrust the trial of a citizen charged with crime to any other than a judge learned in the law; and surely, I say, Mr. President, and I speak it in the spirit of that law, no man so imbued would ever trust the finding of a fact in such cases to any other than a jury of the vicinage. If it were certain that all people who are arrested on charges of this kind were guilty, there would be no necessity for these safeguards; but that is just what the law never presumes. The law always presumes innocence until guilt is shown, and the presumption of guilt must be such as to exclude every other hypothesis than that of guilt. How would you make a military commission understand that? You cannot. Nobody can.

Very well; now this man is dragged away from the district in which the offense is committed, he is taken away two hundred miles from home, and he is put on his trial before this extra-judicial tribunal, this tribunal which can have no legal existence under our Constitution, as it can have none in any civilized country that I know of to-day, either on this continent or in Europe. He is put upon his trial; how is he to get process to compel the attendance of witnesses? He is dependent on the mercy of the tribunal for that, because there is no law which compels them to grant it, unless this bill may provide for it here. But how is he to get his witnesses? How is he to know what witnesses are to be there against him? If he does know, he may be too poor to summon and to bring his witnesses a distance of one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles and detain them there waiting till his trial comes on, or until it pleases this military commission to award him his trial.

Mr. President, I am sorry to say that this is no fancy sketch. This is a thing which is occurring to-day all over this country, to the wonder and astonishment of the civilized world, and without the slightest necessity whatever. We enacted here a few years ago a law by which we made resisting the draft an offense, and we gave to the regularly constituted courts of the country jurisdiction over all offenders against that act.

Yet what has been done almost within the very shadow of the court-house, and almost within a stone's throw of the judge having jurisdiction? And that judge is the creature of the Administration; the marshal is its creature, and that marshal has a right to select jurors.

Gentlemen may say that some of the jurors may not be loyal. The marshal has a right to go among his own friends and select those who are truly and sincerely loyal. I say that within a stone's throw of all this machinery men have been taken up charged with these offenses, which are merely offenses at common law, and they have been carried away hundreds of miles from home, and they have been tried before military commissions. What has been the consequence? In one case, very well known to my colleague, partially known to myself, upon the testimony of a suborned witness, upon the testimony of a man who was himself a deserter, and who had himself got up all the resistance there was to the draft, the conviction was procured of a man who had actually gone to the meeting called to resist the draft to get that meeting to desist, to disperse quietly, and go to their homes, because there was no difficulty or danger. Upon the oath of that man, a deserter, a military commission two or three hundred miles away from the home of the parties, away from where the proper testimony could be gotten, innocent men were convicted; and it was only at last when the people of the neighborhood became aroused to the necessity of leaving their district and leaving the place where they had been in the habit of having justice administered to them, and going, some of them at their own expense, all the way to the State capital, that they were able to satisfy the military commission that this man was utterly unworthy of credit and that his statements were wholly false. What then? Some forty or more men had been arrested; they had been carried to Fort Mifflin; they had been shut up in a case-mate; one of them had died; another had lost his health, I believe irrevocably; another had become insane; and one or two on trial had been convicted. Then the rest were doled out and dismissed; two, three, four, half a dozen at a time, so as to get clear of them without any public demonstration.

Mr. President, I think we have had entirely too much of that already. Where is the necessity for withdrawing the trial of offenses from the courts of the United States, I would ask? I admit that there is a strong argument against submitting these cases to the State courts often, because it may be that juries would be unwilling to convict; but that reason fails entirely when you allege it against the United States courts, because, in those courts, if there is a loyal jury within the whole district, the marshal may summon it, and may have it there for the trial of offenses.

But again, the instinct of self-preservation ought to impel us to reject any such provision as this. Are we to give up all our liberties here? What for? I might be willing to suspend for a while the operation of the laws which secure mine, if it were necessary. If any man can satisfy me that it would in any way help to put down rebellion, help to strengthen our arms, help to make the country stronger, I might agree to it; but, Mr. President, it has the very contrary effect; good people know it; good people lament it, and I am sorry to say people are beginning to be astonished that we sit here, and not only permit this, but provide for it.

Take a substitute broker, and that is the very worst type of the class—I think there is not a man in the world who has less sympathy with a substitute broker than I have; take a substitute broker, if you please, the vilest of mankind, still he is a citizen, and he is entitled to a fair trial; he has a right, to use a very popular phrase now, to stand upon an equality before the law. The law presumes him innocent until his guilt is established. Take, I say a substitute broker who commits one of the offenses enumerated in this section; what objection can there be to trying him in the United States district court? If you have no confidence in a jury of the vicinity, where is your Government gone? Where does it exist? In whom will you confide? If you cannot govern this people through itself and by an appeal to its own reason and its own good sense, what despotism are you going to build up that can govern it? Do you think you can overturn this great fabric that has been built up here at such an expense of blood and treasure for hundreds of years—that you can overturn it all, and all its safeguards, and substitute in the room and stead of it a packed military tribunal, in the choice of which you can have no voice? Mr. President, it is just like laying the ax to the very root of the tree; it is like digging away the very corner-stone on which the temple stands. Is it not enough that it is suspended within the military lines? Is it not enough that these great privileges are for the time suspended within the actual lines of the Army? The people of the loyal States, the people who have been bepraised in this Hall for their loyalty and their virtue and their liberality in the great sacrifices that they have made, have made them for what? To be tried by military tribunals, to be ridden down by despotic governments and irresponsible dictators? If the people are fighting for nothing better than that, there is an end of it. But, sir, the people are not making this tremendous struggle for that. They are making, as Burke would say, this great struggle that twelve men may be got in the jury box whenever a man's life, liberty, or property is in jeopardy; and yet here is a provision to take away the jury box from the people, because "any other person" is a phrase broad enough to cover all persons, and this penalty would necessarily, if the tribunal had any character, render the convict infamous for life. I do not know but that now it might increase the sympathies of the people for him, and perhaps render him famous; but if the tribunal had any character to give force and effect to its decrees and findings, it would render him infamous.

I am opposed to this provision. We have courts for the trial of our people constituted according to the Constitution and laws, known to the people, willingly obeyed by the people, to which the people are accustomed; but I would never, never institute a tribunal outside of them for the trial of any offense of which they could have cognizance and take jurisdiction.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania takes the ground that the clause of the bill which is now under discussion is violative of the Constitution of the United States, and he tells us, in that tone of earnestness which is peculiar to him, that courts-martial and military commissions are tribunals unknown to the Constitution. Upon this assumption is based the denunciatory part of his speech in which he has indulged in so much vituperation against the mode in which military justice has been administered during this war.

Is it true that this clause violates the Constitution? Is it true that all the convictions we have had before courts-martial and military commissions have been coram non jure, void for want of legal authority? Is it true that the Executive Administration, in carrying out their policy in the prosecution of this war, and in the punishment of offenses committed in the military service, have been and still are mere usurpers and tyrants, as they have been characterized by the Senator from Pennsylvania? Upon what principle of construction is it, let me ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, that he makes the broad assertion that courts-martial and military commissions are unknown to the Constitution, and that all their proceedings are so many wanton tyrannies and violations of the fundamental law? He tells us that the prohibition is to be found in article five and article six of the amendments, and he reads from each of these to bolster up his assertion. We need but read a very small portion of the fifth article to see plainly that what the honorable Senator has said upon this subject is the merest assumption, the merest begging of the question. Article five declares:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

The Senator forgets the exception which is plainly embodied in this clause of the amendments. He overlooks the exception, I think very ingeniously, and instead of reading the clause with that exception in, he reads it without; and, of course, according to his style of reading the instrument, he makes this clause declare that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury," and stops there.

Now, sir, in the first place, let me say, the offenses created by the present bill are not, in the sense of the Constitution, infamous crimes. Were the fifth amendment the only provision on the subject, we might try any crime which is not infamous by a military commission and without a grand jury; we might proceed to punish all such crimes on mere information without indictment, and try the information without the intervention of a petit jury, if we saw fit—I mean to say if this amendment of the Constitution were the only clause concerned. But, sir, it is perfectly apparent from the language itself of this amendment that the Constitution has in view the trial of a certain class of offenses by tribunals other than those in which a jury intervenes. It is certain, from the language itself, that it was expected that military offenses would be tried by courts-martial and military commissions.

If this be the true construction to be given to the Constitution, all that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania has said in denunciation of the Administration for employing such tribunals is without foundation. We may try offenses committed in the military forces of the United States, or committed in the militia when in the actual service, by courts-martial or by military commissions. We have used and employed this species of tribunals ever since the foundation of the Government, and they are just as well known and recognized in the code of American law as are courts in which juries intervene. They are just as necessary to the public service. Why, then, are we told with so much emphasis that military courts and military commissions are usurpations upon the liberties of the people?

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania appears to regard the findings of a jury in the trial of criminals as infallible. According to his ideas it is impossible that a jury of twelve men from the vicinity in the finding of a fact can possibly err. Now, the experiences of that learned Senator, like my own, I dare say, teach him that the findings of juries in criminal cases are among the most uncertain means of ascertaining facts; and although undoubtedly the preservation of trial by jury is still regarded as a precious privilege to the American citizen, it is nevertheless true that the legal mind of the country is coming more and more to the conclusion that, after all, facts may be well ascertained by persons other than jurors.

I hold it to be competent for Congress to punish as a military offense any act which is connected with the military service of the United States, and to do this by court-martial; that contractors who enter into contracts with the Government for furnishing supplies may be thus punished; that any and every act performed by any and every person, by which the military service of the United States shall be directly or even remotely affected, presents a case arising under this amendment, and may be thus punished. Such has been the practice of the Government for years past. Such is its practice now, and has been during the war; and I believe it to be founded on the soundest principles of constitutional law. We all know very well that it will be utterly impossible to inflict adequate punishment upon the commission of military offenses if it is necessary to resort to the cumbrous machinery of juries and other instrumentalities used in civil tribunals. It would be utterly impossible to bring to justice the hundredth part of the offenders connected with the Army if it were necessary to indict and try and punish them in the counties in which the offense was committed. There must be something more summary.

The Senator from Pennsylvania reads also from the sixth article of the amendments, "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district," &c. Certainly, if there be a class of offenses, as there undoubtedly is, which may be punished by proceedings other than trial by jury, then that class of offenses is excepted from the generality of the language of the sixth amendment of the Constitution, so that this particular clause has no bearing whatever upon the argument.

Now, sir, I do not think it necessary, I will not say becoming, that Senators should go out of their way to make attacks upon the Administration in relation to the administration of military justice, unless the case is a flagrant one. I have yet to learn of a single case of great injustice having been committed by the military tribunals that have sat during the existence of this war. There must be justice in the military service. There must be some way of bringing offenders to justice, to hold them to their criminal responsibility. The Constitution gives ample authority to Congress to enact laws upon the subject, and I think Senators would better consult the interests of the country, if, instead of carping at the military administration of the Government, they would devise some means by which military justice can be meted out better than it is at present, if its present administration be as faulty as it is represented.

For my own part, I think the present bill is a very necessary one, and especially this penal portion of it, which punishes not only recruiting agents and substitute brokers, but all other persons who shall commit any one of the crimes which are defined in section three. We all know that these impositions have been practiced daily throughout the country, not only by substitute brokers and agents for recruiting, but by other persons who have lent their aid toward their accomplishment. There is many a man and many a boy who has been entrapped into enlisting when he was in a state of downright intoxication; many a case in which a deserter has been knowingly reënlisted, and in which all the crimes mentioned in this section have been perpetrated.

I think Congress is but doing its duty in defining these crimes and affixing specific and severe penalties upon them; and I hope the words will not be stricken out.

Mr. HALE. I confess, sir, that I have been not a little surprised at the speech of the honorable Senator from Michigan. If I made myself understood in what I asked before of the Senate, I think it will need no illustration and no argument. What is proposed by this law? I am content, for the purpose of the argument to-day, that every contractor, every substitute broker, every agent for recruiting, and every man that in any capacity voluntarily connects himself with the naval or military service, should by Congress be made amenable to this law; but I am not willing to see adopted a provision like this, that covers the whole land, that subjects to its operation every man within certain ages who is liable to military duty, and who is compelled to render it; I am not willing that by virtue of this compulsion which the Government has forced upon him, you shall at the same time tear him away from the protection of the ordinary tribunals of the land, and subject him to the tender mercies of a military trial before a court-martial hundreds and hundreds of miles away from the place where he lives.

Mr. President, I protest, and I will protest here always while I have the power to do so, against the right of the Senator from Michigan or any other man on God's earth to accuse me of carping at the Administration or opposing them, because I stand here to-day to invoke for the humblest of my constituents the protection of that Constitution which was won by the bravery of their fathers ages ago.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg—

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield the floor to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HALE. I would rather not.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor, unless he yields.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish merely to say that in my remark I had no allusion to the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from New Hampshire does not yield the floor.

Mr. HALE. I cannot tell to whom it alluded. I heard the remark and I heard it with pain, and I said to myself, "Great God, it is possible in this period of the history of the world, in this Senate, in this nation, at this day, that an attempt to throw the shield and the axis of the Constitution around the humblest of the citizens who owe it allegiance and to whom the Government owes protection, can be denounced as an attack upon the Administration!" If the Administration have the heart and the feeling and the sentiment which I think they have, they would feel that an attempt to shield them by such an appeal as that would be the grossest attack that could be made upon them.

Mr. President, when this war is over, if we shall have saved our country and lost our liberties, it will be a matter of speculation by the philosopher and the historians to settle with posterity how much was gained and lost by the result. Is there any necessity for this enactment? Take, for instance, one of the humblest citizens of the humble State that I represent, one of the hard-working, hard-fisted, tax-paying yeomanry of New Hampshire. By virtue of your draft he is compelled to do military service or to furnish a substitute. He comes in the honest discharge of a duty not voluntarily assumed, but imposed upon him by the Government, and brings a substitute. He is no substitute broker; he is no recruiting agent; he is no man who has voluntarily connected himself with the military service; but he comes forward in obedience to a duty which he cannot resist, and brings a substitute, and that substitute is accepted. By and by, in the course of time, it may be three months, six months, or a year hence, some malicious, some evil-disposed person may suggest "that young man whom that drafted soldier brought was intoxicated at the time he was enlisted." What then? Shall you send an inquiry into the vicinity, into the State, into the district? Oh no, sir; but a mere arbitrary order is issued, and he is seized in New Hampshire and hurried to Philadelphia it may be, to New York, to any other place—God only knows where—away from home, away from his neighbors, away from any of the protections to which he is entitled. He is arbitrarily hurried and put to trial before a court-martial, and if four out of the seven think upon the whole that the man was intoxicated, thereupon the citizen of New Hampshire is sentenced to two years imprisonment in the penitentiary at hard labor.

The honorable Senator says that is not an infamous offense. You make it infamous by the punishment that you annex to it. Now let us look at the provision of the Constitution. I do not know that it is in order to quote the Constitution at this period of our history. [Laughter.] I know that we got to such a stage in New Hampshire once that if you quoted the constitution of the State the judge would laugh in your face. There is a provision on this subject in the original Constitution, independent of the amendments:

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury"—

"All crimes," not infamous crimes, but the trial of all crimes, shall be by jury—

"and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

That has not been repealed by the amendments subsequently adopted. Then the fifth and sixth articles of the amendments make further provision on the subject. The fifth article provides that—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

Now let me ask if a man in the discharge of a duty imposed upon him by law (that is, to go and render military service or to offer a substitute) is, within the purview of that provision of the Constitution, in the land or naval forces or in actual service in the militia in time of war or public danger? I venture to say, with all that has been said staring me in the face, that the condition of things contemplated by this clause has never occurred in the United States of America. There has never been an extension of the liability to military courts-martial beyond that of making contractors liable; but citizens outside of that provision are not liable.

But the Senator says that everybody who has anything to do, directly or indirectly, with the land or naval service, or with raising men for the service, may by Congress be subjected to this provision. That is broad enough; that covers the whole land, because everybody is obliged to pay taxes, and taxes are raised for the purpose of supporting your Army and Navy.

Mr. HOWARD. Allow me to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. HALE. I give way.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to say that this comment of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire upon what I said is unfair and gratuitous, for if he had listened to what I did say he could not have drawn any such conclusion as he seems to have drawn. I did not intimate that any citizen who was so remotely connected with military affairs as to be a mere tax-payer could therefore be subjected to trial by court-martial. It is a mere chimera of the Senator's own brain.

Mr. HALE. My statement was not that the Senator did say so, but I said it would be a fair inference from the premises that he laid down. What is this furnishing a substitute? Nothing but a substitute for a duty in the nature of a tax; and if you may subject the man offered as a substitute to a military tribunal, so you may the tax-payer, by the same reasoning.

The honorable Senator has said some things that it pained me to hear. He says that trial by jury is one of the most uncertain modes of coming at the truth in criminal cases, and that the public mind is fast coming to the conviction that there may be some other modes of ascertaining the truth. Mr. President, I have heard that doctrine before; I have argued against it, talked against it, written against it, in season and out of season. And, Mr. President, let me tell my honorable friend that it is a sentiment that I did hope never to hear uttered by any man for whom I have so much respect as I have for him. I know the trial by jury is odious, odious to the oppressor and the friends of oppression the world over. It is the great safeguard of liberty; sprung up gradually, perfected through all the bloody history through which English liberty made her way, until it culminated on this continent in the enunciations of the American Constitution, fought at every step. I know, sir, that whenever despotism would strike a blow at the liberties of the world the trial by jury has been one of the great obstacles that have stood in the path against which despotism has thrown itself. It was because Charles I and his minions did not like trial by jury that they instituted the special court which they did, and which resulted not in overthrowing this great bulwark of constitutional liberty, but in bringing the author of those innovations and those oppressions to the block. That was the result there; and the infamous Jeffreys having the same opinions, and carrying them into practice in his cruel and bloody history, at length well-nigh met, at the hands of an infuriated mob, the just judgment of his infamous crime.

Mr. President, if trial by jury is overthrown in this country, take the rest. I would not lift my hand, nor open my mouth, nor counsel one of my constituents to shed a drop of blood or pay a dollar of treasure if the Constitution is to be preserved emasculated of this great safeguard of liberty. In these times, when so much is demanded and so much is at stake, with a generous confidence I would give to the Administration almost everything that they want. I would consent, and I have consented, that the habeas corpus may be suspended, and these extraordinary tribunals may be erected and instituted for the trial of everybody that voluntarily comes forward and connects himself with the public service. But, sir, if you are going to throw a drag-net over the land, if you are going to bring in this whole people and subject them to the penalties that may be inflicted by military tribunals and these courts-martial, then the last step in the humiliation and the degradation of the country is taken, and we shall be left fit instruments for any despotism that the bold and the lawless may see proper to establish over us.

Mr. President, where is the necessity for this provision at this time? The honorable Senator from Michigan says that he does not know of a solitary case of abuse of this sort—

Mr. HOWARD. Where great injustice has been done.

Mr. HALE. I will not say that I do know anything of that sort, because I do not want to make any issue with anybody on this subject. I do not know but that all our public men are as pure as any public men in the world. I believe they are. I believe, as I have heretofore said on this floor and elsewhere, that our Chief Magistrate, the President of the United States, is an honest and patriotic man. But, sir, I will read an extract from a letter written by a high officer of this Government to another officer in contemplation of a naval court-martial that was about to be set on foot. It is as follows:

"I have been summoned before the select committee of the Senate for investigating frauds in naval supplies, and if the wool don't fly it will not be my fault. Norton, the Navy agent, has complained that I have interfered with his business. He and his friend are dead cocks in the pit. We have got a sure thing on them in the tin business. They that dance must pay the fiddler."

That, sir, is from a high officer of your Government, written in reference to a prosecution that he was about getting up. I will not say that any injustice was done by that court-martial; but I will say this, that I do think it is barely possible that a public protection might have been instituted with purer motives than those which are manifested by the extract that I have read to you. But it is not necessary to quote instances. The question is, is there anything that makes it necessary to go so much further than you have gone, and to subject the whole people to this tribunal and to its penalties? Mr. President, the wisdom of our fathers and the wisdom of the world has been taxed in all past ages to build up a code of laws for the protection of rights and the punishment of wrongs, denominated the common law. In my humble judgment, human wisdom has not yet gone beyond it; and I shall be slow and loth to surrender any of these privileges which are not absolutely necessary to the better welfare, to the maintenance, of the public service, to its integrity, and the vindication of its authority against any aggressor. But I do not look upon this case as one of that sort. I look upon this case as a dangerous precedent, going beyond everything that has been attempted heretofore, and as such I oppose it.

Mr. WILSON. I am very anxious to have the vote on this bill to-day. I know the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is after us with his measures. I am very anxious, therefore, for action now, and I shall be very brief in what I have to say.

This measure is not asked for by the Administration. The provision of this section is demanded by humanity and justice to right the wrongs of hundreds and thousands of our countrymen. You cannot comprehend the height and depth of the iniquities that are perpetrated in this country to-day upon the people by persons engaged in putting men into our armies. The American slave trade, I think, pales before the crimes that are committed in this country upon hundreds and thousands of our people; and there are to-day hundreds and thousands of men in our armies upon whom the grossest outrages have been perpetrated in putting them there.

The heavy bounties offered by the Government for substitutes or enlisted men have stimulated the cupidity of a great many persons who are simply seeking for money and have no sense of right or justice. A large number of men, governed entirely by the hope of getting money, have entered into this brokerage business. Men are seduced from insane hospitals and put into the Army. Men are taken out of your jails charged with crime, and in fact charged with crime and put into jails in order to be taken out and put in the Army. Men are enlisted, and then induced to run away, and then enlisted again, and over and over again, for the benefit of persons engaged in filling up quotas, but not in filling our armies. Men are drugged, are intoxicated, and men in a condition unfit to decide any thing are put into our Army. More than all that, the bounties promised them are taken from them. Many a man has enlisted, and for whom has been paid a bounty of several hundred dollars, some as high as eight hundred or a thousand dollars, and he has received but one hundred and fifty or two hundred dollars of it.

The object of this measure was simply to correct these outrages of agents and substitute brokers. I do not wish to strike the mass of people. They have committed no offense. I do not wish to reach the cases of men who put substitutes in the Army for themselves properly. I do not believe that this act, if it should pass in the form in which we propose it, would ever be used to the wrong of anybody. It is possible that it might be; and I would be willing to confine it entirely to those professional substitute brokers or recruiting agents, men who are engaged in the business; and therefore I would consent readily to strike out the words "or other person," and confine it to a class of men that have come to be mere professional men. I understand that these substitute brokers in the city of New York have a brokers' board and have regular meetings, where they consult together and decide upon this matter, in humble imitation of the brokers' board in Wall street; and I suppose they regulate the price of men very much as the brokers of Wall street regulate the price of gold and stocks.

This provision has been sanctioned by some officers who have had large experience in raising men, men who have seen these outrages, and I have brought it forward simply to protect the mass of our people, the unwary, who are misled, against a class of professional men who are stimulated to commit these outrages by these enormous bounties that have been offered for men in the service. I should be willing to strike out the words "or other person" and confine it to these professional men. They are the men I want to reach. As to taking them before the common tribunals of the country and convicting them, I have no idea that that would amount to anything. I want something or other that will reach the case and do justice, practical, substantial justice, to these men and to our people. I therefore will be willing to assent to this modification.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to inquire what is the motion now pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To strike out the words "or other persons" in the second line of the third section of the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. It is not subject to further amendment now, I understand?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not at present.

Mr. CONNESS. If the words "or other person" should be stricken out you would have to prove, before you could get a conviction, that the party offending was an agent or substitute broker; you would have to fix a technical designation and employment to him; and I question very much whether that could be done in one case out of every fifty who would offend, as described by the chairman, and as is known to every person in the country who has paid attention to this class of offenses. I was going to offer an amendment, but as it is not now in order I will simply content myself by calling attention to the change I prefer, and which I think will obviate the objections made by the Senator from New Hampshire, and others. It is to insert after the word "who," in line two, the words "for pay or profit," so that the section thus amended would read:

"That any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person, who for pay or profit shall enlist or cause to be enlisted," &c.

Thus, if I furnished a substitute, I should be simply doing what the law gave me a right to do, not for pay or profit, but to furnish a soldier, and you would not be required in every case to establish by proof the character of a technical—what shall I say?—scoundrel, upon me before I could be convicted. If the other amendment should be withdrawn I will offer this. If not, I will offer it afterward.

Mr. HALE. I am content to withdraw my amendment, and take the one proposed by the Senator from California.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws his amendment, and the question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California, to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I rise merely to inquire of my friend from California whether he thinks his amendment as now worded would cover that very sorrowful case presented to us by the eloquent Senator from New Hampshire—the case of a person who himself having been drafted should present to the proper recruiting officer a person who afterward should turn out to be drunk at the time of enlistment, or insane? Would it cover the case of a man who has been himself drafted? Let me read it:

"That any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person, who for pay or profit shall," &c.

Does the person who has himself been drafted procure a substitute for his own pay or his own profit? Would it include that class of individuals?

Mr. CONNESS. I apprehend not.

Mr. HOWARD. I think it would not. I think, therefore, that the very sorrowful case presented by my honorable friend from New Hampshire is not covered by this amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I apprehend the argument of my friend from Michigan is entirely facetious in its character; not real.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of interest to the argument of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and I agree with him as to the enormity of the offense to be corrected. I am satisfied that he does not hold it in more detestation than I do. But that is altogether beside the argument. The argument is not as to the enormity of the offense; the argument is not as to the special penalty to be inflicted on its commission; but the argument is as to the proper mode of determining the offense and the proper court having jurisdiction of it.

Now I wish to say a word to the honorable Senator from Michigan; and I wish to say it not only to him but to some others who are in the habit of doing it. There are certain gentlemen on this floor whose retort and argument, whenever they are opposed in anything, is that the other side is opposing the Administration, or that the other side has not the interest of the country at heart, and a hundred things of that kind. Mr. President, it is true, that to answer such an argument is to give it a consideration to which it is not entitled. There is no way of treating it, perhaps, so well as that of giving it that silent contempt which it merits. Do Senators think when they make this argument that they frighten anybody? Do they think that they convince anybody? And what is most extraordinary is, that it so happens that it is very frequently made by those who themselves are almost continually throwing obstacles in the way of the Administration and quarreling with it day after day, and assailing it in its very vital measures and principles. I think the honorable Senator from Michigan is not entirely free from that charge. My record is here. I have never thrown a single obstacle in the way of the Administration. I have never drawn a single resolution of inquiry in regard to it except one. I have never assailed any of its political projects. I have resisted these attempts to innovate upon the common law of the country. I have resisted these attempts to overturn the Constitution of the country by the enactment of statutes which it does not warrant; but in doing so, I am not opposing the Administration, because I do not understand the Administration to seek this power. I have never seen any recommendation from the President, or from any of his Cabinet officers, desiring that such extraordinary power should be put in their hands as this bill would confer upon them.

But if there is anything which can astonish a man more than another, it is to hear a lawyer upon this floor assert that these cases are within the exceptions to article five of the amendments to the Constitution; or, in other words, the Senator from Michigan argues here with all the gravity imaginable, and it would be a capital joke if it was not in earnest, that these cases of the recruiting agent, the substitute broker, and any other person who offers a substitute for enlistment, are cases in the land and naval service of the country, and therefore they are not entitled to the protection which is afforded to all other people by that clause of the Constitution. I could not conceive it possible that there was a man in the country who did not know what was meant by "cases in the land or naval service of the country." We have what we call Articles of War for the governance of those cases. To whom do they apply?

"That from and after the passage of this act?"

That is, the act of April 10, 1866.

"The following shall be the rules and articles by which the Army of the United States shall be governed?"

Those rules and articles of war cover all cases which arise within the land or naval service; but no civilian can be taken from his home and subjected to the jurisdiction of tribunals created under the Articles of War. The soldier cannot be subjected to them until he first agrees to submit to them by entering into the service of the United States; and it is required, in order to subject him to them that he must make a special agreement before he can be punished under them. I ask in all earnestness, does any man in his sober senses believe that a recruiting agent is in the land or naval service of the United States? Does he receive pay from the United States? Does he bear its commission? What connection has he with it any more than any other man has who undertakes to solicit recruits for the Army? I should be ashamed, after the description of substitute brokers which I heard from the Senator from Massachusetts, to suppose that there was a being in the land, or naval, or even the civil service of the United States of America, so terribly destitute of everything which constitutes true manhood as a substitute broker. Certainly there can be no such individual as that in the service of this Government in any of its departments; and if there is, I think the officer who has charge of him should put him out immediately.

The ground I take is, and I assert it broadly, that no man not in the land or naval service of the United States can be tried by any military commission legally; and I assert further, that any military commission that undertakes to try a citizen not in the land or naval service is responsible; and if they cause his death, whether by their sentence, or by their imprisonment, or anything of that kind, they are guilty of murder, and if the laws of the country are properly administered, and administered in the spirit of the men who made them, the men who ordered the court-martial and the men who sat upon it would be convicted; and why? For the best reasons in the world; for the protection of human liberty and its safeguard under the Constitution under which we live.

I hope Senators will pause before they adopt this section. I am perfectly willing that any penalty they may see fit to inflict upon the substitute broker shall be inflicted. I am willing to make it death, if you please. If a broker will take an insane man out of a hospital and attempt to put him into the Army as a soldier, I am willing, if you please, to make the offense death. If he will drug a minor, or a weak man, and induce him to enter into the Army by that means, make that death, if you please. But what I do object to, and what I shall always resist, is, that that offense shall be tried anywhere except in the proper constitutional courts.

Senators say you cannot convict in the proper constitutional courts. Sir, do they reflect when they say that, what a slur they cast upon the country? Do they reflect that if that be true we have never been so disgraced before? If it be that in the courts of the United States a man charged with a high offense can never in any case be convicted where his guilt is clearly proved, then, Mr. President, as I remarked in the former part of this debate, this Government is destroyed; then the very end, object, and aim for which it was created has been foregone, has passed away; because all the machinery of the Government, from the top to the bottom of it, was that there should be a fair trial in the courts instituted by the laws of the country. If it has come to that, that in these courts men guilty of crimes of this magnitude cannot be convicted, I would like to know where is the security for any one of us. Certainly that security is not to be found in military commissions; men unlearned in the laws, men who are selected without any of those precautions which surround the selection of juries, and which are thrown around the choice of judges everywhere. There is no liberty to be found there. I will remark, in addition to what was said by the Senator from New Hampshire, and I trust that with us and with our race it will always be true, that whenever an assault is made upon the trial by jury it may be treated as it was in England. There when the quarrel commenced the head of the king was thrown down by the people as the gage that they accepted it.

Mr. President, I shall not attempt to deal in any argument upon this subject. It is like attempting to make it plainer than it is to every ordinary comprehension that two and two make four. Here is the very case which was to be provided for, and here is the plain letter of the paramount law, the will of the American people; and who dare gainsay it? Not the will of a party, but the will of the whole people; the Constitution itself; not the will of the majority, because the will of no majority can convene it, or set it aside.

But if it is punishment that is asked, I am willing that this section be amended in this wise. I think it is a little awkward in the first two or three lines. The word "enlist," in the second line, should be made "offer;" and the word "enlisted," in the third line, should be stricken out, and "offered for enlistment" inserted, because I suppose it is not intended to say that these bodies can enlist men. A recruiting agent cannot enlist a man, as I understand it, nor can a substitute enlist him. He can offer him to an officer who may enlist him and muster him into the service. Then, after having made these alterations, I will at the proper time move to amend by striking out the words "court-martial or military commission," and inserting "court of the United States having competent jurisdiction." Then the offender, instead of being tried before a military commission will be brought before a court of the United States; and as these courts have now very little to do, I should think you could have all your offenders tried there, and have a much better security, and the people be much better satisfied a hundred times over than to drag them away before military commissions, in whom it is not the spirit of our people to believe.

I do not know that I understand exactly now what the amendment is that is pending. Is it the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, or is it the substitute of the Senator from California?

Mr. CLARK. The substitute of the Senator from California.

Mr. COWAN. Very well. I do not know that that will alter the case in the least, because I have heard men engaged in filling up the ranks of the Army say that those who procured substitutes for pay were the very men who filled up the ranks and procured the men, and it was the policy of the law to pay so much to men who would bring substitutes, in order to get the men. I suppose it is possible that a man might be honest in this business. I know a great many honest men in my country who have given their time and labor and all that kind of thing for the purpose of obtaining substitutes and filling up their quotas.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, such a man would not be amenable unless he knowingly presented such a person as is described in this section.

Mr. COWAN. The trouble is always here in considering this question: you presume the individual guilty. If that was the presumption, your law would be free from all these objections; but the mischief that I allege is that the man, before he is known to be guilty, is subjected to this improper mode of trial. We must proceed in fabricating laws for the trial of offenses upon the presumption that all men are innocent until they have been shown to be guilty, and shown to be guilty upon a hypothesis which excludes every other hypothesis. That is the law; and that is the only security that the people have in the administration of criminal justice. There is another great principle which I may state here, and which is not generally considered, and that is, that by our law it is not the intent of that law that all guilty people should be punished; but it is its intent that all innocent people should be protected. I agree that no healthy, judicial machinery will punish all guilty people; but I do contend that under the common law no innocent man can possibly be convicted; and that is the object of the law.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not accuse the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania with opposing the Administration. I am not so weak as to make that matter of fault-finding or accusation. But what I said, or intended to say, was this: that I was a little surprised that a gentleman of so much legal distinction as himself should willingly lend himself to the business of censuring the administration of criminal justice by the military authorities of the United States during this present dreadful war. It seemed to me, and it seems so still, that the exercise of a little charity on the part of himself and other Senators would not be unbecoming, at least during the existence of the war. When the war is over we can settle these old scores in a friendly way, and talk them over as lawyers do in their consultations or in their closets.

The honorable Senator expresses his amazement at the construction which I gave to the first part of article five of the amendments to the Constitution; but in doing this the honorable Senator failed to use constitutional language himself. There is no such phrase in the instrument as "military service" or "naval service" as connected with courts-martial or military commissions. The language is this:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, &c., except in cases arising in the land or naval forces."

Mr. COWAN. "In the service."

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir.

Mr. COWAN. Read on.

Mr. HOWARD.

"Except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

That, sir, is the language of the Constitution; and the question is, what, in the contemplation of this clause of the Constitution, is a case arising in the naval forces or in the land forces of the United States? What is the "case?" The learned Senator, with all his earnestness and all his learning, has failed to indicate to us what is to be understood by the word "case" in this clause of the Constitution. I shall not enter upon the consideration of that question. If I had time, however, I could show him very conclusively what such a case is understood to be by the Supreme Court of the United States, and that it embraces all such cases as those which I described in my previous remarks.

Mr. COWAN. If the honorable Senator will allow me I will give him—

Mr. HOWARD. On a former occasion when I wished to make an interruption of the gentleman himself in a debate in this body, he refused me the privilege. I will not imitate his example. Proceed, sir.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know that I ever refused that privilege to anybody. I think the gentleman is mistaken. The first thing that I see here in the Articles of War is "mutiny." That is an offense in the land or naval service. The second is "striking a superior officer." The third is "making false musters, signing false."

Mr. HOWARD. I understand all that. The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania (he will pardon me) seems to assume that all the offenses mentioned in the Articles of War, from which he is reading, constituted the cases and the whole of the cases embraced in this article of the Constitution. In that respect he and I differ toto caelo. I think the clause includes or may include a great variety of other cases besides those embraced in the articles of war.

Again, sir, in the midst of all the eulogies which have been pronounced by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from New Hampshire upon the great privilege of trial by jury, and that wonderful certainty which always arises from the finding of fact by a jury of twelve men, I beg them not to forget that, after that celebrated gage of battle was thrown before the British people—the head of Charles—and after the restoration of the House of Stuart, there occurred what is known as "the bloody assize," in which scores and scores of men were tried, convicted, sentenced, and executed for high treason, in England, who were as innocent of the offense as the gentleman or I. Who found them guilty? Was it a military commission? Was it a court-martial? No, sir; in every case it was an English jury that convicted them, and an English judge that sentenced them. Was not that an especial glory of the trial by jury that it was used in "the bloody assize," and it was presided over by that charming specimen of professional and judicial purity—Jeffreys?

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. GRIMES. What do you want to do?

Mr. POWELL. I want to move to continue a special order for to-morrow.

Mr. GRIMES. If there is no objection to that being done, I will withdraw my motion for that purpose.

Mr. POWELL. I do not want my special order to lose its place.

Mr. ANTHONY. This bill will displace it, as it is the unfinished business.

Mr. GRIMES. I insist on my motion.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The motion was agreed to, and after some time spent in the consideration of executive business, the doors were reopened, and
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 6, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved. The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call committees for reports to go upon the Calendar and be referred to the Committee of the Whole, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider; when none were made.

The SPEAKER announced the next business in order to be the call of States and Territories for bills and resolutions, beginning the call in inverted order, with the Territory of Montana.

TELEGRAPH LINE IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. DONNELLY introduced a bill to authorize the construction of a telegraph line over the public domain from St. Cloud to Pembina, Minnesota, and there to connect with the telegraph line of the Hudson Bay Company to the Pacific ocean at or near Victoria; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXEMPTION FROM MILITARY DUTY.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the genius and policy of our Government is opposed to making distinctions between religious denominations, but guarantees equal protection to all and exclusive privileges to none; and whereas it is alleged that certain preachers of the gospel, belonging to some of the churches whose religious tenets do not bring them within the scope of the act of February, 1864, for enrolling, and calling out the national forces, have, since the passage of said act, been exempted from military duty after being drafted, without complying with section seventeen of said law: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House whether any privileges have been granted to the preachers of any denomination of professing Christians which have been denied to others, and if so, what denomination those persons belonged to, and also their names and place of residence, with the reasons for making such distinction.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD moved to lay the preamble and resolution on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. PRICE demanded the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE demanded the previous question upon the adoption of the preamble.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble was adopted.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution and preamble was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN UNION COMMISSION.

Mr. GRINNELL. I offer the following resolution, on the adoption of which I demand the previous question.

Resolved, That the use of this Hall be, and the same is hereby, given to the American Union Commission, the object of which is to provide aid for white refugees, for a meeting on Sunday evening, the 12th instant.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that this resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to, there being, on a division—ayes 20, noes 74.

Mr. COX. This resolution, as I understand, is for the benefit of white refugees. I congratulate the other side of the House—

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The previous question has been seconded.

The main question was ordered.

On agreeing to the resolution, there were, on a division—ayes 67, noes 13; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and Messrs. GRINNELL and WADSWORTH were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 16.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND DISTRICT IN MONTANA.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, introduced a bill to constitute the Territory of Montana a surveyor general's district; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I offer the following resolution, on the adoption of which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing, who, by joint resolution, were instructed to divide the books now on deposit in the Interior Department, report at once why they have not complied with said resolution and made the distribution in accordance with the provisions of said resolution.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, we can make that report now, if necessary. The reason that the resolution has not been complied with is that it has not yet been passed by the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. In view of the gentleman's explanation, I withdraw the resolution. I now offer the following, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to report a plan for the distribution of the books which have accumulated for years past in the folding-rooms of the House among the members of the present House of Representatives as speedily as possible.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. BEAMAN offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the homestead law that lands occupied under its provisions may be taxed for town, county, and other purposes.

COMPENSATION TO LOYAL SLAVE-OWNERS.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, introduced the following joint resolution; which was read a first and second time:

Whereas the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States having passed, on the 31st day of January, 1865, a joint resolution to submit to the Legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which joint resolution is as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

"ART. XIII, SEC. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

And whereas by the ratification of this amendment by three fourths of the several States all persons heretofore held as slaves under the laws of certain States of the Union will be made free, and in consequence thereof a large number of citizens, (among them many widows and orphans,) their former owners, who are, have always been, or may be willing to again become faithful to the Government of the United States, and who have not been in the civil or military service of the so-called Confederate States, will be subjected to heavy pecuniary losses; and whereas this being a measure necessary to "form a more perfect Union, establish justice" to all men, "insure domestic tranquility," "promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves" and future generations, in the attainment of which great objects the people of all the States have a common interest and for their establishment should make mutual sacrifices:

Be it therefore resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all persons faithful to the Constitution and obedient to the laws of the United States, residents of any State that shall ratify the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed to the Legislatures of the several States by the Congress of the United States on the 31st day of January, 1865, who have not been in the civil or military service of the so called Confederate States, and who have been deprived of the services of these slaves, heretofore recognized by law as property by said amendment, or by any act or ordinance of emancipation of any State of the United States, shall receive therefor a just and reasonable compensation; said compensation to be provided for by the United States Government without unreasonable delay.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, demanded the previous question.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the previous question be not seconded will not the resolution go over if discussion arise?

The SPEAKER. Bills and joint resolutions offered on resolution day go over, like a simple resolution, if discussion arise.

Mr. WILSON. Then I withdraw my motion to lay on the table for the present.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution goes over under the rules.

ALLOWANCES TO MAIL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. DUMONT submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Road be instructed to inquire whether the Postmaster General has the power under the law now in force to make additional allowances of compensation to contractors for carrying mails where the compensation agreed upon is clearly inadequate; if not, whether he has any power to release them from such contract; and if he has neither of said powers, that said committee inquire into the expediency of clothing him by law with such powers, to be exercised in cases of great hardship when justice and equity demand it; and that it report by bill or otherwise.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 22; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. DUMONT and LAZEAR.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 40.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

The question now being upon the adoption of the resolution, the House divided, and there were—ayes 46, noes 47.

So the resolution was disagreed to.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWERS.

Mr. EDGERTON submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas the Daily Morning Chronicle, of this city, the reputed political organ of the President, in recent editorials upon the subject of negotiations for peace, has referred to the President of the United States as having gone "in his sovereign capacity" to treat with the commissioners from Richmond, and has further described the President as "the sovereign head of the greatest Government on earth;" and whereas the supreme court of the District of Columbia has, by a late solemn adjudication, affirmed principles as the law of the land which recognized arbitrary dictatorial powers in the President, not only as to military but as to civil offenders, which are subversive of civil liberty and of the public welfare: Therefore,

Resolved, (as the judgment of this House,) That the President of the United States is in no constitutional sense the sovereign thereof, but that all his governmental powers are derived from the Constitution and constitutional laws of the United States, and are limited by them; and this House sincerely deprecate all political teachings and judicial decisions having a tendency to exalt the President above the Constitution and laws, or to clothe him with attributes unknown to them, or to derogate from the powers of Congress; and they affirm that the principle that the people are sovereign, and that all departments of the Government are their agents or servants, and should be kept in strict subordination to the Constitution and laws, is essential to the permanence of republican government and to civil liberty.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. EDGERTON demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, withdrew his motion to lay on the table.

The question being upon seconding the previous question, the House divided, and there were—ayes 33, noes 66.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I desire to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, then, goes over under the rules.

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS.

Mr. HOLMAN introduced a joint resolution in relation to certain railroads, and demanded the previous question.

The resolution was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that whereas large portions of the public lands have heretofore been granted to several of the States for the construction of railroads, on condition that the lands so granted should be subject to the disposal of the Legislatures of said States for the purpose aforesaid and no other, and that such railroads should be and remain public highways for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge for the transportation of any troops or property of the United States, which lands have been applied and are now being applied to the purpose aforesaid; and whereas payments have heretofore been made for transportation of troops and property of the United States to companies whose roads have been constructed in whole or in part by the public lands so granted as aforesaid: therefore no payment shall hereafter be made to any railroad company which shall have obtained the benefit of any grant of the public lands on the condition that the railroad of such company should be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States, for the transportation of any such property or troops. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause to be refunded, by proper proceedings, to the Treasury of the United States any money which has heretofore been paid by any Department of the Government for such transportation; provided, however, that nothing herein shall be so construed as to prevent the Secretary of War from taking possession of any such road and its appurtenances, and apply the same to the use of the United States whenever in his judgment the interests of the Government may require it; and provided further, that nothing herein shall be so construed as to impair the provisions of the joint resolution relating to certain railroads in the State of Missouri, approved March 6, 1862.

Mr. GANSON. Does this embrace the canal grants passed recently?

Mr. HOLMAN. The joint resolution explains itself.

The question being upon seconding the previous question, the House divided, and there were—ayes 62, noes 30.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused, and the yeas and nays were refused.

The joint resolution was then passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN W. CAMPBELL.

Mr. RANDALL, of Kentucky, introduced a bill for the benefit of John W. Campbell, late lieutenant and quartermaster of the seventh Kentucky cavalry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

RIGHTS OF NEGROES.

Mr. GARFIELD introduced the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire whether there is any regulation in this District which forbids colored persons to leave the city of Washington without a pass; and if so, that they ascertain and report to this House at as early a day as practicable by what authority such a regulation is made and enforced, and what legislation is necessary to secure equal justice to all loyal persons, without regard to color, at the national capital.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAJOR GENERAL W. S. ROSECRANS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be directed to make a full investigation, and report upon the military campaigns of Major General W. S. Rosecrans, from the beginning of his services in Western Virginia to the conclusion of his recent campaign in Missouri.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the vote by which the resolution was adopted be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEGOTIATIONS FOR PEACE.

Mr. COX introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, in endeavoring to ascertain the disposition of the insurgents in arms against the authority of the Federal Government, with a view to negotiations for peace and the restoration of the Union, is entitled to the gratitude of a suffering and distracted country; and that with a similar view he be respectfully requested to omit no reasonable exertions hereafter which may lead to the desired object, to wit, peace and union.

Resolved, That, if not incompatible with the above object and the public interests, he be requested to communicate to this House all information leading to and connected with the recent negotiations.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Does not the second resolution call for executive information?

The SPEAKER. The second resolution does; and consequently it cannot be considered to-day if objected to.

Mr. COX. Then I withdraw the second resolution, and demand the previous question upon the first resolution.

Mr. SCHENCK. Can the first resolution be separated from the second?

The SPEAKER. They can be separated.

Mr. ROSS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. COX. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then my colleague from Illinois [Mr. Ross] is opposed to the resolution, is he?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Are there any facts before the House to show that the allegations contained in the resolution are true?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 30, nays 107, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, Brandegee, Freeman Clarke, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Driggs, Edgerton, Higby, John H. Hubbard, Jencks, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Long, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Morrill, Rogers, Sloan, Smithers, Stevens, Thomas, Upson, Wadsworth, and Windom—30.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alvey, Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Ashtley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, James S. Brown, William B. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Thomas J. Davis, Dawson, Deming, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gitch, Grinnell, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, McBride, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, Samuel P. Miller, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Noble, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Perham, Perry, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyne, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Seofield, Scott, Shannon, Spaulding, John B. Steele, Sules, Strouse, Sweat, Townsend, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wade, Elisha B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—107.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Bailey, Blaine, Bliss, Brooks, Cole, Creswell, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Eden, English, Grider, Griswold, Hotchkiss, Kathbisch, Kasson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Littlejohn, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, William H. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Smith, Starr, William G. Steele, Stuart, Thayer, Voorhees, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Benjamin Wood—45.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

During the roll-call, Mr. WADSWORTH stated that Mr. MALORY was not well enough to occupy his seat today.

Mr. RANDALL, of Kentucky, stated that his colleague, Mr. SMITH, was detained at home by sickness.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, stated that Mr. CRESWELL was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. WILLIAMS stated that Mr. MOORHEAD was absent in consequence of severe illness.

The result was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the resolution goes over until Monday next, with the demand for the previous question pending, on which no quorum voted.

The next business in order is the consideration of the motion made on Monday last by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to suspend the rules to enable him to introduce a resolution in regard to a picture in the Capitol, and upon which motion no quorum voted, and the House thereupon adjourned.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College; when the Speaker signed the same.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order from and after to-morrow evening until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The House has not yet ordered any evening session.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, then, to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. There is one motion to suspend the rules already pending.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I ask unanimous consent that we have evening sessions.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the proposition is to make this bill the special order from evening to evening and not from day to day. I must object to any more special orders for the day sessions. I have a bill amending the enrollment act which should have come up on Thursday last, and the draft is coming on and we cannot get the bill up.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe the House will consider this as perhaps as important business as we have on hand, and it is very important to get it through the House in order that the Senate may act upon it. I move, therefore, that the bill be made a special order from and after seven o'clock to-morrow evening, until disposed of.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that this tax bill is reported on the 6th of February, and the country has at least a right to see it for three or four days through the telegraph. The interests that are to be taxed have a right to see it for three or four days before we act upon it.

Mr. MORRILL. In reply to the gentleman from New York I will say this, that a large portion of the bill, the fore part of it, is merely formal, but it will take some time to go through with that, and the important parts of the bill will not be reached for several days.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is a very just one. Certainly there are provisions in the bill in which our constituents are interested. As the gentleman from Vermont says, the fore part of the bill is merely formal; it will take no time to consider it—perhaps only an hour or two. We want to know what the provisions of this bill are. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] suggests that we want to know about the paper duty; and I certainly want to know how it is with "whisky on hand." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Vermont that he is of opinion upon reflection that the House, having granted unanimous consent to allow this bill to be reported, any motion in regard to the bill, even if it involves a suspension of the rules, is strictly in order, and therefore a motion that this bill shall be considered as a special order from and after to-morrow evening at seven o'clock would be in order; but a motion for a daily recess would not be in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I prefer to have it made a special order from and after to-morrow evening at seven o'clock; but if other gentlemen think fit to propose an amendment to that motion I will yield for the purpose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not understand that any attention has been paid by the Chair to the objection which I have made. I objected from the first to the bill being introduced and made a special order for to-morrow evening and from day to day. I said that if the gentleman from Vermont would make the bill a special order from evening to evening I would have no objection; but it does seem to me that some portion of the time of the House should be allowed to other committees and to other business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that if he objected to the introduction of this bill he did so from his seat, having yielded the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I objected to its introduction for the purpose of being made a special order to-morrow evening, and from day to day; but I said I would not object to its being made a special order from evening to evening. Of course my objection goes to its introduction. It was all one proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair holds that the objection comes too late. The Chair put the question to the House whether there was any objection to the introduction of the bill, and no objection was made, although the Chair paused longer than usual.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Chair will permit me to say that that was the very time I made my objection, and in my place, standing.

The SPEAKER. The bill having been introduced, it is now for the House to direct what shall be done with it. The gentleman from Ohio objects to its being made a special order from day to day.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Chair will bear in mind that I had the floor in regard to a matter that was before the House, and proposed to call it up. I yielded to the gentleman from Vermont, supposing that he only wanted to have his bill introduced and ordered to be printed. But he went on and proposed to have it made a special order from day to day. I objected to that.

The SPEAKER. That objection is in time; but the bill is before the House for its action.

Mr. SCHENCK. I want it understood now that I object to its being made a special order from day to day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in time to make that objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am perfectly willing, if there be evening sessions, that the bill shall take its chance from evening to evening.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this not being an appropriation bill, it will require a two-third vote to make it a special order; but it is in the power of two thirds to make it a special order in spite of objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made a special order from and after seven o'clock on Wednesday evening next, and until disposed of.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. MORRILL and SCHENCK.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 31.

So, two thirds having voted in favor thereof, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I am also directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to ask that some amendments to the bill, not agreed to by the Committee of Ways and Means, shall be printed with the bill.

It was so ordered.

HARBOR ON LAKE SUPERIOR.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting land to the State of Michigan to aid in building a harbor and ship-canal at Portage Lake, Kewenaw Point, Lake Superior; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of expenditures for contingencies of the Department; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING BUREAU OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department in answer to a resolution of the House requiring information in reference to the Printing Bureau of the Treasury Department; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting the annual report of that office for the year 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PICTURE FOR THE CAPITOL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] moved on Monday last to suspend the rules to enable him to offer a joint resolution authorizing a contract with William H. Powell for a picture for the Capitol. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules.

The joint resolution directs the Joint Committee on the Library to enter into a contract with William H. Powell, of the State of Ohio, to paint a picture for the United States, to be placed at the head of one of the grand staircases of the Capitol, illustrative of some naval victory—the particular subject to be agreed upon between the committee and the artist, provided that the expense shall not exceed $25,000, and that $2,000 shall be paid to Powell in advance, to enable him to prepare for the work, the remainder of the installments to be paid at intervals not less than one year, the last installment to be retained until the picture is completed and put up.

Mr. PRUYN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he has changed the form of the resolution as modified the other day, and whether it is now imperative.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir. I intended to inform the gentleman that I had made that change. I suppose that the House is able to decide whether it will or will not agree to order a picture of this kind.

Mr. PRUYN. I had thought it better that the Joint Committee on the Library should be allowed to judge and determine the propriety of ordering this picture.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether the object of this joint resolution is to purchase a painting which has already been executed.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is not. The resolution provides that the subject (which must be a naval subject) shall be agreed upon between the Joint Committee on the Library and the artist; and that when the subject shall have been agreed upon, the artist shall receive an advance of $2,000, and a similar amount yearly, the last installment not to be paid until the picture has been completed and put in its place, and the installments not to be paid at intervals of less than one year. It will take some six or seven years at least to finish the picture.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Do I understand that these payments are to be made directly on the order of the Joint Committee on the Library?

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I suppose that if the artist should insist upon it, the whole sum would have to be paid anyhow, because a contract would have to be made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer as to that.

Mr. SCHENCK. The resolution is similar in its form to resolutions heretofore adopted for the purchase of national paintings.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the resolution, that the inquiries of members may be answered by its language.

The Clerk again read the joint resolution.

Mr. PIKE. I would like to see the purpose of this resolution carried out; but I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether he would not consent to an amendment to subtract this amount of $25,000 from the appropriation of $40,000, which I understand has heretofore been made for a picture to be placed in the eye of the dome of the Capitol. It seems to me that such a painting would be a species of high art that it would be very uncomfortable to look at. With such a proviso as I have suggested, I should be very glad to see this naval painting executed by this excellent artist.

Mr. SCHENCK. I should have no objection to a modification of that kind.

On the motion to suspend the rules, there were, on a division—ayes 59, noes 40.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCHENCK and BRUNN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 36.

Less than two thirds voting in the affirmative, the motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

MAINTENANCE OF THE UNION.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution, and if it be objected to I shall move to suspend the rules. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the duty of the President to maintain, in every constitutional and legal manner, the integrity of the American Union as formed by the fathers of the Republic, and in no event, and under no circumstances, to proffer or accept negotiations which shall admit by the remotest implication the existence of any other federal or confederate government within the territory of the United States.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRADE WITH REBELLIOUS STATES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Commerce, and I will state in one word the purport of the report.

The Committee on Commerce, who were charged with an investigation concerning trade with the rebellious States, have ascertained that the Committee on Commerce of the Senate are engaged in a similar examination; and for the purpose of saving expense, and having both committees pursue the same investigation, the Committee on Commerce of the House have directed me to ask the adoption of the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the Committee on Commerce on the part of the Senate be joined to the Committee on Commerce on the part of the House in the investigations in which said Committee on Commerce on the part of the House are now engaged, under resolutions of the House of January 20, 1865, and January 25, 1865, in regard to trade with the States in rebellion, to constitute a joint committee for the purpose of completing said investigation, and that the said joint committee have the same powers as the Committee on Commerce of the House now has on the subject of said investigation.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKLY, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed a concurrent resolution providing joint rules for the government of the two Houses in counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to submit a resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I will when the naval appropriation bill has been passed.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866, the pending question being upon the amendment submitted by Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, being to add the following to the bill:

Provided, That no money appropriated for the naval service shall be expended otherwise than in accordance with the following provision, so far as is applicable; that is to say, that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a Board of Admiralty, which shall consist of the vice admiral and one rear admiral, one commodore, one captain, one commander, and one lieutenant commander, over which the Secretary of the Navy or the officer highest in rank present shall preside; and when the subject under consideration shall appertain to the duties of any bureau in the Navy Department, the chief of such bureau shall be a member of the board, and entitled to sit and vote on the consideration of the subject.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the board shall deliberate in common, and advise the Secretary on any matters submitted by him relating to naval organization, naval legislation, the construction, equipment, and armament of vessels, navy-yards, and other naval establishments, and the direction, employment, and disposition of the naval forces in time of war. All such opinions shall be recorded.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That no vessel-of-war shall be built or materially altered, nor any guns of new construction ordered or adopted, nor any engine for any vessel of-war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments decided to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That all invitations for plans or proposals for any of the works above mentioned shall be prepared by the board, subject to the approval of the Secretary; and all bids or offers or proposals for the same shall be opened in the presence of the board, and the award made by it, subject to the approval of the Secretary.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary may add to the board, from time to time, other officers of the Navy eligible to the position of chief of bureau, not exceeding three, at any time, for consultation on any of the above subjects. The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLOW. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BLOW. Mr. Chairman, the subject under discussion has been invested with extraordinary interest by the eloquence of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, whose acknowledged ability eminently fits him for the Herculean task which he has undertaken. I have listened to his statements and reflections with intense and painful interest, and with a regret far exceeding any that I have ever experienced upon this floor. I do not doubt the purity of the gentleman's intention; no one regards him more warmly or esteems him more highly than myself. But I do most emphatically condemn the taste and judgment which induced him to attack the Navy of our country, and to suggest a remedy for fancied imperfections and failures in the midst of its greatest achievements, and at a time when every consideration of justice, patriotism, and policy should have prompted the statesmen of the two Houses to present the power and progress of this strong arm of our Government, and not to indulge in arguments and criticisms calculated to degrade it and our Administration in the eyes of the world.

I hope I may be permitted, therefore, in my own way to present another view of the Navy of the United States; not going into useless details nor classifying our vessels as he has done, to show how few are as perfect and as well suited to the age as they would have been with years to model and build them, but rapidly reviewing their main features and services, begging you to recollect that they sprung into existence with a rapidity which has never been equaled in the history of the world, and indulging only in such statements and assertions as will be supported by the evidence of the brightest and purest men in this land. I say in my own way, Mr. Chairman, for no report of the speech has been printed, and I have sought access only to those points referring especially to the monitors and the conflict with the Tennessee in Mobile bay, and my aim will be rather to place the Navy as it really is before the country than to follow the gentleman in all his disparagements of it.

The honorable gentleman who is leading this attack upon the United States Navy says—I quote his own language—

“The Monitor accidentally came into Hampton Roads as the Merrimac was trying to destroy, as it had already destroyed, some of our vessels. A collision took place. Neither party was destroyed; neither vessel was sunk; neither party was whipped, as the boy said, and the country ran wild over two guns in a cheese-box on a raft, not having done anything.”

Such is the slur attempted to be cast upon a Department which so promptly and timely completed a vessel which preserved the character of the nation, the safety of its capital, and untold millions of its property. Let us go back for a moment and examine into the circumstances which rendered this combat the most famous of the war. The Merrimac, on the 8th of March, 1862, was the most formidable iron vessel in the world; she had on that day destroyed two of our frigates, utterly unable to cope with her; before her lay millions of property, which she proposed to destroy the next day, and then the Chesapeake could be cleared out, or, if her commander chose, every vessel in the Potomac between Fortress Monroe and Alexandria could be destroyed. Ay, more! our navy-yard here, with all its value to our Government at that critical period, would have fallen a victim to her irresistible power. If not this destruction, then her course in the Chesapeake would have cut off the gentleman's own Monumental city from the world. No communication could have existed between it and the capital except by railroad, and the army of Beauregard would have turned its course toward Washington instead of evacuating its long-held position when the news came to him that the brightest day in the history of the confederacy was succeeded by one that blasted all her hopes of naval supremacy and protection.

The little cheese-box, so insignificant as hardly to be seen by the side of her immense mailed antagonist, carried within her contracted walls the honor and genius of a great nation, and her two guns, an experiment yet untried by the great naval Powers of England and France, resounded through the world and said, what? Not that America was without a navy, without skill, genius, and the spirit of progress; but that the navies of those two nations belonged to the past, and were not able to dictate to the people who were struggling for freedom what course they should pursue toward rebels enlisted in the unholy cause of slavery. The gentleman has alluded to Admiral Farragut. I have asked this greatest of naval heroes the value of the contest between the Monitor and Merrimac, and whether if all the monitors since built on the same plan had been sunk into the ocean, costing, as my friend says, $13,000,000, the experience of that combat was not worth them all. He replied, with the comprehensiveness and patriotism that distinguish him, that such a result could not be estimated by dollars; in fact the moral weight of it was above all calculation. So much for the honorable gentleman's cheese-box. Such must have been the opinion of Secretary Chase also, for when the hour came that a great responsibility was to be taken, he did not hesitate to counsel the honorable Secretary of the Navy to persevere in creating such protection as this Monitor had proved to be.

Nor will I, Mr. Chairman, withhold from Captain Ericsson the gratitude we owe him; his genius has accomplished too much in this single instance for me to allude disparagingly to speculators and contractors. The gentleman is unsparing; he condemns the Dictator on a rumor; damns the Puritan before she is launched, and disgraces the Dunderberg in the face of all that is claimed for her by her experienced builder, who has some character as a gentleman of honor, and a reputation as a constructor acquired by building some of the finest vessels that ever floated under any flag. My hope and belief is that the gentleman himself will one day own that he spoke rashly of this great vessel.

I will make no comments upon the statesmanship which so unjustly deals with a Department and its contractors, against which no single discreditable act can be brought, in the case, at least, of these vessels, remarking at the same moment, Mr. Chairman, that for four years all my time and all my thoughts have been devoted to protecting my Government against every man, high or low, that would take advantage of this trying time in its existence to build up a fortune for himself. I am no favorite with contractors or speculators. Congress, it is true, voted Captain Ericsson an immense sum. I had faith in the committee which recommended it. May I remind the gentleman that on that occasion he should have stood by his Government with his powerful influence?

I do not stand here, Mr. Chairman, to defend the monitor system of construction, or any other system of naval architecture. Their merits and defects have been the subject of essays from experts and officers of high standing in our Navy. Some of these I have carefully examined, and the exalted reputation of many of the writers must give great force, if it does not add conviction, to their arguments. But few of us are competent to decide this interesting question from our own knowledge of the principles underlying it, or from any experience which we ourselves have had with the vessels. We must necessarily take the testimony of those who have such knowledge, and who possess such experience. Fortunately we have this testimony, and we have it of such high character that it should carry conviction to the minds of all unprejudiced men. I beg the indulgence of the House while I introduce some of this testimony. For no other cause has the Navy Department been so much and so severely criticised as for the construction of the monitors, and believing myself that the administration of that Department has been eminently successful, I propose to show that in the construction of the monitors it acted with sound judgment, and was guided by the best lights it could obtain.

The gentleman from Maryland has severely animadverted upon the building of so many monitors immediately after the contest of the Monitor and Merrimac, without that careful investigation which was necessary to secure the Department and the country against the evils to result, and which the gentleman endeavored to show have resulted from constructing vessels of no value to us.

The plan for building the first monitor was submitted to a board of admiralty before it was adopted by the Department, and this board was composed of Admirals Smith, Davis, and Paulding. We may form some idea of the favorable opinion of the plan entertained by the board and of the prompt action of the Department by the following quotation from a letter written by her constructor (Ericsson) to the New York Herald upon the subject:

"A more prompt and spirited action is probably not on record in a similar case than that of the Navy Department as regards the Monitor. The committee of naval commanders, appointed by the Secretary to decide on the plans of gunboats laid before the Department, occupied me less than two hours in explaining my new system. In about two hours more the committee had come to a decision. After their favorable report had been to the Secretary, I was called into his office, where I was detained less than five minutes. In order not to lose any time, the Secretary ordered me to 'go ahead at once.' Consequently, while the clerks of the Department were engaged in drawing up the formal contract, the iron which now forms the keel plate of the Monitor was drawn through the rolling mill."

On the 10th of March Captain G. J. Van Brunt, commanding the frigate Minnesota, gave the following testimony to the merits of this "cheese-box," as the honorable gentleman has sneeringly called her:

"At six a. m. the enemy again appeared, coming down from Craney Island, and I beat to quarters, but they ran past my ship and were heading for Fortress Monroe, and the retreat was beaten to allow my men to get something to eat. The Merrimac ran down near to the Rip Raps, and then turned into the channel through which I had come. Again all hands were called to quarters, and when she approached within a mile of us I opened upon her with my stern guns, and made signal to the Monitor to attack the enemy. She immediately ran down in my wake, right within range of the Merrimac, completely covering my ship as far as was possible with her diminutive dimensions, and, much to my astonishment, laid herself right alongside of the Merrimac, and the contrast was that of a pigmy to a giant. Gun after gun was fired by the Monitor, which was returned with whole broadsides from the rebels, with no more effect, apparently, than so many pebble-stones thrown by a child. After awhile they commenced maneuvering, and we could see the little battery point her bow for the rebels, with the intention, as I thought, of sending a shot through her bow port-hole, then she would shoot by her, and rake her through the stern. In the mean time the rebels were pouring in broadside after broadside, but almost all her shot flew over the little submerged propeller, and when they struck the bomb-proof tower, the shot glanced off without producing any effect, clearly establishing the fact that wooden vessels cannot contend with iron-clad ones; for never before was anything like it dreamed of by the greatest enthusiast in maritime warfare.

"The Merrimac, finding that she could make nothing of the Monitor, turned her attention once more to me. In the morning she had put an eleven-inch shot under my counter, near the water line; and now, on her second approach, I opened upon her with all my broadside guns and ten-inch pivot—a broadside which would have blown out of water any timber-built ship in the world. She returned my fire with her rifled bow gun, with a shell which passed through the chief engineer's state-room, through the engineers' mess-room, amidships, and burst in the boatswain's room, tearing four rooms all into one in its passage, and exploding two charges of powder, which set the ship on fire, but it was promptly extinguished by a party headed by my first lieutenant. Her second shell went through the boiler of the tug-boat Dragon, exploding it, and causing some consternation on board my ship for the moment, until the matter was explained. This time I had concentrated upon her an incessant fire from my gun-deck, spar-deck, and forecastle pivot guns, and was informed by my marine officer, who was stationed on the poop, that at least fifty solid shot struck her on her slanting side without producing any apparent effect. By the time she had fired her third shell the little Monitor had come down upon her, placing herself between us, and compelled her to change her position, in doing which she grounded; and again I poured into her all the guns which could be brought to bear upon her. As soon as she got off she stood down the bay, the little battery chasing her with all speed, when suddenly the Merrimac turned around and ran full speed into her antagonist. For a moment I was anxious; but instantly I saw a shot plunge into the iron roof of the Merrimac, which surely must have damaged her."

Under the same date Captain H. Y. Purviance, of the frigate St. Lawrence, states the following:

"The Monitor, whose performance more than equaled the highest expectations, contributed most powerfully to the withdrawal of the Merrimac, and her earlier arrival would have prevented the unfortunate loss of our two defenseless frigates."

In a letter dated the 9th of March, 1862, Chief Engineer Sumers says, addressing Captain Ericsson:

"After a stormy passage, which proved us to be the finest sea boat I was ever in, we fought the Merrimac for more than three hours this forenoon, and sent her back to Norfolk in a sinking condition."

Lieutenant S. D. Greene, of the United States Navy, and executive officer of the Monitor, states, under date of March 27, to the Department:

"I received to-day your communication of the 25th instant. I do not consider this steamer a sea-going vessel. During her passage from New York her roll was very easy and slow, and not at all deep. She pitched very little and with no strain whatever. She is buoyant and not very lively. The inconveniences we experienced can be easily remedied. For smooth-water operations, such as she was engaged in on the 9th instant, I think her a most desirable vessel. The opinion of experienced seamen on board is the same as my own."

The Department had therefore the action of a board of admiralty recommending a trial of the monitor plan. It had the evidence of the remarkable invulnerability of the completed vessel in this contest. It had the testimony of all these naval officers, and the oral representations of many more in praise of the vessel, and it knew the disaster that would have resulted to us if the Merrimac had not been defeated. It knew that the Merrimac was not destroyed, and had no means of knowing whether she had been seriously damaged. It knew that other iron-plated vessels were being constructed by the rebels, and it knew the responsibility which rested upon it of providing for the increasing efforts of the rebels in the same direction. It had no other armored vessel afloat upon tide-water with which to compare the merits of the Monitor. Those on the Mississippi had been eminently successful under the skillful and gallant Foote, but they were not capable of being moved from harbor to harbor on the sea-coast. The iron-clads of Europe had not given satisfaction to the Powers which constructed them. Our own Ironsides had not yet been completed, and was not for many months afterwards. The wants of the Government were immediate, were pressing, and were of the most extraordinary character. With all this testimony in favor of the Monitor, and the absence of any better plan being submitted and successfully tested, the Department was not only justified in building as many monitors as Congress would pay for, but it would have been culpable in the highest degree not to have put them in the course of immediate construction. The wisdom of the decision of the Department to build these monitors was not only sustained by the state of facts at the time they were placed under construction, but the testimony which is borne by the highest officers of the Government in their favor since they have been completed and tried makes the action of the Department in this whole matter as invulnerable as are the vessels themselves. I propose as briefly as possible to present a small part of this testimony, but sufficient, I trust, to prove the truth of this assertion.

Rear Admiral Dahlgren, in his report on iron-clads, says:

"During the progress of the engineers toward Wagner the iron-clads played an important part, using their guns whenever an opportunity offered, as shown in the instances quoted on page 583. It may be readily conceived that, all things being equal, it was just as easy for the rebels to have worked toward our position as it was for our troops to work toward theirs. But there was a serious difference in the fact that the cannon of the iron-clads, and also of the gun-boats, completely enfiladed the entire width of the narrow island, and absolutely interdicted any operation of the kind on the part of the rebels. In addition, whenever their fire was bearing severely on our own workmen, a request from the general always drew the fire of the vessels; and I do not know that it failed to be effective in any instance."

"As a consequence the rebels were restricted to Wagner, and were powerless to hinder the progress of the trenches that were at last carried into the very ditch of the work, and decided its evacuation without assault."

"The duties of the iron-clads were not performed under idle batteries. The guns of Wagner never failed to open on them, and fired until their crews were driven, by those of our iron-clads, to take shelter in the bomb-proofs. One of these cannon, a ten-inch, left deep dents on every turret that will not easily be effaced."

"During the operations against Morris Island the nine iron-clads fired eight thousand projectiles, and received eight hundred and eighty-two hits. Including the service at Sumter in April and the Ogeechee, the total number was eleven hundred and ninety-four."

"The battering received was without precedent. The Monitor had been struck two hundred and fourteen times; the Weehawken one hundred and eighty-seven times, and almost entirely by ten-inch shot. What vessels have ever been subjected to such a test?"

"The speed of the monitors is not great, (seven knots,) but it is quite respectable with a clean bottom, and is fully equal to that of the Ironsides. Their stowage is peculiar, but when understood and rightly managed not difficult of control. They pivot with celerity, and in less space than almost any other class of vessel."

"The monitors could operate in most of the channels; could direct their fire around the whole circle, and were almost equally well defended on all sides."

"The defects in both classes of vessels are susceptible of being remedied partially or entirely. The defense of the Ironsides could be made complete, and that of the monitors equally so."

"The Ironsides is a fine, powerful ship. Her armor has stood heavy battering very well, and her broadside of seven eleven-inch guns and one eight-inch rifle has always told with signal effect when opened on the enemy. Draught of water about fifteen and a half to sixteen feet. Speed six to seven knots, and crew about four hundred and forty men."

As no other officer in the service has had so much experience with the monitors, and none are more competent to judge of their merits than this able officer, his testimony is entitled to the highest respect.

Admiral Porter's testimony of the seaworthiness and efficiency of the monitors at Fort Fisher is of such recent date and possesses such deep interest that it is doubtless fresh in the minds of the members of the House and need not be repeated.

In his letter to the Department, dated February 16, 1864, he says of the first monitor:

"I remember pronouncing that vessel 'a perfect success,' and capable of defeating anything that then floated. I was looked upon at that time as something of an enthusiast, as my opinions were widely at variance with those of some scientific gentlemen. The results have justified me in forming a high estimate of the monitor principle."

In this connection the opinion of the able chief of the Engineer corps of the Army is not without great interest. General Barnard says:

"I formed a high opinion of armored and turreted vessels built after Mr. Ericsson's designs, particularly as harbor defense vessels; in fact coming to the conclusion that his plans furnish the best solution of the problem of constructing vessels for this purpose. I also believed that in the Dictator and Puritan we should have vessels capable of encountering the heaviest seas, if not of keeping the sea a long time, and making transatlantic voyages, and that, from their armanent and slight exposure to an enemy's shot, they would contend successfully with anything afloat."

To this testimony I might go on and add the testimony of Commodore Rodgers and other officers in the Navy; but enough has certainly been adduced to show that the Department has acted with good judgment in ordering the monitors, and to satisfy any unprejudiced mind that our iron-clads are not only not a failure, but constitute the hope, the pride, and the bulwark of the Republic. That they have faults I have no doubt, but they are better than anything our enemies have, and before they get anything to equal them the ingenuity of our constructors will have perfected the novel ideas of Captain Ericsson and others, and we will still be ahead of all competitors.

The Department has been assailed for not constructing more vessels of the Ironsides type instead of so many monitors. It is denounced for constructing monitors before their merits were fully established by other contests and trials besides that with the Merrimac. But the assailants of the Department forget that no contracts for ocean vessels have been made since the trial of the Ironsides, for the very good reason that Congress refused the necessary appropriation for the purpose. The plan of Mr. Webb for the Dunderberg and that of Mr. Whitney for the Keokuk were the only plans for ocean vessels approved by the board of officers appointed to examine and report upon them while the Ironsides was building.

The eminent success of the Monadnock not only bears evidence to the ability of the officials of the Department, but to the wisdom of ordering the construction of four of this class, all designed in the Department and constructed in our own navy-yards. They are double-turreted vessels, built of wood, and heavily plated.

The gentleman told us on last Thursday that our iron-clad navy was a failure. Constructions that have grown up like magic under the inspiring touch of American energy and American talent, and which constituted the pride of our people and the bulwark of the nation against foreign arrogance; this best bower of the ship of State, upon which our faith was resting to hold us in safety from the hidden rocks and breakers of hostile shores, is declared to be a failure. These terrible engines of naval war that bear upon their mailed coats countless marks of shot and shell, that have been so carefully studied by the ablest engineers of enlightened Europe for the last three years, which have furnished models to be copied by Denmark and Sweden and Russia, after the most mature and careful investigations, are declared to be failures. We are gravely told that this iron-clad navy has accomplished nothing; that they have never silenced forts of any kind. Shade of the immortal Foote! are the glories of Fort Henry so soon forgotten? Have the dead on the decks of the DeKalb, the Cincinnati, and their consorts at Donelson, no place in the national memory? Are the fires which lighted the island scenery of No. 10 from a hundred iron throats, as the Carondelet and Pittsburg passed them, no longer remembered? Is the desperate conflict with the rebel rams at Fort Pillow and at Memphis not written in American history? Was nothing done by the gallant Porter and the Essex, when the Arkansas was destroyed? Have the trophies of Arkansas Post no glorious reminiscences? Has the history of Vicksburg and Grand Gulf been lost in oblivion? Why did the old salamander, he of the iron heart, with the laurels of New Orleans fresh upon his brow, and the praises of a great nation for his gallant deeds still echoing over the land; why, I say, did our country's pride, the noble Farragut, deem it unsafe to attack Mobile until he had four of these iron-clads which are pronounced so worthless by the gentleman from Maryland? Did the four hundred and fifty-pounder that crashed through the side of the Tennessee effect nothing? Nor the one hundred and eighty-pounder blows of the Mississippi river iron-clads, when disabling her steering gear and closing her ports, effect nothing, when the lighter shots of the wooden vessels were falling harmless upon her? Will the gentleman from Maryland insist that the wooden vessels captured the almost impregnable Tennessee, when the published survey of the captured vessel made by Captains Jenkins and Alden, Commander Le Roy, and Chief Engineer

Wilkinson, shows exactly how the damage was inflicted that placed her at the mercy of the fleet? He sees no virtue in an iron-clad carrying hundreds of tons of armor to enable her to cope with our enemies unless she steers with all the facility of a pleasure yacht; and because one of the four iron-clads which entered Mobile bay on the 5th of August had her turrets disabled in that fierce contest, he condemns the whole as worthless.

For the information of the honorable gentleman, and to correct any false impression as to the value of the four double-turreted vessels now holding the harbor of Mobile, I will ask the Clerk to read a portion of a private letter from a brave and skillful officer in the fleet at Mobile to the gentleman who designed and constructed those vessels on the Mississippi river. This officer holds the very important position of fleet engineer of the western Gulf blockading squadron, and knowing him well, I can bear my humble testimony to his purity of character as well as the value of his testimony.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WEST GULF SQUADRON,
ENGINEER'S DEPARTMENT, December 15, 1864.

• MY DEAR SIR: * * * * I know you have been kept posted on our monitors by your many friends attached to them in our squadron. You have no doubt been informed that with a little effort we got the other two, namely, the Milwaukee and Kickapoo. I got the admiral to change off the Manhattan (Ericsson monitor) and the rebel rani Tennessee for them, and before this gets to you we shall have them at anchor within three miles of Mobile, the only vessels upon which we depend for an entrée to that harbor when we get ready to make the start. They have grown so in favor with everybody that it almost amounts to an affection, particularly after the fight in Mobile bay.

I feel happy to think that these vessels have come up to my expectations, and that I succeeded in carrying out my views and wishes, long since expressed, namely, to get them in the Mobile fight. They did it, and I am satisfied.

Yours truly,

WILLIAM S. SHOCK, U. S. N.

To JAMES B. EADS, Esq.

Mr. BLOW. I will state that I myself have heard Admiral Farragut speak in the highest terms of these vessels. He does not hesitate to say that they are absolutely necessary now to hold Mobile bay; that the management of the iron-clad Chickasaw was splendid, and that the strength and power of the Manhattan was terrific. I agree with my friend from Maryland that Farragut can go anywhere in a wooden vessel, but that is simply because he is an iron-clad himself. But I have still other evidence from an impartial naval officer who has always been regarded with favor by our countrymen, and who differs widely with the gentleman from Maryland in regard to these costly guns inclosed in a cheese-box. It is dated Claremont, January 11, 1865, is from the Prince de Joinville, and the extracts from it read as follows:

"The glorious action of the Keersage and Alabama, and the magnificent fight of Admiral Farragut, must be studied in all their details. The mode of fighting the forts ordered by Admiral Farragut was an act of genius, and his orders were carried out in the most beautiful manner. But the Tennessee was a very serious enemy, and it required the fifteen-inch at close quarters to do it for her.

"The amount of resistance furnished by the Tennessee, and every other example of your war, show how useful iron-clads are for harbor and coast defense. English, French, Italians, Turks, and Spaniards, are building very expensive sea-going iron-clads, but with some misgivings, and I understand their misgivings. Build a gunboat of great speed, with a few lines of thickness in bed-plates in excess of those of the English and French iron-clads, and with one good big smooth-bore gun, and she will be a match for the whole fleet."

I like this letter. It shows a correct appreciation of our Navy and of the genius of our people.

The gentleman from Maryland, not recollecting the unfortunate result attending a previous controversy on the subject of improved steam machinery, has alluded in rather unhandsome terms to that designed by the Department, and now being built for our new vessels-of-war. It is well known throughout the world that we are specially skilled in the planning and manufacturing of steam engines, and the completeness of our great constructions for the merchant and naval service is universally acknowledged. I beg to refer him to the report of the Naval Committee of the House who have so ably vindicated their industry and ability on this floor, and which is thus noticed by the Army and Navy Register in its issue of last Saturday, the 4th instant:

"The Naval Committee of the House are understood to have unanimously adopted the report of their chairman, Mr. A. H. RICE, on the subject of the resolution introduced during the last session, on the condition of naval machinery built by Mr. Isherwood, the chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering; the causes of the failure of the machinery of the Pensacola, from the plans of Mr. E. N. Dickerson, and the administration of the engineering department of the Navy, including the charges of fraud and incapacity. The report vindicates the management of the Bureau of Steam Engineering, stating that the machinery is in accordance with the latest improvements, and that the mode adopted of using the steam, with a very moderate measure of expansion, is in accordance with the most recent scientific researches and practical experiments, and has the indorsement of all able and experienced engineers. The comparison of his machinery with that previously constructed for our Navy, and for the French and English navies, and for the merchant marine, shows an incontestable superiority and a greater speed of vessels."

Mr. Chairman, the iron-clad vessels alluded to as having achieved the great victories that so strengthened the cause of the Union in the valley of the Mississippi, were mostly constructed by a man whose genius was brought forth by this rebellion and the necessities of the country, and whose future, if we are faithful to ourselves, will be as brilliant as his past has been patriotic and useful. I allude, sir, to the only genius of the day who is now conceded by the naval men of this country to be without a superior, if he has a rival—James B. Eads, of St. Louis, who has constructed twenty-one iron-clad vessels, whose successes are the pride of the whole nation.

Sir, if the entire monitor and iron-clad fleets constructed on the sea-board had failed, and nothing had been accomplished except what has been achieved by the western iron-clad navy, this country could well afford to forgive the errors which had caused such a failure in the magnificent result we have obtained through their agency West. If the twenty light-draught monitors now constructing, about which so much has been said, are failures, a result which I hope will never be established, I still contend that, taking all that the entire Navy has done, there are no services equal to it in the history of navies and navy struggles. Let those at home who are not satisfied with results which have startled England and France from their fancied security, enlighten us as to the exact method which they would have pursued under similar circumstances and in detail, and then we can be able to judge better of the errors complained of.

And are we to be told that this great country cannot in times like these go boldly into constructions and experiments, if you please, which promise at least success? Are we to stand still when our rebel adversaries, weak in money and mechanics, are duplicating their Merrimacs, Atlantas, and Tennessees? Is our Government to be held up to the criticisms of the world, and our own people to be the means of exhibiting every little failure made in this gigantic struggle? Are the men whose integrity, patriotism, skill, and devotion have never been doubted, to be prostrated the very hour when their labors are being crowned with success? Let us indulge the hope, sir, that such a result will not occur.

There are now in the Department plans of a steamer that it is claimed can run to the city of London and back again without coaling, and destroy within the time $500,000,000 of English property on the way and in that city, resisting all the engines of war yet devised by English skill and English gold. These plans have been submitted by one whose enterprises have ever been successful, and whose genius has been acknowledged by the highest naval authorities of our country.

My feelings and policy dictate that we should go on in the work of construction. Now, more than ever, do we need Ironsides, Monadnocks, and the Leviathan that can destroy the hopes of tyrants as well as their cities and forts. Let us not waste our time in idle disputes and unfriendly criticisms. Remember that Bull Run, Chickasaw Bluffs, Red River, and the two hundred thousand dead in Virginia, are passed over in the glorious victories and marches of Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, and Thomas; and so must our errors of construction, if they really exist, be forgotten in the brilliant achievements which have immortalized Foote, Farragut, Davis, Porter, Du Pont, Dahlgren, and a host of other naval heroes.

But I pass, Mr. Chairman, with much pleasure from the discussion of points that I deeply regret were ever pressed upon us, and beg the attention of the committee to some considerations of grave importance.

We have achieved our present supremacy on the ocean as a result incident to the suppression of the rebellion. Possessing the domination of the seas, policy, interest, and humanity conspire to prompt its retention: When we are able to sweep the ocean and bid defiance to all whom interest or passion might otherwise prompt to attack us, we need not fear that our peace will be molested. We have the highest possible motives for maintaining this superiority; but with the enormous ability to construct ocean steamers possessed by Great Britain at this day, we cannot hope to do so without such immediate legislation as will tend to increase our facilities for the construction and repair of iron-clad vessels. The developments of the war have shown that the British navy is to-day far inferior to our own. But it is only so because of the immense additions and improvements in construction that have been made by us during the rebellion. These improvements are well known to England and France, and if they do not at once adopt them it will be only because they hope to get some that are better, not because they will trust to those of the past. In a very few years those nations, England especially, will possess a navy quite as powerful as our own, if we remain idle. "Eternal vigilance is the price of safety."

At this day England is turning out from her immense private yards on the Clyde, the Thames, the Mersey, the Tees, the Tyne, and Wear, five hundred thousand tons of iron merchant vessels per annum. She is to-day duplicating the entire tonnage of our navy annually in iron steam vessels for the ocean, and this in her private yards alone. We are not able to build in all our private establishments together more than one sixth part of this tonnage. This is a startling fact that it is well for us to remember; but it is not the only remarkable truth which has been brought to our attention by the very able and interesting report of Chief Engineer J. W. King, United States Navy, and embodied in and published with the last annual report of the Secretary of the Navy. Mr. King was sent last summer by the Department to examine the dock-yards and iron-clad establishments in England and France, and I am glad to be able to say that every facility was extended to him by the Governments of those countries in the performance of his duties.

We learn from Mr. King's report the fact that England is far ahead of us in her ability to construct ocean iron steamers in her private yards; and that in her national establishments for the construction and repair of armored war vessels she is beyond all comparison superior to us. From his report it appears that there are in England seven naval or dock-yards; one of them, that at Chatham, is being extensively enlarged specially for the construction of iron-armored vessels-of-war, while another, situated at Portsmouth, is to be enlarged with like views. The total area of the British dock-yards exceeds five hundred and fifty acres, possessing thirty-six and a quarter acres basin accommodations, 32 stone dry-docks, and 31 ship-houses; and when Chatham and Portsmouth are completed, the ground covered by them all will exceed one thousand acres, containing 44 stone dry-docks and as many ship-houses; all other preparations being proportionate and comparatively gigantic. Besides these national works for the construction of fleets, the British have vast resources in the shape of iron-ship-yards and iron-works. It is seen that on the Clyde are 33 iron-ship-building yards, the productions from which in 1863 were 170 iron vessels with an aggregate of 120,700 tons. On the river Thames during the same year 117,000 tons of iron vessels were built; on the Mersey 80,000 tons; on the Tyne 51,236; on the Wear 25,000, and on the Tees 15,000—making a total of 408,996 tons of iron vessels built in 1863; and it is estimated that during the past year, 1864, upward of 500,000 tons of iron vessels were constructed in the British dock-yards, exclusive of those built for the royal navy. Some of the private iron-ship-yards have large capitals, and are very extensive and complete in all respects. Mr. King's report informs us that the constructive capabilities of either of the great Thames yards are equal to 25,000 tons or ten heavy iron vessels in hand and progressing simultaneously. Such are the facilities possessed by the British for building and equipping iron-clads. The Admiralty there could in the event of war, in addition to their own extensive dock-yards, command the services of more than 40 private iron-ship-building yards.

Now, how are we prepared to build sea-going armored ships? With resources in iron and materials superior to those of England, the few private yards in this country are mere make-shifts compared with them. The combined capabilities of them all are not equal to one such as are to be found on the river Thames. What are our navy-yards, and how are they prepared to meet the changes taking place in ships-of-war, and to meet the demands of a Navy which has grown in proportions until it is acknowledged to be superior to any other afloat? The Chatham dock-yard when completed will have an area of three hundred and eighty-nine acres, the whole of the ground being occupied by basins, dry-docks, ship-houses, and substantial steam factories. The New York navy-yard, the most important we possess, covers an available space of about twenty-five acres, not one fifteenth part as large as the Chatham yard. It has one stone dry-dock, two ship-houses, and other limited facilities for wood ship-building only. The Philadelphia navy-yard has a total area of but nine acres. It would require forty-three such yards to make one equal to the Chatham yard in England. It has one wood floating-dock, and two ship-houses, but not a steam factory, or any preparations for either the construction or repair of steam machinery. The Boston navy-yard, of but small area, has one stone dry-dock, three ship-houses, and is comparatively well prepared for constructing and repairing vessels; while the yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, is but little in advance of that at Philadelphia. The Washington yard has greater facilities for building machinery than all the others, but has not a single dock. Our navy-yards on the Atlantic coast possess two stone dry-docks and two wooden floating-docks, with other proportionate facilities, while the British will soon have forty-four stone dry-docks, beside unequalled resources in private docks. On the river Mersey alone there are twenty-four dry or graving-docks!

Apart from the limited facilities of our yards, they are in no way prepared, nor is there sufficient room in them, for building iron-clads. The Secretary of the Navy has frequently called attention to the subject, and the Department is much embarrassed for want of a proper yard, and the longer action in this matter is delayed the greater will be the difficulties and embarrassments that will arise to the Department, and the more imminent the danger to the country. Shall we allow this session to pass without deciding on so important a national measure—one in which the whole nation is interested, and in which no sectional or party feelings should or ought to interfere?

When we consider the manner in which our Navy, exclusive of iron-clads, has been improvised by the purchase of vessels from the merchant marine, we can readily see the great superiority which England would possess in drawing an increase to her navy from a merchant service which is increasing at the rate of five hundred thousand tons per annum in iron vessels under the stimulus of a demand which has resulted from her unfriendly conduct in giving aid and comfort to the enemies of this Government.

The want of at least one complete navy-yard near the Atlantic sea-board, with these startling facts in full view before us, is a great national misfortune, and its immediate construction is demanded by every consideration of interest, prudence, and policy. And yet there are gentlemen on this floor ready to vote defiant resolutions embodying the Monroe doctrine, and to march our armies into Canada, but who can go quietly to their homes and tell their constituents that they have faithfully discharged the trust confided in them, when they know we do not possess one single national establishment in the whole country for the construction of iron-clads, nor even the proper facilities for docking and repairing the armored vessels which now constitute our sole dependence, notwithstanding the Secretary of the Navy has time and again urged upon us the duty of providing these great national means of preserving our present Navy and providing for the inevitable necessity of its increase.

The unfriendly spirit manifested by England during the last four years toward us, and the ambitious designs of the French emperor, so boldly developing themselves upon this continent, should admonish us to be prepared for a conflict that will surely come when one or the other of those great Powers feel that they are safe in precipitating it. A jealous regard for the condition and effectiveness of our naval establishment is the surest way of keeping the peace and inspiring those and all other great Powers with a wholesome respect for the American Republic. I apprehend that there are few members upon this floor who do not feel satisfied that our iron-clad navy has been the only obstacle to prevent the hostile designs of France and England from assuming a form that would have compelled a declaration of war with them.

When we contemplate the enormous cost of this war, estimated by many at not less than $4,000,000,000, we can form some idea of what the cost of a war with those nations would probably be. If we compare the cost of this war with the cost of our entire Navy, $280,000,000, which includes its maintenance for four years, we find the latter is only one fourteenth part of this outlay. And this will enable us to form some idea of the great economy of the Navy in a struggle like the present, when we compare the results it has accomplished with the cost of similar results when achieved by the Army. Nor has this $280,000,000 all vanished in smoke and cannon-shot, in shoddy clothing or the commissary supplies that have been consumed; but it is to-day existing in substantial ships-of-war that are defending our foreign commerce, blockading rebellious shores, or battering down the strongholds of treason and bidding defiance to unfriendly Powers. These six hundred and seventy-one vessels, at the low average of $200,000 each, would represent a value of $134,000,000, or nearly one half of the entire outlay. The balance, $150,000,000 in round numbers, will represent the cost of maintaining it for four years—an average of $37,500,000 per annum.

The Government has been and is still paying bounties to volunteers for the Army at the rate of $300 per man, and through the past three years local bounties have been paid in addition sufficient to average at least $300 more. These local bounties, although not paid by the Government, are nevertheless paid by those who must be required to meet the interest on the public debt and provide for its ultimate liquidation; hence the whole amount of these bounties, say $600 per man, come from the same fountain source, the people, and it is proper to estimate their total amount as part of the expenses of the war. But these bounties alone are but a small part of the cost of maintaining the Army, and yet the total bounties alone paid to the volunteers in one year for the Army would defray the entire expense of maintaining our splendid naval establishment for ten years. This, Mr. Speaker, is a fact well worth pondering over by the ablest statesmen. When war comes it involves the vast machinery of an army with its stupendous expenditures. Is it not the part of wisdom to put the probability of a foreign war as far beyond the regions of possibility as it is in the power of the nation to do when it can be done at a cost that is insignificant when compared with the cost of such a war—a cost that is as trifling when compared with the cost of war as is the premium we pay to the insurance company when compared with the loss we desire to be protected against? Such protection we gain by maintaining a Navy commensurate with the grandeur of the nation, and capable by the power and efficiency of its construction and organization to protect the honor and advance the interests of the Republic. If our Navy be preserved by such facilities for repairs and construction as are absolutely demanded, and its development properly fostered, we need not fear but that American genius and enterprise will be amply sufficient to keep it through all time where it is to-day—in advance of all the nations of the earth. But let us be admonished by the fable of the turtle and the hare, and not believe that because we are now so superior to our competitors that we can afford to slumber and not expect to find them in advance of us when we awake. By American genius we have taught the Old World the worthlessness of many of their theories, and they will doubtless draw wisdom from our experience and the rapid development of facts that are constantly manifesting themselves in this present struggle. Twelve million dollars' worth of Armstrong breech-loaders in Great Britain were demolished when one blow of a Yankee four hundred and fifty pounder struck the rebel iron-clad Atlanta. And it needed but one American armored ship in Hampton Roads to show England that—

"Ruined was her buckler and broken was her shield."

Her boasted rule of the waves was as empty on that day as the command of her Danish king to those same waves a thousand years ago: "Thus far shalt thou come, and no further." Of her one thousand and four war vessels, but four remained to assert Britain's ocean supremacy. And the bombardment of Fort Sumter, with the much-abused monitors, if it did nothing more, taught our transatlantic neighbors that the new system, so much criticised and ridiculed in this Hall, was too invulnerable for their intermeddling to prove advantageous to them. That bombardment, if it did not capture Charleston, was so full of instruction to France and England that it saved us from an intervention, the result of which no statesman on this floor would dare to prophesy.

In the wonderfully rapid construction of our Navy the energies of the Department have been taxed to the uttermost point through all its official ramifications; and the powers of the people, through the contract system, have been strained to their greatest capacity, and the consequence has been a wonderful development of resources and a remarkable degree of inventive talent and capacity for naval constructions. The result of all this is before the nation and the world in the form of a Navy which has dealt the rebellion some of its worst wounds and maintained the honor of the nation. It is now the most potent in the world; surpassing in all the elements of effectiveness that of France or England. It now controls more than twelve thousand miles of inland waters, giving confidence and support to our armies, which are seldom beyond the reverberation of its guns, and at the same time successfully scours the ocean in pursuit of Anglo-rebel pirates, and maintains a blockade which is the wonder of the world.

This truly gigantic work has been accomplished without ostentation, and with an economy which has even extorted praise from the hostile and mercenary press of England, and, as our investigating committees have shown, with less fraud and peculation than any other undertaken by the Government. Notwithstanding the magnitude of the results that have been accomplished, the Navy Department has been repeatedly assailed in the most unjust and unreasonable manner, and its able chief ridiculed and caricatured until one would suppose that his principal occupation had been to pass his official hours in comfortable dozing in an easy arm-chair especially provided for that purpose by himself at the Department. Friend and foe to the Union have alike been led to believe that what was so persistently asserted by his defamers must be true.

Treason, in mistaken security, ridiculed the efforts of the old man of the sea to shut up a coast equal to one seventh of the world's circumference, and made thrice difficult by the rich fringe of islands, bays, peninsulas, sounds and inlets bordering it from Cape Henry to the Rio Grande and whose endless labyrinths gave friendly shelter to smugglers and pirates; but it has now awakened amid the terrors of starvation and the hopelessness of despair to see this stupendous work accomplished.

England, self-styled mistress of the seas, folded her snowy hands to rest when she saw the drowsy lids of the old Rip Van Winkle, but his Kearsarge guns in the British Channel have roused her from her pleasant slumbers. Winslow is crashing through British oak. Her trained gunners of the Excellent are struggling in the agonies of death, and Cherbourg bears witness to the petty larceny of the pirate's English consort—Britain's neutral Deerhound.

When the history of this war is written, Mr. Chairman, no prouder record of able administrative talent and comprehensive coöperation will gild its instructive pages than that which recites the management of the Navy Department during the last four years. The utmost efforts of ridicule and defamation have been exhausted in vain endeavors to weaken the confidence of the people and the President in the ability of its Secretary. From the moment of his installation this gentleman seems to have pursued, with a fixedness of purpose rarely witnessed, a policy having for its object the throttling of treason and the domination of the ocean. Calling at once to his council the ablest talent in the service, and confidently trusting his reputation to the keeping of the loyal people of the land; turning neither to the right hand nor the left to defend himself from the scurrility and misrepresentation which has assailed him, he has devoted his talents and energies to the consummation of this grand object with the modesty which attends true merit. Measured by the criterion of success, the only touchstone which a nation involved in a mighty struggle will trust in, the honorable Secretary has naught to fear. The stupendous work accomplished by the Navy, the soul-thrilling victories it has achieved, and the remarkable good fortune which has attended its undertakings during this rebellion; bear incontrovertible testimony to the statesmanship which has directed its operations, and stamp the administration of that Department as eminently successful.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I should like to record my profound admiration of the splendid gallantry and devoted patriotism that have been displayed by the naval heroes who have defended the honor of the national flag with a devotion and bravery which has won for them the admiration of the world. I have on several occasions, by my votes in this Hall, manifested my gratitude to these gallant officers and men who have done so much to defend our land from the curse of treason, and would now, if I felt that my humble powers were equal to so grand a theme, delight to dwell upon the glories with which they have enriched the story of these perilous times. But, Mr. Chairman,

"What skillful limner e'er would choose
To paint the rainbow's varying hues,
Unless to mortal it were given
To dip his brush in dews of heaven?"

The brilliancy of those achievements will make history more attractive than romance. Poetry will draw from its absorbing record immortal themes to gild its graceful numbers, and many a youthful hero in the dim and far-off future will feel the first impulse of generous emulation while listening to the songs and tales which recite the deeds of Foote and Farragut.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman from Maryland to allow me to move that the committee rise, in order to close debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not object to that.

Mr. STEVENS. I make that motion. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the naval appropriation bill be closed in one hour after its consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. PIKE. Let it be an hour and a half.

Mr. STEVENS. The debate has now run on interminably. We have a great deal of work to do. I cannot agree to more than an hour.

Mr. PIKE. I do not want to make a speech, but others do. Make it an hour and a quarter.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Maryland is entitled to close the debate; when he closes I want the debate closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] on which that gentleman was entitled to the floor; and that the general debate had been limited by the House to one hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, had the gentlemen of the Naval Committee treated the proposition I had the honor to present with ordinary fairness, or exhibited in the course of their discussion of it that they had read the bill and amendment which they rejected, and understood that which they attempted to induce the House not to adopt, I should not have indulged in a word of reply; for, sir, no fact I have adduced from the public record of this or the last session has been controverted or can be controverted by them; nor, indeed, if those facts stand is there any reply possible to the considerations urged by me. But instead of meeting the argument I addressed upon a measure introduced upon grave deliberation and referred to that committee for its consideration now nearly a year ago, both honorable gentlemen commenced their observations by remarking on the personal feeling and temper of my remarks.

Now, sir, whether that temper was that of a May morning, or of a November night, scarcely affects the value of the measure before the House. Whether I am pleased with or disgusted with the gentlemen who preside over the Navy Department is not an argument either for or against the measure I presented. My wrath did not sink the light-draught monitors, and the puffs of the Boston Advertiser cannot float them. If the gentlemen meant to intimate, for the purpose of weakening the weight of any observation I made here, that the measure I introduced is prompted by any personal feeling relative to the gentlemen who control that Department, I desire to say it is their invention, and nothing else, which gives foundation to the suggestion. I have not the honor of an acquaintance with either of those gentlemen. I have neither asked, nor received, nor been refused any favor at their hands, and that is more than the two gentlemen [Mr. RICE and Mr. PIKE] upon the committee can say for themselves.

If I am in ill-temper, and that ill-temper is to affect the judgment of the House upon the argument I presented, it is only fair to say—though I mention matters of this kind with great reluctance—that the devotion to the Department of the honorable gentlemen upon my right may be supposed equally to affect the weight of their arguments. And so far as the gentleman upon my left, [Mr. GRISWOLD,] who adduces his testimony to the efficiency of the machinery and the structure of the Dictator, is concerned, I may be permitted to say that the gentleman, if I am not misinformed, has had an interest in the construction of the iron-clads, which may naturally be supposed to warp his judgment upon that subject at least as much as my disgust biases mine. So that, when the collateral facts are made, I submit, be my temper what it might, my argument is entitled to weigh equally with the arguments of gentlemen upon the other side, irrespective of the temper that dictated or pervaded them.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. My time is limited.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman says he has neither asked, received, nor been refused any favors at the hands of the Navy Department, and that is more than gentlemen upon the committee can say. Has the gentleman any evidence to sustain that charge?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I did not make the charge.

Mr. PIKE. Impliedly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. All I said or meant to say is, that the inclination or enlargement of the gentlemen's hearts toward the Department as seriously impairs the argument and weight of their judgment as mine.

Mr. PIKE. I understood the gentleman to say that it was more than I could say that I had neither asked, received, nor been refused favors at the hands of the Navy Department.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. If the gentleman says he has not, he has only to say so.

Mr. PIKE. It is not for me to say whether I have or not. I ask the gentleman upon what proof he makes that assertion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will take the gentleman's word for it.

Mr. PIKE. He has not my word for it one way or the other. I ask the gentleman for the evidence.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I suppose the House can understand why the galled jade winces. I have done with these interruptions.

But another step; and it is to the gentleman I refer. He spoke about my inaccuracy touching the consideration of the bill before the committee, and said, if I understood him correctly, that it had been considered promptly by the committee after I had requested the honorable gentleman and some others to have it considered, whether at the last session or the present session I do not remember. When that consideration took place I do not know, and the honorable gentleman does. But if I was misled, I was misled by the statement of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] a member of the committee, who, when I moved this amendment formally, said to the House, as an objection to its consideration, that it "is now undergoing investigation before that committee," and if it was decided before that time, I was not at fault in supposing it had not been decided. If it was decided since that time, I am right in supposing that the judgment was made while my amendment was pending, in order to affect the judgment of the House unfavorably and irregularly upon it.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Does not the honorable gentleman from Maryland know that the Committee on Naval Affairs have had no opportunity whatever to report on that measure?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That is not the question; the question is, when the committee came to their conclusion upon it.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It is impossible, unless my time is extended.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman said they came to an adverse conclusion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. He did not make such a statement.

Mr. PIKE. It is upon the record.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. No, sir; he made that statement afterwards, when the amendment was under consideration; when I referred to his statement that the bill was undergoing investigation, and therefore undetermined, when I moved the amendment, he asked to be allowed to interrupt me, and said, for the satisfaction of the gentleman I tell him the committee have come to a conclusion, and determined to report against the measure. I am correct, or the gentlemen of the committee differ among themselves, and I cannot adjust their differences.

But how have the gentlemen treated the measure itself? From beginning to end as if I had introduced this bill to annex the British system of a Board of Admiralty to the organization of the Navy Department. There was no other ground of objection or point of observation made by either of those gentlemen, so far as I could understand them. I desire to say that gentlemen who are arguing from the Board of Admiralty in England against the measure I adduce either do not know what the Board of Admiralty of England is, or they never have read or understood this bill. The Board of Admiralty is the Navy Department of England. The six lords administer the navy, not advise a single head. They are the executive body itself, not a council to advise another head. It is formed upon the old system of the Government of England, which is ministerial, by a board of ministers and not by the nominal head, the king. The Board of Admiralty is carrying the organization of the ministry into the administrative department of the navy. That is the peculiarity of the system. Against that peculiarity the objections to the Board of Admiralty in England are directed alone. It is that peculiarity which I do not propose to adopt, and it is upon this peculiarity of that board that these gentlemen have argued here against the amendment which I introduced.

The gentleman who is chairman of the Naval Committee stated that a board of naval commissioners was appointed under a law passed in 1815, and that that law was repealed, and the bureau system was adopted in 1849. The burden of his argument was that the naval commission of 1815 was such a board as I propose now. Why, Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman understand the history of the organization of the Department which he here represents and attempts to defend? The Navy Commissioners of 1815 were the ministerial organization of the Department, for which were substituted the present bureaus, now the ministerial portion of the Department, executing the instructions of the Secretary of the Navy. What I propose—and I hope now, at least, I shall be able to make myself understood—what I propose is, not to remove the bureaus, not to substitute any other organization to discharge their ministerial duties, nor to interfere with the free discretion of the Secretary, but to interpose, on the French system, between the administrative discretion of the Secretary and the ministerial obedience of the bureaus a council of naval officers, whose advice the Secretary may command on all matters, whose opinions he must take on some matters, but which when taken he is free to disregard. Is that intelligible? As the President has his Cabinet, so the Secretary shall have his advisers. I would have the Secretary, without restricting his executive discretion, surrounded by advisers of competent professional knowledge, who would prevent blunders, expose errors, and furnish light if the Secretary have only eyes; or if he had light, give him greater light. The weaker he is the more he needs it; the wiser he is the more he will prize and profit by it. The very foundation of the American system of government is an executive head with a council of advisers around him.

In view of the great errors and blunders that have been committed by the present administration of the Navy Department, I endeavor to apply that same system to the Secretary of the Navy so as to surround him with professional advisers who may save him from repeating the errors of the past by mere caprice, by mere blundering, or by mere carelessness or haste. If he had the genius of Napoleon Bonaparte he would need advice, and if he were as wise as Napoleon before empire crazed him, he would seek and not decline it. Those who are familiar with the writings of the great historian of the Consulate and Empire know that in his earlier and better days, when he exhibited greater administrative capacity than any man who had ruled France since the days of Richelieu, he adopted no great measure of questions of war or peace, of diplomatic policy or internal administration, until it had been debated fully, freely, and deliberately by his council around him. The fruits of that consultation appeared in his judgment which closed the sitting, and in the event which consolidated France and revolutionized Europe. It was only when an insane ambition—as a smaller ambition here leads people to discard advice and avoid professional advisers, and inflict on this land of law all the evils of personal rule—only when an insane ambition had bent him on to the conquest of all Europe, and when his projects would not stand discussion even in his own private councils, that the campaign of Russia and the invasion of Spain were determined on, without consultation, in spite of remonstrances now sunk to whispers, on mere fancies of his own imagination; and he followed them to his ruin. It is thus all merely personal government must end, and it is from mere personal irresponsible rule the Navy is now suffering. If Napoleon could take advice, certainly Mr. Welles should not be above it. If he needed counselors around him, I submit that Mr. Fox is not a sufficient counselor for the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, what do I propose? First, that professional officers shall be appointed by the President. Next, that they shall advise the Secretary of the Navy on every matter relating to naval administration, naval legislation, and the application of the naval force in time of war. It does not compel him to follow, it gives him the privilege of taking, the advice of this board. But on the great subjects that involve vast expenditures, the organization of navy-yards, the structure of new vessels, the forms of iron-clads, the adoption of new machinery, the pursuit of investigations in new departments of inquiry—on these subjects the bill says, not that the Secretary shall be bound to come to the same conclusion with the board, but that he shall come to no conclusion, and shall make no order, until he has taken the advice of this board. Tell me what harm advice can do him. It does not divide the responsibility. It does not delay his judgment. It does not control his conclusions. It puts light around him, and then leaves him to take the way to ruin if he sees fit to do so, on his responsibility before the American people, with the advice which he has had, and which we have provided for him, lying printed beneath his eyes, to condemn or to justify him.

The honorable gentleman who heads the Naval Committee [Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts] has informed us that boards have been organized, from time to time, by the Navy Department, for its assistance, and that that is done continually. Then, sir, if the Department, at its discretion, feels the necessity of advice, why should not the country have the benefit of the experience of men responsible to it, appointed under the law by the President and confirmed by the Senate, whose opinions shall stand before the country, instead of having a commission, packed for the occasion, responsible to no law and no person, but simply executing the Secretary's will and caprice? Why should we not have this board, instead of one to be summoned, as in the case of the additional expenses of the Dictator, for the purpose of revising the decision of another board, and of coming to a conclusion more satisfactory to the Department? the results of their adverse judgment known only by accident, and after Congress, in ignorance of their findings, had improvidently ratified the reckless extravagance of the Department for "the honor and interest" of the Government.

The committee treat my observations on their hunt for a navy-yard as an imputation on them. Nothing is further from my meaning. My complaint at the loss of their services in the House was wholly playful; but the argument which pointed my remark was sharp and direct, and that they evaded under cover of a personal complaint. Gentlemen have treated this measure as an imputation on the Administration. Perhaps they did not understand the point of my argument; they did not answer it. It was that the Committee on Naval Affairs conceded, last session, the necessity of advice by constituting themselves into a board of admiralty for the Secretary of the Navy. If they thought he needed advice and that they were competent to advise him on the choice of navy-yards, is not a board of naval officers as competent and as necessary to give advice upon the great questions of naval administration?

But, in the pursuit of their argument derived from the experience of the Board of Admiralty in England, the honorable gentlemen brought themselves, I think, into divers inconsistencies. They even attempted to play on our prejudices in favor of American genius. They are not more American than I am. They attempted to awaken the susceptibilities of this House by imputations that I had depreciated the enterprise of the American Navy. Mr. Chairman, every officer of the American Navy knows that I am pleading his cause; and if I do not give the names of officers of the first position in the Navy who hang breathless on the passage of the measure, it is because the Assistant Secretary of the Navy says that court-martials are organized to convict.

But, sir, let us pursue the argument on the question of the English Board of Admiralty. Notwithstanding this perpetual American gasconade about the performances of the Monitor in Hampton Roads, which, we are told, according to English authority quoted here, has made all their ships useless, neither France nor England has built a single monitor; and that was in 1862, and we are now in 1865. Russia has built thirteen monitors, we are boastfully told. When did Russia become a naval Power whose opinions could instruct Americans on a question of naval armament? Sir, I may have said bitter things in the course of my observations, but I said nothing so bitter and so insulting to the American Navy or the Navy Department as that.

But the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] informs us that English authorities declare "that all their broadside vessels of the iron-clad class, like the Warrior, will have to be built over." Yet there they stand unchanged. England still adheres to her system of broadside iron-clads as tenaciously as she holds to the "exploded" Board of Admiralty. I suppose that we shall next be told that England is no naval Power, because she has changed neither the organization of her Navy Department nor the structure of the iron-clads that she has built.

The honorable gentleman has cited another authority, Sir Charles Napier, and one of the Napiers so proverbial for their quarrels in both branches of the English service. But what does he complain of? Unfair promotion and lack of responsibility. Will the gentleman ask any officer of the Navy of the United States whether he thinks that the promotions in our Navy are fair? That is a most unfortunate topic for the honorable gentleman just now that the Department has organized the board of promotions, on which its malice has excluded the officers of the south Atlantic squadron from the representation accorded every other squadron. Where is any responsibility? Who is responsible for anything that is done? For we have a head that does nothing, and the active power under him, irresponsible, that does everything.

Then the same honorable gentleman quoted a high English authority as saying that it would be an outrage to send men into action in wooden vessels. Why does he cast such an imputation upon the head of the Navy Department that sent Farragut to Mobile and Porter to Fort Fisher in wooden vessels, and is now building a whole fleet of them, with engines alone costing $400,000 and $600,000 each?

But a word on the question of iron-clads abroad. The "American idea," as it is called, embodied in the Monitor and the Dictator, has hitherto produced nothing that will cross the ocean. The New Ironsides that will cross it is not on that American idea, but a copy of the Warrior. And whatever opinions of magazines or officers the gentleman from Maine may quote, it is not true either that England or France has adopted the American idea or abandoned as failures the Warrior or La Gloire. Against those hasty suggestions I quote and prefer the opinion of an American naval constructor, that gentleman whom the gentleman from Maine so justly eulogized, the great naval constructor of the United States, Lenthall, to whom we are indebted for our great superiority in the structure of our wooden vessels. He does not think that the iron-clads of either England or France are a failure, but does think that we have now nothing to oppose them. Here are his words:

"For the protection of our coasts and harbors we are probably well prepared; but we have only three vessels that can pretend to cope with the sea-going iron-clad vessels of European nations, and these have not yet been tried. It is a problem to be yet resolved, whether a large steam vessel with her deck a foot or two above water, and without sails, can be effective and use her guns as a cruising ship. Experience has shown that as ships increase in dimensions and weight there must be a certain relative portion above the water; that is, the height of the guns from the water should be increased; but this may, to some extent, be modified by making sacrifices in some other qualities.

"The accounts we have of the performances of the iron-clad European vessels, if to be relied on, show that the elevated position of their armor-plating has not seriously affected the motion of the vessels, and some of them are represented as being easier than ordinary vessels. Their large dimensions have much influence in this; but our principal harbors do not permit us to have so great a draught of water as European vessels have, which is stated to be from twenty-six to twenty-seven feet."

Now, sir, with reference to the iron-clad navies of France and England, abandoned upon the mere rumor of the impossible Dictator, let me read again:

"Until such time as it becomes the policy of the Government to build iron-armored vessels for sea service—and, whenever commenced, it will require some years to have them in sufficient number to keep an enemy from our coast—we must have recourse to plating wood vessels, of which the first cost may appear less, though it is certain to be more expensive in the end.

"Unless we have armored sea-going ships?"—

Not Monitors, not Dictators, not Dunderbergs, but armed sea-going ships—

"We must give up the expectation of engaging our foes on the ocean, and must limit our operations to attacks on their commerce with fast and light-armored vessels."

That is the judgment of our great naval constructor upon the extent to which the American idea of monitors has affected the sea-going iron-clads of Europe. He declares that we must go to work and build iron-clads of the same class, if we contemplate meeting them on the ocean in battle array.

I will not repeat what I quoted from Admiral Porter about the New Ironsides—the only vessel of that kind in the Navy—the best he ever saw for aggressive purposes, the counterpart of the Warrior; so that the Warrior class cannot be a failure if she is not. But I cannot refrain from invoking against the Department and the gentleman from Maine the judgment of Dahlgren, who went to Charleston to do impossibilities and staid there two years without accomplishing them; who went there to show that monitors could take forts, and has taken none. Though he was pledged by his appointment to a judgment in favor of the administration wherever it was possible, his scientific judgment could not be so deluded as to overlook the great power of this form of vessels. He ventures no opinion on the monitor form for sea-going cruisers, apologetically refuses a judgment on the general merits of iron-clads of that class, but gives the palm of superiority for aggression to the form which the gentleman from Maine supposes the monitors have exploded:

"The Ironsides is a fine, powerful ship. Her armor has stood heavy battering very well, and her broadside of seven eleven-inch guns and one eight-inch rifle, has always told with signal effect when opened on the enemy. Draught of water about fifteen and a half to sixteen feet. Speed six to seven knots, and crew about four hundred and forty men.

"Just as they are, the Ironsides is capable of a more rapid and concentrated fire, which, under the circumstances, made her guns more effective than the fifteen-inch of the monitors."

He, pledged by his appointment to a judgment in favor of the administration of the Navy Department, as far as it is possible to bend his scientific judgment to meet the expectations of the Department, cannot be so used as to put out of sight the great power of this form of vessel, or to venture an opinion in favor of monitors beyond the special circumstances of the war. He says what corroborates in every particular the statement of Admiral Porter read by me, that that vessel, constructed on that model, came more perfectly up to his idea of those intended for aggression than any other he had ever seen.

Now, sir, I agree with the honorable gentlemen of the committee that we cannot adjust these conflicting authorities. But here stands the great fact that while the general clamor across the water exaggerates the effect produced by the attack of the Monitor upon the Merrimac, it has not changed the course of European structure; it has not produced a single monitor in the ports of France or England; and the judgment of our naval officers is in conflict with the opinions quoted from abroad, responsible or irresponsible, by the gentleman from Maine, but conforms to the official judgments of France and England, that vessels of this class are neither a failure nor inferior to the American idea embodied in the monitors. I prefer the judgment of American naval officers to the judgment of English naval officers, and still more to the clamor of English magazines; and in any legislation for the benefit of the Navy I should consult their judgment and not a criticism of the English Board of Admiralty not analogous to the one I propose. Arguing from one to another is merely for the purpose of misleading the judgment of the House, or because gentlemen did not understand the bill they are criticising.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not contemplate following either of the gentlemen through their arguments, in which they evaded everything that was to be answered and controverted many things which were not asserted. But I desire to say, when my honorable friend on my right [Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts] spoke of the swiftness of the Lutaw—as if that in the least degree controverted my statements, which were in reference to war vessels of the Navy, and not to those river boats, as I termed them—he was introducing a topic I had not touched. I did not mean to say one word in respect to the speed of those vessels, because I considered them set out of the account as naval vessels. But the honorable gentleman must not suppose that I can allow to pass his statement of the performance of this vessel in smooth river water, without her provisions, without her ammunition—I do not know whether she had her armament—certainly without her full load of coal, under none of the conditions of a vessel going to sea, subjected to no collision with the waves, as if I accepted that as a test of the power of the same vessel at sea.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman want to hear the report of Admiral Porter in reference to the sea-going of that vessel?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not know that that is in question. I spoke of the validity of your answer to a challenge of the speed of the Navy vessels. The question being as to the speed of the screw vessel, the Department ostentatiously put forward a river steamer, a paddle-wheel boat, upon smooth water, without the load necessary to be carried at sea, to answer the problem of the speed of screw sloops on the ocean; and gentlemen can form their own judgment whether that solved the problem submitted for solution, or served any other purpose than to mislead the public mind from the real question.

But, since the gentleman has referred to the double-enders in that behalf, I will do what I did not do the other day. I said then only this: whatever may be their speed, the faster it carries them into action the faster it will carry them to the bottom; that, since all their machinery and boilers are above water they are doomed to inevitable destruction in any general naval action where equal forces come into collision. I said for those reasons those vessels were not to be counted a part of our naval force for a war with a naval Power.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. How can you build a ship to draw only six or seven feet with its machinery below the water-line?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I thank the honorable gentleman for that question. A board of engineers, summoned by the Department to criticise the machinery placed in these and other vessels, said that because of its peculiar form the boiler projected above the water-line, but that with a proper model it could be placed below.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. State what model they recommended, or does the gentleman know of any?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The honorable gentleman has their report, and can read it for himself. My impression is neither he nor the Department read it after summoning the board. The report will show what I state to be correct; but no form of machinery of a paddle-wheel steamer can be protected, and therefore none of these vessels are war vessels.

But, sir, what I meant to refer to now, though not covered by my former remarks, is this: that it will appear that after the explosion on the Chenango in New York harbor, killing and wounding nobody can tell how many of our sailors, an investigation took place before the coroner, and the coroner, after a full investigation upon the evidence, stated the result of the evidence to the jury; and it went to show conclusively that the boilers placed in this vessel, and others of her class, which were condemned by the board of engineers summoned by the Navy Department, were so liable, by their peculiar structure, to exhaust the water in the boiler, that it was dangerous to run the vessel with open ports or full power. And that was proved by the officers of the vessel themselves.

I now send to the Clerk to be read an extract from that investigation.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"It is apparent that the engineer corps of the Navy, as well as the persons whose plans are involved, have a deep interest in assigning some other cause than low water; since if it were low it must have been so either from carelessness of engineers or from inherent defects in the organization which baffled the ordinary skill of such persons as had the machine in charge; yet no attempt has been made to explain away the melted lead or to reconcile its presence with the fact that there was enough water in the boiler. And as this is the ordinary cause of explosion it would seem consequently the true one here, particularly since no evidence of any sort has been produced to substitute any other cause; and we are left to the mere suggestion, without proof, that possibly the braces might have been taken out by Mr. Cahill and not replaced, or possibly the cold-water test, which experience has shown to be infallible, has in this case proved a snare. Unfortunately, there are other facts, which point out very clearly the existence of an organic disease in these vessels, requiring the utmost vigilance to guard against, the presence of which is abundantly proved. A number of these vessels are just now coming out, and it so happened that on Saturday, the 16th, the day after this explosion, the Pawtuxet, having been run for ninety-six hours at the dock, was taken out on a trial trip from Providence. In the course of the run it became necessary to shut off the steam from the engine, from some cause, and thus the fire appeared that the water, which had seemed to be abundant in the gauges, was low. Mr. Baker, an experienced engineer, who set up and ran the engine on her ninety-six hours' trial, at once had the fires drawn from the furnaces, as a measure of safety, the necessity of which, under the circumstances, Mr. Sewell admitted to you when on the stand, and it was found that the steam pump required twenty-two minutes to resupply the boiler with the water found wanting, although the gauges had given no warning of its absence. But for Mr. Baker this accident would have probably had its counterpart; and so convinced of the danger of the machine was Mr. Baker that he refused to come to New York in the vessel unless he had the control given him; and he has told us these facts, and sworn to the danger.

"On the Chenango, the experienced engineers who ran the engine at the dock have told us that they considered their lives in danger from the liability to low water; and so convinced were they of it that they refused to open wide the throttle-valve, though the United States engineers who were present insisted that the contract required the engine to be run wide open. Mr. Smith, the engineer who erected and ran the engine of the Metacomb, another of the same class, has proved here that the water could only be kept in her boilers by so setting the valves that they would not fully open when the engine worked; and that when those valves were ordered by Mr. Sewell to be set so as to open wider, and the vessel was run from the ship to the navy-yard, the water worked so that the valves had to be put back to their original position, which was done by himself at the navy-yard, under orders from the chief-engineer of the ship. The drawings of these engines have been produced before us, and the measurements made of the cubic feet of vacant space which existed in these cylinders between the valves when they are closed and the piston when at the extreme end of the cylinder nearest the closed valves, and it appears that these spaces are great enough to hold more than sixteen hundred pounds of water at a revolution before they will be filled so as to arrest the motion of the piston as it approaches the end of the cylinder, and compel the opening of the relief valves, which are placed in each end of the cylinder to prevent the destruction of the engine by the confinement of the solid water in the cylinder; yet it appears here that even more than this quantity of water would at times come over from the boiler at a revolution, and that these self-acting relief valves had to be opened constantly by hand, to permit the escape of this enormous quantity of water more freely than it could be voided by the self-acting valves. When it is considered that only about nine pounds of water in the shape of steam are needed to make the ordinary revolution of these engines, and that at times they draw even more than three quarters of a ton of water at a revolution, it is very easy to see how the boilers might be robbed of their water in a very few minutes, and the attention of an ordinary man be eluded.

"The coal burned by the Chenango on her trial has been proved, and the amount of steam which that coal produced has been measured on the indicator diagrams which were taken on the trials, by which it is proved that in the form of steam these boilers only evaporate from three to four pounds of water to the pound of coal, whereas if they did not use up the heat by carrying it off from the boiler in hot water they would evaporate seven or eight pounds of water into steam; and it is testified to here, and the calculations show upon the indicator diagrams themselves, that these engines must have been working out of the boilers, in water, on an average during the ninety-six hours of the trial, about six times as much hot water as steam. Of the accuracy of such calculation, based upon comparing the weight of coal burned with the cubic feet of steam used by the engine, you are perhaps better judges than I am; but it is to be remarked that these calculations have been on the table for several days challenging contradiction, and that they are not disputed. It is further proved here that a considerable number of these vessels, exactly like the Chenango, have been recently built and tried, and that they are now awaiting orders for sea; yet no witness has appeared before us to say that any of the other of these vessels have operated differently from those whose performance has been proved; although there is no want of proof that when these boilers are arranged with a high steam space above the ends of the tubes, and a steam chimney, they do not work out their water. It would have been much more instructive to us if the engineers who have run so many of these low-roofed boilers had been produced, instead of those whose only experience has been with boilers not liable to that difficulty.

"It is not very surprising, perhaps, that among the great number of vessels used by the United States and placed in the hands of young men who have had but little experience, and who are employed when there is a scarcity of engineers, on account of the great demand for the services of such men suddenly made by the Navy, that an explosion should occur at some time; and if the machinery were of the ordinary kind the accident would excite no unusual interest. But when it occurs on machinery peculiar in its construction, and which had been condemned as inferior by an official board of the most eminent engineers in the country, and when it appears that those peculiarities have so exhibited their dangerous qualities as to alarm practical and scientific men, and to induce them to foretell an accident of this kind; and when we find these peculiarities existing on a greater number of our vessels just now coming into use, upon which the lives of our fellow-citizens are to be intrusted, then it is of serious consequence, and demands of us to raise a voice of warning in time to prevent any more such horrors as we have witnessed. Our brave men, who are willing to expose their bosoms to the enemy's shot, ought not to be subjected to the chances of a horrible death at the hands of their own friends, and in their own floating homes."

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. So much for the boilers of the double-enders.

Two gentlemen of the Committee on Naval Affairs have made great complaint that I imposed upon them last year a burden too heavy to be borne in the resolution of inquiry I introduced relative to steam machinery. Mr. Chairman, when I referred that resolution to the Naval Committee I thought I was paying them the highest compliment I could bestow, for I supposed I was sending a resolution to a committee which, from its connection with the Department, would have the best means possible of information; and from their attendance to the interests of the Navy would prosecute their inquiry with energy and thoroughness, and give us the full benefit of their judgment. It related to the same matter investigated in part by the board of engineers organized by the Department in 1863, and disregarded by the Department. It was intended to save the ruin of the machinery of the Navy, to bring it to the test of science and knowledge; and the topics which were to be inquired into could have been inquired into effectually as well in the course of two weeks as in the time which has elapsed from the day that resolution was brought in down to the day the committee brought in their report about a week ago. There were a few topics, and only a few, requiring investigation, which the examination of half a dozen engineers would have settled almost immediately, and the Department and this House would have had the results of the investigation upon that subject in time to act upon it.

But on the contrary what do we find? The stupendous diligence of the gentlemen of that committee had absorbed all their leisure time from the day of the reference of the resolution down to the day, I think, before the motion made by me to append this amendment to the naval bill. An immense mass of testimony—twenty-two hundred pages—was introduced, which nobody can possibly read, which nobody can possibly consider. Their report came here and has not yet been printed. It is worth now substantially, no matter how wise or correct the resolution to which the committee came, just as much as the paper upon which it will be printed, because during the time that the investigation was being carried on the Department had been building the very machinery that it was intended to test and correct and examine. Just as the Department has kept an investigation going on to verify the results of the report of the engineers appointed in February, 1863, still diligently at work in November, 1864, and all the time, the Department, since February, 1863, has been building the machinery; so that, without its being intended to have that effect by the gentlemen making the investigation, exactly the same result has been accomplished, that is to say, the Government does not get the advantage of the investigation at all, but while the investigation has been lumbering on, every machine shop in the country has been ringing with the construction of the very machinery which is in question. In a word, both investigations have been a mere screen to the Department, giving impunity to its gross abuse of the public confidence.

Mr. GANSON. I would ask the gentleman if it would not be a more direct and reliable mode of obtaining information to have the head of the Naval Department upon this floor?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I answer that question with very great pleasure. If the information were in the head of the Department, I would say yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. GANSON. I would ask the gentleman if he has found that it is so? [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I fear the gentleman does not give me credit for as much acuteness as I flattered myself I possessed. I had found that out long ago. [Laughter.]

I take leave of this digression.

Sir, I submit that this measure must be determined on its merits. Gentlemen cannot escape responsibility before the country by saying that I proposed it out of ill-temper; nor that a vote for it might disturb their relations with the Department; nor that their appointments might be interfered with; nor that it might diminish their capacity to serve their constituents with the head of the Department, whom the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Blow] eulogized so strenuously, I take it, in order to procure weight for his navy-yard at Carondelet. These arguments cannot support them before the country, and they are dangerous arguments to go into a political contest thereon. I ask a vote upon the measure I propose, not upon my disgust at the Department; I ask the vote upon the public considerations which must determine the judgment of the country that the measure is right or wrong. I ask gentlemen to say whether they think the Navy Department has been managed so during this war that no advice can improve it. I ask them whether they are content that the American commerce shall have been swept from the ocean by five rebel privateers, with six hundred cruisers in our Navy to catch and destroy them. I ask them if they think that American commerce can live if this is what we call an energetic and wise management of the Navy Department. If we give the Navy a chance to live, and a voice in its own preservation, we may rescue our commerce from destruction, and when we are called upon to meet a great naval Power on the ocean, we shall not be driven to imitate the plundering warfare of the rebels, and, shunning our armed enemies, go mousing over the ocean for their defenseless commerce, but, like a great Power, meet our foes in arms and dictate terms of peace on the water as well as on the land. When gentlemen shall take steps to do that America will be a Power; but as long as Congress will not assert its supremacy over the Departments and prescribe such organization of them as will give this nation the benefit of its resources, so long as Congress stops to inquire what the Departments wish, instead of imposing on them what the interest of the nation requires, we will be powerless before the nations of the world.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I am here to-day pleading the cause of the American Navy against the Navy Department. I am saying what four out of five of the officers of the Navy would say had they a voice in this House. I say what the ablest and leading men of the Navy would say to-day through the newspapers, were it not that the fear of exposure makes the Department despotic. Gentlemen quote here the opinions of officers of the British navy against the administration of their navy; but who in our Navy dare say anything against the management of our Navy Department? Have we not seen one of the most distinguished officers of our Navy, Commodore Wilkes, for controverting statements in the report of the Department seriously affecting his honor as an officer, dragged before a court? Was that court organized on principles of justice, or was it organized "to convict," in the language of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy? He was dragged before a court for vindicating himself and his own administration of the squadron under his command, and subjected to three years' suspension from service—a cruel and disgraceful persecution such as never before has tarnished the administration of the American Navy. Sir, this system of tyranny in the Department deprives the country of the benefit of the opinion and advice and judgment of the officers of the Navy upon the structure and organization of the American Navy. They are always ready to risk their lives and shed their blood on anything that will float, but they shrink from advising the country for the benefit of the Navy at the expense of a trial by a court organized to convict. Let them have a voice in the making of the vessels they are to navigate; let them have a voice in the selection of the artillery they are to use; let them have a voice in advising where they shall be sent. Had this been done the Alabama's career would have been shorter and less disastrous. The coal depots and other necessities of navigation, the lines of commercial transit, the passes of the seas, pointed out the line where rebel cruisers must go from any given point; and any competent board could have devised a plan to meet and destroy them. Under the spasmodic guesswork by which the Alabama was pursued by this administration for four years, our commerce was swept from the ocean, sent to the bottom, or driven under foreign flags. Rebel cruisers burnt our ships not merely on distant seas but almost within sight of the American coast; and then the Department telegraphed to the navy-yards, and all the newspapers were filled with eulogies of the marvelous diligence of the Department in setting vessels afloat to catch the rebel cruisers. Those seas swarmed with vessels sent to the spot where the burning took place, and came back to report that the rebel cruisers were not there, and that nothing was found but the ashes of the conflagration.

That system, sir, is one which could not have existed had there been competent professional advisers around the Secretary. His own patriotism, his feeling for his country's cause, the vain clamor of New York merchants, their cry to him to spare their commerce, would have compelled him to listen, if the law had only clothed a board of officers with the right to speak, free from the danger of courts-martial organized to convict. It is that great deficiency that I am now trying to remedy. I am not influenced by any estimate of the personal value of the present Secretary, or of any other Secretary of the Navy. Be he as respectable as he may, be he as able and upright as he may, be he as honest and efficient as he may, I would not waste five minutes of the precious time of this House in eulogizing or in condemning him. I look beyond men to measures. I look beyond the head of the Department to the great country which that Department represents. I look beyond the brief and fitting moments of his official life, now rapidly drawing to a close—if the prayer of every naval officer can be heard—to the day when the American nation will have to vindicate its power before the nations of the world now insidiously seeking our ruin, not by stealthy depredations on unarmed traders, but with a Navy bearing proudly the banner of the Republic over the seas, worthy to meet in arms the armed foes of the thirty millions of united Americans whose freedom and empire it guards, and able to prove on some great historic day that the Republic can neither be torn asunder by internal dissensions nor browbeaten by the coalesced monarchies of Europe. [Applause on the floor.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What has become of my appeal from the decision of the Chair on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. PIKE. I have but one word to say on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. PIKE. I propose to offer an amendment, and to speak to it.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order after the question of the appeal is disposed of.

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained, ruling the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] to be in order.

Mr. PIKE. I now propose to offer an amendment, if it be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is in order to offer an amendment to the amendment, but not to debate it except for five minutes.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine himself to the reasons for striking out that last line. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIKE. I made no point, Mr. Chairman, as to the ill temper of the gentleman from Maryland, which has called out this most intemperate reply. He has made profert voluntarily of his own temper, and I think with him that the House would be unwise to pivot upon it its action upon an important measure. But that gentleman did say about the Committee on Naval Affairs that it was simply recording the opinions of the naval Department. I asked what evidence he had for making that charge, and for attempting to belittle the committee, and in the remarks which he has just made to the House he has withdrawn the insinuation. I stated in reply to that charge that I, for one, so far from being influenced by the opinion of the naval Department, did not know what that opinion was, and had not taken means to inform myself of it, that I had had no conversation either with the Secretary or Assistant Secretary on this important measure, but that judging from the measure itself—which I stated in my remarks I understood to be an advisory board, more after the fashion of the French board, and not a controlling board after the manner of the British admiralty, that it was a conglomerate of the two systems, with the bad qualities of both; and I adduced naval opinion against the plan to show that it would simply introduce confusion into the councils of the Navy, that the board would be simply a debating society, that it would entail needless discussion, and that it would deprive the Navy of that single responsible head, which, in the opinion of Sir Charles Napier and other naval writers, is essential to its efficiency.

Now, one word more, and only one word, upon this question of armed vessels, upon which the gentleman cited the opinion of the distinguished head of the Bureau of Construction. Sir, that gentleman reported to the head of the Navy Department, and the head of the Navy Department sent his report in here approvingly, asking of this Congress, at the last session, that they would make appropriations for the purpose of building large armed vessels, vessels which European opinion has decided cannot be efficient unless with the enormous tonnage of six, seven, and eight thousand tons. But Congress decided, and properly, in my opinion, that the condition of the public Treasury was not such as to justify, at that time, an appropriation to carry out the recommendation of the Navy Department on this subject; and now the gentleman from Maryland complains of the head of the Navy Department for not building that class of vessels.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. Davis, of Maryland, there were, on a division—ayes 48, noes 44.

Mr. PIKE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. Davis, of Maryland, and Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 57.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866, had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I now call the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Most of the amendments were adopted against the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means; but I am willing that the vote shall be taken upon them in the lump, except the last, which strikes out all after line three hundred to the end of the bill. That amendment, if adopted by the House, will leave the ordnance department and several other departments without appropriations which are absolutely necessary.

Mr. PIKE. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Davis.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for a separate vote on each amendment.

The first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

In line eleven strike out the word "construction," and insert in lieu thereof the word "completion."

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

In line twelve strike out "twenty-one million five hundred and seventy;" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-four million five hundred and thirty;" so that the clause will read:

For the construction and repair of vessels of the Navy, twenty-four million five hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The third amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

After line seventeen insert: "For bounties to seamen, $1,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The fourth amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

After line one hundred and forty-nine insert: "For completion of joiners' building, $25,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The fifth amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

Strike out, commencing at line two hundred and seventy-seven, the following words:

"And there is hereby authorized to be appointed in said office one additional aid, at an annual salary of $1,333 33, and said amount is hereby appropriated therefor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The sixth amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was read, as follows:

Strike out all after line three hundred to the end of the printed bill, as follows:

For pay of clerks in the ordnance departments at the several navy-yards, in lieu of the present per diem pay, namely:

For salary of one clerk at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, navy-yard, $1,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,200, and one at $1,000 per annum, at Boston navy-yard, $2,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,200 per annum, and one clerk at $1,000 per annum, at the New York navy-yard, $2,200.

For salary of one clerk at the Philadelphia navy-yard, $1,200.

For salary of one clerk at $1,400, one clerk at $1,000, one draughtsman at $1,000, one analytical chemist at $2,500 per annum, one assistant pyrotechnist at $1,400, and one keeper of magazine at $480 per annum, at the Washington navy-yard, $8,380.

On agreeing to the amendment,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 75, not voting 55; as follows:

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

During the roll-call, Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, stated that his colleague, Mr. L. MYERS, was detained at his room by indisposition.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The seventh amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

One midshipman, in addition to those now allowed by law, shall be appointed for each congressional district and Territory, to be appointed on the nomination of the present members of Congress and delegates from said districts and Territories respectively; but no midshipman shall be appointed for any district not represented in Congress.

Mr. SPALDING asked unanimous consent to insert a provision for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, objected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, asked unanimous consent to insert the word "hereafter."

Mr. SPALDING objected.

The amendment was concurred in.

The eighth and last amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was then read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

All such opinions shall be recorded.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That no vessel-of-war shall be built or materially altered, nor any guns of new construction ordered or adopted, nor any engine for any vessel-of-war adopted or ordered, nor any permanent structure for naval service executed, until the plans, estimates, proposals, and contracts for the same shall have been submitted to the board, and its opinion and advice thereon communicated in writing to the Secretary; nor shall any patented invention be bought or adopted for the naval service without first the opinion of the board thereon having been taken; and all experiments decided to test inventions and naval plans and structures shall be conducted under the inspection of the board, or members thereof named by the Secretary, and submitted to the board for its opinion thereon.

The board may take the opinion of eminent practical engineers, mechanics, machinists, and architects, in their respective branches of art or industry, when in their opinion the public service will be promoted by it, and pay them such reasonable compensation as the Secretary may approve.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 60, nays 70, not voting 52; as follows:

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DAWES stated that his colleague, Mr. GOOCH, had been compelled to leave the House by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent of the House to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That on and after Wednesday next, except Saturdays, unless otherwise ordered, the House will take a recess daily at thirty minutes after four o'clock, p. m., to meet again at seven o'clock, p. m., for the transaction of business.

Mr. ANCONA. I object.

Mr. MORRILL moved to suspend the rules.

The question was taken, and two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage a concurrent resolution sent to us from the Senate to-day in reference to counting the electoral votes.

No objection being made, the resolution was taken up, considered, and agreed to; as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring therein,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses, namely:

"The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock p. m., on the second Wednesday in February next, succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their Presiding Officer. One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate, and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses thus assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the substance of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

If, upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the Presiding Officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall in like manner submit said question to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted, except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses, which being obtained, the two Houses shall immediately reassemble, and the Presiding Officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted; and upon any such question there shall be no debate in either House. And any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner.

At such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: for the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, a chair immediately upon his left; for the Senators, in the body of the Hall upon the right of the Presiding Officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not occupied by the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon either side of the Speaker's platform.

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared, and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to the counting of any of such vote, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately, in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess not beyond the next day at the hour of one o'clock, p. m.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the vote by which the resolution was agreed to be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

QUOTAS OF THE SEVERAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to communicate to this House at an early day the basis upon which the quotas of the different districts of the States have been established and adjusted under each of the several calls for troops by the President of the United States, together with a detailed statement of the number of troops and seamen furnished by each State and district since the outbreak of the rebellion, with their respective terms of service.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

At a subsequent stage of the proceedings Mr. UPSON withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the introduction of the resolution?

Mr. GARFIELD. I shall object unless the gentleman modifies it by putting in the words "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. CHANLER. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. KELLEY. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS the Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the further consideration of a memorial of the citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for increased hospital accommodations at that place; and the same was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a special order for to-day which now properly comes before the House.

The SPEAKER. The special order now before the House, if the House proceeds to its consideration, is the bill in reference to reconstruction.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to postpone that matter for two weeks.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at four o'clock and forty minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 7, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D., of Washington, District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate proposing an additional joint rule of the two Houses, providing that the two Houses shall assemble on the second Wednesday in February next after the meeting of the electors of President and Vice President of the United States, in the Hall of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of opening and counting the votes for President and Vice President; and prescribing the rules for the proceedings of the two Houses in such joint meeting.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

TRADE WITH REBEL STATES.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed a concurrent resolution to authorize the Committee on Commerce on the part of the Senate to join the Committee on Commerce on the part of the House, for the purpose of making certain investigations in regard to trade with the States in rebellion, and making said committees a joint committee for the purpose of completing said investigations; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the concurrent resolution just communicated from the House of Representatives in relation to the investigation of the subject of trade with the States in rebellion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the Committee on Commerce on the part of the Senate be joined with the committee on the part of the House in the investigations which said Committee on Commerce are now engaged in, under resolutions of the House of January 20, 1865, and January 25, 1865, in regard to trade with the States in rebellion, to constitute a joint committee for the purpose of completing said investigations; and that the said joint committee have the same powers as the Committee on Commerce of the House now have on the subject of said investigation.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

TELLER TO COUNT PRESIDENTIAL VOTES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The joint rule which has been adopted by the two Houses in regard to counting the votes for President and Vice President to-morrow makes it the duty of the Senate to appoint one teller on its part and the House to appoint two. I move that the President of the Senate appoint the teller on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. TRUMBULL.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of merchants of the city of New York for the construction of a national ship-canal from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of booksellers and newspaper publishers, praying for the repeal of the impost on chemicals, feltings, wire-cloths, and other articles used in the manufacture of paper, and also the abolition of the excise tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COWAN presented the petition of field and line officers of the thirty-first regiment United States colored troops, praying that a brevet second lieutenant drawing the pay of the grade may be authorized by law to be appointed for each company of the United States colored troops; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of booksellers and newspaper publishers, praying for the repeal of the impost on chemicals, feltings, wire-cloths, and other articles used in the manufacture of paper, and also the abolition of the excise tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL. I present the petition of H. C. Ingersoll, Mary Wendell, and Nancy J. Spalding, who represent that the use of foreign luxuries of apparel tends to take the gold from the country and to depreciate our national currency; that those persons who desire to purchase American fabrics only have found themselves unable to distinguish the productions of our own country from the fact that the best American goods are put into the market with a foreign stamp upon them; that our manufacturers and merchants have combined to perpetuate this wide-spread falsehood; that this course is detrimental to the public conscience, and injurious to our national honor and to the American name; and they therefore ask that Congress place such a tariff of duties upon foreign luxuries of apparel as shall amount to prohibition, thus rendering it impossible that the extent and variety of American goods shall longer be concealed, and making the fact plainly discernible to the large number of persons who earnestly desire to promote the best interests of their country that they can clothe themselves with neatness and good taste in American fabrics. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I present seventeen petitions of officers in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of the pay of Army officers. As the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom such petitions have been referred, have made a report, I move that these petitions lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON also presented the memorial of A. C. Swartzwelder, surgeon United States volunteers, remonstrating against an increase of the pay of Army officers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of officers in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of the pay of Army officers; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented three petitions of ministers of the gospel and pastors of churches, praying that ministers of the gospel may be exempted from military duty; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. POMEROY presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Ellwood, via Marysville, to the Big Bend of the Republican river; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 307.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the Senator moves to take up that bill, which I suppose will take some time, I ask—

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator has a pressing matter of business before the Senate, I will move the postponement of this bill until the day after to-morrow at one o'clock, and that it be made the special order for that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan moves to take up the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the Senator not to press that motion until I can call up a resolution which I laid upon the table some days ago in reference to the constitutional amendment, which ought to be acted upon. I desire to make a short statement as to the practice of the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan withdraw his motion?

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir, but I am willing to let it be passed over informally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator either withdraws the motion or he does not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to make the consideration of the bill the special order for Thursday next at one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan first moves to take up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that question I desire to say a word. I have been trying now faithfully for three weeks to get the attention of the Senate to the consideration of public bills reported by the Committee on Finance. On Thursday next, at farthest, we ought to take up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. We are getting behind-hand in business. The bill which the Senator from Michigan seeks to call up is, I understand, the bill about the railroads, a controverted subject, which will lead to long argument, and cannot be acted upon without serious debate. I trust, therefore, it will not be made a special order to stand directly in the way of the legislative business of Congress which must be acted on.

I feel it to be my duty, occupying the place assigned to me by the Senate, to call for the yeas and nays on the honorable Senator's motion. If, however, he will allow the bill to stand like other bills on the Calendar, subject to be called up on his motion when other business is not pressing, I shall not have the slightest objection, but shall vote with him. If he desires to make it the special order for Thursday, so that it will interpose to prevent the ordinary legislative business, it is my duty to call for the yeas and nays, and let the Senate decide the question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not wish to antagonize this measure with any of the Senator's financial bills, as a matter of course; but I desire to get a vote on it at the earliest moment. I do not think it will lead to further discussion. I have taken great pains to give an opportunity to every Senator to consider it during the session, and I think the speeches are made; at any rate, if they are not made, it is the fault of those who desire to speak, not mine. I desire to press the bill to a vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Michigan will allow me to say that I do not think the discussion on that question has begun yet.

Mr. SHERMAN. Several Senators around me say they mean to discuss it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio calls for the yeas and nays on this question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw the motion. The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are now in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before proceeding with other business, I ask the Senate to take up the resolution in reference to the approval of the constitutional amendment by the President, and I move to postpone all prior orders for that purpose.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to make a report?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall get through with this matter while the Senator is making his report, if he will allow me to get it out of the way. The motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, which was submitted by Mr. TRUMBULL on the 4th instant:

Resolved, That the article of amendment proposed by Congress to be added to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the extinction of slavery therein, having been inadvertently presented to the President for his approval, it is hereby declared that such approval was unnecessary to give effect to the action of Congress in proposing said amendment, inconsistent with the former practice in reference to all amendments to the Constitution heretofore adopted, and being inadvertently done, should not constitute a precedent for the future; and the Secretary is hereby instructed not to communicate the notice of the approval of said proposed amendment by the President to the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Since the Government was formed several amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been proposed by Congress and adopted by the States. They were all proposed at three different times; the first series of ten amendments was proposed in 1789; the eleventh amendment was proposed in 1794, and the twelfth amendment in 1803. The Constitution of the United States declares that "the Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution," which being ratified in the manner prescribed shall become a part thereof; and the amendments which have been heretofore adopted have been adopted under this clause of the Constitution authorizing Congress to propose amendments, and those proposed amendments have never been presented to the President of the United States for his approval. The clause of the Constitution which declares that "every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States;" and the clause that requires "every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and the House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment)," to be "presented to the President of the United States" for his approval, are not applicable to the proposal of amendments to the Constitution. Those clauses of the Constitution requiring the approval of the President to the bills which pass Congress and to the resolutions which pass both Houses, have reference to ordinary legislative proceedings; and hence, when amendments were proposed in 1789, 1794, and 1803, they were not presented to the President for his approval.

I have before me a statement prepared by the Chief Clerk of the Senate, of the different amendments which have been adopted, and the manner in which they were adopted, from which the fact I have stated will appear. The question was raised distinctly in 1803 in the Senate of the United States on a motion that the then proposed amendment should be submitted to the President:

"On motion that the Committee on Enrolled Bills be directed to present to the President of the United States for his approbation the resolution which has been passed by both Houses of Congress proposing to the consideration of the State Legislatures an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the mode of electing President and Vice President thereof, it was passed in the negative—yeas 7, nays 23."

On a distinct vote 23 to 7 voted that the Committee on Enrolled Bills should not present the proposed amendment to the President of the United States for his approval, and it was not presented to or approved by him. In 1798 a case arose in the Supreme Court of the United States depending upon the amendment to the Constitution proposed in 1794, and the counsel in argument before the Supreme Court insisted that the amendment was not valid, not having been approved by the President of the United States. This was his argument:

"The amendment has not been proposed in the form prescribed by the Constitution, and therefore it is void. Upon an inspection of the original roll, it appears that the amendment was never submitted to the President for his approbation. The Constitution declares that 'every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be re-passed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives,' &c. (Article one, section seven.) Now, the Constitution likewise declares that the concurrence of both Houses shall be necessary to a proposition for amendments. (Article five.) And it is no answer to the objection to observe that as two thirds of both Houses are required to originate the proposition, it would be nugatory to return it with the President's negative to be re-passed by the same number, since the reasons assigned for his disapprobation might be so satisfactory as to reduce the majority below the constitutional proportion. The concurrence of the President is required in matters of infinitely less importance, and whether on subjects of ordinary legislation or of constitutional amendments the expression is the same, and equally applies to the act of both Houses of Congress."

Mr. Lee, the Attorney General, in reply to this argument, said:

"Has not the same course been pursued relative to all the other amendments that have been adopted? And the case of amendments is evidently a substantive act, unconnected with the ordinary business of legislation, and not within the policy or terms of investing the President with a qualified negative on the acts and resolutions of Congress."

The court, speaking through Chase, Justice, observes:

"There can surely be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation. He has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution."

The court would not hear an argument from the Attorney General on the point, it was so clear. If the approval of the President were necessary, none of the amendments which have been made to the Constitution since its adoption would be valid, for not one of them ever received his approval.

I ought to state, perhaps, that three or four years ago, when Congress passed a proposition to amend the Constitution by a two-thirds vote, it was inadvertently presented to the President for his approval, just as the one passed a few days ago was presented; but that amendment has never been acted upon by the States, and it ought not to form a precedent. The object of the resolution which I have introduced is to prevent the inadvertent approval in this instance being considered as a precedent hereafter; so that it shall not be in the power of any future President by pocketing, if you please, an amendment proposed by both branches of Congress by the constitutional majority, to defeat it. I think it important that the precedent should be right. The resolution also instructs the Secretary not to inform the House of Representatives that the President has approved the proposed amendment. His approval of it can do no harm, but it is not a necessity, and it having been inadvertently presented for his approval, the Senate ought so to declare lest a wrong precedent be set.

Mr. HOWE. As I was the instrument of the Senate who took this resolution to the President, perhaps the Senate will indulge me in a single word on the matter.

The bulk of the precedents are against the propriety of that step, as has been stated by the Senator from Illinois. There is a judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring that the assent of the President is not necessary to a resolution of this kind. That is the authority for dispensing with the assent of the President. Nevertheless, to my understanding, the express language of the Constitution requires the assent of the President just as much to a resolution of this kind as to any other. It does not require the assent of the President to a vote for adjournment, and that is the only exception. The Constitution declares that—

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

All legislative powers are vested in a Congress, and we are expressly told of what the Congress consists. If you will look to see what Congress may do, in the eighth section of the first article you are told that the Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to borrow money, to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, &c. The Congress may do these things. That is precisely the tribunal, in precisely the words, which is authorized in a subsequent clause of the Constitution to propose amendments to that instrument. It is the Congress that may propose amendments; it is the Congress that may raise armies; and the Congress consists of a Senate and House of Representatives. Now, how does it happen that any bill or any resolution must go to the President for his signature? Because there is a distinct clause in the Constitution which provides that—

"Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States."

He is not a part of the Congress, and all legislative powers are vested in the Congress; nevertheless, you cannot have a law unless you have presented the bill previously to the President. Not only that, but another clause of the Constitution requires that—

"Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed."

Not passed, but repassed—

"by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."

If this language applies to any one resolution requiring the concurrent vote of the two Houses it applies to every one, for it says every one. So much for the express letter of the Constitution itself.

The Senator from Illinois, however, says—and in that he is borne out by the judgment of the Supreme Court, or at least he is borne out by the language of Justice Chase, formerly a member of that court—that this provision which I have just read only applies to the ordinary acts of legislation. It cannot be disputed that Justice Chase so said, and the court having concurred with him perhaps we are bound to consider the law settled upon that point. Not a reason was assigned for it; and the argument which was made by the counsel in that case against the validity of the amendment adopted was not answered either by the opposing counsel or by the court; nor have I heard it answered by any one. Justice Chase remarked, indeed, that argument was not necessary upon a point of that kind. In the vote which was taken in the Senate of the United States in 1803 I notice among the names of those who voted for presenting the resolution to the President the names of Mr. John Quincy Adams and Mr. Pickering. I think, with all deference to Justice Chase, that when such gentlemen as Mr. Adams and Mr. Pickering have affirmed that a step is necessary, some argument may fairly be offered to show that it is not necessary.

This resolution says that the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution was inadvertently presented to the President, and the aim of the resolution is to prevent its being made a precedent; but the Senator from Illinois has told us correctly that the precedent has already been established. In 1861 an amendment was agreed to by both Houses and was submitted to the President for his approval; and I have yet to learn that any member of either House of Congress entered any protest to that form of procedure. The President did approve it. The Senator from Illinois says it ought not to be considered a precedent because the Legislatures of the States did not adopt the amendment. How that can make it more or less of a precedent I do not understand. The two Houses concurred in the resolution; the organs of the Houses presented it to the President, and he approved it; and so your records show; and there is the precedent. If this resolution passes without dissent on the part of Congress it will be but another precedent. Precedents, I take it, cannot override the Constitution itself. The approval of the President will not do any hurt if the Constitution does not require it. My own judgment is that the express language of the Constitution does demand it, and my own judgment is that propriety sanctions it; that it is proper to present it to the President; for it does not follow, if the President dissents and presents his objections to the two Houses, that the vote of two thirds of each House can be again had to repass the resolution.

But assuming that the Constitution does not require the President's assent to such a resolution, and assuming that the resolution was inadvertently presented to the President, the resolution now pending declares that it was unnecessary to present it to him. I do not think that follows, even if the premises are as stated; for if it had not been presented to the President, I ask you, sir, and I ask the Senate, how would it have been transmitted to the Legislatures of the States? Your resolution proposing the amendment provided no means, and there has been no other action taken on the part of the two Houses to get it to the States. It would not go to the State Department unless presented to the President. When presented to the President, if he approves it he transmits it to the State Department; and being transmitted to the Secretary of State, he transmits it to the Legislatures of the States. I think I am abundantly authorized to say that but for this very action of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, which your resolution says was not necessary, the resolution proposing this amendment to the Constitution would not have reached the Legislature of a single State probably until this time. If it had, I do not know how it could have got there, or who would have sent it there. You took no steps whatever to send it there. It certainly would never have got there until after, under the procedure which was adopted, many of the States had actually ratified the amendment. If it be the established law that these resolutions should not go to the President for his assent, certainly the two Houses which pass them ought to take some measures to execute them, and to get them before the State Legislatures.

I am free to confess that when I presented this resolution to the President I did so in pursuance of what is a mere habit, so to speak; I did not stop to distinguish between this and any other resolution. I had not looked into the precedents; I had not looked into the Constitution. Since my attention has been called to it I have looked into the precedents; I have looked into the Constitution; and as I have already said, my judgment is satisfied that the course taken was right, notwithstanding the authority which has been read goes so far against it.

Mr. JOHNSON obtained the floor.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, I desire to refer to the rule of the Senate on this subject. I omitted to do so when I was up before. One of the special rules of the Senate also shows that these constitutional amendments are not to be submitted to the President. The 26th special rule of the Senate declares:

"And all resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution, or to which the approbation and signature of the President may be requisite, or which may grant money out of the contingent or any other fund, shall be treated in all respects, in the introduction and form of proceedings on them, in the Senate, in the same manner with bills."

Showing by irresistible inference that resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution are not required to be submitted to the President for his signature; because the language is—

"And all resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution, or to which the approbation and the signature of the President may be requisite," &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. It would be very improper to say that the question which is presented by the resolution offered by the honorable member from Illinois, if it was an original question, would be entirely free from doubt, not only because the honorable member from Wisconsin thinks differently, and has expressed a different opinion upon it, but because there were some six or seven Senators, in 1803, I think, who entertained a different opinion. But, to my mind—with due respect to the authority of my friend from Wisconsin—it seems to be quite clear that a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution is not to be submitted to the President for his approval. The object of the constitutional provision on the subject is simply to initiate a mode by which the people shall decide whether there shall be an amendment of the Constitution or not. It does not operate as a law. The whole effect of it is, if it is initiated by Congress, to submit the question to the people for their determination; and the Senate, of course, will have seen that that is but one way in which amendments are to be proposed. Precisely the same effect is given to amendments proposed by the Legislatures of the States. I suppose it will hardly be contended that the President has any control over a convention called by two thirds of the State Legislatures.

What makes it, as I think, still more obvious that it was not the purpose of the Convention that framed the Constitution that the President should decide upon a resolution of this description is, that the resolution itself is not to be passed unless it is concurred in by two thirds of each House. The constitutional provision which gives to the President the authority to veto any such bill as is to be submitted to him for approval or rejection says that if he disapproves, he is to send it to the House in which the bill or resolution originated, and if passed by that House and the other by two thirds it is to become a law notwithstanding the veto. You are not to construe these provisions, therefore, literally where they come in conflict with each other, but you are to construe them in relation to the subject-matter with which they deal. By looking at the provision upon which my honorable friend from Wisconsin relies, you find that—

"Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States."

The clause immediately preceding says:

"If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House it shall become a law."

Now, as such a resolution as the one in question is a resolution which cannot be passed by either House except by a vote of two thirds, why should it become necessary to submit that to the President for his decision; for, after he decides, there is but one provision looking to what is to be done in consequence of his decision against the resolution, and that is that it is to be passed by two thirds; so that if this resolution was sent to the President for his approval, and he rejects it, and it comes back, it will just be precisely the same vote.

Mr. HOWE. It does not follow that it will get the same vote after Congress has heard the President's objections.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know it does not; but what I mean to say is, that looking at the two provisions—that is to say, the provision which gives to the President the right to approve or disapprove, and the provision which looks to the duty of Congress consequent upon his disapproval—it is evident that what was intended to be submitted to the President was a question which was to be passed upon by more votes than were necessary before it was submitted. Then the provision is:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution" * * * "which" * * *

"shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof."

Now, the proposition is that no proposal by Congress of an amendment to the Constitution, although receiving the support of two thirds of both Houses of Congress, is to be submitted to the States, unless the President shall approve it. That is not the case in relation to the other mode of proposing amendments. There being two modes, and stated in the alternative, the other mode is:

"Or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States."

What are Congress to do then? Suppose two thirds of the States propose amendments, has the President anything to do with that? All will admit that he has not. Has Congress anything to do with that? All will admit that their single duty then is—an imperative duty—to call a convention. So that the whole object of the clause, as it seems to me, is merely to begin a mode by which the people shall have an opportunity of deciding whether the Constitution shall be amended or not. But when, as is stated by the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee, every amendment which has been adopted has been submitted to the States without having been approved by the President, and when the Supreme Court, at a time when it stood as high as it has ever stood at any time since its organization, refused even to hear an argument on the subject, supposing it to be too clear for discussion, it would seem to me that we ought to consider the question as settled; and in order that it may be considered as settled, that it is advisable to take the particular case which is before us (where the amendment has been submitted to the President for his approval without at the time, as my friend admits, due consideration or any consideration, taking it for granted it was to go to him for approval) out of the way as a precedent.

The resolution was agreed to.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. FARWELL presented the credentials of Hon. WILLIAM PITT FESSENDEN, chosen by the Legislature of the State of Maine a Senator from that State for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1865; which were read and ordered to be filed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 391) authorizing an adjustment of the claims for lands heretofore confirmed to any State, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 421) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb and the Blind," approved February 16, 1857, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 364) authorizing and requiring the opening of Sixth street west, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 368) to incorporate the Association of the Sisters of Mercy in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommended the bill (S. No. 238) to ascertain and settle private land claims in the State of California, reported it with an amendment.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. DIXON. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to move that Saturday of this week, after the morning hour, be assigned for the consideration of business reported by that committee.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have in my charge a single bill relating to the Post Office Department that I wish to have passed. I do not know why the District Committee should have time particularly assigned to its business when I cannot get any time for mine.

Mr. DIXON. I believe it has been customary to assign a day for the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COLLAMER. I know there has been that practice, but I insist that some other committees should have the same privilege also.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut to include in the business of the District for which he wishes to assign a special day, a bill of my own, reported from the Military Committee, touching the militia organization in the State of Missouri. It is a very important military bill, and ought to have been acted on long since.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 431) to amend an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads and telegraphs in said State," approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862; asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and had appointed Mr. J. F. WILSON of Iowa, Mr. W. H. WADSWORTH of Kentucky, and Mr. E. R. ECKLEY of Ohio, managers at the same on its part.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to interfere with the regular order of the day; but with the indulgence of my colleague I am going to ask the Senate informally to take up the resolution which I offered yesterday calling on the President for information with reference to recent conversations or communications with the rebels, that it may be acted on without debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that resolution is to be pressed now, I shall desire to discuss it.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator desire to debate it?

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to have it go over. I wish to discuss it.

Mr. WILSON. I hope, then, we shall proceed with the regular order of business.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have prepared an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, which I wish to lay on the table to go over with the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received. The regular order of business is the bill (S. No. 408) in addition to the several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs. The Senator from California proposes to amend the third section of the reported amendment by inserting after the word "who," in line two, the words "for pay or profit;" so that the clause will read, "that any recruiting agent, substitute broker, or other person, who for pay or profit shall enlist or cause to be enlisted," &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN. I move further to amend the third section by striking out the word "by," in the eighth line, and inserting the word "in," and in the next line by striking out the words "martial or military commission" and inserting "of the United States having competent jurisdiction;" so that it will read if amended, "shall upon conviction in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction, be fined," &c. I do not propose to debate this question. I merely wish to say that I have no doubt it would be better for the country that this amendment should be made. It will transfer this class of offenders to the proper court where they may be tried according to the forms to which the people are accustomed, and in the judgments of which they will acquiesce; and it will relieve the military department from that which must now be a source of great trouble, if not vexation to them. Further, it will unquestionably make this section conform to the Constitution. It will confine the jurisdiction of military tribunals to military men, to those who are in the land or naval forces and in the service of the United States. It will throw all civilians within the jurisdiction of the civil courts, and there they will be tried, and tried much more speedily, fairly, and, I think, acceptably to the country generally.

The question being put, it was declared that it appeared that the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. I would not call for a division or for the yeas and nays if I believed it was the sense of the Senate to adopt this amendment; but I can hardly think the Senate will agree to transfer this class of cases to the United States courts where the process of trial and punishment will be so slow as really to amount to nothing. I do not wish to detain the Senate by any remarks on the subject; but having no doubts on the constitutional question involved, as presented yesterday so elaborately by the Senator who makes this motion, and desiring that the provision shall be effective, I can hardly think that it is the deliberate sense of the Senate to agree to this amendment. I have therefore called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COWAN. I have but a single word to say. I may remark that the fact that the administration of criminal justice is slow has long been common to our system. One of the illustrations of it is, that a Turkish cadi will hear a crime, order the offender off to the other end of the room, give him a hundred on the soles of the feet, or the bastinado, and settle the question in twenty minutes; whereas an English or American court, having regard to the liberty of the citizen, would perhaps occupy itself for three months with that same question. It is the very essence of liberty, that those who are intrusted with the punishment of the citizen should go slowly, in order that the citizen may have an opportunity to defend himself.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing this clause further, except to say that if this amendment shall prevail it will destroy, as I think, all the efficiency of the measure itself. If it shall be made necessary by this act to try all these petty offenses before the ordinary civil tribunals of the county in which they may happen to be committed, if it is necessary to call a grand jury to indict the offender in every case, and a traverse jury to try him, if all the cumbersome and dilatory machinery of a civil court is to be employed in every case to punish these crimes committed against the interests of the military service of the United States, the bill itself will not be worth, practically, the paper upon which it is written. The very object of the bill in this respect is to expedite trials and bring them to a close, and to bring these offenders to speedy justice. There has been an almost universal outcry all over the country in relation to the agents and perpetrators in these frauds against the soldiers and against the interests of the Government, and in many cases the outcry has even claimed that a penal statute should be enacted by which they should be hung for defrauding the Government and for imposing upon the honest soldiers. I trust this amendment will not be made; I trust the Senate will stand by the bill and continue the policy which seems to have actuated the Committee on Military Affairs, of subjecting this class of offenders to trials by courts-martial. Nothing short of it will answer the purpose which is now demanded.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to ask the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the point that I understand was raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that this bill proposes to punish a civilian by a military court, which he seems to think conflicts with the provision of the Constitution of the United States providing for the trial by jury of all crimes except where the party accused is attached to the military or naval service of the United States. It is on that point on which I should like to hear the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD. If time would allow, I certainly would repeat the views which I expressed yesterday on that subject. I certainly entertain no doubt whatever of the competency of Congress to enact this law. I have no doubt of the power of Congress to punish as for a military offense acts injurious to the military or naval service of the United States, and intended to injure that service, or to obstruct it or impair its efficiency. There must be some power by which to protect the efficiency of the military service. We certainly have power to punish by court-martial offenders against the laws in all cases arising in the military or naval forces of the United States, for that is the language of the Constitution; the question is, therefore, what is a "case" arising in the military or naval forces of the United States? What is a case? It seems to me it requires no very great ingenuity of construction or of interpretation to ascertain and find out what a "case" is. Such a case I should understand to be a state of facts by which the military service or the naval service of the United States was damaged, obstructed, or endangered intentionally by a person committing the act. I know that definitions are not only difficult, but dangerous sometimes; but if any gentleman will turn his attention to the language of the clause in the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution, it seems to me no doubt can remain as to the intention of the framers of the instrument. It was intended to be sufficiently broad to protect the military and naval service of the United States, and to punish all persons offending against it, all persons obstructing it, all persons intentionally damaging it, or injuring it in any respect whatever. All persons who assume to act as contractors for the United States, who assume to act as recruiting agents of the United States, or take upon themselves any other function connected with the military or naval service of the United States, are, as it seems to me, persons coming within the category of the fifth amendment, coming within the "cases" there mentioned.

It certainly never was the intention of the framers of the Constitution, as it seems to me, that this class of offenses, whether immediately in the military service or being more remotely connected with it and growing out of it, should in all cases be subjected to trial by a jury of the vicinage. It is obvious to us, as it was obvious to our forefathers, that upon such a principle no army could be made efficient, no discipline could be of any value; and the military service, requiring promptness, activity, energy—the military service, which in most instances admits of no delay, no procrastination at all, would be as good as destroyed.

These are my views about it, Mr. President. I entertain no scruples and no doubt of the power of Congress to enact just such a clause as this. I think the language of the fifth amendment, to which I have referred, abundantly authorizes us in so doing, and I am sure that the public necessities existing at this moment demand this expeditious and rigid mode of procedure.

Mr. COWAN. The vice of my honorable friend's argument is that it proves entirely too much. If those are cases arising in the land and naval forces which are merely connected in some remote way with the Army and Navy, we are all entangled in this mesh of military dominion and military rule. If the fact of a man going forward and offering a substitute to be enlisted in the service of the country fraudulently constitutes a case in the land or naval force, then when a man comes forward and furnishes a defective gun for the service of the country, when a man furnishes bad clothes for the soldiers, shoddy blankets, wooden-soled shoes, and all those things, that constitutes a "case," and then the whole population is involved, then the military swallows up entirely the civil, and we are cut loose from all the safeguards of the Constitution and all those which the common law throws around us.

Mr. HOWARD. No, the Senator will allow me to say the case must embrace the military service; the state of facts must relate to the interests of the Government connected with the military or naval service of the United States. If the case does not embrace that interest, of course it is not one arising in the military or naval forces, and is therefore not in the category. But the essence, the test of the offense, is that it is committed against the military or naval service, tending to obstruct it, to hinder it, or destroy its efficiency.

Mr. COWAN. I think the Senator's position is not good. The true test is whether the person committing the crime is within the jurisdiction of the military officer. I merely wish to say a word further and submit this matter without any longer debate. All members of the Senate now, I have no doubt, understand it thoroughly.

The honorable Senator says that these cases demand immediate action. There is no force in that argument. If the substitute broker or the party violating the law in this instance is detected, he can be arrested, committed to the custody of the proper officers, and kept there just as summarily within the grasp of the civil power of the Republic as he could be within its military power. He can be disabled from further mischief quite as readily in the one way as in the other. Therefore the argument as inconvenient amounts to nothing.

But one word more. The "case" must not be outside of the land or naval forces; it must be within them, and it must attach itself to somebody who is within them, and somebody who is amenable to them. Now, upon an examination of the Articles of War, it will be readily seen what is the class of cases that fall within the exception of the fifth amendment to the Constitution. First, there is mutiny; second, desertion; third, advising desertion. Anything which militates against the regular organization and police of the camp, is the exception that was contemplated. Another most substantial reason, which ought not to be overlooked, is the fact that the moment that a man enters the military or naval service he voluntarily agrees to become subject to these extraordinary and extra-judicial provisions. The first thing that is done with the soldier or the sailor when he enlists is to ask him, and upon his oath, I believe, whether he submits to be governed by these Articles of War. That is never the case with the civilian. The civilian is left to be governed entirely by the municipal laws of the country, subject to them, and entitled to protection under them.

Now, it does seem to me that this section as it stands would be most mischievous. It not only affects these bad people, but it may affect good people; there is the difficulty; and we are bound to protect the virtuous citizen as against any danger from this quarter. I have no hesitation here in asserting that, if these persons are indicted in the United States courts, and tried and convicted within them, a solemn judgment of the court inflicting this punishment will be a hundred times more efficacious than the sentence and punishment of a court-martial. I have no doubt of it, because there is a natural, innate love in the people of these forms of administering justice, and they will never be satisfied with any other forms.

Therefore I have the hope and the assurance that there will be an end put to this source of trouble and difficulty on the part of the Government itself, making it enemies every day and everywhere, and giving color to the charge of tyranny and oppression against it which, at the present time with us, is worth millions. When we are making a great struggle ostensibly for liberty and equality among men, we ought by all means to endeavor to preserve and guard for ourselves and for the loyal citizens all those great privileges and muniments of liberty which have come down to us intact for so many generations.

As my friend from New Jersey [Mr. TEN Eyck] suggests to me, these cases are taken into the United States courts every day, and are being tried there, and persons guilty of these offenses are being punished; and no one has ever yet come here with a complaint that those courts have conducted themselves in an informal or tyrannous manner; and nobody has ever yet charged them with having failed in their proper duty toward the country in the conviction of these persons. Why, then, not let them exercise their function as was contemplated by the Constitution? Let all people who are in the Army and who are in the Navy obey the laws of the Army and the Navy, and let people who are outside the service be subject to the municipal law, not because many guilty people may not do very bad things, may not commit offenses, and perhaps escape punishment, but it is better that ninety-nine of them should escape than that one innocent man should be punished improperly and the odium of his punishment thrown on the Government.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cardie, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Sausbury, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Grimes, Howard, Morrill, Nye, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, and Wilson—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Harding, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Sprague, Wade, and Wilkinson—8.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to strike out the first section of the amendment reported by the committee. I make this motion in order to call forth from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs some explanation of the reason why he proposes such a very radical change in the present method of conscription and enrollment. It will be remembered by the Senate that as the law now stands, a person who has been enrolled and who is liable to draft cannot be used as a substitute for another person who has already been drafted. This section proposes to change all that, and to say that any person who is enrolled in any particular township, although he may be subject to draft the next day if another draft shall be made, may be received as a substitute for a man who was drafted the day before. This, it will be observed, will in a great many instances require us to expend two men in order to get one man. The operation of it is destined to be exceedingly unjust. I can best illustrate the effect of this proposition, if it shall be adopted, by an example that has occurred within my own observation.

In the county in which I have the fortune to live there is one large town, and that is a town of considerable wealth, containing a population of ten or twelve thousand. Adjacent to it is a purely agricultural township, with not a store or a village in it, composed of excellent, loyal, industrious husbandmen. It was known that a very large number of the young men from this agricultural township had gone to the war, and it was supposed as a matter of course that there was no liability on the part of that township to the draft.

But when we had the draft last year, it was discovered that although there was a surplus of twenty-eight men who had gone from the agricultural township to the war, they were credited to the town in which I live, having been induced to accept the bounties that were furnished by the gentlemen in this wealthy town; and the result, therefore, was that this purely agricultural township, that had sent an excess of her population of twenty-eight persons to the war, was under that draft compelled to furnish fourteen more.

Is that fair? Is that what the Committee on Military Affairs want to provide for? Or is it what we ought to provide against? This proposition, if we adopt it, is going to create a very radical change in the whole system of conscription, and in half the instances, I think, to raise three hundred thousand it will cost us five hundred thousand enrolled men, as the section now stands.

Mr. WILSON. The original enrollment act allowed substitutes to be obtained among those who were enrolled. At the last session it was feared by some gentlemen that we should soon exhaust the enrolled men of the country if we allowed substitutes to be taken from among those enrolled, and we provided that substitutes could only be obtained from among men under twenty years of age or over forty-five years, or from aliens, unless the persons who were thus enrolled should be made liable on future drafts. The practical effect of that act is simply to confine the persons enlisted as substitutes or as volunteers mostly to aliens and to persons under twenty years of age. I think the tendency is to check filling up the Army. Now, what we want to do is to fill up the ranks of our armies and to do it at once. Most of the men put into the armies are enlisted; very few are obtained by draft. The enrollment system has more effect to stir up, to press the people and the officers of the various localities throughout the country to fill up the Army by volunteering, than it has the direct result of obtaining soldiers by draft. That is the great value of the law.

I am told by persons engaged in raising men that the effect of the law passed at the last session has been to check enlistments. I was told the other day, by a gentleman who has himself enlisted and put into the service during this war fifty-eight thousand men, that the passage of this first section will increase the number of enlistments tenfold at once, and he suggested at the same time that another provision ought to be made, which the committee have not reported, that the substitute should have the same bounty as the enlisted man, and be put on the same footing in every respect. He thought that in that way we could fill up the armies speedily.

I know that many provost marshals and many persons engaged in filling up the armies are of opinion that this change ought to be made. We now take men for one year, and when a man has served his time he goes back. There is no danger of exhausting the enrollment. I believe that if we could now fill up the pending call for three hundred thousand men, we should have no special reason for any more soldiers. We want these men now. Our armies are not filled up because of the manner in which the attempt has been made to execute the law, and because of the terrible abuses that have grown up under the system of heavy bounties, stimulating bad men to perpetrate wrongs upon others and upon the Government itself. If we had had three months ago fifty thousand or seventy-five thousand men to send to General Grant before Richmond, I think the war would have been ended to-day by the destruction of the only force there is in the country that carries the flag of the rebellion, I mean Lee's Army. Why did we not have it? We have had all sorts of constructions of this plain law which he that runs may read and understand. Then we have had all sorts of interference with its execution—committees sent here from localities to ask the Secretary of War or the Provost Marshal General or the President to do what none of them had any right to do; and I understand that committees have been here recently to fill up the call that has been made by getting reductions rather than by sending men. There is a report in circulation that a large percentage of the number called for from one of the States has been remitted by the President, who has no more right to do it than I have. Neither he, nor the Secretary of War, nor the Provost Marshal General has any right to do these things. They are a violation of law, and it is unjust to the whole country that they are exercising power which does not belong to them.

Sir, this is a plain matter of calculation. The law provides for the enrollment of men between twenty and forty-five years of age; and when the enrollment is made, if it is incorrect it may be revised, and should be revised; but when the proper officers appointed have done that work, it does not belong to the President or anybody else to interfere with it. If a call is made for men, justice to all sections of the country requires that the record shall stand correct, and the quota of each locality is a matter of mere mathematical calculation and not of favoritism toward any man or set of men in the country. It is this eternal interference, this construction one way to-day and another way to-morrow, that has prevented filling up our armies promptly; and the result is also owing to the system of large bounties and those abuses by which insane men, drunkards, criminals, and men who have run away from the Army, have been enlisted and imposed upon the country; so that the result is that we do not get more than fifty per cent. of the men who are professed to be put in the service. General Hinks, who has had the superintendence of this matter in New York harbor for months, under his own hand, in a public letter that has been printed, testifies that not more than fifty per cent. of the men sent there really go to make up the forces of the country. Our present system seems to be to fill up quotas and not fill the armies. It is because the armies have not been filled up as they should have been under the call for five hundred thousand men last year that Lee's army is defiant at Richmond to-day. If General Grant had had fifty or sixty thousand more men last fall, he could have cut Lee's lines of communication and have destroyed that army.

Now, sir, I am opposed to this policy. I am in favor of adopting means at once to get all the men we can raise of the three hundred thousand men called for, and fill up the armies now, and put an end to this war that we all want to see ended. I think the striking out of the first section will simply have the effect of checking the filling up of the armies, and to make the matter linger along. There is no danger of exhausting the men of the country. We have in the country to-day more men fit for military duty than we had when the war opened. There is no danger on that point. What we want to do is to get the men now, at the earliest possible moment, for we have no time to lose. Open the spring campaign; destroy the military power of the rebellion; and then we shall have peace without sending commissioners to Richmond, or meeting their commissioners half way to talk about it.

Mr. GRIMES. If the purpose of this section of the amendment which is proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs be to accomplish that which the Senator says is all that was accomplished by the laws that have hitherto been passed on this subject—that is, to frighten people into volunteering in the national forces—it is possible that this section of the present bill may accomplish that end, and therefore may be of some value; but if it be a real, genuine enrollment bill; if it be based on the theory that every man owes his service, his life, if need be, to the country, and that we should come just as near as possible to requiring every man to perform that sacred duty, then I say that we ought to amend the Senator's proposition by striking out the first section.

The Senator says we have not accomplished as much as we ought to have accomplished hitherto in filling up the Army, for three different reasons, I believe; first, he says that there have been various interferences by the executive authorities of the Government; in the next place, there has been a great deal of rascality perpetrated by bounty brokers and other persons of that description; and in the third place, there have been a great many irrelevant and indecisive and improper constructions placed upon our laws by the executive authorities who have the administration of them.

Are we going to improve that condition of things by changing our legislation on this subject every few months? It is now thoroughly known all through the country what our legislation is. It is now known that a man who is already enrolled upon the books of the provost marshal cannot be accepted as a substitute for another man. Has that operated injuriously? Has there been a draft in the Senator's own State? Has he had any experience or observation of it? I have had, in the town in which I live, which is the central point in the congressional district in which a draft has been made, and I can tell the Senator that he is wholly mistaken in regard to the operation of the law as it now stands. I have seen men of family and of substance who have been drafted, and who had the capacity and the opportunity to procure substitutes, but who said that they did not believe that it was a manly and generous course for them to pursue, and they shouldered their muskets, leaving their families and their property behind them, and are now under General Sherman.

We have experienced no difficulty there in the law as it now stands. We have no disposition to sacrifice two men for the sake of securing one. Where does this demand for a change come from? Will the Senator tell me that the War Department desires this change? He has not so informed the Senate, and I have heard from no quarter that anybody has desired it, except some gentleman who, the Senator says, has enlisted fifty-eight thousand men since this war began. He has not told me what relation that man sustains to the parties for whom he has enlisted them. It may be possible that it may be for the interest of that individual, as the agent of a State or as a private broker, that this change of the law should take place, because then he will have a wider field from which to secure his substitutes. He can then go into one of the agricultural townships in Massachusetts, if a draft should be ordered in that State, and exhaust from that township enough of the men who are already enrolled there to fill up the quota that may be due from a rich commercial township adjacent to it; and then when the draft shall hereafter come upon that agricultural township, she will be deficient to the extent of the men that have been drawn from her, and the draft will be imposed upon those who remain; and if there shall not be men enough capable of bearing arms in the township after this number have been drawn off into the rich commercial towns, who is the sufferer? The Government of the United States.

Mr. President, I confess that I have never heard that there was any objection to the law as it now stands in this respect, and I never imagined that there was going to be any attempt to change the enrollment law on this subject. As I have said before, I live in a State where a draft has been made in every county, and I have never heard of any objection to the law as it stands being made by anybody there. Why shall we change it; why shall we have this irresolute, this indecisive, this whiffling, changing kind of legislation, to the principle of which the Senator attributes so much of the evils of the past in regard to the filling up of the quotas?

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say to the Senate that I think the act we passed at the last session has had a tendency to prevent filling up the armies of the United States in this way: persons who are enrolled, knowing that they may be drawn if the draft comes, are not likely to go into the service, and thus their enlistment has been prevented. Besides, it has had a tendency to make persons who had substitutes to get or who wished to enlist men, go around and pick up aliens, get them in from Canada, get them anywhere they could, and pick up boys under twenty years and men over forty-five, and put improper men into the service. I have no doubt that if we allow the men who are enrolled to be enlisted, and exempt them from draft during the time they are in the service, it will enable us to fill up the armies more speedily at the present time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question while he is on this particular subject?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator is speaking of the effect of the law of the last session upon the enlistments. I wish to ask him if the repeal of the commutation clause did not have the effect to cut off enlistments and stop volunteering?

Mr. WILSON. I have not examined the subject enough to decide that question; but I was opposed, as the Senator knows, to the repeal of the commutation clause. I had to submit to it, however, as I have to many other things here.

I referred to the opinion of a gentleman who has raised during the war fifty-eight thousand men. I alluded in that reference to Mr. Blunt, of the city of New York, who was here a day or two ago, and who impressed upon me the importance of this very section; and I have here a letter from a provost marshal in which he says that if this bill be passed it will fill up the armies and keep the armies full; if properly executed; that these amendments will have that tendency; and it is because I so believe that I have pressed the changes contained in this bill. The Senator from Iowa moves to strike out the first section. I hope his motion will not prevail. What we want to do is to fill up our armies now. If the war was to be continued three or four years longer there would be logic in what he says.

Mr. GRIMES. What assurance have you that the war will not continue?

Mr. WILSON. I believe we want the men now, and the assurance that the war will not be continued will be given by the fact of our furnishing the men now. If we furnish the men we now need within the next sixty days, everybody knows that this war cannot go on; but if we fail to do it, if we fill up quotas instead of filling up the Army, if we have a class of men put into the service just to fill up the quotas, who are unfit for service, men who are broken down in health, men who will run away, men who will desert, we shall have expended the resources of the country, filled the pockets of the substitute brokers, made fortunes for them, as many of them have made independent fortunes within the last few months, and we shall have spent millions of dollars on men who will be of no use to the country, and General Grant and our other generals will be as poorly off as they ever were for efficient men. What we want to do is to fill up the armies now, to get good men, and put an end to the war; and I go for this change because I have no doubt it will tend that way, and I know that to be the opinion of some of the gentlemen who are largely interested in filling up the Army; and I will say, in regard to Mr. Blunt, that I am told he has done this work for nothing, without pay, and that he has enlisted into the service of the country more men, by all odds, than any other person—over fifty-eight thousand.

Mr. CONNESS. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to quote Mr. Blunt as the authority that he gave a while ago?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. The man who received $50,000 at New York for doing nothing?

Mr. WILSON. It is said that is not so.

Mr. GRIMES. He is the gentleman that secured the naval enlistments of about twenty-nine or thirty thousand, is he not? I inquire whether those thirty thousand naval recruits credited to the city of New York are a part of the fifty-eight thousand?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know.

Mr. GRIMES. He is the gentleman who, in his report, chuckles over the admirable manner in which he was able to secure the credit of those recruits for that city.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say in my own behalf that I differ very widely from the chairman of the Military Committee upon the effect of this section. I believe the effect of it will be the very reverse of what he has stated. If I can get his attention for a moment, I will suggest this reflection. He charges that the bounty system furnishes the Army now with the very worst class of soldiers, men who run off, men who are unfit for service, men who are insane, and men in every respect disqualified for the service; and yet, in the face of these facts, he wishes now to extend the bounty system, which is limited by law to a certain class, so as to enable the bounty brokers to have the whole of the population of the United States who are enrolled from whom to rake and scrape all the worst material they can get to go into the Army. In other words, he wants to increase tenfold the amount of bad material from which they can get those whom they can induce in this manner to go into the armies of the United States. Now, I contend that any such policy as that will be a policy destructive and injurious to the service. I say that the bounty system itself is a bad one, and the more the bounty system is limited the more effective will be the service of your Army. As you have it now limited to a small class, you have it under far better restraint than if you extend it in this manner by authorizing a wholesale substitute system throughout of those who are enrolled.

That is the point to which I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Military Committee; but, sir, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to another fact, that this expansion of the bounty system—for it is nothing more nor less than an expansion of the bounty system—is an increase in a tenfold ratio of the power of the wealth of the country to buy itself out of the duties of this war. It is giving it a power which it never had under any previous enrollment act, a power which those gentlemen who advocated the present enrollment act disclaimed when it was on its passage. It is giving the wealth of the country the power to buy itself out of the duties that are devolved on it by this war. It was argued here, when that measure was before us at the last session of Congress, that there would be no injustice in authorizing the purchase of a substitute, especially where that substitute was not liable to enrollment, and that it did not interfere with the basis of your armies as presented in the enrollment list; and that argument was held, to a certain extent, valid in the Senate, and on the strength of it the bill was passed as it now stands. But now, in the name of the wealth of the country, it is demanded that this whole restriction shall be abolished, and that it shall have opportunity to select its substitutes from all those who are enrolled, and who are required to do military duty, putting it in direct antagonism with the men who are poor and who are unable to furnish substitutes.

I desire to say for myself that I am opposed to the system of bounties; that I think it is injurious and disastrous to the service; that I think it has wrought us more ruin than any other feature of our enrollment bills, and I shall be glad to see it stricken out; but so long as it is maintained in any of your bills, I desire to see it limited to the smallest possible compass.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend the section proposed to be stricken out by striking out in the fifth line the word "drafted" before "person," and inserting after the word "person" the words "drafted from the same town, city, or ward in which the substitute is enrolled;" so as to make it read:

That from and after the passage of this act any person enrolled and liable to be drafted may be accepted as a substitute for a person drafted from the same town, city, or ward in which the substitute is enrolled.

It is just this, that a man drafted may be permitted to find a substitute from the enrolled men in his own town, ward, or city, but that he shall not go into another ward, town, or city so as to excite competition between the different towns, wards, and cities. I can see an advantage in allowing the provision reported by the committee to pass with this amendment; and I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the position in which you place the enrolled men of the country and the military resources of the country by the old law. You enroll everybody liable to military duty; that is, the best men in your town, the men from twenty to forty-five, the men fit for service. When a man is drafted and proposes to get a substitute, he is from the very necessity of the case obliged to go outside of that enrollment and find a substitute among the men unfitted, or among aliens, or such people as would be enlisted for the bounties and then desert. If you allow a man in his own town to enlist a substitute from those who are enrolled, you are more sure that he will get a fit substitute and a good substitute, because the substitute was a man fit to be enrolled, and then you do not excite any competition with any other town, and whatever is done is done with the knowledge of the town, and the men of the town furnish their substitutes among themselves. You get the same class of people that you would get through the draft—the men liable to be drafted—if you allow the selection to be from the enrolled men; and the only objection to it is, that you exempt the man who goes as a substitute and the man for whom he goes at the same time.

Mr. COWAN. You exhaust two men on the enrollment for the service of one.

Mr. CLARK. Exactly; and there might be some danger that the enrollment list would be exhausted; but I do not think that danger and that mischief would be half as large as the danger and mischief we are now encountering. I can state a case where two hundred and fifty men were put into one of the regiments in my State, and in forty days or less after those men were put in two hundred and forty of them deserted. They went away by the wholesale. They were men who went in for the bounties, and went in to desert; and they were smart men and did desert.

Mr. COWAN. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I think I can suggest to him a somewhat ancient method of avoiding the difficulty of which he speaks, in one moment. According to the provisions of some of the State laws in early times for making drafts, when John Smith was drawn and procured John Thompson to become his substitute, the name of John Smith was put back into the wheel, and that of John Thompson taken out. That prevented all the difficulty. Then at a subsequent day, if John Smith was drawn again and he chose to get John Jones for a substitute that time, the same process took place. It was left to be regulated between them entirely as to the amount of bounty which the principal would pay for his substitute. I do not see that there can be the smallest difficulty in introducing a provision of that kind into our law, which would avoid all this difficulty; because it is manifestly unfair that two men should be exempted from military service on account of the actual military service of one.

Mr. CLARK. I have not the least objection, if the Senate think proper, that it should be so arranged, and that the person who is first drafted and who procures a substitute shall take the place of the man who is substituted for him, and have his name put back on the enrollment. That would keep your enrollment full; but I do desire that there shall be some provision for persons who are drafted and cannot go to get some good men if they can, and not be obliged to take up any substitute that may be offered.

Mr. COWAN. There is one difficulty with regard to the proposition to confine the party to procuring his substitute from the enrolled men of his own district, because the population is to a certain extent transitory, and it is particularly so with reference to that class of men who go as substitutes. Sometimes they reside in one township, sometimes in another; sometimes in one county, sometimes in another; therefore it might perhaps be injudicious to confine the man in the selection of a substitute to the enrollment of the district in which he lived; but it could all be provided for, no doubt.

Mr. CLARK. I think that difficulty may be readily overcome. In fact I do not think it would amount to much, because the population is very stable in many parts of the country; the men enrolled are very stable men, they are the best men of the country, they are the young men, the strong men, the promising men.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that we shall adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, and that the Senator from Iowa will withdraw his motion and let us go on with the bill. I think the amendment is a good check and ought to be adopted.

Mr. BROWN. Does the Senator mean the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILSON. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BROWN. And that of the Senator from Pennsylvania also?

Mr. CLARK. We can adopt this amendment first, and then the other can be proposed.

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to this. The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the first section of the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I understand how the bill will be amended. Is it the purpose of the clause to prohibit a drafted man from procuring a substitute unless the substitute himself be an enrolled man?

Mr. WILSON. By the present law a man can obtain a substitute anywhere.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I supposed.

Mr. WILSON. But if an enrolled man is drafted he is liable to go, and therefore it is very difficult to enlist good men, men who have any character or substance, who are enrolled, and the enlistments are mostly from persons under twenty years of age, or aliens, or worthless men who are enrolled. The amendment just adopted is that a man that is drafted may get his substitute under age as now, or an alien as now, or pick up anybody that is enrolled that he can get, but he must get the enrolled man in his own township or locality. It confines him to that locality if the substitute is enrolled and liable himself to be drafted. I am willing to take that amendment and put that limitation upon the section. It meets the objection offered by the Senator from Iowa that a rich community may go into a poorer one and pick up its men.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not mean to object to the amendment proposed by the honorable member from New Hampshire, but I want to know whether the effect of the clause as amended is to take from a drafted person the right to procure a substitute anywhere.

Mr. CLARK. Not at all.

Mr. WILSON. It enlarges the privilege he has now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to strike out the first section of the amendment as amended.

Mr. GRIMES. I withdraw that motion. The Senator from New Hampshire has another amendment which he proposes to that section, which will make it unexceptionable to me, and I think everybody else.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to insert in the third section, after the word "person," in the fourth line, the words "convicted or person charged with crime." Let me say, in making this motion, because I find that the language I propose to insert was contained in the original bill for which the committee have presented this substitute, that I regard the insertion of these words as necessary, perhaps more necessary than any other provision contained in this substitute. Perhaps the greatest abuse that exists under the enrollment and in the obtaining of soldiers occurs in this connection. It is the habit in the city of New York, and in other cities, in the city of Washington, I am told, for men who are engaged in this business of bounty jumping, as it is now known, to cause the arrest of persons by police officers who are engaged with them in making money; and when they are arrested they are drugged, having been made drunk in advance, and incarcerated in prison, charged with the commission of an infamous crime, for which there is no foundation in fact. They are frightened with its publicity, surrounded with some evidences of the proofs that they are going to present of the crime charged against them. Thus the men are compelled to agree, while in a state of stupefaction and fear, to enlist in the Army of the United States, with the agreement that the parties with whom they thus agree shall receive the bounty that they are entitled to by law if they shall enter the service. In many instances in the city of New York—more instances than one—it is an ascertained fact that justices of the peace are found to engage in complicity with such transactions. The result is not only that you get honest men in the service who should not be there, who are not there by the love they bear for the service, who are not there by the obligations they feel to the country to render it military service or to engage in the national cause, but who are there by duress, by imposition, by fraud, but who feel, after they sober up and find themselves in the Army, that it is but just and right to themselves to desert on the first opportunity. In addition to that, you find your armies filled with felons, taken from the jails of the country, men of the worst classes, men who have no regard for their obligations, men who engage and bargain, as a part of the transaction, that they shall receive a portion of the money, and thus it is divided up between this latter class and the police officers and bounty-jumpers and brokers engaged in this business.

In many instances you get hundreds of soldiers nominally, no proportion of which remain in the Army, but all of whom desert and run to the enemy, desert and rebel; and if there is any form of crime committed in connection with this business of obtaining soldiers for our armies, it appears to me that the transactions of which I have spoken, and which are ascertained facts not subject to question any longer, are the grossest form of crime that can be committed, and they should be stopped and punished. It cannot be called with any fairness, or with any justice, or with any reason, an advantage to put convicted men in the Army, and therefore I move the insertion of these words.

Mr. COWAN. Allow me to suggest that it ought to be an infamous crime, not an ordinary offense which does not render the party infamous.

Mr. CONNESS. The men engaged in this business would, then, simply lower the grade of their charges against the men whom they drug, make drunk, and drag into prison for the purpose of getting the bounty, and thus evade the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania move an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. COWAN. I move to insert the word "infamous" before "crime."

Mr. CONNESS. I submit that you will destroy the value of the amendment by the insertion of the word "infamous," because, as I before suggested, the men engaged in this business will be careful, then, not to charge them with infamous crime; they will simply lower the grade of charge they make against these persons and thus evade the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania is in the third degree; the Chair was not aware that the amendment of the Senator from California was an amendment to the amendment; but being so it is not amendable.

Mr. CONNESS. It can be inserted afterward, if such is the sense of the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am opposed to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California in the shape in which he has got it, certainly. He uses the word "crime." A man is guilty of assault and battery, and it is a crime; it is so designated by the law. In many of the States it is indictable; in all of them it is a crime because it is punished by fine. But at all events I am opposed to the amendment for another reason. A man is guilty of manslaughter: it is a crime; but I do not see why that man may not be placed in the Army as well as a man who has been guilty of no crime. It is a good place in which to put him. I do not think the reason exists for the exclusion of that class of persons from the Army. I think they might as well be placed there; indeed it is a better place for them. There is a class of offenses known as crimes that do not disqualify men from voting, from serving upon juries, from the exercise of all the privileges of citizens, except the punishment that is inflicted. A riot is a crime; but I do not think that would render a man incompetent or unfit to be a soldier. I am opposed to it.

Mr. GRIMES. It may be desirable to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from California at a subsequent stage, but I trust that we shall adopt it as it now is, and then if we see fit to amend it by inserting the word "infamous" or to use the word "felonious" in connection with it, we can do so. It seems to me that the transactions which have heretofore taken place in different portions of the country in this connection call for some remedy and some rebuke on the part of Congress. I do not know how it has been in all portions of the country, but I will state what I am informed has been the case here in the District of Columbia. I was told by a gentleman acquainted with the jail and connected with it that a large number of persons—I think seventy-two; I am not confident as to the exact number—who had been arrested and some of them indicted for high crimes and misdemeanors, some as high as arson and rape and robbery, have in some way or other, through the instrumentality of some agents or other, been taken out of the jail and sent to the Army, and not one of them to-day remains in the Army. Why, sir, do you suppose that such men as those are going to subject themselves continually to the discipline of an army? After preying for a little while upon their fellow-soldiers, if they do not desert to the rebels they go back to some of the large cities where they return to the commission of offenses of the description of those for which they were first incarcerated in a jail.

We owe it, Mr. President, to the noble men who are fighting for us that such men as these should not be thrust into the Army, and that they should not be compelled to associate with them. It degrades and demoralizes the Army to allow in it culprits, men who have been charged and who are guilty doubtless—at any rate the presumption is that they are guilty. It is not right to allow men who have been charged with an offense, and many of them indicted and in jail, to be taken out without undergoing any trial or without any punishment being inflicted upon them, and pay bounty to them or to the agents who secure their release, who become "straw bail" for them, and then after going into the Army, associating with our soldiers for a little while, they run off and desert to the enemy or else come back and go to prowling about again in iniquity and vice. I trust the amendment of the Senator from California will be adopted, and then if it be the opinion of the Senate that we shall insert the word "infamous," or the word "felonious," I shall be content that it be done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to submit a motion that I know will not be agreeable to the Senator from Massachusetts, but I think that he ought to yield to it, and that the Senate ought to yield to it when I state the facts. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed, and that the joint resolution in regard to the duty on printing paper be taken up. I will state to the Senate that on Saturday last that resolution was made the special order for yesterday, at one o'clock, but at the urgent demand of the chairman of the Military Committee I yielded without even a contest to allow this bill to be taken up, which he told me would be passed in half an hour, or an hour at most. This morning I called his attention to the fact that the bill had occupied all day yesterday, and he told me that at two o'clock to-day he would ask no further time, and would not resist my motion. I think it is manifest now, from the number of amendments that are pending, that this bill will give rise to further debate, and the Senate ought to carry out the understanding. It is now half past two o'clock, and I therefore move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed, or that it be recommitted, if the Senate desires that course, and that we take up the resolution fixing the duty on printing paper.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to submit to my colleague on the Committee on Finance, the chairman of the committee, whether it would not be better to finish this bill now. We have well progressed in it, and I think that we shall actually save time, and that the chairman of the Finance Committee will have more time for his bills after we shall have finished this, than he will by urging his now. I do not at all depreciate the importance of the measure which he moves to take up; it is a proposition to regulate the duty on printing paper; but I submit to the chairman of the Finance Committee, and I submit to the Senate, whether we do not owe it to the country rather to fix the manner in which we shall raise men to put in our armies, than to stop the debate just at this time and delay the measure for the purpose of fixing the duty on printing paper. I agree with him about the importance of that measure, and will go with him heart and hand to consider and dispose of it; but I think he had better let us finish this bill now. I submit to him whether that is not the better course.

Mr. SHERMAN. In reply to the remarks made by the Senator from New Hampshire, I will say that I know from remarks made about me that there are other amendments to be offered to this bill; and it will take a great deal of time. In regard to the joint resolution regulating the duty on printing paper, I am perfectly indifferent as to its fate, whether it be postponed or not; but it stands in the way of other business; it is a revenue measure, and I believe by the usual courtesy of the Senate has a preference for that reason. The legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill is ready for the consideration of the Senate, and I can call that up. There are other appropriation bills that are now pending in committee, and can be brought before the Senate. I think we had better proceed with these questions of practical legislation.

Mr. GRIMES. I will inquire if the paper duty bill does not decrease the revenue, in place of increasing it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The House bill undoubtedly does.

Mr. GRIMES. How is it with the Senate bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that as we propose to amend it it will increase the revenue. That is our opinion, and I have no doubt of it. I insist on my motion. If a majority of the Senate are against me I shall consider myself overruled and say no more about it.

Mr. CLARK. I will make this suggestion: the draft is fixed for the 15th of this month, and whatever we do upon this bill should be done before that time. The session will not close until the 4th of March, and we may have all the time between the 15th of February and the 4th of March to pass the legislative appropriation bill, even if we were obliged to take up with other measures all the time between the present date and the 15th of February. I submit to the Senate whether we shall not save our time by finishing now the bill we have on hand, keeping at work on it until we get it out of the way, and then take up the measure the Senator from Ohio proposes; because if we postpone this now it will be called up again at the first opportunity by the Senator from Massachusetts, for it is a bill of which he feels the importance, and he will press it on the Senate until it is ended. I submit that it had better be finished now.

Mr. POWELL. I have a little interest in this squabble about the precedence of business. I have in my charge a very important bill to my region of country, and indeed to the whole country, which was made the special order of the day for yesterday. That bill was knocked out of the way by this. I do not intend any more to submit to the postponement of that bill unless I am voted down by the Senate. Now, if this bill be laid over, I shall move to take up that bill of mine in preference to any other. I yielded yesterday, as I thought gracefully, to this bill, which it was said would take twenty minutes, but has now taken nearly two days. I find that I acted very badly for the interest of my bill by yielding on that occasion, and I now notify Senators that I will yield no more. I think it will take but a little time to pass my bill, and I notify the Senate that I will challenge all comers on all bills until it shall be disposed of, and I will not even postpone it to my friend from Ohio with his paper duty bill, if I can help it. I would have done so yesterday, probably, but he waived the paper bill then, and now if any bill is taken up in preference to the one before the Senate, it ought to be my railroad bridge bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his motion at this time, and let us finish this bill and get it out of the way. It is very evident that until this is cleared away we can get at nothing else with satisfaction. Then I for one will join the Senator from Ohio in getting his appropriation bills forward.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe I am always good-humored about the order of business. If members of the Committee on Finance will not vote to take up our bills, I am afraid we shall be clogged at the end of the session with long and wearisome night sessions, and that legislation will not be properly considered. The honorable chairman of the Military Committee now tells me that he can pass this bill in an hour. I hope the Senate will enable him to do so, and therefore I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. Conness] to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move now further to amend the first section of the substitute by striking out all after the word "person," where it occurs for the first time in the fifth line, and inserting at the end of what was inserted by a former amendment on my motion these words: "And the name of the drafted man shall be continued on the enrollment list, and such drafted man shall be liable to future calls and drafts in the same way and manner as his substitute would have been liable;" so that the whole section will read in this wise:

That from and after the passage of this act, any person enrolled and liable to be drafted may be accepted as a substitute for a person drafted from the same town, city, or ward in which the substitute is enrolled; and the name of the drafted man shall be continued on the enrollment list, and such drafted man shall be liable to future calls and drafts in the same way and manner as the substitute would have been liable.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say that that is the law now. I wanted to make a change in it. If it be the disposition of the Senate to take this amendment, I should like to add the words, "but not until the present enrollment shall be exhausted."

Mr. BROWN. Oh, no; that would destroy the whole effect of it.

Mr. WILSON. As the amendment is now, it is worse than the present law.

Mr. BROWN. We want to get rid of the system of exhausting two men to get one.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to ask the Senator who offers the amendment if it is not just what the law now is.

Mr. CLARK. It is, as I understand it, the law as it is; but I desire, in changing the law, to keep it still before the public by putting it in connection, so that no question shall arise about it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The people of the State of Indiana are not so ignorant of the draft law that it need be repeated at every session of Congress. I believe one or two drafts pretty fully informed the people of the provisions of the law, so that I cannot see the necessity of this amendment. I am free to say that the only feature of this bill as it came from the committee which I admired was the first section of their amendment. I do not see much merit in all the rest of the bill; but this first section did open the entire military force of the country to the Army.

Mr. GRIMES. The second section would save fifty thousand men in a year to the Army.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the first section would cut off to some extent the business that bounty brokers feed and live upon. You open up the entire class from which substitutes are to be obtained by the proposition as it came from the Senate committee, and will, perhaps, if this law be properly administered, enable the War Department to fill up the Army at once with a very valuable and serviceable material. I thought there was something in the first section; but if we have to go right back to the law of the last session, or as we amended the former law at the last session, and leave the legislation just where we found it, I cannot see any necessity for the section. It is trifling with the subject, in my judgment. I want to see an opportunity to furnish substitutes from the men who are enrolled. There are two men in a neighborhood, both of them enrolled. The one is drafted, and the other is not. The probability is that for some months at least there will not be a necessity for another draft. The man who is drafted cannot go. The condition of his family is such as to make it impossible. Sickness at home or some other reason may make it impossible for him to go. His friends are willing to help him. This other man who is enrolled and is not drafted and who would make a good soldier, says, "I will go for a reasonable compensation." The Army in that way is filled at once, so far as that draft is concerned; the quota is supplied; the necessities of the country met. Is it not a good provision? But you say we shall go right back to where the law was, and not take a step in advance. I think the first section as reported is a good provision, and I hope the Senate will stand by it.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I will read what the law now is. It is the fifth section of the act of February 29, 1864:

"That if such substitute is not liable to draft, the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute is not liable to draft, not exceeding the term for which he was drafted; and if such substitute is liable to draft, the name of the person furnishing him shall again be placed on the roll and shall be liable to draft on future calls, but not until the present enrollment shall be exhausted; and this exemption shall not exceed the term for which such person shall have been drafted."

The object of the first section of the committee's amendment was to allow persons who were drafted to obtain their substitutes among men who are enrolled and liable to be drafted, but who have not been drafted. The Senator from New Hampshire moved to amend that so as to confine it to the persons within his own locality and his own township. I assented to that. If that stands, then the person is exempted for the time during which his substitute is liable to serve, if he gets him in his own town; but if he goes beyond his own township, he is under the operation of the fifth section of the act of last year; his name goes to the foot of the enrollment list, and he may be drafted again. I am content that it shall stand in that way.

But if the amendment now proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire should be adopted, it will make the section more stringent than the law is at the present time. The person furnishing a substitute is now liable to be drafted, but he is not liable to be drafted until the enrollment is exhausted; he goes to the foot of that enrollment; but he has not even that limitation in the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire. I hope that the amendment will not be pressed. I think it would be well if we leave the section just as it now stands. Let the drafted man, if he gets a substitute in his own township, among his own neighbors, a good respectable man, be exempted for the time that that man goes into the service; but if he goes beyond his township to any other place, then his name goes on the list, and he is liable to be drafted again. Let him take that risk. I am willing that he should. As the section now stands, it equalizes all localities, and I hope it will be allowed to stand as it is.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Massachusetts thinks the amendment I have offered is a little more stringent than the provision in the old law, I will withdraw the amendment striking out and inserting, and will move simply to strike out the words "and such drafted person shall be exempt from service for such time as the substitute shall be held to service under the terms of his enlistment," so as to leave the old law exactly as it stands in force; so that the section will read:

That from and after the passage of this act any person enrolled and liable to be drafted may be accepted as a substitute for a person drafted from the same town, city, or ward in which the substitute is enrolled.

And then the old law will prescribe the condition of the man who procures the substitute as to future enrollments.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Indiana that I have not presumed upon the ignorance of the people of his State; I have no doubt they are just as intelligent as any persons can be; but I have sometimes in the practice of the law found this difficulty, that when I found an alteration of a statute in part I was obliged to go and hunt up the old statute and compare the two together to see what was the true meaning of what was reenacted and what was left out. I desire to save all that trouble to everybody in constructing the law on this subject, by bringing it together in the same section. I desire, as the Senator from Indiana does, to allow a man to get a substitute from the men enrolled in his own town; that is, among his neighbors. But take the case he puts of a man who cannot go, whose family are sick, or it is very inconvenient for him to go, and he desires to get a substitute, and his neighbor is willing to go for him. He says to his neighbor, "Will you go for me?" and he says, "I will." It seems to be but just and fair to the other persons enrolled in that town that only one of those men should be excused; because if there be twelve men enrolled and you exempt two it leaves ten, and the chances are a little increased that one of those ten will be called for the next time. But I do not know that it is so very important as to make it necessary to pass the amendment that I proposed.

But there is a necessity that the amendment should prevail as it has been adopted by the Senate, in this regard, that one town should not be permitted to bid over another town. We found this difficulty in the State of New Hampshire. We are not so rich a State as the State of Massachusetts. There is the city of Boston lying right below us, and the towns of Lawrence and Lowell. They would offer higher bounties than we could give in many of our agricultural towns, and the result was that men went from there to Lowell, or Lawrence, or Boston, and took the bounty and enlisted, and were credited to the State of Massachusetts, and we had so many less men to procure our quota from. I desire to keep our men in our own towns, that one town shall not be permitted to forbid in that way on another town because it has more wealth. The city in which I reside, in that way would have a vast advantage over some of the small agricultural towns in the State. They would draw all the men there to be enlisted, which would be unfair to those little towns. If a man is to be permitted to get a substitute in his own town, and not go further among the enrolled men, then it would be fair among all the towns.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I have not objected to that feature of his proposition.

Mr. CLARK. But I understood the Senator to say the section would not be worth anything.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No, sir; I said the section was useless if we go further and make it mean just what the law of last session means. I object to restricting the effect of furnishing a substitute, as I understood the Senator to propose. I have seen in my own section of country the effect of this business of furnishing substitutes. I think it is the most demoralizing thing that I have ever beheld. As the law now stands, a man can furnish a substitute only from a particular class—persons under twenty years of age, aliens, or negroes from the southern States. A person is drafted in some neighborhood. He does not know where there is any person of this class. He has to go to some of the more prominent towns where there are agencies established and who publish that they will employ and furnish substitutes. The substitutes go to them. Fellows are wandering over the country who want to sell themselves out for $1,000. They hunt up the substitute broker; and thence arises this business. If the drafted man, instead of going to the substitute broker to obtain a substitute, were allowed to go to his neighbor and make a bargain with him and let this neighbor take his place and give him five or six hundred dollars, it would break up this system of substitute brokerage, and restore to some extent a little morality and decency in the country. I want to see that done.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator from New Hampshire has withdrawn his amendment I desire to renew it.

Mr. CLARK. I have withdrawn the amendment to strike out and insert, and renew the amendment to strike out the words:

And such drafted person shall be exempt from service for such time as the substitute shall be held to service under the terms of his enlistment.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope the Senator will allow the Senate to take a vote on the proposition as he originally submitted it; and I want to try to show the Senate why I think the same principle that governs them in adopting the first amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, and the same principle to which I understand the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from New Hampshire now give their adherence, require us to adopt the amendment last proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will allow me, I will renew the motion to amend that I made originally, and then if that should not be adopted I can make the motion to strike out.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, when the enrollment bill was originally before us, and at the last session also, there was a majority of the Senate, or if not a majority at least a very large minority, who were opposed to the power being granted to any person who might be drafted under the enrollment law to procure a substitute. We believed it was the duty of every man to render his service to the Government; but at last, during the conflict that existed between the two Houses, we gave way, and, in the interest of capital, in the interest of wealth, we allowed men to procure substitutes to go into the Army and fight the battles of the country for them.

It is objected by the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Indiana, and I think justly—I agree with them fully in it—that we ought not to allow this ability to procure substitutes to extend so far as to allow the persons who may be drawn in one township or ward of a city to go outside the jurisdiction of that township or ward and obtain substitutes from among men who have been enrolled in another township or ward of a city. Why? Because they say these rich counties, cities, townships, and wards will draw from the poor agricultural townships all the men, or a portion of the men, who are enrolled in that township, and who will be required to fill up the quotas of these agricultural and poor townships.

There is a great deal of validity in that argument. But let me ask the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from New Hampshire if the same principle that governs them in regard to their conduct in relation to the townships, cities, and wards, ought not and should not govern them in regard to the individuals within the townships. Let me put an illustration. The Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, lives in a township in the State of Massachusetts. He is a man of wealth.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no.

Mr. GRIMES. If he is not, he ought to be, and we all wish that he were. I take it for granted that he is a man of wealth, with his half million dollars. Around him are twelve poor men, mechanics. The Senator is on the enrollment list and is drafted. He goes to one of those mechanics, and he hires him, by paying him $1,000, to go into the Army and serve in a military capacity in his behalf for the term of three years. The draft still impends upon that township. There must be a certain number of those twelve drawn. Two of them are already exhausted. The Senator has been drawn. He has procured a substitute, and ought not to be compelled to perform service, according to the theory of the Senator from Indiana. He has also taken out one of the remaining twelve, thus increasing the burden or the liability to the burden at the rate of twenty per cent. or thereabouts upon the remaining men. Now, I ask, is not that a boon given to wealth? The duty was incumbent upon the Senator from Massachusetts. He was as liable to perform military duty as anybody else. We have allowed him to use his money in order to purchase his freedom, and he has purchased the services of a poor man, a mechanic, who was compelled equally with him to perform military duty.

Mr. FARWELL. If the Senator will allow me to make a single suggestion, I do not know how it has been in the section of country where he lives, but his statement of the case, so far as it applies to the section of the country from which I come, has no weight. All the money paid for substitutes has been assessed upon the wealthy. I think everywhere in New England where men have procured substitutes to supply their places, it has been done by the votes of the cities and towns, and it has been assessed upon the wealthy.

Mr. GRIMES. We are making a conscription law. There is wealth enough in the Senator's State, I suppose, to raise a vast fund from which they are able to purchase men to go into the Army without making a conscription. I live in a section of country where we have not that vast wealth; where every man is called upon to perform his duty to the country; where we volunteer; where we enroll and draft; and therefore I speak with some knowledge on this subject. I speak for the men in my own neighborhood, in my own town, who under the operation of this law, if it shall be passed without the Senator's amendment, will be liable in a much greater degree to be drawn and compelled to leave their families, because of the ability of men of wealth who are associated with them to buy the service of other poor men who are also enrolled. I submit to the Senator from Indiana, if the same principle that justifies his position in favor of the original amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, so far as it relates to cities, wards, and towns, does not extend also so as to relate to the individuals within the jurisdiction of any of those wards, towns, townships, &c., who may be enrolled.

Now, in regard to inserting it in this bill, it is said that this is the law, except that the law as it now stands places the man who procures a substitute at the bottom of the enrollment list, whereas this puts his name into the wheel and he takes his chance. That is the only difference between the two cases. Is not that right? He has purchased his freedom from this draft. Why should he not be subjected to another draft? Why should he not stand his chance with the remaining men in that township to perform his duty to the country? I want it inserted in this same connection, for the reason assigned by the Senator from New Hampshire, that I do not want it to be left to any construction that may hereafter be put upon it by any of these provost marshals, or justices of the peace, or constables, that because this act was upon the same subject with another act passed a year before, therefore, by intentment, it contravened and repealed the provisions of the old law.

I want to have it so plain that the wayfaring man, though a fool, cannot err therein. If there is any law that ought to be plain and be within the comprehension of every man in the whole country it is this enrollment law.

Mr. CONNESS. The amendment now before the Senate does not meet my approbation or judgment; and yet I am at a loss to present a form by which it may be changed for the better. It appears to me in all that I have thought on the point now under consideration that the just proposition, and the proposition that would give us soldiers, would be one of this kind: that every man furnishing a substitute (and this leaves out of the question the source from which the substitute shall come) should be held bound to keep his substitute in the service in the field until he was wounded or rendered incapable of service longer; and that if his substitute should desert or leave the service, the principal should be immediately sent for and compelled to take his place. The adoption of a proposition of that kind would put an end to all this brokerage, or the worst class of it, that we have.

It is certainly the purpose of the law to get soldiers. When we provide that a citizen drafted may furnish a substitute in his stead, we simply accommodate the law to what may be the dire needs or necessities of the citizen drafted, and therefore we allow him to furnish a substitute in his stead. That is an accommodation that the law makes to the citizen. But there should be no form of law that should in any manner deprive the nation of the services of the soldier. Therefore every man who furnishes a substitute should be held responsible for the presence of that substitute in the service until he is rendered incapable of serving longer. Then if it shall be found that there is a deserter, the inquiry will be, "Who is he?" "A substitute for Mr. Brown, of such a place, such a district, such a ward, such a town." Immediately, through your provost marshals, you call upon Mr. Brown to enter the Army, and make him enter it or furnish another substitute as good as he is.

If such were the law, every man who was drafted and authorized to furnish a substitute would be careful to furnish an honest, able-bodied man, not a thief, not a felon, not a fellow just imported for the purpose of filling his place, not a man stolen from an immigrant ship, not a negro taken from the southern States; but a man that he believed would remain in his stead until he was incapacitated from service further in some manner by the exigencies of war. If you will add to that a regulation such as is attempted to be provided by this amendment, by which you shall make facility to the furnishing of substitutes, you will fill up the ranks of your Army. But, sir, it is a fallacy to fill the ranks of your Army nominally, when you have really got no soldiers, or when you lose five, ten, fifteen, twenty-five, or fifty per cent. under the substitute system by enabling you and I, sir, when we are drafted, to get any vagabond in the land to take our place, and who runs away as soon as possible, relieving us.

Mr. WILSON. I assure the Senator from California that I am very glad to have somebody in the world as hard, and as cruel, and as oppressive as I am. The sixth section of the original bill as I introduced it had that very provision in it, in these words:

And if any person who may hereafter enter the military or naval service as a substitute shall desert therefrom, or be discharged by reason of physical disability, existing prior to such entry into service, his principal shall be held to service for the remainder of the term for which such substitute shall be liable.

I thought that was a very good provision.

Mr. COWAN. Not without being drawn, I hope. I have no objection to the principle involved in the section, if after the substitute shall have been discharged on account of sickness, or deserts, the principal shall only stand his chance like other men to be drawn. Is that implied in the section?

Mr. WILSON. The Senator, I think, mixes the two subjects. By the existing law a person who is drafted may get a substitute anywhere. If, however, the substitute is liable to be drafted, the principal is not discharged for the whole time his substitute goes into the service, but his name goes on the roll at the foot of the list, and he may be drafted again. That is the existing law.

But, sir, we have got this practice in the country: we put in the Army a great many men who are not fit physically to go in, and in a few weeks they are discharged. They come in to supply places, and the communities that put them in are exempted. They have filled their quota; but the country has not got a man. He is physically unfit or deserts. The sixth section of the original bill provided that if he deserted, or if he was mustered out of the service on account of physical disability existing at the time of his being mustered in, the locality should give us another man, or the individual putting him in should give us another man, as the Senator from California now suggests. As soon as that proposition was made and went over the country immediately there came out in certain presses of the country a denunciation of it as very hard and oppressive, and a paper in my own State held me up as a man who was disposed to be very tyrannical and very oppressive; in a word, to be a little different after election from what I was before election. I have had a large number of those papers sent to me to show that I was certainly a very cruel, hard, and oppressive man. I am very glad to have the Senator from California with me to-day to share the odium and the burden of being such a cruel and oppressive man. I think it a sound principle. However, we struck it out in this amendment; but we hold the locality responsible and not the man.

Mr. CONNESS. I cannot understand the justice of holding the locality responsible and not the man. It is not the locality that owes service to the Government. It is the citizen that owes service to the Government. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FARWELL] suggests, in answer, that the practice in many districts is that localities fill up the quota without reference to men. When a district is required to furnish a certain number of men, what is it required to furnish? It is a certain number from its population; it is those that may be drafted and that are owing service to the Government. I cannot see that there is any injustice, or any tyranny, or any oppression in the proposition contained in the original bill, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. Suppose I am drafted, and I owe service to the Government, it is clearly my duty to go and render that service, or, the law permitting it, that I furnish a substitute. It is my duty; and can that duty be held to have ended and terminated when I turn a man into the Army, a man who deserts the next day, or a man who deserts and goes over to the enemy, or comes back to reenlist, or become a substitute for some other person and get a new bounty and a new price for his substitution? Can it be possible that I have paid the debt I owe to the Government by such a transaction as that? All I have got to say is, that unless the citizen is held bound to furnish an actual soldier, he should not be authorized to furnish a substitute at all. It is soldiers the country wants, and not a list of the names of men. A mere list of names can do no fighting. It is men that are wanted in the Army.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to suggest to the Senator what I presume he perceives already, that his idea is merely cumulative upon the one that is in the bill, and goes further.

Mr. CONNESS. That is so.

Mr. CLARK. It is not any objection to this amendment because it does not go quite as far as he suggests, because we might make his amendment afterward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Does the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw his original amendment and offer another?

Mr. CLARK. No, sir; I renewed it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the first section of the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that the proposition now is to strike out the first section; is it not?

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir; I withdrew it some time ago.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I have an amendment to offer: to insert immediately after the first section of the amendment of the committee the following, as additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That in addition to the substitute furnished by a drafted person, every such drafted person shall, before his discharge from the draft, be held to contribute a certain proportion in the nature of a title of his annual gains, profits, or income, whether derived from any kind of property, dividends, salary, or from any profession, trade, or employment whatever, at the following rates, to wit: on all incomes over $1,000 and not over $2,000, five per cent.; on all incomes over $2,000 and not over $5,000, ten per cent.; and on all incomes over $5,000, twenty per cent. And it shall be the duty of every such person seeking to be discharged to make return, either by himself or his guardian, to the provost marshal of his district of the amount of his income, according to the requirements of the act to provide internal revenue, of July 1, 1862; and so much of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, as is inconsistent with this section, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

And be it further enacted, That the contributions thus made shall be employed by the Secretary of War as a bounty to the men actually drafted and mustered into service subsequent to the date of this act whenever they shall be honorably discharged, or, in the case of death, to the legal representatives of any such man according to the rules and regulations established by the War Department.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, on a former occasion I offered this amendment, and it was slightly considered by the Senate, not at much length, not, I think, as much as it deserved. Since then I have received many letters on the subject, I may say from all parts of the country, especially from the West, expressing a great interest in that amendment. The correspondents who have done me the honor to write to me have found in that proposition an element of justice to the poor man, and an endeavor to equalize the terrible burden of the draft. That is its essential character; and it is on that account that I now on this occasion renew it.

The proposition proceeds on the idea that it is not equal to exact the same sum from all men as an excuse from the draft. It is not equal when you compel the poor man, in order to save himself from the draft, to pay the same sum which is paid by the rich man. One man can pay with the greatest difficulty the five or six hundred dollars that may be required; to another man it is nothing. One man pays that sum out of his abundance; he loses nothing by it; his personal convenience, his necessities, are not in any way interfered with by the payment of that sum; but another man when compelled to pay that sum is constrained in the very necessities of life. Now, sir, I desire to say in this Chamber and before the country that that is not just. I stake the little reputation I have on that assertion as a principle of public morals; and I wish that my voice could go throughout the length and breadth of this country declaring that principle, and as a protest against this injustice. I say the rich man ought to pay for his exemption from the draft more than the poor man, and he ought to pay in proportion to his wealth.

But I have been told, or the Senate was told on other occasions, that the rich paid an increased tax, according to their income. Very well; that is one thing. The poor man pays his tax also according to his means. Let the rich man pay his tax according to his means. We come now to another matter which is not under the head of taxation; it is under another head, this head of conscription; and the question is, how much men who are drafted shall pay for their exemption. Under the existing law the poor man pays just as much as the rich man. I say that is unjust; and on that principle I stand.

The second section of the amendment which I have proposed provides that the contributions thus made shall be employed by the Secretary of War as a fund for bounties to be paid to the men actually drafted and mustered into the service. The fund that is gained in the way now proposed will be then for the benefit of drafted men. It will go to help them. It will go to add to the comfort and to the conveniences of the poor man who has been compelled to take part in the service of his country. Therefore there is a double object accomplished. In the first place, this burden, so far as legislation can do it, is equalized; it is made to bear equally upon the rich and the poor; and, in the second place, you obtain a very large fund for additional bounties to the poor man.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know whether I understand exactly the scheme of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts; and if I do not, he will of course correct me. I understand that the basis of the proposition is in this: that political value, as well as commercial value, shall be measured by money; that is, all the citizens of the Republic shall be appraised and their money value ascertained precisely, and then they are to be assessed, not only as to their money contributions to support and maintain the Government, but also as to their personal and military service to maintain the Government. I hope I have stated him fairly. That seems to be the great principle which underlies the proposition sent to the Secretary's desk.

But the proposition does not carry out the principle, as I understand. The proposition confines it to those persons who are liable to be drafted. I think I am right in this. If that be so, then there is a conflict between them which is fatal, because if a man's weight and value in society depends upon his pecuniary value, why should not a man aged forty-six years and worth $10,000,000 be obliged to contribute ten times as much as a man worth $1,000,000 who is only forty years of age? If money is to be the measure of the contributions which we are to offer upon the altar of the Republic, money ought to measure those who are liable to the draft and those who are not liable. I suggest this for the consideration of the honorable Senator, in order that he may conform the system and make it harmonious; that he may introduce into it that symmetry which was supposed to be the essence of all virtue in ancient times.

But, Mr. President, I object to the taxation of salaries upon the broad ground stated in this proposition, and I object to it for this reason: there are three kinds of income in this country very distinct from each other. In the first place, there is a large class of incomes which arise out of contracts made before the passage of the present legal-tender law. A man may have purchased ground rents in 1860, yielding to him a revenue of $2,000 per annum. In the present condition of our currency and its depreciation, that revenue is now really but $1,000 per annum. The other $1,000 is not put into the coffers of the Government, but is transferred from the pocket of the ground-rent landlord into that of the tenant who was to pay; or, in other words, the tenant pays $2,000 with $1,000, or with that which only costs him $1,000 now to procure. That is a class of persons liable to be drafted who are already by the operation of our law taxed one half of their incomes; or, in other words, by the operation of those laws, their incomes are reduced to one half what they would be if we had not adopted the provision making United States notes and Treasury notes legal tenders.

Then there is another class of salaries that I would not subject to this kind of tax, and our own are an example of them. The salaries of State officers all over the United States are also examples. By the terms of the contract between the present members of Congress and the United States Government our salary was $3,000; but by the depreciation of the currency in which we are paid it is now and has been for the last year but $1,500. The other $1,500 is taken from us and put into the coffers of the Government, and it is really $1,500 tax. There is no fact more certain in the world than that the members of this Senate and of the other House have during the past year paid not only the income tax that all other citizens have paid, but they have paid the reduction in the value of their salaries, which amounted to $1,500; and yet the Senator from Massachusetts, not satisfied with this burden, proposes to impose an additional one. If he will confine his burdens to another class whom I am about to mention, and who are the third class—

Mr. GRIMES. Are there any members of this Senate who are subject to the draft?

Mr. COWAN. Yes, sir, there are members of this Senate who are subject to be drafted; and I am utterly astonished that the honorable Senator from Iowa in casting his glances around cannot discover evidences of juvenility sufficient to warrant him in saying that that is the fact. [Laughter.]

The last large class of persons are those who may be denominated, perhaps, now, under the heads of "shoddy" and "petroleum"—people who have everything to sell and not much to buy; people whose incomes are not fixed, but whose commodities go into the market, and being nearly as sensitive as the currency itself, rise and fall with it; people who do not care what the public credit may be—it does not affect them. If the public credit falls, their commodities rise. I would not object to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts being applied to such persons having large incomes; but he makes no discrimination in favor of those who are suffering and those who are rioting now in the enjoyment of perhaps larger profits than they ever had before. That class, at present, are those who depreciate the public credit. The man whose salary is not fixed to-day is put in antagonism with the Government, and it is his interest to depreciate its securities. The more he depreciates them the more he gets out of them; the more he has to present finally for ultimate payment. I have heard a contractor say that whenever his country was fortunate he was unfortunate, and whenever it was unfortunate he was fortunate; "so that," said he, "notwithstanding my patriotism and my great love of country, I have almost been afraid to hear of a Federal victory." Why? Because a Federal victory appreciates our currency, and the prices of his commodities fall in the same proportion; he loses; but a Federal disaster depreciates the currency, and his commodities rise in proportion.

If we could reach that class of people who have large incomes and subject them to any kind of tax, no matter what, I would have no objection to it; but I protest against this large drag-net which the gentleman has thrown about the whole community to sweep in those whose incomes were fixed before you established this fluctuating standard, to sweep in those whose incomes are fixed by law, or public officers, along with these people who are left perfectly free to regulate the prices of their commodities, apart from this standard. I should have been much better pleased to see a proposition come from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to come back to a fixed standard. What would have been thought of a proposition in this body, agreed to by the other, and made into a law, that the yard-stick should be made of some substance elastic, variable in its nature, so that to-day it would be twenty inches, and to-morrow twenty-four inches, and the next day sixteen inches; or that the pound weight should depend for its gravity upon the direction of the wind—if you please? We have done that thing precisely. We have set up as a standard of value here a measure which varies with the fortunes of the Republic, which on the 1st day of January, 1864, made your dollar sixty-five cents, on the 1st day of July, 1864, made it thirty-five cents, and during the last year has kept it all the time below fifty cents. What is the consequence? We not only pay for the depreciation in this money, but we pay for its fluctuations; and it is its fluctuations rather than its depreciation which have enhanced the value of prices of every article, which have destroyed the relations which have heretofore existed among men, and which will, in my judgment, if not corrected, and corrected speedily, bring to us more ruin than defeat will bring to the armies of the United States. The reason is simple, perfectly simple.

If we had undertaken to be guilty of such folly as to alter the yard-stick, and change it from a fixed measure three feet in length into a variable measure which might be twenty inches to-day and twenty-four to-morrow, and fifteen the next day, what then? Would not the dealers have been changed from fair dealers into gamblers? As long as the yard-stick is a fixed measure the dealer is a fair dealer; but the moment you make him speculate as to what it will be you make him a gambler, and you make him bet upon that which no human foresight can foresee.

If it were a question of a contract between the honorable Senator from Iowa and myself as to whether I should deliver to him a thousand yards of cloth ninety days from this date, and we were to deal according to the fixed yard-stick, there would be only one kind of fluctuation that we should have to take into account, and that is the fluctuation in the supply and demand of the cloth. If the market was glutted, of course the price would be less; if the supply was limited, it would be more. But when I am to deliver this cloth at ninety days, and it is a question as to the yard-stick whether the yard-stick shall be twenty inches on the day of delivery, or whether it shall be thirty-six, or thirty, or twenty-eight, the honorable Senator says, "I must take that into the account when I am making this bargain; I must provide for the probable fluctuation." So it is with regard to the money. If I stipulate to deliver to him a thousand barrels of flour ninety days from this date, it is not a question as to the supply and demand of the flour; it is principally a question as to the fluctuation of the money. What am I to do? The barrel of flour is really worth five dollars, but the standard now would make it worth eleven or twelve dollars, and it may be worth fifteen dollars; and if I am to deliver the flour at all I am to deliver it at such a price as will cover the probable fluctuation. What is the effect upon prices? To increase them half a dozen fold sometimes; and they have been increased in that way.

Now if this provision of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is to apply to all people who are free to speculate upon these fluctuations, and whose incomes are derived from gambling upon them, I have no objection to it; but I do object to its being applied to that portion of the community whose hands are tied, and who have not been guilty of any depreciation of this currency. There are two classes of people connected with depreciation. The paper dollar of the United States is as good a dollar as the gold dollar if all the people will agree to take it as such. It is as good a dollar as the gold dollar if all the people of the country will give it the credit of the gold dollar.

Who is it that refuses this credit? It is not the members of Congress. When we go to the Secretary's desk to receive our pay we take the paper dollar as the gold dollar. It is not the soldier in the Army. He takes it as the gold dollar. It is not the seamen in the Navy, or the State officers employed under the State governments. They take it as a gold dollar. It is not the widow who lives upon a fixed dower charged upon land before the 25th of February, 1862, because she is obliged to take it by force of our law as a gold dollar. It is not the minor whose moneys have been loaned by his guardian and who has become of age since the prevalence of this fluctuating standard who depreciates it, because he is compelled to take it as a gold dollar.

And here, Mr. President, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate just to state a personal fact which was within my knowledge. A friend of mine was the guardian of a minor who had about ten thousand dollars in gold on the 1st of July, 1861. He was exceedingly anxious to invest that money upon real securities payable in three years, at the time the minor would arrive at maturity. He succeeded in doing so. On the 1st day of July, 1864, the money was repaid him in United States notes, which he was obliged to take; and upon an accurate calculation on that day, what he actually received was a little over four thousand and one hundred dollars for his $10,000, with three years' interest. Its actual purchasing power in the market that day was equivalent to four thousand one hundred and some odd dollars. What became of the remainder? Who got it? The Government did not get it. It did not go into the Treasury of the United States; but it went into the pocket of the borrower. He had obtained ten thousand gold dollars, with the purchasing power of ten thousand gold dollars, and he paid it back with four thousand one hundred gold dollars, or a purchasing power equivalent. That guardian remarked to me, "If I had taken that $10,000 on the 1st day of July, 1861, and locked it up in my safe and kept it there, not invested it at all, not put it to profit or to interest, on the 1st day of July, 1864, I could have gone out into the market and bought more than twenty-eight thousand dollars' worth of the money that I received in payment for it."

Now, I say that the minor child whose patrimony had been taken from him and put into the hands of a man who has given no consideration for it, has not depreciated the public credit. He took its dollars as gold dollars; and he is now liable to the draft; and he is one of the persons who would come within the provisions of the honorable Senator's proposition, which he says is founded on national justice. I can say to the honorable Senator that that minor to-day is in the Army of the United States, battling nobly for the honor of his country's flag; that he has paid more taxes than the honorable Senator and myself both since the war began; that is, I proceed upon the assumption that the honorable Senator is as poor as I am, [Mr. SUMNER nodded,] and therefore the more honor.

If these classes are to be distinguished, and if those who are free to take this dollar or not to take it are to be taxed, I have no objection; but I come now to the question, who does depreciate the currency? Who is it that depreciates the paper dollar of the United States? Who is it that refuses to take it as a gold dollar and to give to it the purchasing power of a gold dollar? I have said that it was not the officers the Federal Government; that it was not the soldiers in the Army, nor the seamen in the Navy; that it was not the officers of the State governments; that it was not the widows who lived on fixed incomes or dowers; that it was not old people who had retired upon ground rents, thinking they had something substantial to maintain themselves in their old age; it was not the minor whose patrimony is handed to him under this state of things; but who is it? It is the dealing part of the community; it is that part of the community who buy and sell, and whose incomes are not fixed. If the paper dollar is offered to me in payment of my salary I take it; but if I offer it to a farmer for his wheat he refuses it, and says, "Let me see, what is gold to-day—225? I must have $2 25 in paper for this bushel of wheat." If I offer it to a merchant for his commodities, he inquires, "What is gold to-day—216? I will give you this for a gold dollar; but as gold is now 216 I must have $2 16 in paper for it." It follows, as a matter of course, that the more it depreciates the more he makes out of it; and yet we proceed in stultifying ourselves by following this system, and following it without any attempt to escape from it.

Therefore, I say, I would have been much more happy to see the Senator from Massachusetts come in and plant himself upon the great general laws of political economy and the wealth of nations, and ask—first, that salaries be fixed and stable, that they be regulated by a fixed and certain standard before they are to be taxed; and if he had done so I would have been very glad to adjust them with him. And then I would be in favor of taxing incomes. I think—and I believe that I agree with the more advanced view of modern political economists—that to tax the income is the proper way to reach the available means of the community, which the Government has a right to call upon in order to improve its revenue; but I am opposed to the taxation of salaries when such an element of difference, and when such an unjust discrimination is made as against a large portion of the people and in favor of another much larger portion. I am opposed to it when it is proposed to put them upon the same footing.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have the attention of the Senate for one moment in order to bring the question back to its precise position. The bill under consideration is entitled as follows: "A bill in addition to the several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes." To that bill I have moved by way of amendment a proposition to equalize the burden of the draft, so that it will bear to a certain extent, and so far as that can be secured by legislation, equally upon the rich and the poor. But the Senator from Pennsylvania opposes my proposition, and he treats the Senate to a very elaborate disquisition on political economy in general, on the depreciation of the currency in particular, also on the currency, also on taxation, and still further on salaries.

Now, sir, admitting that all that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania has so ably said is perfectly true, that it is according to just principles of political economy and the experience of the world, (and I am not disposed to go at this moment into that discussion with that learned Senator,) the proposition that I have had the honor to make has not been touched in the least by a hair's breadth. My proposition involves no question of political economy, no question with regard to the currency, or with regard to taxation, or with regard to salaries. It has nothing to do with any of those matters. Its single and exclusive object is to equalize the burden of the draft. There is no political economy in it. There is nothing but justice. I propose that every drafted person, before his discharge from the draft, shall be held to contribute not merely a substitute, but a certain title of his annual gains, according to the following proportions:

On all incomes over $1,000, and not over $2,000, five per cent.; on all incomes over $2,000 and not over $5,000, ten per cent.; on all incomes over $5,000, twenty per cent.

I provide in the amendment the means of ascertaining those incomes. I am not tenacious with regard to the percentage which they are to pay by my amendment. If Senators would suggest a different percentage I shall be perfectly willing to yield to any suggestion which shall seem to be reasonable. I have offered the proposition as the best under all the circumstances that I could devise. Other Senators may improve it; it is open to improvement; but I submit that the criticism of the Senator from Pennsylvania does not touch it in the least. The proposition still stands before the Senate in its original character as a measure which, if adopted, would equalize this burden of the draft. It would, if I may so express myself, temper this terrible draft to the poor of the country. It would make them see that the legislators here, while imposing this draft upon the country, thought of the poor, and took such steps as they could to the end that this burden should not press upon them with undue severity; so that it might to a certain extent be equalized upon them and upon the rich. I know full well that this cannot completely be accomplished; but, sir, it is something to make an endeavor in that direction. I think that the Senate of the United States owes it to this question; it owes it to the poor that are liable to be enrolled, that they should make the endeavor. Let them show to the country that while they require this draft they also recognize that there are inequalities of condition; that some men are poor and some men are rich; and that the same sum shall not be exacted from the poor man that you exact from the rich.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I felt it my duty when this measure was proposed by the member from Massachusetts at the last session, to oppose it then, and notwithstanding I have listened very patiently to his observations in support of it, I am obliged to adhere to my original convictions.

In the first place, it is very undesirable, as I think, upon every ground, to draw a distinction between the poor and the rich as a general proposition. Class legislation is always mischievous, and is therefore, as I think, defective in principle. The honorable member from Massachusetts says he thinks, and no doubt he does think, that his proposition is so clearly just he can hardly imagine the Senate can fail to see it in the same way, and to adopt it. A great many things may be just in the abstract, and we might be very anxious to accomplish what in the abstract is just when we are not able to do it as legislators. What is proposed is to levy a tax of five per cent. upon all incomes between $1,000 and $2,000, ten per cent. upon all incomes between $2,000 and $5,000, and twenty per cent. upon all incomes exceeding $5,000; and the fund that is to be raised by this tax is to go into the Treasury of the United States to be appropriated by the Secretary of War for the purpose of procuring soldiers for the Army of the United States.

Mr. COLLAMER. It goes to pay the drafted men a bounty.

Mr. JOHNSON. Drafted men or others.

Now, Mr. President, there are but two clauses in the Constitution under which this proposition can be maintained. The first is the clause which gives to Congress the power to lay taxes, and the other the one which gives to Congress the power to raise armies. There are no others. I suppose all will admit that under the power to lay taxes there must be a uniform rule. You cannot tax one man specifically by a different rule from which you would tax another. You cannot say that one man is to pay upon his real and personal estate one rate of taxation, and that another man is to pay a different rate of taxation. You cannot say that a man who is worth $500 only is to pay five per cent. and the man who is worth $20,000 is to pay fifty per cent.

Mr. COLLAMER. The income tax law imposes different rates of taxation.

Mr. JOHNSON. They all go upon the same footing, though; but this proposition wants uniformity in this very vital particular. It not only does not include all who may have the incomes proposed to be taxed as far as the amounts are concerned, but it does not include a great many, or may not include a great many, who fall under the operation of the law itself. If a man having an income of $5,000 is drafted, and he thinks proper to go into the service, he would pay nothing. It is not proposed to make him do anything more in that case than to comply with the draft, to go into the field. He might be worth his $20,000 a year and yet he pays nothing.

Now, Mr. President, can this be done? Can you levy a different rate of taxation for the purpose of raising a fund to support and raise an army where one man is to pay upon his estate only one per cent. and another man is to pay upon his estate twenty per cent.? Can you do that specifically? He pays more by your general rule of taxation, because he has more with which to pay. If he has three farms, each farm is valued and each farm is taxed; but it is taxed by the same rate of taxation that he is taxed who owns only one farm. If the one farm is valued at $5,000 and you tax him two per cent., you tax him who owns three farms, each worth $5,000, two per cent.; but you cannot tax the man who owns one farm only two per cent., and say that he who owns three farms shall pay upon each of his three farms ten per cent.

No such rule of taxation ever has existed anywhere; and the Convention who gave to Congress the authority to lay taxes never dreamed that under that power Congress could discriminate between the rich and the poor as far as the rate of taxation is concerned. The proposition of the honorable member may perhaps be very acceptable to a majority of the people of the United States, because it may be that they would not fall within his rule. Then the result would be that they would control the legislation of the country, and controlling the legislation of the country they could impose taxes so as to bring all to the same level, destroy the property of the rich man by making him exclusively to support the Government. The Convention never contemplated a result of that sort. If they did not contemplate that as a thing to be done under the taxing power, it is to me very evident that they could not have intended that it should be accomplished under the authority to declare war and to raise armies, because the taxing power is given for the very purpose of enabling them to raise and support armies. When you are in the act of raising and supporting your armies and you go to your taxing power in order to enable you to do either, you are bound by the limitations to which the taxing power itself is subjected.

Nor is it true, Mr. President, in a political sense that there is any injustice in what is now being done. Each man, the poor as well as the rich, is bound to serve the country in time of war. If he happens to be poor, it only increases the misfortune under which he labored before he was called upon, that is, the misfortune of being poor; but it gives him no claim upon the rich as far as the Constitution is concerned; it gives him no right to say to the rich man, "You shall pay me for going into the Army, because you are able to pay me, and I cannot afford to go unless I am paid." As an application to the benevolence of the rich man, I can understand it; but as a right in Congress to draw the distinction, and make the rich man support the Army entirely, I cannot understand it. Where are you to stop? In the particular instance you are about to tax five per cent. on him who has an income of $1,000; he who has an income of $900 is not taxed at all. How do you know that the man who has an income of $1,000 is better off than the man who has an income of $900? What are the demands upon him? What family has he? What are the incumbrances? What does it cost him to live? He may be just as hard pushed to support his family out of his $1,000, and much harder put to it, than the man who has but $900, because the latter may have no family to support, and he is richer, therefore, in point of fact, than the man who gets his $1,000; and so in relation to each of the other classes to which the amendment applies.

I object to it, therefore, on the ground that it is wrong in point of principle. I object to it, because, so far as the honorable member's ground is concerned, the rich man pays now a great deal more than the poor man, because he is rich, and only because he is rich. He pays a great deal more on the estate which he has than a man pays who has no estate with which to pay. This is to take from the rich man who has an estate that you tax in every variety of form, because there is hardly anything that is not taxed; you make him pay an income tax of five per cent., or whatever may be the amount, and then you tell him that if he happens to be drafted, you give him the privilege of getting a substitute, for which he may have to pay four hundred or five hundred or a thousand dollars, and after he has done that he must place in the Treasury a fund out of which the Government can get just as many soldiers as they think proper. You had better pass by the system of substitutes and provide at once that all drafted men who have an income of $1,000, or any sum above $1,000, shall in the aggregate raise money enough to carry on the war.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN. I suppose that this proposition is not in the nature of a tax, but is intended to operate as a penalty on the drafted man to induce him to enter the service. As has been stated to-day, every man owes military service to the country when his service may be needed in the defense of the country. The names of all the able-bodied men in the country are enrolled and a draft is had to select the exact number for any particular exigency. It is the man that is wanted, and not money or material, and the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to make it inconvenient for the individual to evade that obligation. He will render it inconvenient for him to evade the obligation, to evade the performance of military service, first by requiring him to furnish a substitute, and in the second place by requiring him to pay a sum of money, which may be in the nature of a fine, in proportion to his wealth, in proportion to his substance, so as to increase that inconvenience on his part to stay out of the service. In voting, then, for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, I do not do it as a tax measure, but I do it for the purpose of inducing the drafted man to perform military service, for the purpose of making it inconvenient for him to evade the service; and in that view of the case it seems to me it is a very proper measure.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Harlan, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sumner, and Trumbull—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Bucklew, Carlile, Clark, Colman, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wade, and Wilkinson—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. In section six I move to strike out after the word "therefrom," in the fourth line, the words "or be discharged by reason of physical disability existing prior to such entry into service;" so that the section will read:

That the remainder of the term of service of any person who shall hereafter enter the military or naval service as a volunteer or drafted man, and shall desert therefrom, shall be added to the amount of service due from the district to which such volunteer or drafted man shall have been credited, and the same shall be filled up from such district by enlistment or draft.

I wish to strike out the words which I have moved to strike out, because I think the Government should be responsible for the examination that it makes in advance upon the question of physical disability.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask if it is not in order now to move a substitute for the first section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not while the amendment of the Senator from California is pending. The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from California to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I now offer the following as a substitute for the first section:

That all acts and parts of acts now in force providing for substitutions, or regulating the substitution of another for a person drafted into the military service, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2d Session.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 41.

I desire to state that I do not now suppose the Senate is prepared to adopt this amendment; but I feel it my duty to offer it, believing that the system of substitution has failed utterly to replenish the ranks of our decimated armies. I witnessed five weeks ago a scene which I will state to the Senate. I was invited to make a speech on the Sabbath day, at Benton barracks, in Missouri, near St. Louis. While speaking my attention was called to two or three hundred soldiers brought out on that day in the middle of the camp ground to hear my speech. I noticed that they were guarded with more care and more vigilance than if they had been felons. I inquired why that care and vigilance in guarding those soldiers, and I was told that they were substitutes, and that it was indispensable to guard them to prevent their running away.

A SENATOR. From the speech? [Laughter.] Mr. LANE, of Kansas. No; from the camp. They were very desirous to hear the speech, I will say to Senators.

The system of substitution, I repeat, has failed. It is necessary for us now to have soldiers to give the death-blow to this rebellion. If the system has failed, no Senator will deny that the burdens of this war now rest upon the poor and middle classes. I for one am desirous that the drafted man shall serve, and that the burdens shall be equalized. I will say to Senators that if they desire to replenish our armies they can do it by adopting the section which I propose as an amendment to this bill. It will encourage volunteering, and we shall not be troubled with a draft.

Mr. COWAN. I am obliged to object to this amendment for what I think will be deemed by this body at least sufficient reasons. If it should be adopted, I am not prepared now to say what would become of the Finance Committee. The honorable chairman of that committee [Mr. SHERMAN] is liable to be drafted. Suppose he is drafted, is he not to be allowed to put in a substitute?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Is he not exempt under the present law?

Mr. COWAN. No. The honorable Senator from Missouri, also a member of the committee, [Mr. HENDERSON], is liable to draft. Shall he not be allowed to put in a substitute? I do not know whether I could escape myself or not, but perhaps I might.

Mr. HALE. I want to inquire of the Senator from Kansas if those soldiers that had to be guarded while he was making his speech were any of those whom General Schofield imprisoned for hurrahing for Jim Lane. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I am not prepared to answer the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire. That there were soldiers imprisoned for that offense is undeniable; but I can assure the Senator from New Hampshire that a soldier in Missouri would now be much more liable to imprisonment for refusing to halloo for Jim Lane than heretofore for doing so. Since the emancipation and freedom of Missouri has been secured there has been a change in the feelings of the citizens of Missouri.

Mr. President, being desirous to record my name in favor of the proposition that I have offered in good faith and in sincerity, I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Doolittle, Grimes, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, and Ramsey—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Pennington, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Harding, Hicks, Howard, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wade, and Wilkinson—13.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the heads of Executive Departments, judges of the courts of the United States, and members of Congress, during their terms of service, shall be exempt from military duty.

I believe, sir, that it was a subject of some astonishment when it was discovered after the passage of the original conscription law that members of Congress were not exempt; and although no personal inconvenience has occurred to any one, I think the law ought to be distinct on this question. This law contemplates personal service, that the person drafted will go. I submit that a member of Congress, or a judge of the courts of the United States, or the head of a Department ought not, in view of the Constitution and the laws, to render personal service in the Army. It has been decided, I believe, by the House of Representatives, that a man cannot be a member of that body and at the same time hold a military office. He cannot serve the country in the Army as an officer and also in Congress. Certainly that decision is right; and I submit that the Constitution requires that there shall be Senators here and that there shall be Representatives in the other body, and that we cannot pass a law taking a Senator or a Representative out of either Hall. The Constitution provides that there shall be two Senators from each State, and that there shall be representation in the other body in proportion to the population, and that Congress shall meet on the first Monday of December, unless otherwise provided by law. There is no other provision by law; the Constitution then regulates the time of the meeting of Congress; it is our constitutional duty to be here; not only a privilege and a right, but a duty under the Constitution to be here at the time provided in the Constitution. Now, is it possible that the Executive can demand of members of Congress service elsewhere? Is it not the right of the district to be represented in the other House by the man whom the people may elect? Is it not the right of the State to be represented in this body by the Senators selected by the Legislature? It is not competent, then, I submit, for Congress to take away either from the district or the State the representation which the Constitution gives in Congress.

I have no concern personally about this matter, and care nothing for it myself; I do for some other persons. Here is my distinguished friend from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.] I should feel a sympathy for him if he should be drafted; but I do not choose to place the question on that ground. There is another objection, even if constitutionally we could provide that a member of Congress should be drafted. I submit that this power ought not to be given to the Executive. It was the contemplation of the framers of this Government that the three departments should be distinct and independent. Now, is it right to place the legislative department to any extent under the control of the executive department, or that the executive department under any circumstances shall take one single member out of this body or out of the other House? I submit that it ought not to be allowed. I think it has been an oversight up to this time; and clearly it would be a most mortifying spectacle to see the military officer take the judge off the bench of the United States courts. That judge is presumed to render as important service in the court as he could render in the field. That presumption applies to each member of this body. Whether it be true or not, it is unnecessary to discuss. The Constitution vests in this body its powers and devolves upon each member his duties. The powers are to be exercised here, and the duties to be discharged here at the time provided. I think there ought to be no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. I trust, sir, for one, that the amendment moved by the Senator from Indiana will be adopted. I believe with him that it is a matter of very great doubt whether it is competent for Congress to place one branch of this Government under the authority and power of another branch of this Government. I have no doubt, however, about the policy of any law which has that tendency, any law which when carried out might have that effect. I may cite a case in connection with the State which I have the honor to represent on this floor. The result of the draft has been very exhaustive there; there is pending a very heavy draft now, and it may so happen that in the draft which transpires a few days hence both the Senators from that State and every Representative on the floor of the other House of Congress may be taken and drafted into the armies of the United States. Now, I say that that is a condition to which no State should be subjected; and I say it is a condition to which the members of the legislative branch of the Government themselves should not be subjected, and I state frankly that it is a position to which I do not desire to be subjected myself. I have no hesitancy about this. I do not suppose that any one will accuse me of shirking the proper duties that devolve on me. I have already served out one term of enlistment in this war, having enlisted as a private soldier; and I therefore cannot imagine that any one will attribute motives of that kind to me; but I do feel that it is wrong; I feel that it is liable to effect still greater wrong, and I trust that we shall begin and make exceptions, as we shall have to begin hereafter to make them.

Another thing, Mr. President. I believe that if we are going to correct our military system, if we are going to put it on a true and a better basis than we now have it, we shall have to begin by making those necessary exceptions that are right for the civil service and for that portion of the business that cannot be conducted otherwise. Whenever you undertake to oppose the substitute system, whenever you undertake to oppose the bounty system, whenever you undertake to oppose this whole system by which money is put in the place of men, you are met with this simple assertion: "How are you going to do so and so?" Whenever you undertake to do that, you are met with the objection that you cannot carry on this, that, or the other branch of the Government; that you cannot carry on this, that, or the other necessary avocation of life. Now, sir, I say that if we are going to put our military establishment on the proper footing, making the proper exceptions, making the proper divisions, and giving to the country for its military service that which is requisite, giving to the civil departments that which is requisite, then we might as well begin now as at any other day to make those exceptions, and begin in the right place. I, for one, shall support the amendment which has been moved by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HENDERSON. I care nothing about the proposition pending before the Senate, but the remark of my friend, the Senator from Indiana, in regard to myself, makes it necessary that I should say a word. He seems to entertain some fear that I may be drafted into the service, and he, I believe, is the only Senator that seems to express any regret about it. He would be very sorry, I have no doubt. I am like my colleague from Missouri; I think it altogether likely that both of us may be drafted into the service in our State, especially if the quota now assigned to Missouri shall be drafted. But, sir, if it becomes necessary to go into the service, I suppose we both can go; and unless this question is settled in the course of a very short time, I shall be disposed to go, and not to furnish a substitute. I have been attempting here for the last three or four weeks to get a bill, of great interest to my State, before this body for consideration, but there are now some six or eight bills ahead of it, and I have been unable since I have been here this session to do anything for my constituents. I feel that I am doing nothing here for their good, and I do not know but that I may do some good in the service, and I do not know but that it would be well to draft me. Hence I shall vote against this amendment, so that there may be some possibility of my being drafted into the service. I am sure I can do some good in the military service, and I cannot see that I do any good here. I feel that it will be impossible for me to do any good here unless we very soon get rid of this proposition, in which there is nothing. There is not a thing in the bill now before this body. We have been discussing it here for two days, and I see nothing in it. I saw nothing in it when it was called up. I am willing to vote for it; I am willing to vote against it—any way in the world to get rid of it. If the Senator who so ably fills the post of chairman of the Military Committee insists upon it, I shall vote for it; but I care nothing about it. I do hope we may take a vote on this question, and let us get along with the business before the Senate.

Mr. BUCKALEW called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Pomeroy, Powell, Riddle, Trumbull, and Wright—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Collamer, Doolittle, Hale, Harding, Hicks, Howe, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Richardson, Salsbury, Sprague, Wade, and Wilkinson—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I propose to amend the seventh section by inserting after the word "service," in the thirteenth line, the words "and all persons who being duly enrolled shall depart the jurisdiction and go beyond the limits of the United States with intent to avoid any draft into the military or naval service duly ordered." It will be seen that the section now provides for disqualifying persons from holding any office of trust or profit who desert the military service. I do not see why the same principle should not extend to those who leave the country to avoid the draft.

Mr. CONNESS. I would remind the Senator that the act of desertion after a sailor or soldier is in the service is an act duly ascertained and proven, while the intent with which a man leaves his home and changes his residence cannot be so easily established. Why not require the person to go to the enrolling office and give notice there after his enrollment, and disfranchise him as proposed if he shall not do that? If you leave it to the proving of the intent I apprehend you will not disfranchise anybody by that means.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course it depends on the intent with which the party leaves. I think it would be a little severe, perhaps, to provide that a man shall be disfranchised on changing his residence unless he should report himself to the enrolling office.

Mr. CONNESS. He knows whether he is enrolled or not. Otherwise I submit that the proposition will not effect anything.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest an amendment in the same section, with the view of raising a question about which I have some doubt. I move to strike out all after the word "service," in the third line, down to and including the word "and," in the eleventh line. The words which I move to strike out are:

All persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the passage of this act, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their rights to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any of the rights of citizens thereof, and.

I am not clear that there is anything in the point I desire to raise, but it will be seen that the section provides for a penalty to two classes of persons; in other words, it applies to those who have deserted and to those who shall hereafter desert. The question I suggest is whether it is competent for us to impose this disability on persons who have heretofore deserted, whether it is not an ex post facto law, whether it is not fixing a penalty for an act already done.

Mr. GRIMES. It is removing the penalty.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Maine is mistaken, as I think, because the penalties are not imposed upon those who have deserted, if nothing else occurs, but only on those who have deserted and who shall not return within sixty days. The crime for which the punishment is inflicted is made up of the fact of an antecedent desertion, and a failure to return within sixty days. It is clearly within the power of Congress.

Mr. MORRILL. Then the Senator would make it depend on the fact of not returning. But the gist of the offense of course is the desertion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Deserting and not returning is the offense punished here. Besides, if this amendment is adopted, or anything like it, it will be necessary to alter the section in another particular, because the words proposed to be stricken out are the words in which alone the penalties are imposed, so that there would be no meaning to be attached to this section; for it would simply provide that all persons who shall hereafter desert the military or naval service "shall be liable to the penalties of this section;" and the penalties are in the words proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL. As I said in moving the amendment, I had great doubt whether I was right. I have accomplished all the object I had, which was to call the attention of the Senate to the subject, and I now withdraw the amendment.

Mr. COWAN. I wish to move an amendment to the last line of the third section in order to make it conform to the amendment already adopted on my motion. I move to strike out the words "martial or military commission" after the word "court," and to insert the word "aforesaid," and also to strike out the word "at," in the eleventh line, and insert the word "in," and also to strike out the word "such" in that line, and insert "the," so that it will read, "in the discretion of the court aforesaid."

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask the chairman of the Military Committee if it is very clear what is the meaning of that part of the third section which begins on the sixth line. The immediately antecedent part of the section provides for the punishment of him who shall furnish as substitute a drunken man, or an insane man, or a deserter; and then it goes on to say in the sixth line, "or who shall defraud or deprive any volunteer or substitute of any portion of the State, local, or United States bounty."

I do not suppose it is the purpose of the section to prevent the business of procuring substitutes. As I understand it, persons who are willing to become substitutes for the bounty enter into an agreement with some agent, or broker, whatever he may be, and agree with him that they will pay a certain proportion of the bounty, say fifty dollars. That agreement may be in writing. The service is rendered; the substitute gets his bounty money, and the fifty dollars goes into the hands of the broker, and then the substitute says, "I want that fifty dollars back."

Mr. CLARK. Put in the word "wrongfully."

Mr. JOHNSON. I was going to say, "illegally deprive." I think it better to insert that word. I move to insert the word "illegally" after the word "or," in the sixth line of the third section.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer an amendment in the form of an additional section, to come in immediately before the last section:

And be it further enacted, That before there shall be another draft in any State or Territory or in the District of Columbia, the Secretary of War shall cause to be made a correct enrollment of the present military population of such State, Territory, or District of Columbia, by counties, towns, wards, and other local divisions, by which said draft may be conducted, deducting therefrom all persons who may be exempt from disability or other cause; and each State and Territory and the District of Columbia, by subdivisions, as aforesaid, shall be credited with any excess in its favor above its quota of the preceding draft, and with all persons, white or black, who may have been resident and subject to draft therefrom, who have entered or may enter the military or naval service of the United States subsequent to the last preceding draft and before the next draft.

There are three points in this proposition. The first is that another enrollment shall be made; that before another draft shall take place there shall be a correct enrollment of all the military population of each State and Territory and of the District of Columbia. The second is that before a draft shall take place it shall be ascertained who are entitled to exemption from that draft; that these exemptions shall be made before the draft takes place. Heretofore, in our State at least, the exemptions from draft for military service were not ascertained until after the draft took place, and it produced a great deal of confusion, and I think is a very vicious principle. The draft ought to be from the population who are subject to military duty, and ought to be from that population exclusively, and therefore that population ought to be separated from all the people who are not subject to military duty before the draft takes place. The third point is, that where there was an excess in the smallest local division by which drafts took place at the last draft, that excess shall be credited to that locality in the ensuing draft. Now, I will read a short letter from the provost marshal of my county, that will show the necessity of this proposition so far as relates to that county, at least:

"Sir: In reply to yours asking the number of negroes who have joined the Army from this county, I submit the following remarks:

"I have the names of seven hundred and two who have left the county since enlistments commenced. At least a hundred more have left since, and are to be added to this list. Captain E. H. Moore, the provost marshal of the district, informs me that this county has a credit only of two hundred and five in his books for negro enlistments."

The county of Bourbon has sent into the Army upward of eight hundred negroes. The entire negro military population of the county have been swept from their owners, and yet the county has been credited with only two hundred and five negro recruits when it is entitled to about eight hundred. The military population of that county, white and black, amounted before the last draft to about twenty-two hundred men. Since that draft took place nearly one half of the aggregate military population of the county have been taken into the Army. As a matter of justice and of law the county ought to be credited with all the negro soldiers that have been enlisted into the Army. It has not received that credit. If it was to receive that credit it would be exempt for the next draft, and for a draft after the next; because there is no locality I presume in the United States, unless it be in some of the large slaveholding counties of Kentucky, where half the military population, including whites and blacks, has been mustered into the service.

This is not a single isolated case applying to the county of Bourbon alone; but there is something like the same disproportion of negro military population that has gone into the Army from all the counties in that State, and there has been the same omission to a greater or less extent to give to those counties the proper credits for the negro enlistments.

I do not propose to enlarge upon this proposition, but to state merely these facts, in order that the Senate may apprehend and appreciate the justice and the necessity of the proposition that I make. Is it right that a draft should take place in that county when about half of its aggregate military population at the last draft has already joined the Army? Certainly not. How is this to be avoided? Only by giving the county the proper credits for the military enlistments in that county, both black and white. That has not been done.

The remedy that I propose is embodied in this amendment, that a new enrollment of the entire military population of that county, and of every local district in the United States which is subject to the draft, shall be made, and that that locality shall receive a proper and a full credit for all the enlistments that may be made in it, whether they be negro or white enlistments.

I hope this amendment will be adopted—no, I will not say that I hope it; indeed I indulge in no such hope; but I say that it is a matter of the plainest and the most imperative justice that that county and every county which has given a redundancy of military enlistments to the Army, whether those enlistments be white or black, shall receive their full and proper credits. I ask for nothing more. I call for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Davis, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle and Wright—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Hale, Harding, Harris, Hicks, Howe, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Willey—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out the seventh section, and I wish to say but one or two words on this motion. It seems to me to be very clear that this section proposes to punish desertions which have already taken place, with a penalty which the law does not already prescribe. In other words it is an ex post facto criminal law which I think we cannot pass. It is that "in addition to the other lawful penalty for the crime of desertion from military or naval service, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, and who shall not return" within sixty days after the passage of this law, shall be punished by being stripped of all the rights of citizenship and be denied the right to hold an office of trust or profit under the United States. One of the penalties known very well to the criminal laws of the country is the denial of the right of suffrage and the right to hold offices of trust or profit.

It seems to me this objection to the section is very clear, but I desire to suggest further that this section punishes desertions that may hereafter take place in the same manner, and it is known to Senators that one desertion recently created is not reporting when notified of the draft. A person drafted is notified of the fact, and if he fails to appear within a certain number of days, he is a deserter. He may have a sufficient excuse for that; it may have been impossible for him to appear; but he is declared to be a deserter under existing laws. I submit to Senators that it is a horrible thing to deprive a man of his citizenship, of that which is his pride and honor, from the mere fact that he has been unable to report upon the day specified after being notified that he has been drafted. Certainly the punishment for desertion is severe enough. It extends now from the denial of pay up to death; that entire compass is given for the punishment of this offense. Why add this other? It cannot do any good.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as a substitute, was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator from Kentucky will allow me to submit a motion that all prior orders be postponed with a view to take up the joint resolution fixing the duty on printing paper.

Mr. POWELL. I wish to make such a motion myself, and I cannot yield the floor. I move that all prior orders be postponed and that Senate bill No. 392, for building a bridge across the Ohio river, be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Several SENATORS. Oh no, we will vote it down.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The question was put on Mr. POWELL's motion and it was declared not to be agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to make an appeal to the Senator from Kentucky on this subject, if he will allow me to do so. I am for the measure which he desires to take up, which I believe is to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Ohio river. I think he will gain nothing by making it a special order. We have had a pressure of business for some time past, but we can get on now. I think the Senator can get his bill up at almost any time, unless he antagonizes it with an appropriation bill.

Mr. POWELL. I believe every Senator in this Chamber is for my bill except one; but that does me no good. I can never get it up for consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the Senator pursue his own course.

Mr. POWELL. What good is it if the whole Senate is for the bill when I cannot get it up? It was made the special order for yesterday, but did not come up.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 14, noes 19.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senate seems to be in an amiable frame of mind, and I therefore beg leave to ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill with a view to reference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object until the order of business is settled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill cannot be received. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it in order now to move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 359?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not quite now, because the precise question before the Senate is on a motion to postpone the prior orders and take up a particular bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. I see that my friends from Ohio and Kentucky will never get through with this difficulty. I have been laboring for three weeks to get up the bill for Missouri, the number of which I have given, and I am satisfied that if we can get it up it will take but a short time. I make my suggestion merely to settle the difficulty between my two friends. I see there is some excitement on the question, and I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill I have indicated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not now in order.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to make one suggestion to the Senate in regard to this matter of the priority of business. I see that several gentlemen desire to get up bills to-day, I suppose for the purpose of leaving then as unfinished business. I desire to say that that will do them no good, because at one o'clock to-morrow we have to go to the House of Representatives to count the presidential votes, and everything will be displaced.

Mr. SHERMAN. The unfinished business will come up.

Mr. CLARK. No, the unfinished business will lose its place, like everything else.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I understand that the unfinished business of to-day will come up at one o'clock on the next.

Mr. CLARK. I do not understand that it will.

Mr. SHERMAN. In all candor to the Senate, I must say that I do not think they ought to place me in this position. I am here as the representative of the Finance Committee, desiring to get up a public measure. I cannot engage in a struggle with Senators who simply desire to get up bills in which local communities are interested. That is the condition of the honorable Senator from Missouri, who is a member of the Committee on Finance, and of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. All I desire is to have the general legislative appropriation bill placed in a position where it can be considered without this continual struggle in regard to the order of business. If that bill is now taken up and fixed for any hour and day which may be named, I will not make any further struggle. That is all I desire.

Mr. CLARK. Let us fix it for half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not in order now to submit the motion I desire, because the Senator from Kentucky is before me, although I believe I was on the floor first; but I do not complain of that.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not make the bill the special order for Thursday, at one o'clock?

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot make any motion in regard to it until the pending motion is disposed of.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. That will unravel the difficulty.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 7, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WILLIAM G. SHELDON.

On motion of Mr. HULBURN, the Committee on Public Expenditures was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William G. Sheldon for relief; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question upon the motion I made yesterday to postpone for two weeks the bill (H. R. No. 602) to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw that demand a moment and allow me to make a statement.

Mr. DAWES. I would also request the gentleman to withdraw the demand that I may make a statement to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire?

Mr. DAWES. I desire to present to the House some reasons why I think they should dispose of this bill at this time, either by passing it or by a final vote of some kind. Will the gentleman withdraw his demand to allow me to do so?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to know more particularly the gentleman's purpose.

Mr. DAWES. I will renew the demand for the previous question, or make any other motion the gentleman may suggest.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand and allow me to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to consider some appropriation bills.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will withdraw the demand and allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to make his statement.

Mr. STEVENS. Will not gentlemen postpone this matter for the present, and allow some public business to be disposed of?

Mr. DAWES. How much time will that consume?

Mr. ASHLEY. I would suggest that this matter be passed over informally for the present, as the committee on the rebellious States have not had an opportunity to consult with each other since the passage of the constitutional amendment. I make that suggestion, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to interfere with the appropriation bills, if by general consent this bill can be postponed to a particular hour when I can submit some views and present some reasons why I think there should be some early action upon it, as early as possible. That arrangement would be agreeable to me, and I should not then interfere with the appropriation bills. I suggest that we postpone the bill until three o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. STEVENS. It will come up as a matter of course.

Mr. DAWES. Should I be considered as having the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will be entitled to the floor on the motion to postpone.

Mr. STEVENS. I now desire to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on an appropriation bill.

Mr. DAWES. Let me inquire what would then be the condition of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Whenever legislation shall be resumed in the House, the reconstruction bill will be the prior special order.

Mr. DAWES. Upon which I should have the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have the floor on the motion to postpone; but the debate is limited simply to the question of postponement, and does not extend to the merits of the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to be heard particularly on the question of the postponement of the bill. I desire, however, to submit some remarks to the House on the merits of the bill, for the reason that the Committee of Elections, of which I am a member, have reports to make that have been kept back for want of some disposition being made of this bill. They are reports of importance which ought to be disposed of if this bill becomes a law. I am aware of the rule—

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule on the subject.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"A motion to postpone, under the practice, admits of but very limited debate."

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of the rule, and therefore I appeal to the House to permit me to submit some views upon the merits of the bill. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] will withdraw his motion to postpone, I will agree to renew it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor upon the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I will now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] if he will permit me to resume the floor whenever legislation is resumed in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to claim the floor whenever the bill comes up.

Mr. DAWES. Then I do not desire to impede legislation on the appropriation bills.

THE ASSAULT UPON HON. W. D. KELLEY.

Mr. BEAMAN. I rise to a question of privilege. I am instructed by the select committee appointed to investigate the assault upon WILLIAM D. KELLEY, a Representative in this House, and an alleged breach of privilege, to make a report, together with the testimony taken in the investigation. I ask that the same be printed.

I am also instructed by the committee to report two resolutions; and I propose to call them up as soon as members shall have had an opportunity of examining the report. I ask that the resolutions be read.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending the House, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of A. P. Field, convicted of a breach of the privilege of the House in the attempt by language of intimidation and bullying to deter WILLIAM D. KELLEY, a Representative in this House from the fourth district of the State of Pennsylvania, from the free and fearless exercise of his rights and duties as a member of Congress and voting and deciding upon a pending subject of legislation, and in following up said attempt at intimidation and bullying by an assault upon the person of said Representative KELLEY, and forthwith bring him to the bar of the House; and that thereupon the said A. P. Field be reprimanded by the Speaker.

Resolved, That so much of the resolution of this House of the 5th day of December last, granting the privilege of the House to the claimants for seats from the State of Louisiana, as applies to the said A. P. Field, be rescinded.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed, together with the testimony.

PAY OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to yield to me for a moment, that I may make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for a moment.

Mr. WILSON. I report back from the Committee on the Judiciary Senate amendments to bill H. R. No. 583, entitled "An act to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled 'An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes,'" approved July 17, 1862. The committee recommend that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and appoint a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on the Judiciary recommend that the House non-concur and appoint a committee of conference. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Messrs. WILSON, WADSWORTH, and ECKLEY were appointed as the committee on the part of the House.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceed to the consideration of the special order, the fortification appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ROLINS, of New Hampshire, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, bill (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The bill having been read, was read again by clauses for amendment.

The Clerk having read as far as line thirty-nine,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I have not a specific knowledge with regard to the appropriations proposed in this bill. But I see that their amount is enormous. I would ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means what is the total amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot state the total amount.

Mr. BROOKS. I have estimated it roughly at about five million.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] estimates it, by running it over casually, at $5,000,000.

Now, sir, I do not know but that these appropriations may be necessary to be made at this time; but I do know, that if it be not absolutely necessary for the public defense that this stupendous appropriation of five or six million dollars should be made now, it ought not to be made until prices become somewhat lower than they are now. Were our financial affairs again upon a specie basis, one half of this amount, perhaps less than one half, would accomplish as much as the whole amount will do now. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether he does not believe that these appropriations can be cut down with safety to the public interest.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means, in looking at these large appropriations, felt disposed to cut them all down, and we had resolved to do so, unless upon a full examination we should be convinced to the contrary. We sent for the chief of the Engineer Department, General Delafeld, who seemed to us to be the most intelligent man whom we had before us from any Department; and after a full examination, consuming the whole of one morning, he convinced the committee that all these appropriations were necessary, in view of the new species of guns that have been adopted. He stated that changes in all the forts had been made necessary, in order to adapt them to the new ordnance mounted upon them, and that, if our defenses were to be of any use, these appropriations were in accordance with the lowest estimates that could possibly be made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inquire of my friend from Pennsylvania whether the Committee of Ways and Means inquired into the merits of this new system of ordnance by which these large appropriations are rendered necessary. Did the committee inquire whether this change, involving so vast an expenditure was proper to be made at this time?

Mr. STEVENS. The committee had no other information than that derived from the officers having charge of this Department. General Delafeld assured the committee that, in the new state of affairs with regard to warfare, naval as well as land, the old guns were of no use, and that new guns must be placed in all the fortifications, and new arrangements made.

Mr. BROOKS. I merely wish to say that intelligent, scientific, and highly cultivated gentlemen, occupying positions at the heads of Departments, feel naturally much esprit du corps, and are desirous that the fortifications of this country shall be put in a condition fully as strong as any in the Old World, which cannot be done without very great expense. I think, therefore, that the recommendations of these officers should always be looked upon with somewhat of distrust.

What I wanted to ask the gentleman, however, was whether the committee had taken into consideration the change of fortifications from stone to dirt. From demonstrations which have recently been made in the course of the war, earthen fortifications are now regarded as far superior to stone fortifications. I desire to ask whether the committee have taken this fact into consideration.

Mr. STEVENS. That matter was fully inquired into; and one of the reasons, as given by General Delafeld, for these large appropriations, was the fact that changes in the structure of fortifications, by the addition of dirt, had been rendered necessary, as well as changes in the kind of guns, and in the mode of mounting them, the old guns being now entirely useless.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to ask one further question; and that is, whether the Committee of Ways and Means have consulted naval officers with respect to the question how far monitors or armed iron batteries may in some instances dispense with the necessity for these fortifications—whether armed iron batteries, like the Ironsides, stationed in our harbors, are not likely to do away in a good degree with the necessity for these fortifications.

Mr. STEVENS. In considering this bill we not only consulted General Delafeld, but we had before us some naval officers. They are not, I believe, very sanguine at present in favor of these iron-clad monitors as a sure defense against the vessels of Europe. I do not understand that any of them, except Admiral Porter, who is a gallant officer, are very sanguine. We believe, from all we can hear, that if we are to make defense against foreign nations these fortifications are necessary.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I understand the chairman of Ways and Means to say that new guns are to be substituted in the fortifications for the old, and I desire to ask him what kind of new guns are to be used. Whether the old fashioned cast-iron gun is exclusively to be patronized, or whether a door will be open for the introduction of the improved wrought-iron gun.

A wrought-iron gun has of late been constructed by a Mr. Ames that will cast a missile seven miles, and which may be discharged ever so many times without bursting, and I hope it will be the policy of the Government to introduce into the service a reasonable number of guns of that kind of construction.

Mr. STEVENS. From the best information I understand that a contract has been made for fifteen wrought-iron guns, which have been fully tested, at least one of them has been, and is supposed to answer the purpose. Fourteen of these guns are waiting inspection, and have been waiting inspection for three or four months. The Department is occupied with other things to such an extent, and is so short of help, that it cannot send an officer to inspect them. So they remain uninspected and unpaid for, although finished according to contract.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. These wrought iron guns, as I am well informed, throw seven and a half miles, and can be fired twenty thousand times without bursting; and I think that the policy of the Government requires that this kind of guns should be put into service instead of cast-iron guns, which have proved to be more dangerous at the breech than at the muzzle. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I agree with my friend from Connecticut in some respects. I believe that these guns have been fully tested, and that one of them has thrown a ball seven and a half miles. At least such is the report. Fifteen were contracted for and the remaining fourteen have been finished for some time, but have not been inspected.

Now we cannot in a general appropriation bill undertake to regulate the action of the Department; we must leave that to them. I hope that they will find an engineer in the course of the coming summer, or fall, or next winter, who will find time enough to inspect these guns so that we can use them before the war is over. Whether it will or not, I do not know.

Mr. WILSON. I want to know whether the contract for these guns was made in advance of any appropriation by Congress, or whether it was authorized by any action of Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. There was a general appropriation for ordnance—for no particular gun; but under that a contract was made for fifteen of these guns. One of them, as I have already said, has been received, tested, and paid for.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to know whether any money to be expended for these fifteen wrought-iron guns is to come out of the appropriation under this bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not suppose that it will. This does not propose to go for paying for these guns, but for the changes made necessary in fortifications by these changes in the ordnance used.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then, Mr. Chairman, in addition to these appropriations, which, instead of being $5,000,000 are $7,010,000, there are to be further and additional appropriations to pay for new guns to be mounted upon these fortifications.

Mr. STEVENS. We have made appropriations already for the ordnance itself. I believe that is all I have to say.

Mr. McBRIDE. I move to insert the following:

For completing the fortifications at and near the mouth of the Columbia river, the sum of $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, some two hundred thousand dollars have been appropriated during the last two or three years and expended upon fortifications at that point which are not completed, and I was very much surprised on examining this bill to find that no provision had been made for them. I think that the extent and exposed situation of the commerce on that northwestern coast demand that something more should be done. It has been recommended by the Military Department. I am surprised that it has not met with favor from the Committee of Ways and Means. I hope that it will commend itself to the House, and that the amendment will be passed.

Mr. STEVENS. I would be willing to vote for anything recommended for that point unless I thought it extravagant. We have gone according to the estimates, and if we have overlooked this recommendation the gentleman can have it hunted up and the amendment made in the Senate. We hardly feel ourselves justified in inserting anything of this kind, in these times, which is not asked for by the Department. Sometimes we feel great reluctance in putting in what they have recommended, as we did in reference to many matters in this bill, and we sought to evade doing so after a long examination, but we could not do it. I hope, therefore, the gentleman will withdraw his amendment, and get a recommendation for it from the Department, and then get the amendment inserted in the Senate.

Mr. McBRIDE. I desire to state a single fact. Our coast is a thousand miles in extent from San Francisco north, and not a single dollar is appropriated for fortifying that long line of coast. We have two hundred miles of British coast north of us, which is strongly fortified. Our portion of the coast is the most exposed, and not a dollar is expended for defending it.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to know whether he has examined to see whether there is not a surplus of former appropriations unexpended for that purpose.

Mr. McBRIDE. All the information I have is from officers there, and they are very anxious upon the subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I think it unsafe to put in the amendment here; but if upon examination it shall appear that there is no surplus of appropriation unexpended, and the Department is of opinion that the appropriation should be made, it can be inserted in the Senate.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to amend by striking out lines seventy-five and seventy-six, as follows:

For defenses of Washington, $500,000.

I think we have reached that state of the war when we may dispense with this appropriation of $500,000 for the defenses of Washington, and therefore I move to strike it out.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know that it is entirely proper to tell what the general commanding informed us was the condition of a certain portion of our fortifications around this city, for if there should happen to be another rebel raid in a week or two, the enemy might take advantage of the information. There is a double row of fortifications on the west, so that if one row is broken through the city can be defended by the other. These double rows should be made efficient all around, and this appropriation is for that purpose in part. This is all I think necessary to say at present.

Mr. BROOKS. If I felt it necessary to incur the expenditure of half a million dollars for the defense of the city of Washington I should be the last person to move to strike out this appropriation. It seems to me that in the present condition of our affairs, instead of sending forth to Europe, as we do by this appropriation, that it is necessary to expend half a million dollars for the defense of our capital, it would have a much better effect if we could devote $500,000 to remove the defenses around our capital. I have no idea that another rebel raid will ever again approach within sight of this Capitol. I am quite sure in my own mind, unless there is utter inadequacy in the administration of our military affairs, that that period had gone by; and instead of adding anything more to the defenses of Washington, and making a fortified city of this, like Paris, Vienna, and Berlin, I hoped the time had about come when we could do away with all these fortifications. They are monuments of our civil war which I do not desire to perpetuate, and which I do not desire to preserve one hour longer than necessary for our own defense.

But if it becomes necessary to further defend this capital, there is a reserved military power in the hands of the Administration of this Government to do as we have done heretofore. From the funds now in their hands they can make a sufficient appropriation to make the present fortifications efficient. I would not object if it was proposed to expend fifty or a hundred thousand dollars for the protection of existing fortifications; but this large sum of half a million of money, in the existing condition of our affairs, seems to me entirely unnecessary, and a quasi confession on our part that we do not at this day and hour feel ourselves safe from the guns of the enemy in our own capital in the city of Washington. I hope the appropriation will be stricken out.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not feel as much confidence in the total annihilation of the armies of the South, perhaps, as the gentleman from New York. I did expect, to be sure, I did hope, that the late proceedings would have produced peace. It was very promising for a while—promised on that side of the House, promised elsewhere—but those promises have not been fulfilled, and I understand the war is to be resumed with renewed vigor. We know what we have witnessed in sight of this Capitol, and I know of no reason why we may not see the same thing again. I have no idea that the South will ever have force enough to make a permanent impression upon the North; but with this vast country of ours it is impossible to guard it all at once, and with their energy and skill they may take advantage of our position here and invade us in our own capital, unless we allow the proper fortifications to be made, which are required by the authorities who have charge of the business. I do not believe that a single dollar of this money will be expended unless it is necessary. I suppose that if a state of things exists which renders it improper that the money shall be expended, it will not be expended. I hope, therefore, that we shall grant this amount, so that in case of failure it shall not be the fault of Congress.

Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw my amendment, and move to strike out "$500,000" and insert "$100,000" in lieu thereof. In support of that proposition, permit me to say that I do not believe the rebel army contemplates ever again approaching the city of Washington; and if I am correctly informed respecting the recent proceedings which have taken place near Norfolk, Virginia, between the President of the United States and the Secretary of State, and certain persons said to be commissioners of the confederate States, the rebels themselves do not propose further aggressions upon their part upon us, but on the contrary were ready to accept an armistice from us, if we were ready to propose it, with a view forthwith of consulting their people during the cessation of hostilities between us and them. This is the information which I get upon the subject, and I suppose that I have means of information as correct as any gentleman upon the other side of the House, for my information comes in a good degree from gentlemen intimately connected with the Administration upon that side. If, then, it is true, as stated, that an armistice has been proposed upon the part of the confederates, and that the armistice has been rejected by us, prima facie evidence at least exists that it is not the intention hereafter of the rebels to enter upon any acts of invasion against us, but on the contrary that they contemplate mainly their own defense. I take it for granted that in the present condition of the rebel army, with Sherman on one side, and Thomas on another, and Terry on another, surrounded by the anaconda as they are at present, the most that they can possibly contemplate is the protection of their own territory and their own forces, and that they can never contemplate any invasion of Washington. I do not expect ever again to see or to hear of the rebel flag within sight of the dome of the Capitol at Washington.

My main object in offering this amendment is not so much to save $400,000, but to have a declaration of this House, a vote of confidence from the Representatives of the people, to be proclaimed abroad to the whole world, that a crisis has arrived in our public affairs when we no longer need half a million dollars, or three or four hundred thousand dollars, to defend these legislators here upon the Potomac river, but that our confidence in the ability of our Army and Navy is such that we can cease to fortify the capital. I wish the declaration to go forth to the world that Washington no longer needs, what the capitals of the Old World need, to be protected from the invasion of their own people or their own civil wars, but that we have reached a period when we can throw down our fortifications and rely upon the brave hearts of our soldiers and sailors fully and adequately to protect this capital from any contemplated invasion by the enemy. Watched as this country is by foreign ambassadors and representatives and correspondents of the foreign press, I should look upon the insertion of such a provision as this in an appropriation bill at this period of the war as a declaration of a want of confidence in our power to protect our own capital; while, if it is stricken out, I shall look upon it as a declaration to the whole world of our ability to maintain this capital without making any further appropriations for fortifications for its defense beyond what may be necessary for repairs; I shall look upon it as a declaration to the whole world that no such further appropriation is necessary.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, doubtless the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has more information than I have upon the subject of the negotiations that took place recently at Hampton Roads; but from the account which I have read, I have been unable to perceive that there was the least disposition upon the part of the rebels to consent even to an armistice except upon the basis of absolute independence, and when the negotiations terminated, it was, as I read the account—and I suppose that the same account has been read by the gentleman from New York—distinctly understood by both parties that the war was to be resumed exactly as if the conference had not taken place.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my understanding of this provision of the bill is diametrically opposite to that of the gentleman from New York. He seems to think that if we adopt this appropriation it will be a proclamation to the world that we are fearful of some further aggressions, and that it will be an exhibition of weakness. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, I hold that the war will be more speedily ended if we now proclaim that we are preparing and ready to fight out this war if it should continue for the next twenty years; and I would not have it appear on the face of our legislation that we are to relax our front in the least, or that we are to be fooled or diddled by anything less than absolute submission on the part of the rebels to the terms which have so frequently and authoritatively been proclaimed. I think that if we should adopt this appropriation, instead of its being regarded as an evidence of weakness either here or abroad, it will be an evidence on our part that we mean to wage this war at all points to a successful and triumphant close.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Chairman, in view of the position which this House has assumed with regard to the Monroe doctrine, I feel myself constrained to differ with my colleague, and to sustain this appropriation of $500,000. I think that all the arguments advanced by my colleague with regard to presenting a bold front and relying on the bayonets of our soldiers, apply with great force in regard to the rebellion, and that we may rely upon the spirit of peace which has recently shed its benign influence upon the Administration and its followers. But, sir, a new danger threatens the country, a danger from abroad; and if we propose in this House or through the country to sustain the manly position which we have assumed by our votes in reference to the Monroe doctrine, it hardly becomes us at this moment to take from the Administration the sinews of war, and the means of holding a defiant front against the principle of Dei gratia, and the system of monarchy that is now being reestablished in the southwestern section of this continent. The time has come when no public measure looking toward the policy of this Administration in foreign or domestic relations should induce us for a moment to close our eyes to the importance of being prepared, vi et armis, to carry out the foreign policy which the predecessors of our present President laid down in the face of European aggressions upon the American continent. The period has come when the continental system of Monroe is to be the established principle of a united people. I believe that, by a proper spirit of conciliation, by a broad-minded, statesmanlike policy, founded on suitable appeals to the sympathies of Americans for the rights of Americans, we may reunite with us the armies that now march under the southern cross, and with combined energies we may repel at once the encroachments of European power upon the American continent. With these views, and not in any spirit of cavil or objection, I must maintain the propriety of the appropriation now under consideration, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendment of Mr. Brooks was rejected.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to amend by striking out in line eighty-three "$300,000," and inserting in lieu thereof, "$150,000." It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that an appropriation of $300,000 "for surveys for military defenses, and for purchase of campaign maps," at this stage of the war, is an enormous sum. It strikes me that the ordinary appropriations for the Army embrace the services included in this item. Under the circumstances, I think that an appropriation of $150,000 would accomplish all that is required; and the remainder of this sum might very properly be applied to the increase of pay of those officers below the grade of captain, in the Army, who, it is well known, are now suffering in consequence of the inadequacy of their pay.

The amendment of Mr. Townsend was rejected.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For survey of northern and northwestern lakes, including Lake Superior, $125,000.

Mr. BROOKS. I want to know whether that is an appropriation for internal improvements, or for the military service.

Mr. STEVENS. It is for surveys for military purposes.

Mr. BROOKS. Does not that belong to the legitimate duties of the Coast Survey bureau?

Mr. STEVENS. The surveys of the Coast Survey are intended for the purposes of commerce and navigation.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not think that we have a satisfactory explanation of this appropriation of $125,000 for the survey of the northern and northwestern lakes, including Lake Superior. It is a large sum for surveying, especially when we have a Coast Survey at an expense of over half a million dollars. If I could arrive at the full expense of the department I have no doubt that it would be more than that sum.

Mr. ELLIOT. If the gentleman from New York will pardon me for a moment I will state that the Coast Survey has never extended its labors to the lakes at all; and the duty of caring for the lakes has been imposed upon the topographical bureau of the War Department. This appropriation has always been made for and expended under the War Department, and these surveys have been made by the topographical bureau of that Department.

Mr. BROOKS. I am aware of that. The annual expense of the Coast Survey is over five hundred thousand dollars. I think that I am $100,000 too low; but I have no means of making any accurate calculation, for the estimates of that bureau are made up in a way that defies all ordinary arithmetic. What I wish to suggest is that the duty of the Coast Survey should be extended so as to embrace the survey of the lakes. Lake Superior is an ocean of itself. I think that the Coast survey should incur these expenses. But, in a time of war like this, can $125,000 be necessary for the survey of the northern and northwestern lakes? Michigan is pretty well surveyed, and Ontario and Superior cannot require so much.

Mr. GANSON. I move to insert the following:

For repairing, equipping, and enlarging Fort Porter, $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, I propose that for the reason that I do not see any appropriation made for putting the forts above Niagara falls in any condition of repair. It has been reported to the Department within the last year that Fort Porter is in no condition whatever as a means of defense, and that repair and enlargement of that fort are necessary. In line ten of the bill $50,000 is appropriated for repairs of Fort Niagara, near Youngstown, New York, a fort below the falls, and $100,000 for Fort Ontario, Oswego, New York.

Now, sir, we have within a few days passed, by a large majority of this House, a bill, which I opposed, for a military canal which is to touch Niagara river above the falls and enter that river below those falls. That was proposed and passed as a military measure. All the vast commerce upon that canal will be exposed to inroads from the opposite shore. This Fort Porter is located upon the shoulder, at the foot of the lake, and the head of the river, commanding the entire Canadian shore. The fort is out of repair and it ought to be repaired and equipped.

There is no reason why this appropriation should be withheld. I think that there has been some mistake in a recommendation for this work not having been sent to the Committee of Ways and Means. I ask the chairman to allow the amendment to be inserted; and if there is anything wrong about it I will see that it is stricken out in the Senate. It has been recommended by the officer employed by the Navy Department to inspect this fort. He made a special report, which I have seen.

Mr. STEVENS. We put in all that the Department recommended. If they had recommended this, we would also have inserted it. It is much easier to have it inserted in the Senate than to insert it here, and have it stricken out there.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to gratify the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but this appropriation is manifestly right, and was omitted by an oversight.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I ask that it may be read, and then perhaps the gentleman from New York will accept it.

The substitute was read, as follows:

For repairs of the public works, such as forts, piers, and breakwaters at the mouths of the harbors of the northern and northwestern lakes, $300,000.

Mr. GANSON. I cannot accept that as a substitute. I prefer to have a vote upon this specific amendment in reference to Fort Porter, for I know the public interest requires the appropriation, and I know I could satisfy the House, from the report made by the Department, if I had time, that this appropriation ought to be made.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw my substitute.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire to say but a word upon the subject of the amendment proposed by my colleague from New York. I find that in the present bill $100,000 have been appropriated for the repair of Fort Ontario, at Oswego; and I am confident that the work alluded to by the gentleman from Buffalo requires repairs to a greater extent even than Fort Ontario at Oswego. It is at the foot of the lakes, where the vast commerce of the West reaches the point where the waters of the lakes connect with the tide-waters of the Hudson. There is no protection for that commerce by way of forts. This position commands the Canadian shore and the Niagara river, and I am confident that the importance of Buffalo alone, without respect to the immense commerce of the lakes, demands that this improvement should be made, and the expenditure incurred. It is just to the people of the great West that their property and interests should be thus protected; and unless we put this fortification in complete repair, I know not what contingencies may arise, or what accidents or damages may result. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be adopted.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I would like to inquire of my colleague who offered this amendment, if this Fort Porter is one of the defenses of the city and harbor of Buffalo; or is it further down the lake, at the mouth of the river?

Mr. GANSON. It is on the shore of the river upon the bluff where the elbow is formed by the junction of the river with the lake. Beneath this eminence passes the Erie canal, and the fort is necessary for the protection of that. It commands the opposite shore. Fort Erie is upon the other side. It defends Buffalo harbor, the Erie canal, the New York Central railroad, and all the communications between the West and the East upon which the products of the West are transported. There is no point, in my judgment, so important to be defended as this, and it is a gross oversight upon the part of the Department that an appropriation was not recommended for it. If I had time, I know I could satisfy this House, from the special report of the Department, that this is a necessary amendment. I have offered it in good faith, and I hope it will be seriously entertained.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I made the inquiry merely for information, and I am perfectly satisfied with the reply.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I now move to amend by inserting the following:

For repairs of the public works, such as forts, piers, and breakwaters at the mouths of harbors, on the northern and northwestern lakes, $300,000.

I wish to say to the committee that last year Congress appropriated $250,000 to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War for the purpose of repairing works of—

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a point of order. This is a fortification bill, and the amendment does not refer to fortifications.

Mr. SPALDING. The bill includes forts and other fortifications.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is not in order.

Mr. SPALDING. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WILSON. I would call the attention of the Chair to some items in this bill; for instance, in line thirty-seven is an appropriation for a seawall on Great Brewster's Island, Boston harbor, Massachusetts, $40,000.

Mr. STEVENS. That is a fortification.

Mr. WILSON. There is nothing in the bill which shows that. There are several other similar items.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Iowa that no objections were made to those items, and therefore they were passed.

Mr. WILSON. I make the suggestion for the purpose of sustaining the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. STEVENS. The appeal is not debatable, is it?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

The question being, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. SPALDING called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPALDING and Mr. GANSON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 44.

So it was decided that the decision of the Chair should stand as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to take up bill of the House No. 663, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was taken up, and read in full.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by clauses for amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. I find on line forty-six a provision for "expenses of courts-martial, military commissions, and courts of inquiry." I avail myself of this opportunity to say that in my judgment it is quite time that these military commissions east of the Potomac and north of the Ohio river were dispensed with, and that the ordinary courts of law should be substituted for these military commissions. The military commissions which have been created here in this city have, some of them, been more oppressive than any of those which disgraced English history; and the recent decision of the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, settling certain principles of law, is one which, in my judgment, would have disgraced the age of Jeffreys. But I avail myself of this, the only opportunity that I have, to say to the President of the United States that in the present state of feeling east of the Potomac and north of the Ohio river, I hope he will exercise his prerogative to do away with the disgraceful, dishonorable, disreputable transactions in these military commissions. The record they have made the future and the existing historian will be obliged to conceal and gloss over if not to erase from the page of American history.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no doubt it is very disagreeable to have one's friends tried by court-martial and cashiered. I have had one such experience, about which, at first, I felt very much aggrieved; but after reading the evidence I did not say a word about it. The idea that you can do away with courts-martial in time of war is a novel idea in the history of nations. There may be great injustice done by these courts, as there is by all courts occasionally, sometimes through mistake, sometimes through ignorance, seldom, I think, through design. Whether the President should do away with these courts, as advised by his friend from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] is for him to consider. One thing I am sure of, and that is, that the people of these United States, the loyal people of these United States, have rather censured him for the facility with which he has pardoned and released those who have been convicted.

There was a case in my own State to which attention was called the other day by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Dawes,] in which a horse inspector, I think, had dealt largely in fraudulent transactions and had been tried by court-martial. To what was he sentenced?

Mr. DAWES. The court sentenced him to the restitution of $26,000 embezzled, a fine of $5,000, and to be imprisoned for two years, and until the $5,000 and the $26,000 were paid, if it did not exceed in all five years.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that the goodness of the President—I am not censuring him, perhaps; I say perhaps, because I have no right to do so—has remitted all of that sentence except six months' imprisonment. Am I right?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that it was the goodness of the President. I inquired for the record in order to ascertain the facts. The record stated that by order of the Secretary of War the sentence was commuted to suspension from pay and rank for six calendar months.

Mr. STEVENS. Now, sir, after that sentence of the court, I think that that remission was remarkable.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to add, if my friend will allow me, that I understand that the same individual is pressing a private claim of $81,000 against the Government.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, he will be paid.

Mr. STEVENS. I think it likely he will get it. I do not know whether the President or the Secretary of War is kind enough to suit the gentleman from New York, but I am inclined to think that he is rather too lenient toward some of these malefactors and rebels. I find no fault, however.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask my friend from Pennsylvania if he approves the principle of trying civil offenses by military commissions, where the civil courts are open and the course of civil justice is unimpeded?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; but I have not heard of such cases.

Mr. GANSON. It is done daily in this city, and it is done all over the country. Persons in civil life, and committing civil offenses, are being continually tried by military commissions. I am informed by the Military Committee that there are, within sight of this Capitol, thirty-five persons, arrested in Ohio and other States on the charge of counterfeiting the currency—a mere civil offense, for which they could be indicted, tried, and punished by the ordinary civil tribunals. I understand that military commissions in Maryland have even gone so far as to try persons for counterfeiting the confederate currency.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I think they ought to be hanged if they spent their time in such worthless labor as that. [Laughter.] If gentlemen will examine these matters I think they will find that there is some connection between them and the military service of the country. Where private citizens have been tried before courts-martial it has been for their operations in military affairs, for matters connected with the orders of the War Department. I do not certainly approve the trying of purely civil offenses by military tribunals; but I think that the gentlemen from New York are mistaken, and that there are some facts in the cases with which they are not entirely acquainted.

But, Mr. Chairman, I merely rose to say that while I have no doubt there are many mistakes made and hardships arising from the great number of men whom we are obliged to watch, yet I think those mistakes are as few as could well be expected; and I think that the benignity of the President in the exercise of his pardoning power goes sometimes to an extent that ought not to be censured, certainly by those who oppose these military tribunals. I do not know whether any of us ought to censure him; but I am not certainly able to applaud the remission of the sentence in the case I have referred to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by inserting, after line eighty, the following:

Provided, That the President shall dismiss no officer in the military or naval service of the United States, unless upon the finding of a court-martial convened according to law: And provided further, That any officer who shall be reported by his commanding officer absent without leave for twenty days, in time of war or active hostilities, may be dropped from the military or naval service by the President, for that cause assigned, by proclamation; but on the application of the officer so reported and dropped, stating a sufficient defense, under oath, against such charge during the whole absence to the day of application, the President shall convene a court-martial and try him on that charge; and if it acquit him, he shall, on approval of the sentence, stand reinstated; and if the sentence be disapproved for a legal cause, another court shall be ordered for his trial, by the order disapproving the former finding: And provided further, That the President may suspend any officer in the military or naval service, without pay or emoluments, in time of war or active hostilities, who shall be reported by his commanding officer or the Secretary of War for any flagrant offense, for which, under the Articles of War, dismissal or death is a legal punishment, and, in the opinion of the President, ought to be so punished; but the order of suspension shall specify the charges and convene a court-martial for the trial of the officer thereon, within ten days from the date of the suspension; and if the court shall not assign dismissal or death as the punishment, the officer shall stand restored to his rank, pay, and emoluments from the date of the suspension, subject to the sentence of the court-martial: And provided further, That section seventeen of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a question of order. This bill is one making appropriations for the support of the Army. The amendment is a new measure for regulating certain things in reference to the Army, and ought to come properly from the Military Committee. I believe it did come from that committee last session.

Mr. GARFIELD. The amendment is one regulating the use of the money appropriated.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, yes; a good deal more than regulating that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I agree with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in reference to this question of order as an original question; but the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union has twice decided recently on similar provisos that they were in order. The committee that considered the naval appropriation bill overruled the decision of the Chair ruling such a proviso out of order. I thought the decision of the Chair was right then, and the decision of the committee wrong. I think so still. Now, I shall go with my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] in ruling out this amendment, and endeavoring, if possible, to keep the rules of the House unimpaired. We really have not many rules now; but the whim of the House appears to be the only rule.

Mr. STEVENS. We may have been wrong then; but we will correct our action now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We had better.

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair the amendment is out of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the Chair if the amendment would be in order to any bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be in order, but not to an appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw the amendment, but I am very anxious to get it in somewhere.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to amend by in-serting after the word "duty," in line one hundred and eleven, the following words:

Provided, That their commands are actually serving in the field, and the rolls of their companies show them to be actually up to the minimum standard fixed by law.

I will state my reason for offering this amendment. I have learned from a reliable source that of the eleven regiments organized under the law of 1861, nine of which were infantry regiments, one cavalry, and one artillery, upon the French standard of twenty-four hundred men, there are actually very few in the field at this time. Very few of those regiments now have their minimum standard of rank and file. Yet the officers of those regiments are receiving full pay. Many of them have easy places away from the field of battle. At this time the Army is in want of soldiers, and the President has issued his call for three hundred thousand men. I propose by this amendment to offer to the officers having charge of those regiments a reasonable and honorable stimulant to fill up their quotas, so that the President of the United States will not be obliged, in violation of those feelings of humanity which control him in all his actions, to call for another draft, without having any fixed and regular basis for the quotas to be furnished by the respective States and districts. While the people are constantly being called upon to send forward men, many officers who are receiving full pay are actually almost without commands.

I offer my amendment in the sincere spirit of reform and for the benefit of the Army, and to prevent the onerous and fearful consequences of the draft. If gentlemen of the Committee on Military Affairs would condescend to explain facts within their knowledge, or if members of the House would allow such proper inquiries to be made of the War Department as would bring the facts correctly before us, I believe that all I have said would be substantiated. Yesterday, when I endeavored to secure from this House permission to present a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War to state the basis upon which the quotas have been assigned to the respective States and districts, I was cut off by an objection, without reason and without argument. I believe that this is a question of the most vital importance. I believe that the adoption of such a resolution is due to the people of the country, due to the dignity of this House, due in consideration of the spirit which actuates the President himself; and I believe that it is due to the Secretary of War, that he may explain to the whole country why he has kept us so continually in the dark with regard to a matter which has been consuming the blood of the country, without system, law, or reason, exhibited to the people who are the sufferers.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we have already laws in regard to the subject embraced in this amendment. I think that we have not sufficient understanding of this matter to justify us in adopting the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CHANLER. Let me explain to the gentleman. There are officers whose commands number far below the standard fixed by law, officers whose regiments are mere skeletons without soul or body. The object of the amendment is to induce such officers to raise the number of their commands to the proper quota.

Mr. STEVENS. The effect of this amendment, as I understand it, would be that if an officer's regiment were not quite full, although very nearly, he would get no pay; an officer not actually in the field, engaged, for instance, here at the capital, would receive no pay. The motive of the gentleman from New York in offering this amendment may be very proper; but it strikes me that the gentleman can best accomplish his object when we come to consider the amendments to the enrollment act.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following, to come in as a proviso to this bill:

Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be paid for the purpose of paying any railway company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States where such company may have accepted a grant of lands from Congress upon condition of furnishing said transportation free of toll or other charge, except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, the subject of this proviso has been before the House several times during the Thirty-Seventh and Thirty-Eighth Congresses. During the Thirty-Seventh Congress the House directed the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire whether any of the railroad companies whose railroads have been constructed in whole or in part by donations of land from the United States, accepted such donations on the condition that the troops and munitions of war of the United States should be transported over such roads free of charge; and if so, what railroad companies have received donations of land on the considerations aforesaid; and whether such acceptance of lands so donated conferred upon the United States the unqualified right to the free transportation of troops and munitions of war over such roads by the companies owning the same; and, if not, the character of the limitations on such right. That subject was fully considered by the Committee on the Judiciary during the second session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and it made an elaborate report through Mr. Porter, a member of that committee, and that report concluded with the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the several railroad companies which have received from States grants of public lands, made to such States by acts of Congress, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the roads of such companies respectively, are required to transport the property and troops of the United States over their roads free of toll or other charge whatsoever."

That was the conclusion of the committee, and that resolution was adopted by the House. Subsequently the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] introduced a resolution, which was also adopted, that the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House whether any payments have been made to either of the following-named railroad companies, the Illinois Central Railroad Company, the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company, or the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company, for transporting property or troops of the United States since the 25th day of February, 1862, and if any such payments have been made, the amount paid to each company; and also the amount paid to each of said companies prior to the above date, and the basis on which said payments have been made; and that he also inform the House what claim, if any, the said companies, or either of them, have against the Government for the transportation of property or troops, and which are still unpaid.

In answer to that resolution the Secretary of War sent a communication to the House, under date of March 2, 1864, in which he gives a statement of the several amounts paid to the various railroad companies mentioned in the resolution as having received grants from the United States on the condition that troops and property of the United States should be transported free of charge. The amount stated in the answer of the Secretary of War is as follows:

Amount paid Illinois Central Railroad Company.....	$307,809 50
Amount paid Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company.....	3,453 85
Amount paid Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company.....	40 66
/Total.....	$311,304 01

After that letter was received, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] introduced a series of resolutions that the several railroad companies which have received from States grants of public lands, made to such States by acts of Congress, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the roads of such companies, respectively, are required to transport the property and troops of the United States over their roads free of tolls or other charges whatsoever; that this House approves and reaffirms said resolution; that the Secretary of War be directed to require the said companies to repay to the Treasury of the United States the sums of money so paid to them respectively as aforesaid, and to decline to make any further payments to said companies for any transportation hereafter or heretofore required of said companies by the War Department; and that a copy of the preamble and resolutions be transmitted by the Clerk of this House to the Secretary of War.

There the case rested, so far as the action of this House was concerned, at the adjournment of the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress. Since that time it appears that other attempts have been made, and a resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] calling for information on the subject, and the Secretary of War sends in answer to that resolution the following:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, January 27, 1865.

SIR: In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th instant, inquiring whether or not any payments have been made to the Illinois Central railroad since the passage of the House resolution of the last session of Congress, and if so, how much, and by what authority, I have the honor to state, first, that payments have been made to the Illinois Central railroad since the passage of the resolution referred to; second, that said payments, as reported by the Quartermaster General, amount to the sum of $552,597 40; third, that they have been made by authority of the President of the United States.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Now, sir, the amendment I have proposed is for the purpose of preventing any money appropriated by this bill being used for the purpose of paying those companies when they have received already an equivalent for these services. The law requires them to transport free of charge. They accepted upon that express condition, as is shown by the debates which occurred on the bill making the grant to the Illinois Central railroad when it was pending in Congress. I will read an extract from the report:

"The committee have no doubt that these several acts render it incumbent upon the companies, respectively, which accepted the grants of public lands, themselves to transport over their roads, to the full extent of their ability and means of carriage, the property and troops of the Government free of toll or other charge whatsoever. The same ingenious refinement which could limit the right of the Government to the transportation of its property and troops to a mere free right of passage over the road, with means of transportation to be furnished by itself, could restrict the right of the Government to have the United States mail transported on these roads at such price as Congress might direct, to cases where the Government itself furnished all the means of transportation. In neither instance is it in mere words expressed by whom such means shall be provided."

"The act of September 20, 1850, granting lands to Illinois, is understood to have been framed by Mr. Douglas, who introduced the measure into Congress. On the 29th of April, 1850, when the bill was under consideration in the Senate, Mr. Bradley moved an amendment, to limit the grants of lands to the alternate sections, within six miles of the road, not already sold. Mr. Douglas, after remarking that if the amendments should pass, he did not know whether he should vote for the bill, and that he should hardly regard it as worth contending for, said, 'It [the land] is granted on condition that we make and complete a railroad the whole length of the route, and put it in operation within a period of ten years; and on the further condition that we transport over it the Government troops and Government property of every kind free; and further, that the mails shall be carried at such price as Congress shall prescribe.' Mr. Dayton, of New Jersey, who opposed the bill, did not venture to question this interpretation, but replied, 'But what is this thing? The compulsory conveyance of troops and munitions of war. What will that amount to? Compulsory to carry the United States mail for a sum which the Government of the United States shall prescribe! The United States will pay a fair price for it. Every man knows that the Government will not act meanly and bigly, and the only good contained in the provision is to prevent any act of extortion from the Government.'"

It will be seen from the position taken by Mr. Douglas, when he was asking Congress to pass that act conferring on that railroad company this immense, this magnificent grant of lands, that he asked it upon the express condition, agreed to by the company, that it should be received as compensation to the company for such transportation as it might furnish the Government for troops and property belonging to the Government.

But, sir, the companies by some means, I know not what, have induced first the Secretary of War to override this law, and when his act was met by a resolution of this House, then they induced the President of the United States to override it; and they were paid an additional sum amounting to almost double that which had been paid when the House first took action upon the matter. I insist that our appropriation bills shall be so guarded that neither the Secretary of War, nor the President, nor any other officer of the Government, shall appropriate money to uses which are prohibited by law; and nothing more and nothing less can be said of these payment made to the several railroad companies mentioned in this bill. The law forbids it; the action of the House forbids it; several resolutions of the House declare that such payments shall not be made; and yet, in violation of all this, and of the express understanding between the Government and the company at the time, money is appropriated to pay for services which have already been paid for. I therefore hope this committee will place this amendment upon the bill in order that no more payments of this kind shall be made."

Mr. BROOKS. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I have no doubt that technically his construction of the law incorporating the Illinois Central railroad is right; but as a member of Congress at the time the act was passed, and hearing the discussion upon the subject, I had no idea that Congress ever contemplated a civil war, and that the transportation of the munitions of war mentioned and intended in that bill were intended as connected with foreign wars. Civil war was never contemplated; and the immense amount of work the Illinois Central railroad has been compelled to do was never contemplated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman state how much the stock of the Illinois Central railroad has been enhanced since the war commenced?

Mr. BROOKS. I think I have seen it quoted at one hundred and eight or one hundred and nine.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It was eighty when the war commenced.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the gentleman from New York that the point which he makes is not the one made by the company. They acknowledge that the condition requires them to furnish the road over which this transportation might be made, but that they are not required to furnish the rolling stock for such transportation. They acknowledge that the limitation extends to this war as well as to all others.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would inquire of my colleague if he knows what amount the Illinois Central Railroad Company has received from the sale of lands granted by Congress, and what they estimate the remaining lands to be worth.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know. I am informed by a gentleman from Illinois that it amounts to $20,000,000.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. The company have already sold lands amounting to from twelve to fifteen million dollars, and the unsold lands are estimated to be worth from twelve to fifteen million more; making from twenty-five to thirty million dollars that will be derived from that grant.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to ask my friend from Iowa what those lands were worth before the company built their road and increased their value.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. That is not the question I am discussing. I am speaking of the amount of money that railroad company have received from that grant.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. That is not the question the gentleman ought to discuss. Is further debate on this amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I am not willing to sit quietly by and see this amendment adopted. I think the reasoning of the gentlemen on the other side, who urge this amendment, is most unfair and most unreasonable. I presume that at the time this company accepted their charter, with this provision in it, no man in this broad land contemplated the state of things we have witnessed during the last three years. No company on earth would have accepted such a charter in view of what has been transpiring for four years past. It is a fact that the Government has been employing the Illinois Central Railroad Company for the transportation of troops and munitions of war, and have been paying them something for it, under a contract made with the company; but it is a fact which gentlemen cannot dispute, that within the last year that company has been doing that business for the Government at a loss of $240,000 over and above their actual outlay. They have been as fair as gentlemen could require them to be, for they have kept faith with the Government.

My colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] asked the question a while ago, how much the value of the stock of that company had advanced during the war. I answer him that the stock of that company is not worth as much to-day as it was before the war broke out. Recently, in view of the diminished value of our currency, it is quoted at higher figures than it was formerly. But it is not quoted to-day in our currency at so high a figure as it was before the commencement of the war.

And now a word in reference to the question propounded by the gentleman from Iowa a while ago as to the value of these lands. Sir, those who know anything of the condition of the interior of Illinois at the time this work was commenced know that these lands were comparatively valueless, and those who are honest and willing to do justice must admit that their increased value is due to the building of this great central thoroughfare, by means of which those lands could be brought into cultivation and their products conveyed to market.

Again, sir, what did the Government lose by this grant of lands? Not a dollar, for the price of every alternate section was doubled, and the Government got all the money that it could possibly have got if it had sold all the lands at the Government rate of $1 25 an acre and had not granted any to the Central railroad.

I repeat that when this grant was made no man contemplated the state of things that we have had for the last four years. The fact that the President and the Secretary of War have seen fit to give to the Central Railroad Company something for their immense outlay of money in procuring laborers and stock to facilitate their military operations, is but an evidence that they were not inclined to do what my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] would do, play the Jew and exact the last pound of flesh from this company. It is unjust, it is unreasonable; and the effect of the passage of this amendment would be totally to break down this Central Railroad Company. The Government would have to take the road and run it themselves, and run it at a much greater expense than the company can run it for, considering the prices they now receive for the transportation of troops and munitions of war. During the last four years of civil war there has not been a day upon which the Government has not been transporting troops or munitions of war over this road, and it is unreasonable that the company should be compelled to do it without some sort of compensation.

Gentlemen may think that among a few of their constituents who do not look into this question they may make a little capital by favoring this amendment, but in doing it they will do injustice to one of the greatest enterprises of the Northwest, and are welcome to all the glory that may gather around an effort thus to destroy that great enterprise, one of which we feel proud, one which has opened up the wilderness through central Illinois and made it bloom like a garden; they are welcome to all the glory they can gather from such a course.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am a little surprised at the observations on this subject which have just fallen from my colleague, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN.] He evaded the issue raised by the proviso we are discussing, and proceeded to a defense of the Illinois Central railroad, a corporation of gigantic proportions, and which is grinding to the earth the people of our State. I think if the defense he has just interposed in behalf of this railroad had been known before the election he would not have obtained quite as many votes as he did on the line of the road for Congressman at large, and I believe he only came within thirty-two thousand votes of being elected.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I believe I got as many votes along the line of the railroad as my competitor did.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know that. I know his competitor beat my colleague by thirty-two thousand majority.

But I propose, Mr. Chairman, to address myself to the committee for a moment on the subject of the amendment of my friend from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.] I am aware it touches a matter in my own State, and it may be thought that an Illinois man should not array himself against a great interest there. But, sir, I do not propose to have my lips sealed on a question of this character, however local those interests may be to my State, but I shall speak incidentally of the character and the management of this corporation. I know the power and influence of this mammoth railroad company, running through the entire length of the State; but while I represent that constituency that has so long honored me with its confidence and support, I will stand up here and defend their interests. Not only shall my constituents, but the people of the whole State, find in me a mouth-piece to defend them against oppression, regardless of consequences to myself. In view of the management of this road since the breaking out of the rebellion, it is now only known by its oppressions and extortions upon the people along the line of it. It has raised its rate of fare enormously, five, six, and even seven cents per mile for passengers. I myself have, within two months, paid within a fraction of seven cents per mile fare on this road. And freight, too, has been raised in nearly the same proportion, adding a most burdensome, odious, and intolerable tax upon all my constituents who have to use the road, and it runs through the entire length of my district. I charge that the rate of freight and fare on this road, which was built by the magnificent bounty of the Government, and which the honest and industrious farmers of the State have chiefly to bear, is utterly outrageous, and ought not to be tolerated if it can be helped. I speak for the people of the State, and not from any personal grievance, for I have none.

But to the point of amendment before us. The act of Congress granting the land to build this road had in it the express condition, as has been shown so unanswerably by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] that all Government property, arms, munitions of war, &c., should be carried by the company receiving the grant free from all toll and charge. In the last Congress this precise question was up. It was reported that this Illinois Central Railroad Company had been charging and receiving money from the Government for doing the business which it was bound to do without pay. The question was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary—a committee distinguished for its ability, and having in it not only the best legal talent of the House, but of the country. That committee did not gloss over the important question presented to them with a hurried and imperfect examination. They gave it a full and thorough examination, and Mr. Porter, of Indiana, one of the very ablest lawyers in the House, made an elaborate report from the committee, and pronounced its conclusion by the resolution at the close of the report, and which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] read. That resolution denied the right of the road to charge the Government for carrying its property, troops, &c. The report was adopted unanimously by the House; not a single member dissented from its doctrines. It was the opinion of the House deliberately declared that this railroad company had no right to make this claim.

It appears, however, Mr. Chairman, that very large amounts of money have been paid to this road, notwithstanding the House has repeatedly declared that nothing ought to be paid, and requesting that if anything had been paid it should be recovered back. At the last session the House reaffirmed the judgment of the previous Congress, that nothing was due by the Government to the road for this service, and requesting the Department not to pay anything more. There had already been paid more than three hundred thousand dollars for this service. And yet, regardless of that resolution, I know not on what grounds, and of course I will not attempt to speak in regard to it, instead of paying no more to this company, instead of taking measures to get back the money already paid to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, a further sum of $552,000, more than half a million dollars, has since been paid to that company. A gentleman near me suggests that the Secretary of War in his letter says it was paid by order of the President. If the company had not the right to this money by law, the President had no more right to order its payment than I have. I believe it is a constitutional provision that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury without warrant of law. I do not know the reasons that induced the President to order this payment. I have no doubt the reasons were satisfactory to him, and perhaps they would be satisfactory to me if I knew them. I know that the President is governed by the highest and purest motives, and that he would do nothing but what he believed to be right. But I think it very likely that he and I should differ in opinion on this subject, and there is certainly no man on earth more tolerant of a difference of opinion than the President.

But my colleague [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] has spoken of the benefits of this railroad to the State. That is not the question we are discussing. The question is whether the law shall be obeyed and this company held to its bargain with the Government. This company has one of the most stupendous franchises and by far the most valuable franchise that has ever been obtained in this country. I wish I had the figures here, as shown us by its reports, as to the almost incredible value of the property of the company, of its lands, and of its road. And yet it comes before the Government and claims and receives, in defiance of the judgments and order of this House, nearly a million dollars of the people's money, which my colleague's constituents and the constituents of us all must pay. And by whom is this road owned, and where is our money going? Sir, it is not owned by American citizens, but it is mostly owned by British bond-holders, men living in a country that is the hereditary enemy of the United States, exhibiting to us its deadly hostility in every way. Who can tell whether or not a part of this vast sum of money paid to this company by our Government has not been paid to British bond-holders and invested in pirate ships to drive our commerce from the ocean—the commerce of the great city of New York, represented in part by the gentleman [Mr. Brooks] who has spoken in mitigation of this transaction?

I have spoken of the property of this company; of the vast amounts of land owned by the company. This land is now held at such high prices as to prevent to a very considerable degree that immigration which would have come to our noble State had they put down their land to reasonable figures. Does my colleague uphold this company in thus putting up their land, and its generally oppressive management? Does my colleague wish to keep immigrants from coming into our State by justifying this company in putting up the land to such high prices to the settler? Does not my colleague know that this corporation has already been arraigned this very winter before the Legislature of our State for alleged frauds upon the law? Does he not know that this whole subject is there undergoing investigation, and that the Legislature, acting in behalf of the oppressed people, is groping round in search of some remedy or redress? What claim, I ask, has this road upon the votes or the sympathies of the Representatives of the State of Illinois in this House?

I have seen that the Legislature has arraigned this road for its dealings with the State, and let me tell my colleague that unless it shall reform its accommodations and management, and lower its rates, it will be arraigned at the bar of an enlightened and inexorable public opinion in that State. Why, sir, I have right here before me a paper published in the city in which I reside, which shows how my own immediate constituents are treated by this mammoth monopoly, and the losses which the people in my own city and county are suffering by the management of this company. This paper says that there are at Galena seven hundred car loads of oats, and twenty-five car loads of pork awaiting shipment to Cairo for Government use. It says further:

"There are also three hundred car loads of miscellaneous freight here for Chicago, making in all over one thousand car loads of freight ready to be shipped as soon as cars can be had. Estimating that an average of ten car loads per day could be sent off, it would take nearly three and a half months to clear out this vast amount of freight, to say nothing of what would accumulate in the mean time."

"At Duaneville there is an immense winnow of oats, in sacks, piled up out of doors, extending all the way from the dry bridge, below the old packet office, up to the elevator. The company has no place to store them, and if a heavy rain should come, there would be nothing to do but to let them soak."

That is the way in which the people are treated by this road, not only in my own town, but I believe at nearly every depot upon the line of the road in my district. The company have failed to use the means in their power to accommodate the people; and when the people complain, they are told, "Help yourselves if you can; build a rival road if you are not satisfied with what we do." And the president of the road told me in this very Hall, not more than three weeks ago, that "if the Illinois members of Congress sat here silent when their road was being interfered with they would charge forty cents a mile for passengers." Sir, they may charge me forty cents per mile passage. I shall not only not be silent, but will always raise my voice as long as the rights of the people of Illinois demand a vindication at my hands.

I trust that the committee will adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, and prevent any further payments from being made to this company; and I trust that further legislation will be adopted which will recover from that road what it has obtained from the Treasury, as I think, unlawfully.

Let me, before concluding, reply to one remark of my colleague on the other side, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN.] He said that if we did not pay this company, in violation of law, (I say "in violation of law," because every man about here has said so, and the House has said so time and again,) the company cannot run the road, and the Government will have to take it in its own hands. Sir, I am tired of that kind of talk. It would have been well if the Government had taken possession of the road long ago. The Government could have run the road vastly better than this company have run it. I hope that the committee will not be influenced by such suggestions. The Government is abundantly able to run the road, and run it in such a manner as not only to indemnify itself, but give satisfaction to the people of the State. But it is all idle for the company to talk about turning over the road to the Government. It never intends to do it. All such talk might be regarded as intending to influence in the matter before us.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no quarrel with the Illinois Central Railroad Company, nor any other company; and I regret that my colleague saw fit to introduce this amendment. Sir, this question has wide bearings. It affects my State as well as the State of Illinois. We have four land-grant railroads now in the market seeking to raise money on their bonds, whereby they may go on with the construction of their roads, so that they may meet and become a part of the great Pacific railway, which will link us with the mines and the Pacific as a mutual benefit. What do we propose now? It may be true that we have these companies in our power; but shall we inflict upon them an act of injustice because they seem to be in our power or we have the law technically on our side?

Mr. WILSON. If my colleague will allow me to interrupt him, I would like him to state how much money was paid to the Mississippi and Missouri Railroad Company up to the time when this report was made by the Secretary of War.

Mr. GRINNELL. I know that it was a very small amount.

Mr. WILSON. Forty dollars and sixty-six cents.

Mr. GRINNELL. But since that time they have done work for the Government to the amount of thousands and tens of thousands of dollars, and will be called on for much more.

Mr. WILSON. Has the Government paid anything to that company, in addition to that sum, since the House acted upon the subject?

Mr. GRINNELL. I do not know how that is, but I know that if the Government has not it ought to have done so. It is but just and right that it should have done so.

Mr. WILSON. Then I wish my colleague to state whether he desires the officers of the Government to obey the law.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire that the Secretary of War shall follow the construction of the law as made known to him by his constitutional law advisers.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to my colleague that even the company does not question this construction of the law, that their road is to be used free of charge or of toll for this transportation. The only point they make, and the only one which was made to the Committee on the Judiciary, is that while they have furnished the road the Government should furnish the rolling stock.

Mr. GRINNELL. Hon. John A. Dix is the president of the road, and I am informed that he made a proposition to the Government in regard to the carrying of troops and munitions of war. "Yes, gentlemen, here is the road; go and use it—use it as much as you please." Then another question arose, whether the Government should furnish the rolling stock and the men to operate it. There was the question. It was believed by those whose duty it was to interpret the law, it was believed by the Secretary of War, it was believed by the President of the United States, that it was never contemplated, and that it would be the grossest injustice to compel these roads to furnish and work the rolling stock.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman from Iowa whether the grant made to this company was in the same terms as that to the Illinois Central railroad. Were the Illinois and Iowa railroad grants made in the same terms?

Mr. GRINNELL. I think that the wording was the same, or nearly the same, for all the roads.

This is the point I make: it is not my idea of political economy in a time of great civil war to take advantage of these useful and necessary railroad corporations. I do not believe in that kind of economy. I regard it rather as injustice—a wrong to those who have been and are now in the service of the country as public carriers. We have an interpretation of the law by the Secretary of War, and we have an interpretation by the President of the United States, and I am willing to stand by that until we have an authorized decision to the contrary.

In my opinion the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has gone out of his way to declare that our enemies abroad control the Illinois Central railroad. I believe that his prejudices are so strong that he has not taken the trouble to inquire in regard to the stockholders of this road. I do not think that he knows who they are. I am assured that one of the best and most influential friends this country has had abroad, I mean Richard Cobden, is one of the controlling directors and a very large stockholder in the Illinois Central railroad. Why, sir, if we could give him a present of millions for his labors in our behalf we should not overpay him for what he has done for us as a representative of our cause abroad.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why, then, does not the gentleman bring and put it upon that ground? Why not make a specific appropriation?

Mr. GRINNELL. But I am not alone; for the interpretation I have given of Richard Cobden commends itself to every fair man. He deserves much at our hands. His friendship was early and has been lasting, firm as the hills, and I am not willing, connected as he is with this road, to strike at him and his friends unheard.

Mr. WILSON. There is one point I fear that my colleague will forget, and I desire to call his attention to it; that is, that during the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress he voted for several bills, one at least—the road upon the line of which he lives—confering additional grants of land, upon the express condition contained in the Illinois Central Railroad grant; and that after the House had taken this action, after this construction had been placed upon it, and after the House had directed that this money should be recovered by the Secretary of War from those companies.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee then informally rose.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill (S. No. 411) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia," in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House; that it had concurred in the following resolution of the House:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the Committee on Commerce on the part of the Senate be joined to the Committee on Commerce on the part of the House in the investigations in which said Committee on Commerce on the part of the House are now engaged, under resolutions of the House of January 20, 1865, and January 25, 1865, in regard to trade with the States in rebellion, to constitute a joint committee for the purpose of completing said investigations, and that the said joint committee have the same powers as the Committee on Commerce of the House now has on the subject of said investigation; and that it had appointed Mr. TRUMBULL teller, on its part, to count the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WILSON. I was remarking that my colleague voted for those land grants containing precisely the same conditions that were contained in other grants. I also voted for this grant, and I intend, while that remains the law, to require those companies to live up to the conditions of the grant to which they assented, and I shall not stand here asking this appropriation of public money in violation of that condition after Congress made the grant upon the condition that the companies should perform that service free of toll or charge.

Mr. GRINNELL. I was opposed to that condition, and I stand by the vote I then gave. I do not believe the interpretation which has been put upon the condition is right, and if it is a right interpretation I believe the enforcement of it now would be wrong.

Mr. WILSON. Did not the gentleman vote for the bill to which he refers?

Mr. GRINNELL. I voted for it, but I want a fair interpretation of it.

Mr. WILSON. Has not that construction been placed upon it by the House, and acted upon by the Secretary of War?

Mr. GRINNELL. It has not been placed upon it by the Senate; and I propose to leave the law there to take its course.

Mr. THAYER. Will the gentleman tell me what the construction of the law is?

Mr. GRINNELL. My construction is this: that under its provisions the land-grant roads are required to furnish the road. That they have furnished, and if the Government wants to transport troops and munitions of war, there are the roads, and let it use them. The companies do not believe they are required to furnish the rolling stock and operate it to such an extent as would lead to their bankruptcy.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman will allow me a little further, I desire to ask him whether the language of the proviso which has been referred to does not in express terms require them to carry for the Government troops and munitions of war free of toll; and whether the word "carry," or any equivalent word will be answered by what he now suggests as a substitute for it, to wit, that they shall give the Government the privilege of carrying?

Mr. GRINNELL. I will read the fourth section of the act:

And be it further enacted, That said lands hereby granted to said State shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof for the purposes aforesaid, and no other; and the said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from tolls or other charges upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

"Free from charges or free from tolls." Run your trains every hour, and no tolls can be collected, none would be asked.

Mr. THAYER. Is the company willing that the Government should take possession?

Mr. GRINNELL. Whether willing or not, the Government can do it. But I can answer the gentleman in behalf of the Illinois Central Railroad Company. So far as this, I am told, they are willing that the Government should take possession of their road, rather than do all the Government work without pay and trust to a generous and future action for their reward.

Mr. THAYER. I would like to ask the gentleman how, in his opinion, the conditions of the grant are to be performed by the company; how, in other words, the United States is to get the consideration for the grant of the land. Now, I suppose he will concede that those were not idle words; that the Government of the United States never intended to transfer those large and valuable bodies of lands to these companies, and to couple that transfer with a condition requiring them to perform a certain service, and that they did that without attaching any meaning to it. I would like the gentleman to state frankly how he proposes that these companies shall perform their contracts which they entered into with the Government of the United States when they received these lands.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will answer the gentleman in all frankness. He asks how the Government received a consideration for the grants. I answer, by receiving double price upon each alternate section of land. The Government really gave nothing, while the country got much.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman misapprehends my question. How does he propose that the condition shall be executed by the companies, the condition being that they shall carry Government troops and munitions of war free of charge?

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman mistakes the language of the section. That is not the condition; it was that all Government transportation over their roads shall be free.

Mr. THAYER. Does the gentleman propose to surrender the roads to the United States in order that they may transport the freights themselves?

Mr. GRINNELL. It has been proposed by the railroad companies from the beginning to surrender their roads to the Government.

Mr. THAYER. Then that is a different proposition entirely.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. GRINNELL. In one moment; I wish to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania first. There is this further consideration. In addition to putting a double price on the alternate sections, in the case of the Illinois Central railroad, seven per cent. of the gross earnings of the corporation go to the State of Illinois; and has not every portion of the United States an interest in building up a State so that we may tax it, so that there may be population to bear the burdens of government in peace and in war?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to ask my friend if he speaks for the Illinois Central railroad here?

Mr. GRINNELL. I think if the gentleman was a young member I should say he ought not to ask me that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is a question which is respectful to my friend from Iowa and respectful to the House. I mean it in no offensive sense, as a matter of course.

Mr. GRINNELL. I know but one person connected with the Illinois Central railroad. I do not know that anybody engaged the gentleman to speak against the company, and I have as good a right to ask him if he is employed to speak against it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I did not ask if the gentleman was employed to speak for or against it. The gentleman from Iowa undertook to say that the Illinois Central railroad would do so and so. I wanted to know from him whether he was authorized to say that.

Mr. GRINNELL. I say that I have heard it from the lips of an officer and one of high standing in the road, that they would rather surrender the road.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. One word more. The gentleman has spoken of the consideration to the State of Illinois, the State receiving seven per cent. of the gross earnings of the road in lieu of taxation. That is what the gentleman undertook to say. The gentleman probably does not know another thing, that the railroad company is already arraigned before the Illinois Legislature for its attempts to defraud the State of its just revenue by taxation; this charge, which I see is made by a distinguished member of the State senate, Mr. McConnell, the representative of Morgan and Sangamon counties, is that the company have retained the title of lands which they have sold to settlers in their own name, giving a bond for a deed, thus depriving the State of the power of taxing those lands.

Mr. PRUYN. What has that to do with the merits of this question?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does the gentleman desire to know?

Mr. PRUYN. I desire to know if it has any pertinency to the question that we are considering.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suppose it has just as much pertinency on the one side as upon the other.

Mr. PRUYN. If that is the only reason my question is answered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from Iowa first mentioned it, and I explained it.

Mr. GRINNELL. This seven per cent. of the gross earnings of the road is given to the State in consideration of the taxation of the lands which they give up. That meets the case exactly. Why, sir, seven per cent. of the gross earnings of that great corporation amounts to millions of dollars a year, and the State receives that in lieu of a tax upon lands that are fifty miles from a stick of timber and that never would have been occupied in this generation but for the railroad.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would like to ask my colleague as to the quantity of land granted to the Missouri and Mississippi Railroad Company, whether those lands are not worth from one to two million dollars; and whether, therefore, that railroad company cannot well afford to do all the transportation that it is called upon to do for the Government in consideration of its grant.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will answer my colleague's question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the State of Illinois receives seven per cent. of the gross earnings of the road in lieu of a tax on the road itself, not in lieu of a tax on the land. These lands, of course, are subject to taxation as soon as they are sold. Every settler who obtains a title to land is at once taxed by the State, as every other proprietor of land in the State of Illinois is taxed. Of course the tax of seven per cent. amounts to a very large sum. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] who seems to insist that that provision of the statute requiring the road to remain a public highway, and to be subject to the transportation of Government troops and supplies, free of charge, should be enforced. I understood him to claim that these words also apply to the rolling stock, engines, engineers, the men necessary to load and unload the cars, and all that sort of thing. Suppose the railroad company has not got the rolling stock to perform all the work required by the Government, does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] understand the section to require that the company shall go to work and build an additional number of cars and employ an additional number of hands?

Mr. GRINNELL. That is just the question which I was going to ask.

Mr. THAYER. I will answer the question very candidly. I suppose no lawyer can mistake the meaning of the section for one moment. It means that, to the extent of the ability of the company, to the extent of their car accommodations, to the extent of their engine power, and of their ordinary running ability, the company shall, at all times, receive and transport the property of the United States, in the language of the section, "free from toll or other charge." What could be more explicit, or what could indicate more clearly the intention of Congress, than the accurate and precise terms in which this condition is framed? The committee will observe that the condition states that "the said railroad and branches shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge." Now, if this section had ended there, there would have been something in the argument of the gentleman from Illinois, that the Government of the United States, whenever it wished to transport freight over this road, should itself furnish facilities for the transportation.

But the gentleman only reads half the contract. He stops at the material words which pin this company. He would perform half the condition, and strike out from the contract the words that impose the remainder of the condition, because the section adds to the words "free from toll" the words "or other charge on the transportation of any property or troops of the United States." The law therefore declares, as plainly as language can declare anything, that this company shall not only suffer the Government to have the use of its road-bed free of toll, but that it shall also "transport" the property or troops of the United States free of charge. That is the plain meaning of the words of the section. The last words, which are superadded to the words prohibiting the charge of toll, plainly indicate the intention of Congress to impose upon the company the duty of transportation without charge to the United States; and I do not see how any one can read the section with any other meaning.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like to put a supposed case to my friend from Pennsylvania. I understand from him that, in case of a sudden emergency on the part of the Government for the transportation of a large number of troops and a large quantity of supplies over this railroad, greater than the rolling stock of the road could accommodate, the company would be guilty of a violation of law and would be liable to the forfeiture of its charter, if it did not instantly put on the road the rolling stock to perform this work.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] a single question. I desire to ask him how soon it was after the Government claimed to have its troops and munitions of war transported without charge over this road that the road advertised the Government of its intention to charge for transportation. I ask the question in view of the construction put upon the provision in question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not know.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] whether he has considered the reasons which the Secretary of War and the President gave for the conclusion to which they arrived, and for which they are now arraigned on this floor.

Mr. THAYER. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] will permit me to answer the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN,] I will state for his satisfaction that I have not considered the reasons of the Secretary of War or of the President of the United States. They have not done me the honor to submit those reasons to me. But let me add that I conceive that the members of this House are quite as competent to interpret their own laws as either the Secretary of War or the President of the United States. I am not to be told, in answer to the plain meaning of the act of Congress, that it has not that meaning because the Secretary of War, or, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has said, the Solicitor of the War Department, puts an interpretation upon it which conflicts with my ideas of common sense and plain English.

Now, if the gentleman will point me to a decision—I will not say of the highest judicial tribunal of this country, but to the decision of any respectable judicial tribunal—putting a construction upon this act of Congress different from that which I say properly belong to its words, then he will be in a position to ask me why I hold the construction which I have assigned to it. But he does not answer the argument which presses upon him by asking me whether I have considered the reasons of the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War has no more right to give a construction which shall bind this House than any private individual of this country. Why should I go to the Secretary of War, or to any other public functionary in this country, or to anybody but the judicial tribunals of this country, to interpret a law which is so plain that it requires no interpretation?

Mr. PRUYN. I take no such position. I simply asked the question of the gentleman.

Mr. GRINNELL. I think I must now resume the floor for a few moments. In the first place I wish to answer the question of my colleague, [Mr. HUBBARD.] He asks what these lands are worth which have been given to these railroads. Undoubtedly, sir, they are worth a large sum of money. But I wish to ask him, and that will answer his question, what he supposes the stock of those railroads is worth that is based upon the cost of the road and these land grants to aid in the construction of railroads in Iowa and several other States? These land-grant railroads have never earned three per cent. upon their capital stock, not one of them; and when this assault is made upon this great interest in the West, I make the assertion that these railroads have never yet earned three per cent. upon their cost. The stock has only a nominal value. Gentlemen upon this floor must have absolute knowledge upon this subject, and I am the more surprised at the harsh conditions which they seek to impose.

What I object to is this forced interpretation, this unreasonable interpretation of the law; this oppression of those who now in time of calamity seem to be in our power; who are now carrying our soldiers and munitions of war, as well as thousands of tons of freight, wearing out their rolling stock and their rails for a small compensation. I object to this as unwise, since the State of Illinois cannot well complain; and the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, and Kansas, will be unable to build another mile of railroad in those States by land grants, if the law receives any such interpretation as is proposed to be given. I should not have made these remarks, as I will never defend monopoly or extortion, but that I desire to repel the idea that the proper course to carry a measure is to assail somebody, to create a prejudice against some one, and I refer especially to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] when he sought to create a prejudice in this House against a company because its stock is held across the ocean. I especially wish to demur, when the capitalists, the great friends of the enterprise, especially the Illinois Central railroad, have been not only the great friends of the Government but the powerful friends of the enterprise he now denounces. I do not say that those men are to a fault generous, but will say that I believe the State of Illinois has made hundreds of millions of dollars by the investment of foreign capital in that State, by building its railways, and I do not propose to go back to frown down or degrade such gentlemen as Richard Cobden and his associates, who are our friends to-day as they have always been. I do not propose to grind under my heel as a legislator those who have put their money into our western railroads, which have made our lands valuable, and have built up commerce and trade among us, and are doing the country a real good by their unremunerative investments. I do not mean to be a party to crushing them when they are not getting three per cent. upon their investments.

I understood the gentleman to doubt whether this Illinois Central Railroad Company would like to give up its railroad to the Government. If it is to be a military railroad, and if it is to carry everything for the Army and the soldiers, then they can go to his own town, Galena, where they can buy oats for forty or fifty cents a bushel and have a train ten miles long or less if necessary, saving expense to the Government, to take them down to our soldiers at Cairo.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would inform my friend from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL,] that our western soldiers are not fed on oats. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I should have said cavalry, as it so happens that many of their soldiers have horses that need the grain. I wish to conclude by saying that I am confident this legislation will be destructive to our best interests in the new States. I believe it is out of place, and I regret that my colleague [Mr. WILSON] has seen fit to introduce such a proposition here on an appropriation bill. I believe it is oppressive, and that it will not as a just measure stand the test of time. I believe it is a wrong toward those who have invested their money in our enterprises and who are now contemplating further investments which promise to extend our roads and unite us to the rich and far West.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of making a five-minute speech, and then I shall ask that the debate be closed. I think that this discussion has been very discursive, not very logical, nor very close to the mark. All that has been said might, I think, have been said in half an hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that, in the discussion of this question we have lost sight of one great principle which should guide us in its decision. I think it is due to the parties interested in this question and to the country, that we, as an American Congress, should look at the position which the Government and this company relatively occupied at the time when they entered into that contract by which the Government granted and the company accepted this donation of land. Whatever duties the parties believed that contract imposed upon them they are bound to perform; whatever contingencies or circumstances were contemplated by the parties they are bound to abide by. But I submit to this House and the country that when that contract was entered into, neither party understood that such a contingency as has arisen would arise. Neither party understood that this Government would make a demand upon the resources and transportation of that company beyond anything in their power to place upon their road. A new circumstance has arisen; a new condition has sprung into existence; and in view of this fact I say equity demands that we should step forward and give a compensation in accordance with the new condition of things. I affirm here that not a land-grant railroad company in the United States ever accepted a grant from Congress with the understanding that, in a time of war, when we had two million men in the field, when the resources of every company were taxed beyond its capacity, that company was to go on and furnish transportation for munitions of war, for troops, for freight, without charge to the Government or compensation for the service.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from New York will allow me to say that the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company and the Pacific Railroad Company in Missouri did regard this obligation; and they applied to Congress for relief on the ground that their roads had been destroyed by guerrillas; and Congress did extend relief. Both those companies regarded this obligation as binding upon them. Now, sir, if the gentleman from New York or any other member of the House will introduce a bill to relieve these companies from the obligations into which they have entered, we shall then have presented to us a very different question from that which we are now considering, which is merely, shall we enforce the law as it now exists until it shall be changed by Congress?

Mr. STEVENS. I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] that we have gone wide of the mark, and I think that he has gone a little wider than the rest, for he proposes absolutely to violate the law. He says that inasmuch as, when this law was passed, we had no civil war, therefore—although no exception was inserted in the contract; although there was no provision that civil war should operate as an abrogation of the obligation—we are bound as honest men not to insist on the performance of the contract. Why, sir, what sort of war was contemplated when this law was passed? Was it expected that we should transport munitions of war through Illinois to protect the Canadian border? With what particular nation was war contemplated? Not with France, because it was not expected that we should transport troops along that road to attack France. Not with England, for the road did not reach to England. What war, then, was in contemplation when it was provided that troops and munitions of war should be transported without charge? Why, any war, any disturbance, any insurrection, any civil war which required an interior road to transport troops and munitions of war along it. The provision can have no other sensible interpretation. It cannot apply to any other condition of things. Unless we adopt this construction the Government can never get any return for its grant to this company.

It is plain that, when this grant of land was made, it was a general grant upon a general condition. 'This grant of hundreds of thousands of acres was made upon what condition? That the company should build the road; that they should stock it, and operate it. None but that company had the right to put rolling stock upon it. The right to construct, and stock, and operate the road was granted exclusively to this company. For anybody to attempt to interfere with their prerogative of constructing, stocking, and operating the road would have been an absolute violation of the charter, and an outrage upon the rights of this company.

Just so with the Government. It made this grant of land for a consideration, and that consideration was that in time of war its troops and munitions should be transported free of toll or other charge by this road. Who is there senseless enough not to see that the Government was not only to use the road but also to use the rolling stock of the road? For that grant of lands we had not only the right to the use of this road, but to the rolling stock of the road. It is not too much to ask for the munificent grant of lands made by the Government. I know that we are told that there is the road, and that we are at liberty to use it, but that we must put upon it our own rolling stock. I know that we are told that there will be no charge for the use of this road. The transportation was to be free of toll or other charge. What are the other charges? What was meant except charges for freight and transportation?

Mr. Chairman, I remember that in 1850, when this law was passed, I took objection to it, and suggested that the Government would not get the value for the grant of lands; that it would not get the proposed transportation of troops and munitions of war free of charge. I recollect that my language was offensive to an honorable member from Massachusetts, (Robert Rantoul,) who said that the imputation was unjust, and that there never would be a time when the Government would not have that transportation free of charge according to the law. I remember afterward having seen a statement, made by authority of the railroad company, setting forth the value of those lands, and that it was shown that, after building the road without costing the stockholders one cent, there would be a surplus from these lands for the stockholders of over thirty million dollars.

Mr. PRUYN. Is the gentleman aware that, with these advantages and development of this road, gentlemen living abroad who have invested money in this road cannot now get more than fifty cents on the dollar?

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman knows that you cannot now get more than forty dollars in gold for a $100 bond of the United States, which is one of the best securities in the world; and what has that to do with the matter except to show that the gold gamblers have deluded us, and that we have not sense enough to confound them?

When interrupted I was saying that the stockholders of that road had from these lands a surplus of $30,000,000, although they had not expended out of their own pockets one dollar upon the construction of the road. I predicted all this in 1850. If the company says that it has made a bad bargain and wants to be relieved, perhaps we may relieve it.

I move that the committee rise, to close this debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th June, 1866, had directed him to report the same back with an amendment; and also having had under consideration the Army appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I now call the previous question upon the fortification appropriation bill and amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was concurred in, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, asking an appropriation to complete the payment of certain Indian claims; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

TAX BILL.

Mr. BROOKS moved that three times the ordinary number of the tax bill be printed for the use of the House; which, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

TELLERS TO COUNT ELECTORAL VOTES.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. WILSON and DAWSON as tellers on the part of the House to count the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS moved that general debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Army appropriation bill be closed in one minute after its consideration shall be resumed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, in the chair.)

and resumed the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on the bill is closed in one minute. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Upon that I call for tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Mr. J. C. ALLEN and Mr. WILSON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 31.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending 30th June, 1866, and had directed him to report the same to the House with an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the previous question upon the bill and amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The first question was on the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as follows:

Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be used for the purpose of paying any railroad company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States when such company may have accepted a grant of lands from Congress upon condition of furnishing said transportation free of toll or other charge, except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Upon the adoption of that amendment I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the special committee on immigration.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to move that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet at seven o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged question, and can only be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. My object is to have an evening session for debate alone on the President's message. Several gentlemen wish to make speeches, and this is the last opportunity they will have.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it understood that no business is to be transacted?

Mr. STEVENS. Such is to be the understanding.

By unanimous consent, the motion was agreed to.

MILITARY AND POSTAL ROADS.

Mr. SLOAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to declare certain roads military and postal roads; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRINTING THE TAX BILL.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House fifteen hundred copies of the amendatory internal revenue bill, reported by the Committee of Ways and Means on the 6th instant.

PENNSYLVANIA WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. STROUSE, by unanimous consent, presented the joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, relative to the repayment by the United States of certain moneys advanced by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to pay the volunteer militia of 1863; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

STEAMER VANDERBILT.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the amount of money paid by the Government to the owner of the steamer Vanderbilt for the use of said steamer previous to the presentation of the same to the Government, on what terms the same has been paid, and for how long a period of service.

Mr. DAWES moved that the vote by which the resolution was adopted be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENNSYLVANIA WAR CLAIMS—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution of the Pennsylvania Legislature relative to the repayment by the United States of certain moneys advanced by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to pay the volunteer militia of 1863 was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I desire to have it referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. THAYER. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. STEVENS. It might as well be laid on the table. A bill passed the House last session covering these claims, and it is now in the Senate.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the joint resolution be laid on the table, and printed.

The question was taken on Mr. STEVENS's motion, and it was agreed to.

PAY OF A CONTESTANT.

Mr. NOBLE. I ask unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Elections:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to Hugh M. Martin the usual pay and mileage up to the day when he withdrew his contest before the Committee on Elections as a contestant for a seat in the Thirty-Eighth Congress as Representative from the fourth district in the State of Iowa.

Mr. WILSON. I object.

Mr. NOBLE. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection, and allow the resolution to be referred to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; I cannot do it.

RETALIATION.

Mr. LOAN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table joint resolution of the Senate No. 97, advising retaliation for the cruel treatment of prisoners by the insurgents, for the purpose of having it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to its being taken up to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, because if it gets there the Lord only knows when they will be able to report it back, and I hope that when it is taken up it will be put upon its passage.

BRIDGE OVER THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. NORTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill relating to the railroad bridge across the Mississippi river from Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, to Davenport, in the State of Iowa, to establish and declare the same a post route.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I shall have to object to that.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mileage be directed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the rate of mil-age to ten cents per mile; with a view to equalizing the compensation of members; and that they be directed to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the enrollment bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I appeal to the gentleman from Indiana to allow me to offer a resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will waive my motion for that purpose.

CLAIMS FOR ARMY SUPPLIES.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act passed July 4, 1864, as allows the heads of the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Departments to audit and allow claims for stores furnished to the Army of the United States not receipted for by the officer receiving the same, and which are substantiated only by ex parte affidavits, and that the Committee be further instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the said act as to restore the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims in said cases, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

ENROLLMENT LAW.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, the bill amending the enrollment law was made the special order for last Thursday. It has been crowded out of its place again and again, and now the draft is nearly approaching. I ask the gentleman from Indiana, before pressing his motion to adjourn, to permit that special order to be taken up so that we shall know that it will come up regularly.

The SPEAKER. The bill is already before the House.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, what has become of the special order that preceded the enrollment bill?

The SPEAKER. It was understood that the reconstruction bill was laid aside temporarily.

Mr. DAWES. I did not so understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the reconstruction bill can be passed over temporarily, as the gentleman from Ohio first suggested, it will not lose its priority. The enrollment bill will come up, and as soon as that is disposed of the reconstruction bill will come up.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would like to inquire what effect that will have on the other matters set aside for the latter days of this week.

The SPEAKER. These are the only two special orders in the House. The others are postponements.

Mr. PENDLETON. The tax bill is made a special order after to-morrow evening. When will the bill in reference to Cabinet ministers in Congress come up?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot state.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will object to postponing the reconstruction bill unless it be postponed to a day later than the bill for admitting Cabinet ministers to the floor.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair as to the bill for territorial buildings.

The SPEAKER. That is a postponement according to the Journal—not a special order.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. It was a special order before, and was postponed as a special order.

The SPEAKER. Then there are several special orders. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] says he will object to the reconstruction bill being postponed, unless it be postponed until a day later than the bill for the admission of Cabinet ministers.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot consent.

The SPEAKER. Then the reconstruction bill will be the special order at the meeting when the House resumes that class of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House do now take a recess until seven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that when the House resumes its session at seven o'clock, it will be in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's annual message. The Chair requests that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] will take the chair.

Mr. BLAINE. I beg the Chair to excuse me; I am not well.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] will please take the chair this evening.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURN's motion, and it was agreed to.

The House thereupon, (at four o'clock, p. m.) took a recess until seven o'clock, p. m.

THE PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The House reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m., and resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DONNELLY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the annual message of the President of the United States, on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] had the floor.

MESSRS. BROOMALL, LONG, DONNELLY, (Mr. BROOMALL in the chair,) COLE, of California, and JULIAN, addressed the committee. [Their speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. COLE, of California, moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. COLE, of California, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BROOMALL reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the annual message of the President of the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. BROOMALL, (at twenty-five minutes to eleven o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 8, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Journal of yesterday will be read.

Mr. FOOT. Unless some member of the body is particularly interested in hearing that Journal read, I suggest that it be dispensed with, by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

There being no objection, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. FOOT. I move that the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office be discharged from the farther consideration of the petition of Henry Stanley for the continuance of his patent; and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition. I make the motion with the consent of the chairman of that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had, in conformity to the joint rule on the subject, appointed Mr. J. F. WILSON of Iowa, and Mr. J. L. DAWSON of Pennsylvania, tellers on its part to examine and count the electoral votes for President and Vice President of the United States on this day.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; and a bill (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders on the active list of the United States Navy, praying for the repeal of so much of the act to establish and equalize the grades of line officers of the Navy, approved July 16, 1862, as relates to the pay of captains and commanders, and of the pay at sea of lieutenant commanders, so as to restore to their respective grades and duties the pay to which they were entitled prior to the passage of that act; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of ministers of the gospel and pastors of the churches at New Brunswick, New Jersey, praying that ministers of the gospel may be exempted from military duty; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CLARK presented the petition of Samuel L. Gerould, for pay for his services as reporter in a court-martial; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Dorsey Edwin William Towson, of Georgetown, District of Columbia, praying that his name be changed to Dorsey Edwin William Carter; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented the memorial of the common council of Michigan City, Indiana, praying for the improvement of the harbor at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of officers of the subsistence department of the Army, praying that the subsistence department be placed on an equality with the quartermaster's department in the way of promotion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of commissioned officers of Indiana regiments in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of citizens of Cambridge, in Massachusetts, headed by Henry W. Longfellow, asking Congress to enact a law preferring for appointment to all inferior offices persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States. I have already presented a similar petition to this, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I move that this also be referred to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN. I beg leave to present the petition of George W. Martin, praying that his case may be investigated and the record of the Senate amended and other acts done which will secure his rights. It appears that Mr. Martin was appointed military storekeeper, and he alleges he was confirmed by the Senate, but that the record, from accident or otherwise, does not show the fact, and he prays, therefore, that it be amended. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

POSTAL LAWS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire now, as I can never get any other time, to move to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill (S. No. 390) relating to the postal laws. I think it will not cause debate; it is a bill which ought to be sent to the other House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us make our reports first.

Mr. SUMNER. Had we not better go through the morning business?

Mr. COLLAMER. Gentlemen ask to make reports, and then they insist on the immediate consideration of those reports, so that there is no chance for other business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the Senator go on with his bill. I withdraw my suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill (S. No. 390) relating to the postal laws was considered as in the Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported the bill with several amendments. The first amendment of the committee, was to strike out the first section, as follows:

That from and after the 1st day of July, 1865, unpaid postage upon letters and other mail matter received for delivery, the registration fee on registered letters, rents of drawers and boxes, and all other postal transactions at post offices in which money is involved, except collections of drafts and deposits, shall be paid and performed by the use of United States postage stamps, under such rules and regulations as the Postmaster General shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Before another vote is taken, as this is a very important bill, and the Senate evidently have not listened to it, I wish the chairman of the Committee would state some of the principal alterations made by the bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. This bill as it has now been read was prepared by the head of the Post Office Department. He recommended a variety of legislation in his general report of the year. I called on him and asked him to put in the form of a bill all the legislation he desired for his Department for the year, and we could then examine it and make such amendments as we thought advisable and necessary. He prepared a bill, and this bill as it stands printed here now is the very bill which was prepared by him. I presented it, and it was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. With that bill he also sent a letter explaining all the parts of the bill which he had not explained in his annual report. That letter has been printed. The bill was drawn up out of the materials in the Post Office report, and from this letter of the Postmaster General, at the Department, to carry into effect the views they entertained in relation to legislation.

The committee, after spending some time in carefully examining the bill, reported it with a variety of amendments which have not yet been read. The Chair has called them up one at a time, the first section first. The committee reported that the first section should be stricken out. If gentlemen would collate the bill with the Post Office report, and the letter of the Postmaster General, they would see and understand the reason for all these various sections. They have very little relation to each other; they are isolated sections to secure certain purposes stated in his report and letter. I can go over them all if gentlemen desire it; but I hardly thought it worth while, inasmuch as the bill as drawn by the Department was sustained and explained by the letter of the Postmaster General, to occupy the attention of the Senate in explaining it. However, if any gentleman wishes it, I will endeavor to do so.

The committee have reported a variety of amendments to the bill. The first section, which the committee recommend be stricken out, is based on this idea: a year ago, at the recommendation of the Department, a law was passed to enable them to dispense with keeping so great a variety of accounts, and in order to do that it was provided that at least all letters should be prepaid by postage stamps, and then, if that was faithfully done, all the accounts that would have to be kept by postmasters would be the accounts of their postage stamps. They would need then only so many postage stamps; and inasmuch as nothing can pass through the mails but what is stamped and canceled, if they kept an account of the postage stamps, that is all they would have to keep. It would dispense with all this great variety of quarterly returns, amounting, as the gentleman from New Hampshire very well knows, he having been a member of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, there being about twenty-eight thousand post offices, to twenty-eight thousand quarterly accounts to be looked over and collated with the post office bills. It was utterly impracticable to do that. These quarterly returns acted as some sort of check upon the postmasters, because they were supposed to be looked over, but in fact they never were.

The first section of the bill is predicated on the idea that everything done in a post office, pay for box rents and everything else connected with the Post Office Department, should be paid in postage stamps; the whole dealings of the office should be in stamps. The only object to be secured by that was the simplifying of accounts; but the trouble is that it does not simplify them; it is undertaking to push the principle beyond any practicable result. For instance, suppose a man comes in to pay for his box; suppose it is a dollar. He comes with his dollar and says to the postmaster, "I want to pay my box rent." The postmaster tells him, if this section should be adopted, that the law requires him to pay it in postage stamps. "Very well," says he, "hand me the postage stamps for my dollar." The postmaster hands him the postage stamps, and he hands them right back again to pay the box rent. It will be perceived that those are not canceled stamps; they are stamps paid back into his hands that he can use again; and he may, if he has one hundred box rents at the same price, with one dollar's worth of stamps have the whole of them paid to him; and after all he has no stamps canceled; he has just as many to return and just as many to account for, and no more, than he had before. Still you have to rely upon his account of how much money he got for these boxes. And so it is with regard to all the other things mentioned in this section.

Mr. FARWELL. If the Senator will allow me I should like to make one suggestion to him. I perceive the tendency of this section, and certainly it will be plain to every Senator it would be a good section if it could be carried out. Now, I suggest to the Senator whether, if the postmaster was required to cancel the stamps paid in for such purpose in the presence of the man who pays him, it would not carry out the intention of the section and protect the Government?

Mr. COLLAMER. There is no security about what the man paid. The Department does not know who pays the box rents or who does not. Whom are we to call upon for any check upon him one way or the other? The committee considered this section at large; but they could not see how, practically, it could simplify accounts, and they directed me to call upon and have a conference with the head of the Department about it. I did so, and suggested to him our difficulty about it; that we did not see what practical effect the section would have; that the Department would still have to depend on accounts about those things. After a full discussion, and on conference with his Assistants, he said it would not simplify them; that really it would not effect the purpose at all; and he did not wish it preserved. He entertaining the same view that the committee did about it, the committee recommended that the first section be stricken out. That is all I desire to say about that section.

I will proceed with the other sections if any gentleman wishes it; if not—

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me a moment, he will recollect that when some debate took place on the post office bill which was passed at the last session, the Postmaster General was present, and I believe had some consultation with the honorable chairman backward and forward—

Mr. COLLAMER. I recollect what he said to you.

Mr. HALE. He did not say anything to me; but I want to ask the chairman if, practically, the predictions and anticipations of the Postmaster General in regard to the operation of that measure have been realized, or have they failed?

Mr. COLLAMER. When we come to the section of this bill which relates to that subject I will state how it is as well as I know.

Gentlemen seem to desire that I should explain these different sections; and as they may not all have read the report and letter on which they are founded, I will endeavor to do it. If gentlemen desire it, of course they will attend to it.

The second section is to carry out the principle of requiring all letters to be prepaid. That is the principle on which we started, and which we desire to carry into effect. This section provides that if a man deposits a letter without prepayment by stamp, it shall be returned to him. If the postmaster can ascertain who wrote it or knows who wrote it, he is to return it to the writer for that reason; and if he cannot ascertain without opening the letter, he need not keep it till the end of the quarter and then transmit it to the dead letter office here to be opened, as the law now requires, but he may open it, ascertain who wrote it, and send it back to the writer without its having to go around the circuit of the dead letter office.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to ask the Senator, if he will permit me, whether some other provision, such as advertising, or something of that kind, may not be adopted for returning those letters instead of opening them. I do not like allowing them to be opened in this way.

Mr. COLLAMER. They are opened now.

Mr. CLARK. Here at the dead letter office; but I do not quite like to allow them to be opened by all the postmasters about the country.

Mr. COLLAMER. That section is left by the committee unaltered, just as the Department desired; and the committee were reconciled to it, after some considerable debate, from the consideration that the unpaid letters now go to the dead letter office and are there opened, and it will be much more expeditious to let them be opened on the spot and given back at once to the men who deposit them, and there is no more exposure.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will pardon me; I think there is a great deal more exposure in one view; that is, it acquaints all the postmasters in the neighborhood what the people about them are writing, instead of sending the letters here where the parties are not supposed to know the writers personally.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is the simplest thing in the world to stop all that by just putting a stamp on a letter. If the writer prepaies his letter it cannot be opened. There is no occasion of a man getting into difficulty or in any sort of danger except by his own inattention and neglect; if he will just stamp his letter there is the end of it.

The third section is an attempt to secure the prepayment of all printed matter. There is some difficulty in the practical working of the present system. Papers are now sent from the publishers through the post offices without prepayment, the arrangement being that the postage shall be collected by the quarter at the office of delivery; but in point of fact it is not all collected; a large amount of it remains uncollected; it is lost as revenue to the Department. It is therefore desirable to secure a prepayment of the printed matter as well as of the letters, and this section is drawn with a view to that. It provides that from and after January 1, 1866, so as to give time to make all the arrangement for that purpose, printed matter shall be prepaid. It does not say that it shall be prepaid by postage stamps; that is not the provision; but it shall be prepaid in such manner as the regulations made by the Department shall order and direct. It is probably impracticable to secure prepayment of postage on newspapers by postage stamps. Take a large edition of a daily paper, say the New York Herald, if you please, which every day distributes perhaps a hundred thousand copies, but I will say fifty thousand. They always delay the issuing of the paper as late as they can, so as to put in the last news. They just allow time enough to wrap and direct the papers when they close their press, and then get them into the post office wrapped and directed. If each of these wrappers is to have a stamp put upon it, and that stamp is to be canceled, the papers will not get off that day, for it would require a new manipulation of each paper. This would be impracticable without delaying the sending off the paper until the day after publication. The section, therefore, provides that the manner of doing it shall be left to arrangements by the Postmaster General, and the remainder of this year is allowed to make these arrangements. Of course he will make them after consultation with the publishers as to the best way, either by weighing the papers, or by requiring a return under oath of the extent of their distribution, and having access to their books for the purpose of verifying their return. The regulations will be arranged by the Postmaster General, as I am assured by him, on consultation with the publishers, and in such a manner as to make it easy and practicable. The prepayment of printed matter is a very great object to effect, and the Postmaster General entertains no doubt that it is entirely practicable without the use of postage stamps, and that he can make regulations to carry it into effect.

Mr. HOWE. Let me inquire of the chairman of the Post Office Committee if it is not practicable to make these arrangements by the 1st of July?

Mr. COLLAMER. He prefers to have a year to do it in.

Mr. HOWE. If the arrangements were made by the 1st of July we might know something of their operation by the next session of Congress.

Mr. COLLAMER. The truth is that if you require the prepayment of postage, the publisher will add the amount to the price of the paper, and the subscriptions for papers almost universally commence with January, and the Postmaster General wants to commence with January. For that reason January is put in.

Mr. HALE. I would inquire from the chairman whether it would suit his convenience better, if there are any amendments to be proposed to the sections, to have them suggested as he goes along now, or wait until he gets through.

Mr. COLLAMER. The fact is that the committee have recommended amendments which have not yet been read, and I want those amendments first passed upon. They may cover what the Senator wants. I think the usual course had better be taken about it.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. COLLAMER. I come next to section four.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to make an inquiry in regard to section three before the Senator passes from it; it may save time hereafter. I desire to know if it is not practicable to fix in the law the regulation by which postage is to be prepaid on printed matter. One of the newspaper publishers of the country has written to me, and objects to this provision because it leaves it discretionary with the Postmaster General. He says one Postmaster General may adopt one set of rules, and another another, and the publishers are at the mercy of the Postmaster General in regard to it. Why not fix the matter by law? Let them know what they are required to do, and then there will be some certainty.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senator had the goodness to hand me that letter, and I showed it to the Postmaster General and had a consultation on the subject. It is a matter which has not been overlooked. The difficulty of undertaking to prescribe by law the manner of doing it I have already suggested to the Senate when I spoke of the impracticability of requiring newspapers to be prepaid by stamps. It is difficult now to say what should be the exact mode of prepaying printed matter without consultation with the publishers. We have not had information from the publishers in the different parts of the country to enable us to say that we can now fix on a certain plan. The Department can do it better after consulting with the publishers and ascertaining which is the most advisable course, and it will be done as the body of them want it. If you now say by law that it shall be done in a particular mode, the result will be, if that mode shall not work well, it cannot be altered without changing the law and legislating on the subject over again. On the whole I thought it would be the most prudent and practicable way, and I believe that is the opinion of the committee, to leave the section as the Postmaster General drew it.

The next section is section four. We were applied to again and again by postmasters whose post offices had been robbed, destroyed, and burnt up by the enemy, for relief for the postage stamps they had lost and what they had suffered in their offices. These applications became very numerous, and Congress last year passed a law authorizing the Postmaster General to settle those cases, but confined it to losses occasioned by the enemy, and did not cover those cases where the postoffice itself was destroyed by our own troops. The object of this section is to enable the Postmaster General to settle those accounts in cases where the destruction has been by our own forces. That is all there is in that section.

The fifth section is to help to carry out the money-order system. It became necessary to make expenditures in relation to furniture and fixings in the money-order offices to enable them to carry on their work. There was no authority given to the Department to settle with the postmasters for these necessary expenses, and this section is to enable the Postmaster General to do that.

I come next to the sixth section. It has been found by the Postmaster General that he cannot get published in these times the list of undelivered letters, which is required by law to be published in newspapers, for one cent per letter. The papers will not do it for that; and as he is confined to that price by law, this section proposes to amend the law so that he may get it done, if he can, for a rate not exceeding two cents per letter.

The seventh section is explained in the Postmaster General's report. Last year, in fixing the pay for the agents of the Post Office Department on the Pacific coast, we cut down the pay of a man which had already accrued to him by the law as it was before, thus depriving him of his regular salary, which was not intended. This section is to enable the Department to pay that officer his salary, which was cut down by a mere inadvertence.

The eighth section provides that the special agents of the Department other than those appointed for the Pacific States and Territories, to superintend postal matters connected with the railway service of the United States, shall be allowed for their traveling expenses, while actively employed in the service, a sum not exceeding four dollars a day.

The ninth section is in relation to maps which the Department has been making arrangements for preparing and publishing. They are maps of the States and Territories arranged in groups, showing the post routes and the location of post offices. These maps are to be engraved, and some money is required to finish the engraving and to make the publication, and the ninth section makes an appropriation of $10,000 for that purpose.

Section ten is to carry into effect a plan which has been recently entered upon by the Department, of making distribution in the railway cars, instead of having all the letters pass into the distribution offices to be there distributed. They put clerks upon the cars and distribute the mail matter as they go along through all the important routes of the country.

Mr. HALE. Is not that done now?

Mr. COLLAMER. They have put it in operation now, and this section is to provide pay for the clerks that are employed in that service; that is all.

Mr. HOWE. These clerks, I take it, are to supersede the present agents.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suppose the result will be to dispense with what we call route agents on the important routes; but the Department will not be able to dispense with as many of them as they put on clerks, by any means, because these clerks have to do the duties formerly done by the route agents and by the clerks in the distributing offices.

Mr. HOWE. Where they have these clerks, they will not have what are now called route agents.

Mr. COLLAMER. They will still need route agents on some routes where they do not have these clerks, but on the routes where these clerks are employed they will probably be able to dispense with the route agents.

The eleventh section relates to the carrying of the mails by steamships. The present law on that subject provides that if they are American ships they may be allowed the inland and the sea postage for this service, and if foreign ships the sea postage only. There was a doubt whether the Postmaster General was always obliged to give them all that. On some of the routes he says the service ought to be done for a great deal less, and he wants to be at liberty to get it done for less if he can. His reading of the law was, as the owners of the vessels claimed, that they were entitled to the whole of that postage, at any rate, and in order to remove any doubt about that this section eleven is put in, that he shall get the service done if by American vessels for any sum not exceeding the sea and inland postage and if by foreign vessels, for any sum not exceeding the sea postage, so that he may be at liberty to get it for less if he can.

Section twelve only carries into effect section eleven by compelling the vessels to take the mails. It is a provision to compel them when they take clearances to take the mails if so required.

Section thirteen is superseded by an amendment of the committee. It was originally drawn with a view to enable the money-order offices to make deposits in national banks that are depositories of United States moneys, so that they may make transfers of their money where it is received to where it is desired to be paid out. That section is altered at the suggestion of the Department so as to enable all deputy postmasters to make deposits in the national banks that are depository banks in all cases where they have moneys to deposit. It is only to allow them to do that which the Assistant Treasurers do, which the collectors of internal revenue and the collectors of customs do.

Mr. HOWE. I notice another difference between the amendment proposed and the section struck out. By the amendment the money, as I understand it, is to be deposited at the risk of the Government; whereas, in the section struck out, it was to be deposited at the risk of the postmaster. I do not find fault with the amendment, but I wish to know if I understand it aright.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senator understands it aright, and I will tell him the reason for the change. These depository banks are required to furnish and deposit United States bonds with the Treasurer of the United States as a security for the deposits made with them. Now, if you say that the postmaster who deposits his money shall do so at his own risk, we cannot hold those securities for it; but if he deposits, as the Assistant Treasurers and collectors do, for the Government, those securities will be held for it. I presume the gentleman understands it.

Mr. HOWE. I think it is right.

Mr. COLLAMER. Section fifteen provides punishment for tearing down post-office boxes, and is a security for the safe deposit of letters.

Mr. HALE. Could you not make these offenses punishable by military commission? [Laughter.]

Mr. COLLAMER. No, we do not do that. The next section is the sixteenth. As the law now stands, the Postmaster General may publish his yearly advertisements for proposals to carry the mails in as many papers in every State as he directs. He is applied to, of course, by every paper, and every paper has its friends about here urging its claims. There seems to be no end to the applications, and the matter really becomes a job to be given out, not for the public service, but as a matter of favor. This section proposes that the Postmaster General shall not be allowed to publish the advertisements in more than five papers in each State or Territory where the mail service is to be performed, limiting it so that he will not have to subsidize all the papers in the country. That is the object of it, to relieve him from importunities.

Section seventeen is the one of which the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] spoke, which proposes to amend the act of March 3, 1863, relative to the free-delivery system.

The VICE PRESIDENT, (the Clerk of the House of Representatives having appeared below the bar.) Will the Senator from Vermont be kind enough to suspend his remarks that a message may be received from the House of Representatives?

Mr. McPHERSON delivered his message, as follows:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives is now ready to receive the Senate for the purpose of proceeding to open and count the votes of the electors of the several States for President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. COLLAMER. The seventeenth section of the bill is an explanation of the act about the free-delivery system—

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Vermont will give way, as we have received this notice from the House—

The VICE PRESIDENT. At one o'clock the Senate will repair to the Hall of the House without any notice.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish this bill to be left as the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can proceed for five minutes, if he chooses.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will go on. I can get through, perhaps, in that time. The seventeenth section is the last section in the printed bill. The act providing for the free-delivery system provided that two cents postage should be paid on drop letters, and that all letters should be delivered free, the expense of delivery being supposed to be covered by the charge of two cents instead of one cent on drop letters as it was before; and the head of the Department at that time entertained the belief that it would extend practically to all our cities and large towns in the country, and dispense with boxes, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the honorable Senator from Vermont, and in order to prevent confusion, I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill informally, to take up the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, that it may be made the order of the day for one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COLLAMER. And in the morning hour I can finish this? ["Yes."]

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the motion of the Senator from Ohio will be entertained.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let this be treated as the unfinished business of the morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to take up the bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to postpone its further consideration, and to make it the special order of the day for one o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN. I am directed by the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office to report a resolution, and to ask for its present consideration.

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it the business I had under consideration remains for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands it will be the unfinished business of the morning hour to-morrow morning, and it will be the unfinished business for to-day, when the Senate returns.

Mr. COLLAMER. If we return here to-day, may we not go on with it as unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. COWAN. I am directed by the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate five thousand copies of the annual report of the Patent Office for the year 1864.

Mr. ANTHONY. That resolution should go to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the report of a committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the committee from whom it is reported knows the expense, I have no objection to action now; but I think, before a document so expensive is ordered to be printed, before the number is decided upon, the Senate ought to be in possession of the cost of doing it. ["Move to refer it."] I would rather that the committee from whom it comes should make the motion to refer.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. COWAN. I have no objection, certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator has an estimate, I would as lief it should come from his committee.

Mr. COWAN. I am content that it should go to the Committee on Printing.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

COUNTING OF PRESIDENTIAL VOTES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour agreed upon by the concurrent vote of the two Houses having arrived, the Senate will now repair to the Hall of the House of Representatives for the purpose of opening, counting, and declaring the votes for President and Vice President of the United States for the term commencing on the 4th of March, 1865.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to the Hall of the House of Representatives, preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and headed by the Vice President and the Secretary.

The Senate returned to their Chamber at two o'clock, p. m.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate take up the resolution which I offered two days ago, calling upon the President of the United States for information relating to recent conferences with certain rebels. There will be no debate upon it. I hope it may now be acted upon and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion can be entertained only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object. I think the Senator might wait until we get into our seats.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator rose in his place and objected distinctly.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I can move to postpone all prior orders and take up that resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be in order.

Mr. SUMNER. I will do that. Let us get this resolution out of the way. It will only take two minutes.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to inquire whether that will supersede the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will if the motion obtains.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then I must object to it.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D Session.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 42.

PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT-ELECT.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to offer a resolution in connection with our proceedings in conjunction with the House of Representatives. It is the usual resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The resolution will be received, and read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The joint committee on the part of the Senate appointed to join such committee as might be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, in further execution of the duties with they were charged by the two Houses have agreed to the following resolution, which I ask the Senate to consider now:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate be appointed by that body to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by that House to wait on Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, and to notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1865; and also to notify Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, that he has been duly elected Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865.

The resolution was adopted.

CONFERENCES WITH REBELS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is now before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] withdraws his objection to the consideration, informally, of my resolution. It will not displace the bill of the Senator from Vermont. It can be taken up informally by unanimous consent, and acted upon and put out of the way.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That resolution had better go over until to-morrow. I am quite sure it will lead to some discussion.

Mr. SUMNER. I think not. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am informed by the Chair that it will supersede the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If taken up informally it will only supersede it for the time being.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely wish to take it up and get it out of the way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is now before the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I sent to the Secretary's desk yesterday an amendment which I intended to propose to this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution and amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, to furnish to the Senate any information in his possession concerning recent conversations or communications with certain rebels, said to have been under executive sanction, including communications with the rebel Jefferson Davis, and any correspondence relating thereto.

The amendment of Mr. SAULSBURY was to add the following:

And that he be also requested to inform the Senate whether he, or others acting under his authority, did not require, as a condition to reunion, the acquiescence of said persons mentioned in said resolution, or of the public authorities of the so-called confederate States, in the abolition of slavery in said States; and also, whether he, or those acting by his authority, did not require as a condition to negotiation that the said confederates should lay down their arms. And that he be requested to inform the Senate fully in reference to everything connected with or occurring in said conference or conferences in relation to the subject-matter of said conferences. And also that he be requested to state whether or not an armistice was not asked for by Messrs. Stephens, Hunter, and Campbell with the view to prepare the minds of the Southern people for peace and reunion of the States.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will inquire whether the resolution and amendment have been printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Neither has been printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I would like to have them lie over until to-morrow, and be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to make an explanation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to make an explanation also.

Mr. SUMNER. I object to the amendment of the Senator from Delaware, and on this simple ground: to my mind it is not respectful to the President; it is in the nature of interrogatories addressed to an unwilling witness. I believe that, in the relations between the Senate and the President we have only to express to him our desire that he should communicate to us what in his opinion he can without any injury to the public interests. I believe that he will make a full and frank communication; and I believe I do not go too far when I say it is well known to many Senators that the President is ready to do it; perhaps I might say that he desires to do it. I think, therefore, there should be no delay in making this call upon him in order to give him that opportunity. There is no occasion for printing a resolution which is merely one of this nature, and which can be understood as it is read from the desk; for the original resolution as presented by myself is as simple as language can make it. The amendment as presented by the Senator from Delaware, I admit, does conflict with the resolution, but I presume the Senate will not be disposed to adopt it; there is no occasion for it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, nothing was further from my intention than to offer any disrespect to the President of the United States. It never occurred to me that the amendment could bear any such construction. Inasmuch as the original resolution requests the President to communicate the conversations that occurred in that conference, I wish everything that occurred to be made known. I have been informed that an armistice was requested by those southern commissioners; and if that be a fact, the country ought to know it. I have been informed also that that request was refused. If that be so, the country has as much interest in knowing that fact as in knowing any other.

I rose simply to disclaim any intention of being disrespectful to the President of the United States or anybody else.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that the resolution as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts should first be adopted and go to the President; and if the communication the President shall make shall be found, in the judgment of the Senator from Delaware, not to be as full as he thinks it should be, then he may offer a resolution calling for further information; but certainly he should not presume in advance that the President will not furnish all the information in his possession. I think, therefore, he should withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us vote it down.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yesterday when this resolution was called up I objected to it upon the ground that I did not believe it related to any matter of a legislative character to be brought before Congress. The President of the United States not only has the power under the Constitution, but by an express act of Congress, to grant terms of amnesty to rebels or insurgents in arms against the Government. I doubted very much from the reading of the resolution whether it would be wise for the Senate to call for this information. What transpired in that interview will probably never be disclosed, or at least not for some time, either to the Congress of the United States or to the insurgents in Richmond. I doubt very much whether the resolution would do any good. The Senator from Massachusetts has stated that the President is ready to communicate this information. It may be well to satisfy the public mind to a certain extent as to what was done there, or what reason induced him to go there; and upon the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that this is not a resolution intended to hector or lecture or accuse the President for doing what he has a right to do, I am perfectly willing to waive my objections. The only reason why I objected to it yesterday was that I might have some understanding as to what was intended by calling for this information, and whether it was agreeable to the President to communicate it. The President of the United States ought to exercise his entire pleasure in the matter, and he ought not to communicate this information merely to satisfy the curiosity of the Senate and the country unless he thinks it will tend to quiet the public mind.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In my opinion, Mr. President, this resolution is unwise at the present time. It can do no good. If the communication is made of all that occurred at the interview which is said to have taken place between the President of the United States and these gentlemen coming informally or formally from the southern States, we cannot base any legislative action upon it. The President of the United States is charged with this matter upon his responsibility under the Constitution, and we have no control over it so far as the administration of this is concerned. As was said by the Senator from Ohio, the power of granting amnesty is confided to the Executive under the law as it stands. What may have occurred in an interview like this, on that subject, we do not know. In the discussions between the Executive and these men, if they were pleading for mercy in behalf of those whom they supposed might be ready to lay down their arms, something may have occurred on this subject of amnesty, as to what the President might be disposed to do in the exercise of the pardoning power; but whether there was or not, it seems to me peculiarly improper and unwise to seek by a resolution of the Senate to enter at the present time into that subject.

Sir, I think we ought to presume that the President of the United States knows something. For four years he has been discharging the duties of that high office to the satisfaction of the great mass of the American people. So well satisfied have they been with his administration that they have by tremendous majorities reelected him to this office to discharge its duties. I know that some persons in Washington and outside of Washington, in Congress and out of Congress, have sometimes been disposed to criticize with a great deal of animadversion the course pursued by the President; but, sir, the result has proved, whenever he has passed through any important crisis in his administration, that although he may not have displayed as much genius as some men possess, in the end he has displayed a wisdom and a sagacity which entitle him to the confidence of the country.

While I believe it is unwise to send a resolution of this kind to the President, because it is assuming, on our part, a wish or a disposition to exercise some control over him in the exercise of his great executive responsibilities, I entertain no opposition to the resolution from any fear or any expectation that when the truth comes to be known anything will appear which tends in the slightest degree to weaken the confidence of the country in the wisdom or the sagacity of the President. In my opinion the facts will show that that has transpired on his part, so far from weakening, will strengthen the confidence of the country in the President. At the same time my opinion is just as decided that it is unwise to go into this inquiry.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts objects to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware, because it is not respectful to the President. Let me ask the honorable Senator what more is there contained in that proposition than there is, in substance, in his own resolution? The Senator from Massachusetts uses different language, I admit; but still his inquiry covers the whole ground. It would cover all that may have been said on the subject of amnesty, if anything was said, just as much as the proposition of the Senator from Delaware. It is only a difference in form of expression, not in substance.

Mr. President, I shall content myself with voting against the resolution, because I believe it would be unwise to enter into this inquiry.

Mr. MORRILL. This, I believe, is an ordinary resolution of inquiry.

Mr. SUMNER. That is all.

Mr. MORRILL. Ordinary in its terms, courteous in its language, and by no implication that I see arising from it does it charge the President, or can a suspicion arise that anybody here suspects the President to be unwilling to communicate the information he is supposed to have, or that it is in any sense a sinister resolution. Therefore, as an ordinary resolution, in the ordinary form of business, I should vote for it; and so I propose to do.

But I rise to say to my honorable friend from Wisconsin that I do not see any occasion now on this resolution for a championship of the President. I do not think the Senate ought to be put in the attitude of being defended against an assault made upon the President; for certainly, from the tenor of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, every Senator here who votes for this resolution must feel that there is an implication that we are in some sense or in some way hostile to the President; that we have not as much confidence in his wisdom, his patriotism, his sagacity to manage public questions, as somebody else has. I feel a little more sensitive on this subject this morning at these remarks, because they are a repetition of the remarks of the same kind made the other day by that Senator. I have never said on this floor anything in any way detrimental to the patriotism or the sagacity or the prudence of the President of the United States. I have felt, and I now feel, as profound a regard for him, I trust, as those who have said a great deal more about it. I insist that there is no occasion on a mere ordinary resolution for putting this Senate in the attitude of voting it upon the idea that a majority of this Senate are not particularly solicitous of the character and feelings of the President of the United States. I do not understand it to be so; and therefore, for one, I object on a mere ordinary resolution of inquiry to being told that it is not wise, that it is a reflection on the President; or, at any rate, that it will be taken for granted that we have not as high a regard and as profound a respect for the President as we ought to have. I rose only to make these remarks.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall content myself with one single remark. I do not intend to debate this resolution, nor do I intend to reply to the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin, a speech that he has made more than once on this floor; but I will remind that Senator of a remark from a very illustrious person, one of the most eminent men in the history of the law—I mean the great Chief Justice of England, Matthew Hale—who was accustomed very often to say from the bench to very ardent advocates, "Do not jump till you get to the stile." The Senator from Wisconsin would do well if he did not jump so often before he gets to the stile. Sir, when Senators on this floor attack the President of the United States the Senator may well rush forward, as swiftly as is his habit, to defend him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Massachusetts admitted in his former speech that the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware was an attack substantially upon the President, and he opposed it for that reason. Wherein consisted that attack? It was simply in this: in putting questions to the President about his conduct. This resolution presented by the Senator from Massachusetts is in different language, it is true, but it is doing precisely that thing. It is the favorite weapon which is made use of whenever a party undertakes to attack an Administration to put them on their examination, to put them on their inquiry, to begin to cross-examine them, "What have you been doing? Render us an account of yourself." That is the substance of it.

The Senator from Maine mistakes very much when he supposes that I have said that every person in this Senate who votes for this resolution intends to make an attack upon the President; I say no such thing. I said, or intended to say, no such thing.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not charge the Senator with saying that; but I say that is the inference and inevitable conclusion from the tone of his remarks.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator did not confine himself to the remarks made by me on this occasion, but referred to what I said the other day. I think the Senator could not have heard the remarks I made the other day, or he would have understood that I had reference particularly to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] when I charged them with a common purpose to oppose the Administration and destroy the free State of Louisiana.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator will allow me, I thought it particularly offensive then, and I think so now, for the Senator to rise and characterize the Senate here as distinguished by radicals and conservatives, especially among his own friends; and that was the whole tone and tenor of his speech the other day. We were classified; some of us were radicals and some of us conservatives, under the general phrase of Herod and Pilate, I believe, applicable particularly to the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Kentucky. What I complained of then was the general tone of the speech, classifying the Senate, as if there were a body of radical men in this Senate against whom the President of the United States needed to be defended. I think the Senator's speech was obnoxious to that charge, and in that sense offensive.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I mentioned the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Kentucky, and I did not refer to any other Senator on the floor in the course of my remarks. My reply was made to them, and was intended for them; I meant what I said, and I mean it now. The Senator from Ohio but the other day, in speaking of the Executive, said, "Your Executive lacks blood; he has not got the nerve to carry out and perform his duties as he ought." And particularly was I replying to the Senator from Ohio in reference to the State of Louisiana when I charged upon him and upon the Senator from Kentucky a joint purpose to attack the Administration, and to destroy the free State of Louisiana. Sir, their joint purpose is this: the Senator from Kentucky would keep Louisiana out of the Union until the rebels can vote under its constitution; and the Senator from Ohio would keep her out until the negroes of Louisiana can vote in the formation of her constitution.

Mr. President, that is what I said. I referred to those gentlemen; and the Senator from Ohio will excuse me when, in reference to this matter, I undertook to speak to him and of him, because that Senator, in the course of the last six or eight months, has undertaken, in a published letter of his, to charge upon me conspiracy with the President to defeat the passage in this House of a certain bill in relation to the construction or the reconstruction of the State of Louisiana and other States.

Mr. WADE. When did I do that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I mean by the letter published under the Senator's own hand, in which he assumed to say that I had written to the State of Louisiana stating that that bill would be kept back in the Senate of the United States to save the President the necessity of vetoing it. Sir, I ask the gentleman to produce his proof on that subject.

Mr. WADE. Does the Senator deny that he wrote any such letter?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do. But, Mr. President, is it right for the Senator from Ohio, in a published letter, to say that he is informed by a responsible gentleman that some other gentleman has said in the presence of another gentleman that the Senator from Wisconsin has written a letter to Louisiana in which he says this, and that, and the other thing; and upon evidence like that has the Senator from Ohio the right to undertake, not only to attack the President, but to attack me personally?

Sir, the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] will understand that when I have reference to anything that he says on this floor I shall speak of what he says and of him. I certainly have not yet referred to him or his action here; but in the speech which I made I spoke of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Kentucky.

In relation to this resolution I have only to say what I said in the beginning, that I do not see that it can accomplish any good purpose; it may possibly do harm; and upon the very face of it is an inquiry at the present time in relation to the administration of the executive office, which, in my opinion, is unnecessary and unwise.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, when this debate commenced, I had very little idea of being dragged into it. I did not know that I had anything particularly to do with it. I said nothing about the resolution. I stood the torrent of passion which the Senator from Wisconsin belched forth upon the Senate the other day in perfect silence. I cared nothing about it. I believed I was right, and the result showed that I had a very large majority of the Senate with me. So believing, I cared but very little what the Senator from Wisconsin might say about it. I did not think that all he could say was worth one moment of the time of this body in reply to it. I did not suppose that either he or myself, in any personal remarks that we could make, would be serving the country so much as we should by allowing the measure then under consideration to pass, and proceeding with the public business. It was not necessary that he should drag up this topic unprovoked, without my saying a word, and turn back to his old controversy and repeat it over again, making it almost necessary for me to get up now and detain the Senate for a few moments.

I ask the Senator and I ask the Senate, why is it that this unprovoked, gratuitous attack should be commenced upon me now, when the Senator had the floor to himself on that occasion, and said all he could say to the Senate, and said it, I suppose, as well as he has said it now? If he harbors any particular malice against me, or if he wants to make it appear that he is the peculiar defender of the President of the United States, and that the President cannot stand alone anywhere unless braced up by such help as that, allow me to say that he has a very much poorer opinion of the President than I have, [laughter,] for I hardly think such props will tend to support him much; and I will give this advice to the President now in my place: "If you are in danger of any attacks, for God's sake select as your defender some man that somebody pays some attention to." I care nothing for the Senator's attacks. I did not reply before, and I am trespassing on the Senate in replying now. Why wake up Rip Van Winkle? The Senator says that a certain letter was published. Sir, in the protest which Mr. Davis and myself put forth—I suppose that is what he alluded to—we did say that we were informed that a letter had been written by him down to New Orleans, in which he stated that they intended to postpone that measure till so late in the session that the President would not have time to consider it. That is what we were informed; I have the letter which so informed me, from as good a man as there is in the State of Ohio or elsewhere, and Mr. DAVIS has another letter to the same effect. The Senator very early in the session spoke to me on that subject. I told him that I had such a letter, but that I had not brought it with me, and if he wished to see it I could send home and get it. He did not seem to require that; he did not ask me to do it, and I dropped the subject. That, I suppose, was more than two months ago. Why does he drag it up now? I have done nothing to stir up his malice that I know of. I have not spoken of him or about him, or thought of him. He was not even in my thoughts or in my mind. I care nothing about him any more than I do about anybody else. I bear him no malice, and very little good-will. [Laughter.] I care nothing about him. I do not know why he has waked up now. He has slept about a year on these letters that he complains of, and never before asked me to produce them; he never denied what they contained in all my conversations with him; he never pretended to deny that it was just as the statement was in the letter of Mr. DAVIS and myself. He spoke to me to inquire about the letter. I told him we had such a letter, but that I had it at home and would produce it if necessary. He did not say that he wanted to see it, or I would have sent for it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Did I not tell the Senator from Ohio distinctly that I had never written to any person in Louisiana on the subject of that bill, and that I had never had a conversation with the President about it until the bill passed?

Mr. WADE. I do not remember that the Senator said so.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I certainly did.

Mr. WADE. I do not remember that the Senator said one word of that kind. I will not say he did not, because I did not treasure up much of what he said. I did not think it very important then, nor do I now. But enough as to that gentleman. He is the peculiar defender of the President! I fear the President will fare very hard unless he has better support, as I said before; but I care nothing about that; it is between him and the President. The President, I suppose, will stand on his own foundation and I shall endeavor to stand on mine. I have not attacked the President. Sometimes when I have thought the President was wrong, I have attacked the thing he has done that I believed to be wrong. I think the Senate of the United States has some independent duties of its own to perform. I do not think that it always consists with the honor even of the President that we should be his mere servants, obeying everything that we may ascertain to be his wish and will, because he is not always wiser than the whole of us or a majority of us. I have not said he was unwise, nor have I said he was wise. I have not criticised the President at all. I have criticised some of his acts, and I have disapproved of some of them; and the Senator believes that is a violent attack upon the President which needs rebuke here! Why did he not turn to me and make that rebuke at first? He got up and made his statements and did not apply them to me until he was rebuked from higher quarters, and then he turned around and went back to his old speech and recapitulated it and said that he meant me by the old speech, and thereby sought to get rid of the new one to-day. That is what he was after; and he was properly rebuked for it.

What is more arrogant than for any Senator to rise on this floor and arraign the whole body as being in hostility to the President of the United States merely because a resolution of inquiry is offered? The Senator says we have no right to question the President for anything; it is an impeachment of his wisdom to do so. Why, sir, resolutions of this kind are the business of almost every morning hour. It is this peculiar "friend" of the President, one of "the king's friends," that must rise here in opposition to it. The President is not opposed to it that ever I heard of. I suppose the President is perfectly willing—nay, I am not certain but that he is anxious, and I have understood that he is anxious—to give the Senate such information on this subject as they may ask of him. I have heard from a gentleman—as good a "friend," who ought at least to be quite as good a friend as the Senator—that the President rather desired and wished to give us the information called for by this resolution. I will not say that the fact is so, but I have been so informed. Whether it be so or not, however, the President has initiated a proceeding of the utmost consequence to the nation; he has held a conference with leading enemies of the country with regard to the great question of peace or war. Is the Senate of the United States not interested in such questions? When these tremendous issues are pending, are we to be told that the Senate of the United States has no right to look into them? The Senator seems to suppose so.

I should like to know what the Senator thinks the people of Wisconsin have sent him here for. Has he anything to do for them? Has he any judgment of his own to exercise upon any question? and if upon any question, what more important than that in the midst of this gigantic war we shall know what kind of negotiations have been entered into, what offers have been made pro and con., what are the probabilities of the result? The whole nation stands on tiptoe to ascertain. The people know that questions of the most vital interest have been pending between the President of the United States and the emissaries of the rebel chief. What offers did he make, and what offers did they reject? Can any question more important than this arise before the American people, and is a Senator to be rebuked upon this floor and told that he is doing something which does not belong to him, that he is an intermeddler with the private business of the President, when he assumes to ask him in respectful language, "Sir, if the public interest is not opposed to it, please to communicate to the Senate of the United States what passed there at that conference between you and the enemies of the country?" This is impertinent in the opinion of "the king's friend;" but, sir, the "king" himself does not consider it so. Abraham Lincoln never objected to a fair inquiry like this, nor, in my judgment, will he thank his "friend" for interposing in his behalf in a case of this kind.

Sir, I did say on a former occasion that I thought there was great impropriety in this meeting, and I have not altered my mind on that subject. I wish to God that the President had taken a different view from that by which he seems to have been actuated. I wish the President had conceived it incompatible with the high position he holds as the President of the United States to proceed to meet the emissaries of the rebel chief. I think it was a condescension not very honorable to the nation, on his part; but he has done it, and good may come of it for aught I know. He took one view of the subject and I another; but being a Senator upon this floor, I entertain my opinion as strongly and as firmly as the President does his. He may be right and I may be wrong, but there is nothing in the relation between the President and the Senate that requires me to get on my knees and humiliate myself before him, and say these great questions of public interest do not belong to me as well as to the President. I am responsible to the State of Ohio, nay, to the whole nation, as much as he is, for the way that this thing shall come out. I want to know what he is doing. We have invested him with vast powers, says the gentleman. So we have; and is it not the business of a free people, is it not the business of the Senate of the United States, to watch the President, and see how he exercises the vast powers we have conferred upon him? I know of nothing more important in our position than that, although we have the utmost confidence in the President, on these great questions we shall look into his acts; we shall call for all the facts, because we are ultimately to act upon them, as well as the President of the United States. Why should we not respectfully ask him, "Sir, if there is nothing incompatible with the public interest in telling us what you have done, let us know what it is." Is there anything more important than to know what propositions he did make to the rebels, on what terms he did agree that there should be an amnesty; what offers on our part they so arrogantly rejected? These are questions that the Senator thinks we have nothing to do with; these are questions which he thinks do not interest the Senate of the United States. He thinks this interview was a mere personal amusement of the President, with which the Senate has nothing to do, and in regard to which it is impertinent to inquire. Sir, I scout all such ideas.

I care nothing for the gentleman's attack to-day. As I said before, he will not provoke a reply from me. Perhaps I ought not to say a word in reply, as I did not before. I care nothing for what he has said; I think nothing about it; I even bear him no malice for anything he can say, for I have never had anything to do with him and never want to have. [Laughter.] I did say on a former occasion that I intended to know, if there was power in this body to ascertain, what it was that that negotiation was about. I thought it interesting, and I thought we ought to have it, and I declared that if the Senate had the power to get the information I would know. I should have introduced such a resolution as this long before now, but very soon after I took my seat on making those remarks to which I have just alluded the Senator from Massachusetts offered a resolution—almost in the exact terms of that which I would have presented, and I was content with it, glad that he had taken the matter under his wing, and was not disposed to say a single word on the subject, only glad that the inquiry was to be made, willing and anxious to vote for the resolution in silence, without saying a word, but here I must be provoked by this uncalled-for attack of the Senator, repeating his old speech against me, and trying to make it offensive by saying that he meant me, and me alone, or the Senator from Kentucky and myself. What a poor miserable appeal to what he supposes to be the prejudices that exist on one side and the other of this Chamber! What fine statesmanship for a "friend" of the President here, instead of undertaking to make peace and conciliation in this great council of the United States, to descend to the lowest depths of demagogism in order to provoke a controversy between me and those who are disposed to agree with me upon a certain proposition that we suppose to be right! How did he suppose that a gentleman worthy a seat upon this floor was going to be swayed by such an appeal as that?

Sir, I rejoice when on the other side of the Chamber I find gentlemen who agree with me in regard to any great question that concerns the country. I am glad we are not divided always. We have been divided, we frequently are divided in opinion, so that we have to battle sharply to maintain our different positions. I regret that always; and nothing pleases me more than when I think I am right to be confirmed in that opinion by finding that statesmen on the other side of the Chamber rise and express their agreement with me and their intention to vote in company with me. On the occasion referred to more than two thirds of the Senate voted as I did; and yet I am to be arraigned here as the enemy of the President, and the Senator says his remarks applied to nobody but me. Because I advocated a position which commanded the votes of more than two thirds of the Senate, and because the Senator from Kentucky and some other gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber agreed to a proposition which it was so manifest to everybody ought to pass, I am to be arraigned. He is particular to tell the Senate that he means the Senator from Ohio, and the attack is made on me for agreeing with a Senator on the other side! I say again, the Senator thus appeals to the low, miserable prejudices of party spirit on the floor of the Senate; and he tells us that he hurls his anathemas not at the Senate, but at the Senator from Ohio; and yet I was speaking the sentiments, if I understand the vote, of two thirds of the members of this body. I was content with the substance. My position was maintained strongly against all he could say, and I thought I might well set off the vote sustaining me against a poor, miserable, demagogical speech that anybody might make anywhere. The substantial thing was that a triumphant vote of the Senate of the United States sustained me in my position; and the Senator says he gave me a sound thrashing for holding such opinions, and that he did not mean to attack any other members of the Senate. Did not others argue the same question? Did not others give the same vote? Did not his remarks as well apply to them as to me? If I was Pilate and the Senator from Kentucky was Herod, were there not a great many Pilates and Herods on both sides of this Chamber on that same subject? The Senator from Kentucky and myself do not disagree more than the Senator from Wisconsin disagrees with a large majority of the Senate of the United States. But I am to be singled out, and old things that have slept for a year are to be brought up against me, because another Senator properly sees fit to rebuke the Senator from Wisconsin for his unprovoked attack upon the Senate itself, and he parries it by saying, "I, the other day, attacked the Senator from Ohio; I attacked him personally; I did not speak for the Senate; I did not speak for the country; I hurled my anathemas at the Senator from Ohio, and the rest of you ought not to complain, because I did not mean you." The Senate agreed with me in my argument; but he did not mean to attack the Senate, he meant to attack the Senator from Ohio!

Sir, in an hour like this, when the nation is engaged in a gigantic struggle with the worst enemies that the world ever saw, and we are deliberating how best we can extricate the country from this condition, I envy not the Senator who so far forgets his duty to the country and to the Senate itself as to rise here and make a speech of an hour and a half or two hours barely to lecture the Senator from Ohio or anybody else. Poor "friend" of the President! Miserable prop, to maintain his dignity by an attack on me! It does not make much difference to the President whether the attack succeeds or fails. The President will not care much about it either way. But that is the Senator's excuse. He made the longest, fiercest, most vindictive speech I have heard in the Senate since the rebels ran away; and now he says he meant it nearly all for me, and a little portion of it for the Senator from Kentucky, who seemed to care as little about it as I did. That Senator handled the subject so well that if I had been disposed to say anything afterward I could not have added a word to what I believe, in the judgment of the Senate, was his triumphant vindication of himself and, I thought, incidentally of me. So I dropped it; and now I drop it again, hoping that this resolution will pass, because I believe that things transpired in that conference which the Senate of the United States ought to know. I think the President ought to tell us what propositions he made to these scoundrels, and what they rejected, that the whole country may know how we stand related to them. Did they maintain their old arrogance? Did they reject propositions that were most reasonable to be made? Or did the President fail to make any propositions or terms that ordinary men should have complied with? Are not these things matters that the Senate ought to know; and if they ought to know them, how else can they reach that knowledge, except by a resolution like this, respectful in its terms, calling on the President to disclose to us whatever transpired, that, in his judgment, it is not incompatible with the public interest to let us know? That is all there is of it; and the Senator from Wisconsin thinks that is a violent attack on the President against the peace and dignity of the country. Sir, there is nothing wrong about it. There is nothing in it that the President would not agree to. I have made no attack on the President. I maintain this resolution without fear of any rebuke from the President of the United States or anybody else, except the Senator from Wisconsin. And, sir, I have done with him. I have marked his course a long time. I do not know why he has become so venomous toward me. I have never had anything to do with him. I have no disposition to enter into any negotiations with him on any subject whatever. I am willing here to leave him the defender of the President. Whenever I see fit to attack the President when he is wrong, I shall do it just as quick as if this Cerberus stood in the way barking as though there was no opposition whatever; it would make no difference with me.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, this denunciation of the Senator from Ohio will not provoke my temper. I have never expressed myself as angry to the Senator from Ohio. I have spoken to the Senator from Ohio in earnestness, and I usually speak in earnestness on every subject when I address the Senate. I said in reference to the Senator from Ohio that in the language which he used in his speech he did attack the Administration and the President in the strongest terms possible to be used; but have I used any expression of anger toward the Senator from Ohio? Not at all. I have spoken of his language toward the Administration and the Executive; I have denounced the language, denounced the position, and I have done it heretofore; I shall do it hereafter, undoubtedly. When the Senator assumes that I stand here to speak as the special friend of the Executive, he is entirely mistaken. I admit that I am one among the friends of the Executive, and when I think the Executive is right in the course that he pursues, I propose to defend him against all the denunciations the Senator from Ohio can make, has ever made, or may hereafter make, when he is wrong in making them.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio in this very speech says the President was wrong in consenting to go down to Fortress Monroe to listen to the propositions of any individuals on the subject of peace; that it was undignified and unbecoming his great presidential office which he fills to do so. The Senator the other day in the midst of his denunciatory and inflammatory speech, went on to declare to the Senate, in denunciation of that proceeding, that he desired to know, and he vowed that he would know if there was power enough in the Senate to compel the knowledge to be given, what transpired between the President and those gentlemen. Sir, when that gentleman asks and prays for peace here among the friends of the Administration is it for him to begin war on the Administration; war on its friends, denunciation of the Executive in advance, without knowing the circumstances under which he met those gentlemen, denouncing it in ignorance of all that has occurred, and declare that the power of the Senate was to be used to compel the truth of all that to be disclosed to the Senate and the country? I suppose the honorable Senator from Ohio is thinking about "running" this Administration by the committee on the conduct of the war, assuming that instead of the President of the United States controlling the Army, granting amnesty, listening to propositions for peace, for laying down the arms of the rebels, the committee on the conduct of the war must be consulted; the Senate must exercise its power and go into all this administration and see what amnesty ought to be tendered by the President, whether pardon should be granted if their arms should be laid down, or upon what terms!

Let me say to the honorable Senator from Ohio, once for all, that I claim no more to be a supporter of the Administration than any other gentleman on this floor; and I am no more a supporter of the Administration than he, in my judgment, ought to be in good faith, from the position that he holds, because I believe that the interests of this country and the interests of the Government depend upon our giving the Administration a fair, a cordial, and a united support in the great struggle through which we are passing. I do not ask the Senator from Ohio to go against his own convictions and to sustain what he does not believe; I do not ask him to do wrong, to violate his own conscience; nor do I expect to violate my own conscience, nor will I support any measure which I believe to be wrong. I claim for myself the same independence which I am willing to give to him; but what I say to the Senator from Ohio is, that he has no right to begin a denunciation in advance of the action of the Executive when he knows nothing of the facts, as he did time and again, the other day, in his speech denouncing this whole proceeding by which the President of the United States has, it is said, held these conferences with those gentlemen and listened to the proposals that they made. Why should the Senator from Ohio denounce it in advance? Why should he threaten the Executive with the whole power of the Senate to compel the disclosure of all that occurred between them? Why all these muttering threats from the Senator from Ohio in advance of his knowing what had occurred?

Mr. President, I have not denounced this resolution as coming from the Senator from Massachusetts as an attack on the President. I have said, and the strongest expression I have used in relation to it is, that I believed it was unwise to make the inquiry in the present state of the circumstances. I did go on and say further that it was the usual mode which was adopted when attacks were made upon the Administration by an opposition. It seems to presuppose that the President of the United States will not voluntarily disclose to Congress what it is necessary should be disclosed, or that something has occurred which, as the Senator from Ohio himself says, in his opinion does not conform to the dignity of the high position that he holds; that he has been doing something derogatory to his character as President of the United States, as the Senator believes.

Now, sir, I come to speak to the Senator from Ohio. He says that I have no right to speak particularly of him. I think I have some right when the Senator connects me personally with the Executive in a public charge circulated all over the country, alleging that I had been in some conspiracy with the Executive to defeat the proper action of Congress upon a bill that was then pending. I tell the Senator from Ohio that I never passed one word with the President on the subject of the bill to which he referred until it had passed. I complain of that.

But the Senator says that is an old matter that has been asleep. Having expressed myself on it, if the Senator so desires, it can sleep. If the Senator thinks that upon this floor, between all parties here who claim to support the Government in this great crisis, it is our duty that we should be at peace one with another, I am ready for peace. But in order that that peace may be maintained, I insist that the Senator from Ohio shall not, in every speech that he makes on this floor, travel out of the record unnecessarily to denounce the Executive as wanting nerve, wanting blood, failing in the performance of his duty, denouncing him for this very proceeding which is called for by the resolution as undignified, not comporting with the presidential office, and threatening in advance that he will bring the power of the Senate to compel the disclosure of all that has there occurred.

Mr. WADE. I want to put one question to the Senator. If I am supposed to be guilty of all these improprieties what has he to do about it particularly? What charge has he over me?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I claim no authority over the Senator from Ohio, but the Senator from Ohio must not make war on me if he expects to have peace.

Mr. WADE. I wish barely to say that in all the things about which the Senator accuses me, I had not mentioned his name or thought of him; and why does he talk about my attack on him? He seems to consider what he calls an attack on the President as an attack on him. I have not mentioned his name, nor would I do so now but for the fact that having got into a little controversy with another Senator, he turns around and repeats his old speech and says he meant it all for me then and now. I care nothing about it.

He says there may be peace or war between us. It will not disturb me very much whether there be peace or whether there be war. I reckon I shall always "pursue the even tenor of my way" here very much as I have done heretofore, and I doubt whether I shall think of the Senator three times during the whole session, and certainly not unless he wakes me up as he has done now when I was not dreaming of him at all, and had not for a month.

The resolution was agreed to.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill with a view to reference.

Mr. COLLAMER. I object to everything until my little bill is finished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) The bill (S. No. 390) relating to the postal laws is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COLLAMER. In pursuance of the request of members I had the honor to go through with the bill, explaining its various provisions, until I reached the last section, the seventeenth. In 1863, Congress, on the recommendation of the head of the Department, adopted a plan to enable him to put in operation the free-delivery system, and in order to do that it was provided that on all drop letters two cents postage should be prepaid, and with that money it was thought he would procure the free-delivery of mail matter in most of our cities and large towns. It was in consequence of that assurance that the law was passed. The present head of the Department finds, as he thinks, under the experiments made by his predecessor and himself, that the two cents which is received on drop letters does not anything like pay the expense of the system of free delivery, and therefore he cannot carry on that system in many of the cities and towns where it has been established, and he has been compelled to suspend it. He so construes the law which provided for free delivery that he cannot have a penny post to deliver letters, as formerly was the case, and the seventeenth section of this bill is to so construe that law as not to forbid that. It is so framed as to say that the act of 1863 shall receive that construction.

The committee on examining the subject were willing that where he could not sustain his free-delivery system he might have the penny post, but that in such cases he should have but one cent postage on drop letters. The additional cent was given to pay for the delivery, and if there is no free delivery we think the postage should be but one cent on drop letters. That is to say, for instance the people in Dover or Salem shall not pay two cents on their drop letters in order to enable Boston and New York to have theirs delivered free. We therefore propose in this section to amend the law by providing that the Postmaster General may set up a penny post where he does not have free delivery, in his discretion; but that in that case the postage on the drop letters shall be but one cent. It is further provided that in those cities in which there are at least fifty thousand population he shall establish the free-delivery system; meaning thereby that if it cannot be made efficient for that purpose we shall not have it at all.

There is also an additional section recommended as an amendment by the committee, beyond the seventeenth section as printed in the original bill. This new section may perhaps well claim some attention, and it may be liable to some objection. It is now proposed to be inserted in the form in which the Department recommended. I am not perhaps entirely satisfied with it. It is said that our mails are made the vehicle for the conveyance of great numbers and quantities of obscene books and pictures, which are sent to the Army, and sent here and there and everywhere, and that it is getting to be a very great evil. This section is drawn with a view to prevent that. The first part of it provides that if such publications are in the mails the postmasters may take them out; and the latter part provides a penalty and a punishment for those who put them into the mails. The Senate may adopt the whole of this section, or the latter part of it without the first part.

Mr. JOHNSON. If they are sent in envelopes, how does the postmaster know what they are?

Mr. COLLAMER. Printed publications are always sent open at one end. It will not require the breaking of seals.

Mr. JOHNSON. You do not propose to let the postmaster break the seals?

Mr. COLLAMER. There is not a word said about "seals" in the section. If gentlemen are not satisfied with that part of it which authorizes the postmaster to throw them out, that part of the section can be stricken out; and I take it the objection would be mainly that it might be made a precedent for undertaking to give him a sort of censorship over the mails and allow him to discard matter which was not satisfactory, politically, to some party—like throwing out the abolition papers that used to be talked about. If it is thought that it may furnish a bad precedent to that extent, the first clause of the section may be stricken out, and then the amendment will merely make it penal for anybody to deposit such matter in the mails. The provision is reported as the Department wished it; but I shall be quite as well satisfied personally if the first clause is rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to strike out the first clause. The precedent is a bad one, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will my motion be in order after those amendments shall have been disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be.

Mr. COLLAMER. This section of which I have just spoken is an amendment of the committee; but there is one before it which should first be acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the next amendment of the committee in order.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out the thirteenth section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in the act entitled "An act to establish a postal money-order system," approved May 17, 1864, or in any other act, shall be so construed as to prevent deputy postmasters at money-order offices from depositing in the national banks designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as public depositories, to their own credit and at their risk, money-order funds in their charge, under the direction of the Postmaster General, nor to prevent their negotiating drafts, orders, or other evidences of debt through these banks, as they may be instructed and required by the Postmaster General, in order to facilitate the working of the money-order system.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And be it further enacted, That nothing contained in the act entitled "An act to establish a postal money-order system," approved May 17, 1864, or in any other act, shall be so construed as to prevent deputy postmasters at money-order or other offices from depositing in the national banks designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as public depositories, to their own credit as deputy postmasters, money-order or other funds in their charge, under the direction of the Postmaster General, nor to prevent their negotiating drafts, orders, or other evidences of debt through these banks, as they may be instructed and required by the Postmaster General.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the seventeenth section the following proviso:

Provided, nevertheless, and it is hereby further enacted, That the system of free delivery shall be established in every place containing a population of fifty thousand within the delivery of the office thereof, and at such other places as the Postmaster General in his judgment shall direct: And further provided, That the prepayment postage on drop letters in all places where free delivery is not established shall be one cent only.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as an additional amendment:

And be it further enacted, That no obscene book, pamphlet, picture, print, or other publication of a vulgar and indecent character, shall be admitted into the mails of the United States; but all such obscene publications deposited in or received at any post office, or discovered in the mails, shall be seized and destroyed, or otherwise disposed of, as the Postmaster General shall direct. And any person or persons who shall deposit or cause to be deposited in any post office or branch post office of the United States, for mailing or for delivery, an obscene book, pamphlet, picture, print, or other publication, knowing the same to be of a vulgar and indecent character, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, being duly convicted thereof, shall, for every such offense, be fined not more than $500, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the first part of it, so as to leave it merely to create an offense on the part of those who deposit in the mails these books or other publications. It seems to me—and in that I believe the chairman of the Post Office Committee, in a great measure, if not wholly, concurs—that it would be establishing a very bad precedent to give authority to postmasters to take anything out of the mail. It is true that most of the printed matter that is sent is sent without being covered or sealed up; but if there is any danger of this kind those who send this species of publications will no doubt soon begin to seal them, and then the postmaster, whenever he suspects that the envelope contains anything which is obnoxious to objection, will break the seal. It does not appear to me to be at all necessary to the accomplishment of the purpose; for after the postmaster takes the material out, what is he to do with it? May he circulate it if he thinks proper? It is sufficient, as I think, to accomplish the end, which is a laudable end in itself, to make it a misdemeanor on the part of him who seeks to send through the mail matter of this description. That will be done if the first part of the section is stricken out. I move to strike out all of the section after the enacting clause down to, and including the word "and" in line seven.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would much prefer, if the Senator would be satisfied, with simply striking out the second clause of the first paragraph. I think the prohibition against publications of this character going into the mails ought to stand. We are well aware that many of these publications are sent all over the country from the city of New York with the names of the parties sending them on the backs, so that the postmasters without opening the mail matter may know that it is offensive matter, indecent and improper to be carried in the public mails. I think, therefore, the legislative prohibition against carrying such matter when it is known to the postmasters should be left. Probably the second clause allowing him to open mail matter should be struck out; and I suggest to the Senator to modify his amendment by merely moving to strike out the words "but all such obscene publications deposited in or received at any post office, or discovered in any mail, shall be seized and destroyed or otherwise disposed of, as the Postmaster General shall direct."

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to that, and I so modify my amendment.

The amendment, as modified, was read.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest a mere verbal amendment. I think, in the third line, it would be well to say that none of them shall be delivered or admitted into the mail. This simply says they shall not be admitted.

Mr. COLLAMER. The other part goes on to make the offense of putting in such matter for mailing or delivering a misdemeanor.

Mr. HALE. Well, I do not care about it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. That ends all the amendments proposed by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one amendment, verbal in its character, which I wish to suggest. On page 5, in the fourth line of section seven, as it now stands—the original section eight—the reference to the section should be stricken out, and the word "preceding" inserted, so as to make it definite. It refers now to "the seventh section of this act," but by the changes made the original seventh section is now the sixth section.

Mr. COLLAMER. It ought to be "the sixth."

Mr. SHERMAN. Say "the preceding section."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That mistake will be corrected as a clerical error.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire also to call the Senator's attention to the maximum of expense allowed to special agents. In the seventh section, as it is now, the amount allowed to special agents for traveling and incidental expenses is four dollars a day, and in the preceding section it is five dollars. I think it ought to be uniform.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is five dollars a day in the Pacific States and Territories.

Mr. SHERMAN. While the present sixth section applies to the special agent on the Pacific coast, it also authorizes the appointment of "two additional special agents to superintend postal matters connected with the railway mail service of the United States," and their maximum allowance for traveling and incidental expenses is five dollars a day, while the next section fixes the allowance for all special agents at four dollars a day. I think that ought to be increased to five dollars.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the present seventh section by striking out "four" and inserting "five."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now propose an amendment which is of some consequence, and I want the attention of the chairman to it. I move to strike out the third section. It is the section which compels the postage on every newspaper sent through the mails to be prepaid at the place of publication. I think that will operate to the ruin of a great many country papers. It will be destructive to that interest and will operate exceedingly partially. I suppose the very large papers that circulate by fifties and hundreds of thousands, such as the New York Herald, Tribune, and World, and some of the Philadelphia papers, pay no postage, but are transmitted by express outside of the mails and are sold by newsboys. They are thus free from the burden of postage. The country papers that are sent to their subscribers go through the mails; and now, in addition to the taxes you have imposed on them for advertising and everything else, you propose to require the publisher to pay the postage in advance at the place of publication. I think the small country papers are sufficiently burdened, and that this further tax upon them will be very severe, and in many cases ruinous.

A great many of the country papers do not receive all their subscription money, or anything like it, in cash, but circulating in the country they are paid for in barter, by the country produce of the farmers who take them; and my friend from Maine [Mr. FARWELL] suggests, what I have no doubt is true, that a great many of the subscribers never pay at all. To impose on the editor the necessity of paying in advance the postage upon these papers, for many of which he never gets any pay, it seems to me would be burdensome. It is a new feature. I think that the arrangement of making the subscribers pay quarterly is well enough. If you choose, you may require them to pay quarterly in advance.

Mr. FARWELL. It is so now.

Mr. HALE. If that is properly enforced by the Post Office Department, it is enough, and this section is not necessary.

Mr. COLLAMER. The law is now that the postage on all papers that go through the mails must be paid. This section visits no new burden on anybody. Instead of having the postage paid by the quarter, at the end of the quarter, and collected at the office of delivery, it provides, in order to secure the money, that the postage shall be paid at the place where the paper is mailed. That will not make any country paper pay any more than it does now. Instead of having the postage collected from the subscribers through the postmaster, the publisher will pay the postage when he puts it in the post office, and the subscriber will pay the publisher, instead of paying the postmaster. That is all. There is nothing in the idea that this will visit any new burden on anybody. It is no new burden. It creates no new amount of postage for anybody to pay. It is only to secure the Government that we may get the money we charge for our postage, and the subscribers will pay the postage in advance to the printer, and he will pay it to the postmaster, instead of their paying it to the postmaster. They have got to pay the printer for the paper, and they may as well pay him the postage at the same time.

But the Senator says that some of the large papers that issue great editions send their papers outside of the mails. Undoubtedly they do. This section creates no new law about that. We do not tax by this law papers that do not go into the mails. Under the law now, we do not charge postage on those which do not go into the mails. I do not, therefore, see that there is any new burden created. As I have already explained, it is nothing more nor less than a provision to get the postage already provided for by collecting it in a different manner.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that while this proposition certainly does not increase the burden, it makes it much more inconvenient. It is an inconvenience, certainly, because many of the country papers, as has already been suggested, are not paid for in money; they are paid for in barter, in country produce. It is so with many papers in the Senator's own State; and if the publisher is obliged to pay the postage in advance he will not send the paper. It is very desirable for the country that these small papers that just live should be kept alive. They are very useful in the circulation of intelligence, very useful for town and county purposes, and they are very useful in stimulating the patriotism of the country at this time, and I think this would be felt as a very considerable burden on them. It would not be of any consequence to the papers in the large cities, because most of them are distributed by news men, and those that go to individual subscribers are almost always paid for in advance. It is not so with country papers; they are not generally paid for in advance; but at the end of the time a farmer comes in with a load of wood, or a barrel of potatoes, and settles with the publisher. If this section of the bill be retained it will tend very much to curtail the circulation of small country papers.

Mr. COLLAMER. It happens that I live in the country, and the gentleman lives in a city; I understand the country press. The talk of paying for papers in country produce, a practice which existed some twenty, thirty, or forty years ago, has nothing in it. There is not an article of country produce anywhere in our country now that is not cash at the door. No man is obliged to run around to try to get the printer to take his wood for the paper. He can have his dollar for his wood any day, anywhere. There is no such thing now as paying in produce for papers. No country printer could get butter for his family in that way. The system is all money. So far from being an injury to the publisher, this will be a benefit. It will be a benefit that the credit system, which is almost entirely done away with throughout our country, shall cease with printers as well as other people. This will enable the printer to say to his subscribers, "I have to prepay this postage; now you must prepay me." I do not believe it will injure them in the least. Certain it is, that as the matter is now regulated, we are losing a large amount of our postage which is not collected, and this is the only way in which we can secure its collection.

Besides, while we keep up the practice of sending printed matter through the mails without prepayment, we are obliged to keep up this great system of accounts to which I have already called attention. The accounts of the postmasters for what they collect all over the country cannot be kept in postage stamps. We have now more than twenty thousand quarterly returns; and by continuing the practice of carrying newspapers without prepayment we still keep up that system, and all that immense number of accounts must be managed and manipulated in the Department here. We never can simplify that system of accountability in the office in any other manner than by making prepayment uniform on printed matter as well as on written matter.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no doubt that there is great force in the argument in regard to the simplification of accounts; but I think there is nothing at all in regard to postage. I think at the present price of paper the papers that are forfeited for the non-payment of postage are fully equal to the postage. I think they would sell for that.

Mr. COLLAMER. The very same difficulty arises that we never get any accounts of them.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I think you ought to have honest postmasters, and the country papers ought not to suffer for that deficiency. It is true that the Senator lives in the country and I live in a city; but almost the only thing about which I pretend to know as much as the Senator is newspapers, and I can assure him that if this section passes he will hear from the country press all over the country, and the voice will be such as I predict, not such as he does.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to inform the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads that in my opinion, and I live in the country, the workings of this section will be to suspend all our weekly papers. The papers are sent to the country people on credit frequently. The editors cannot prepay the postage. The average circulation of our weekly newspapers is four or five hundred. The editors cannot prepay the postage on four or five hundred papers every week. It is as much as they can do to live now. I can assure the Senator that the section will have a very serious effect on the papers in our State. I want to give my vote so that it shall be understood, and I ask for the yeas and nays. ["Oh, no."] Well, I withdraw the call for the present.

Mr. HALE. I renew the call.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Cowan, Doolittle, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Collamer, Conness, Henderson, Johnson, Pomeroy, Ramsey, and Van Winkle—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Richardson, Stewart, Trumbull, and Wade—13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARWELL. Was the first section stricken from the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first section has been stricken out.

Mr. FARWELL. I propose to offer an amendment to that section, but I can do it when the bill is reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be amendable in the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. FARWELL. I have examined the first section that was stricken out in Committee of the Whole, and I propose to offer an amendment to it, and then retain the section as amended as a part of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will first put the question on concurring in the remainder of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, excepting the first.

The remainder of the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. FARWELL. I move to amend the first section by inserting in line nine, after the word "stamps" the words "which stamps shall be canceled by the postmaster in presence of the person paying the same."

I will state in a word the reason of my offering this amendment. It is clear from the idea the committee had in the first draft of this bill that there were two objects sought to be attained. One object was to secure the revenue of the Post Office Department against any neglect of the postmasters to return moneys that might be collected for unpaid postage, or for box rents, or any other miscellaneous matters where money might come into the hands of the postmaster in any way. Another was to simplify the accounts, to prevent, if possible, the necessity of the quarterly returns of these accounts. The chairman of the committee, when the question was up upon striking out the first section, stated as one of the leading objections, that it would make it necessary to have all his quarterly accounts furnished to the Department, and to be there examined and passed upon by the Department. I hold that if this section is retained with the amendments proposed by me, it will accomplish both the objects which, evidently, the committee wished to accomplish. It will effectually prevent the postmaster from keeping back any of the money that belongs to the Department; and, in the second place, it will do away with the necessity of making returns to the Department of the moneys received not only for business, but for the newspapers included in the section which has been stricken from the bill.

The amendment that I propose provides that all moneys for unpaid postage, which will include the newspapers, shall be paid in postage stamps. The committee were right, so far as that section went, in deciding that it gave no protection. A man goes into a post office and pays his postage stamps, and the postmaster receives them as so much money, and he may sell them again and may put the money into his pocket. But the amendment which I have proposed says that he shall, in the presence of the party paying him those stamps, cancel and destroy them. It may be objected that it will be neglected, that it will not be done, or that there will be some trouble in doing it, but I hold that it will not be neglected. When it is made the duty of the postmaster, (and it will soon be known to every man, woman, and child in the land that it is his duty,) when any stamps are paid him for any of these purposes, in their presence to cancel and deface those stamps, he will do it. I think, perhaps, it would be well to add a penalty to this section, providing that if he shall fail to do it, a penalty shall be inflicted on him for not doing it.

I think I am understood. If I am, that is all I wish to say on the subject. I believe the amendment will accomplish the whole view that the committee had in mind when they drew the bill, and will also remove the objections stated by the chairman of the committee upon the proposition to strike out the first section.

Mr. COLLAMER. I think I need add nothing to what I have heretofore said on this subject. It is said that we shall have some security if we provide that the postmaster shall take these postage stamps and cancel them in the presence of the persons who pay them; but, sir, what security have we that those persons will stay there? They are not bound to stay there, and there is no way to keep them there.

Mr. FARWELL. It is usual, when a postmaster takes money for box rents, to give a receipt, and the person waits for it though he is under no necessity to do so; and if the law provides that he shall cancel these stamps in the presence of the person who pays them, they will be likely to stay there and see it done.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is no law requiring the person to stay there when he pays box rent until he gets a receipt, and in all probability he goes away and cares nothing about a receipt. The great probability is that the person who pays the postage stamps will go right away without waiting to see whether the stamps are canceled or not. He does not care anything about that. The Senator says that if the postmaster is bound to cancel them he will do it; but suppose he does not, there is no possible way of knowing who you are to call on for evidence. The Department are not informed who paid them in. They do not know who were present when they were canceled, and never can know. There is no way to call upon these persons, over whom we have no control and no knowledge, whom we cannot tell anything about. If they are obliged to pay in postage stamps, you will still have to trust to the postmaster's accounts; you will still have to trust to his integrity entirely. You may as well trust him by having him render his accounts as by having him cancel the stamps.

Mr. CONNESS. I was unfortunate in not hearing the first part of the remarks made by the chairman of the committee, but I will state this as an apparent objection to the amendment: the persons sent to the post offices to do business are frequently servants and children. What is their testimony worth in regard to the cancellation of the stamps? No cancellation made in their presence can amount to a check. Nothing can be a check that is not a matter of record between the officer who does the business and the Department. It is there that checks can occur; but nothing that can be done, or be required to be done, in the presence of a third party can amount to a check.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the first section before the question is taken on striking it out.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole, striking out the first section.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Alfred Spink and Daniel Wolf, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry Rudd, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE. The Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 430) to amend an act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, have directed me to report it back to the Senate without amendment, and I should like to have it taken up now and passed, for I believe nobody will object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill now, it having been just reported.

Mr. POWELL. I object.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON. I submit the following resolution; and I give notice that I shall call it up on some future day for consideration:

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday next the Senate will take a recess every day from four o'clock p. m. to seven o'clock p. m.

Mr. SUMNER. Let that lie over.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have already said that I do not ask its consideration now.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. POWELL. I move to take up Senate bill No. 392, the bill to provide for building a railway bridge across the falls of the Ohio river.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POWELL. I want my bill taken up first. We can pass it in a few minutes.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to inquire whether there was any objection made to the request of the chairman of the Committee on Territories; and if so, by whom? The bill that he asked the consideration of will not occupy an instant. It concerns the Senators from Nevada, who have had no opportunity to get the attention of the Senate to it. It will excite no debate, and if taken up I think will be passed with unanimity. I hope that it will be allowed to be taken up at the present time.

Mr. POWELL. I cannot consent to it. I have yielded my bill for three weeks. I have no doubt I shall vote for the bill indicated by the Senator; but I think my bill is one of that kind also, and I want it to be acted upon now.

Mr. CONNESS. We will take that bill up afterwards.

Mr. POWELL. I think I can get my bill through when taken up in a few moments.

Mr. WADE. I do not care which is taken up first, and I do not think that either will give rise to debate; but I should like to have that bill in regard to Nevada taken up. They can both be acted upon, I think, this afternoon.

Mr. POWELL. I move that the bill indicated by me be now taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 392) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads." It proposes to amend the act of Congress of July 14, 1862, so as to authorize the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company and the Jeffersonville and Indianapolis Railroad Company (stockholders in the Louisville Bridge Company) to construct a railroad bridge over the Ohio river at the head of the falls of the Ohio, subject to all the provisions of that act; but the bridge may be constructed at a height not less than fifty-six feet above low-water mark, and with three draws, sufficient to pass the largest boats navigating the Ohio river; one over the Indiana chute, one over the middle chute, and one over the canal. The spans of the bridge are not to be less than two hundred and forty feet, except over the Indiana and middle chute and the canal. The bridge is to be constructed with draws of one hundred and fifty feet wide on each side of the pivot pier over the Indiana and middle chutes, and ninety feet wide over the canal; and the bridge and draws are to be so constructed as not to interrupt the navigation of the Ohio river.

The second section provides that the bridge erected under the provisions of this act is to be a lawful structure, and is to be recognized and known as a post route.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported the bill with two amendments: in line five, after the word "be," to insert the words "and the same is hereby;" and in line six, after the word "Jeffersonville," to strike out the words "and Indianapolis;" so that it will read:

That the act of Congress approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," shall be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to authorize the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and the Jeffersonville Railroad Company, &c.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow. My colleague is absent, and I do not know where he is.

Mr. POWELL. I hope that motion will not prevail.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was passed.

BOUNDARIES OF NEVADA.

Mr. WADE. I now move to take up the bill for Nevada.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appeal to my colleague not—

Mr. WADE. If my colleague will allow this bill to be taken up now, we can take up his afterward.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is another bill only four or five lines in length in regard to the Covington bridge over the Ohio river, which can be acted upon in a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill indicated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] having been reported to-day and objected to, the motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. WADE. I believe it is not objected to now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not object to it.

Mr. WADE. We will take up the other bill afterward.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if the bill will give rise to debate?

Mr. WADE. I presume not. I have no idea that it will. The Senators from Nevada are very anxious that it shall be passed now, in order that we may get it through the other House. I do not think it will give rise to debate. If it does, I will give way. I am as much interested in the next bill as my colleague is, and I want it to pass; but the Senators from Nevada want this bill passed now, and I am anxious to accommodate them.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is the next bill?

Mr. WADE. It is a bill similar to the one just passed for a bridge over the Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is to declare the Cincinnati and Covington railroad a post road.

Mr. WADE. There will be no debate on either of them, I presume.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator from Missouri will allow this bill to be taken up. It will only occupy a moment of time.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly, I am perfectly willing to yield. I have no idea that I shall be able to get up my bill; my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to-morrow at one o'clock takes up the bills reported from the Finance Committee, and I do not see any hope at all of getting my bill considered.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 430) to amend an act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. The bill proposes to amend the second section of the act to which it is an amendment, so as to read as follows, to wit:

That the said State of Nevada shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the thirty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington with the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude; thence due west along said thirty-seventh degree of north latitude to the eastern boundary line of the State of California; thence in a northwesterly direction along the said eastern boundary line of the State of California to the forty-third degree of longitude west from Washington; thence north along said forty-third degree of west longitude, and said eastern boundary line of the State of California, to the forty-second degree of north latitude; thence due east along the said forty-second degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the aforesaid thirty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due south down said thirty-seventh degree of west longitude to the place of beginning.

Mr. WADE. That the Senate may understand really what this bill is, I will remark that the State of Nevada is bounded on the east by Utah Territory; they lie side by side; and this bill proposes to take one degree of longitude from Utah Territory and annex it to the State of Nevada; about sixty-nine and a half miles, I suppose, or thereabouts. I have not measured it; but from the eye it seems that Nevada and Utah will then be about equal in point of territory.

Mr. SHERMAN. Are there any inhabitants in the portion proposed to be annexed to Nevada?

Mr. WADE. There are a few inhabitants there, I am told. I am told also—the Senators from Nevada will be more able to speak on that point than I am—that this will make a very excellent boundary between Utah and Nevada, because there is a kind of desert that divides them on this parallel; so that it will be a natural division as well as one that will be equitable between the two; it makes their territory about equal.

The Senators from that State, however, will be able to speak more intelligently upon the subject if there is any dispute about it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I rise merely to inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether the Latter Day Saints have been consulted in regard to this encroachment upon their borders.

Mr. WADE. I believe not; I do not know that they were. The committee had no evidence of it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then it is done without consulting them at all?

Mr. WADE. I do not know that they understand it, or know anything about it, and I do not know but they do. The committee had no such evidence.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose the territory that will be added to the State of Nevada by this bill has some population and constitutes portions of some of the counties into which the Territory of Utah may be divided, and there may be suits pending there. There is no provision in this bill for the transfer of those cases to the courts in Nevada. I think perhaps it would be well, therefore, and I suggest it to the honorable members from Nevada, to let the bill lie over in order that they may make a provision that will cover all such cases. It can be done in the morning. I do not know whether there is any population there.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I am quite familiar with the ground described in this bill. There are no inhabitants in that portion of the Territory of Utah that we propose to annex to the State of Nevada. Next year, in all probability, there will be quite a large population there; but not Mormons. The object in getting this bill passed through Congress at the present session is with a view of determining the status of those people who shall then be there. The boundary as it now lies runs through a valley that is well adapted to agricultural purposes, and about in the center of the valley running from the north to the south of the Territory. The boundaries as we now propose will run through a desert, and it will be a more distinct and plainer boundary.

As I remarked, if this bill should pass, and this territory should be annexed to Nevada, it will have this advantage: it will not be settled by Mormons. The Latter Day Saints have called in all their subjects and followers and brought them in and about Salt Lake and further north and east. They have withdrawn entirely from this portion of territory. The valley in which it lies and the mountain on the eastern side has lately been discovered to be a mining region, and the miners will get there. Their rights will be bettered by this annexation. It is well known to this body that no laws recommended by the Governor of Utah can be passed if they come at all in collision with the will and dictum of the reigning power there, Brigham Young. Therefore, if this district of country remains in the territorial limits of Utah, the miners will be without law and without protection. Our people ask for this measure for the purpose of furnishing protection to the inhabitants who will be in this territory as soon as the spring opens—protection such as is required in order to preserve and maintain the rights of the miners and agriculturists there.

I presume there will be no objection on the part of Utah to the passage of this law. I have heard of none, and the presumption is that there will be none. I think the true way to dispose of this troublesome question of Mormonism is to absorb it by parceling out the Territory of Utah among the other Territories adjacent; and when the period arrives that they cannot be supreme in their rule, they will leave the country, and relieve us of the necessity of keeping a large force of our Army there.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Nevada what is the area of that State now. How large is it?

Mr. NYE. I am unable to give the exact number of miles without a calculation. It is quite a large State, but not as large as Utah is now.

Mr. POMEROY. It is estimated to be one hundred and eight thousand square miles with this addition.

Mr. WADE. It is not a large State.

Mr. GRIMES. There are very grave questions connected with the subject of taking territory from Territories already in existence and adding it to States whence we cannot hereafter reclaim it. If we take this territory from Utah and add it to Nevada, it cannot be taken from Nevada again. It may become important to erect a new Territory between Nevada and Utah. It is not for the interest of the State that the Senator from Ohio himself represents, it is not for the interest of the States of the Northwest, that these States to the west of us should be made so large as we are in the habit of making them, because it deprives us of our proper representation in this branch of Congress. I should like to know a little more than I know now before I vote to make Nevada a State of one hundred and eight thousand square miles; much larger than New York.

Mr. POMEROY. Virginia has sixty-nine thousand square miles.

Mr. GRIMES. New York does not begin to have sixty-nine thousand square miles. It is very evident nobody knows how large Nevada is now; and ought we not to have that information before we add a whole degree of longitude to it and put it beyond our ability hereafter to add it to another State, or to make it a part of a new Territory, and afterward part of a new State?

I do not like to interfere with anything that relates to the Senators from Nevada, but this is a matter in which we are all just as much interested as they are, especially the cluster of States of which mine happens to be one, and who are destined to be very intimately connected with all the States to the west of us. I want to see prosperous States built up there, and just as many of them as possible. I want that section of the country to have its due proportion of influence and power in this branch of Congress as well as in the other. If the physical geography of that country is such as to enable a new State to be erected between Utah and Nevada; if it be a rich agricultural country, as the Senator from Nevada says it is, it will support a good population, and I want those States to be made. I think, at any rate, we have not the information before us now that it is requisite for us to have in order to pass upon so important a question, and I therefore move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. NYE rose.

Mr. GRIMES. I will withdraw my motion to enable the Senator from Nevada to make an explanation.

Mr. NYE. The objection the Senator from Iowa urges against the passage of this bill is one that would be apt to occur to as discerning a gentleman as he is; but there is no probability of the formation of any State between the State of Nevada and the Territory of Utah. After you pass the present boundary, and before you reach the contemplated boundary by this bill, you pass into a desert extending almost clearly across the width of the State of Nevada, where it will hardly be possible for a population to exist. I think, therefore, that that objection is not a valid one.

The territory of the State of Nevada is now larger than that of the State of New York; but, sir, a large portion of that State will never be inhabited; it is a desert. We live there in communities, a mining district here, and a mining district there. It will take a long time, I think, before there will be a necessity for any State between Nevada and the Territory of Utah; and as Utah now stands, I believe it is the settled judgment of Congress that it shall not be admitted as a State. This territory is not sought to be annexed to Nevada because the size of the State of Nevada is inferior, but because the necessities and the convenience of the population that will settle it require it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I see that there is an indisposition to vote upon this question this evening. I do not know that I have any objection to the measure pending myself; but I see that Senators desire to look into it, and I also desire to do so. I will move, therefore, to postpone the pending and all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 359, to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not contest with the Senator from Missouri on this point, nor seek to delay his measure, if he will allow a bill reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to be read and passed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Suppose we take up this one first.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is any objection made to the bill to which I refer I will give way. It will be recollected that I gave way to my colleague, thinking that this bill would not lead to debate.

Mr. WADE. I hope this bill will not be dropped. The other Senator from Nevada, who has not spoken, wants to enlighten the Senate on this subject, and I think he ought to have an opportunity to speak upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion now is to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 359.

Mr. WADE. I hope the Senate will not do that now.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to remind my friend from Ohio of his promise that if the bill now before the Senate should take any time whatever, or provoke discussion, he would give way. He will remember his very kind promise on that subject. However, I do not make this motion now for the purpose of getting rid especially of this measure and taking up another; but I am really in no condition to vote upon the proposition before us, and I find various Senators around me in a like condition. I would prefer to have time to look into the bill further. I do not wish to stave it off; but we should have time to consider it and look into it; and I hope the bill that I have indicated will be taken up.

Mr. STEWART. In order that the Senate may have an opportunity to look into it, and in order that they may have some information in regard to it further than they have, I wish simply to remark, in addition to what my colleague has said, that although the annexation of this territory would give us a middling large State, larger than some of the eastern States in extent of territory, still it would never give us a State where we could have a population equal to one of the western States. Three fourths, probably, and perhaps four fifths, of all the territory in the Great Basin is a desert. The balance is mountain ranges that contain minerals, and little valleys in the carons of the mountains where vegetables can be raised. In order to support a population sufficient for a State we need much more territory. It is not an agricultural country. There are several ranges of mountains that will be mined. Mining will be exhausted in time; of course not in our time; but all the mineral veins may be exhausted; they will be worked to a great depth, and the country will be sparsely settled. The little valleys will be inhabited by an agricultural people; but a mining country, legitimately and emphatically, cannot support a large population like an agricultural country. We need more territory. We shall have a reasonable-sized State when we get the additional territory that we ask for. It will be in a compact form, making it convenient for all the people; it will be nearly square. I have not figured it exactly, but it will contain a little over one hundred thousand square miles.

Mr. GRIMES. Without this addition?

Mr. STEWART. I think not; with this we propose to commence our boundary at the thirty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington, commencing at a point formed by the intersection of the thirty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington with the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude; thence due west along the thirty-seventh degree of north latitude to the eastern boundary of the State of California. (The western boundary line, commencing about the center of our State, runs in a southeasterly direction, so that the State is not square, by any means. The southern end of the State is not as wide as the northern end. We go thence in a north westerly direction along the eastern boundary line of the State of California to the forty-third degree of longitude west from Washington. The northern half of the State extends from the thirty-seventh to the forty-third degree, six degrees. The western line runs southwest from that point, in the middle of it, thence north along the forty-third degree of west longitude, and the eastern boundary line of the State of California, to the forty-second degree of north latitude. From the thirty-seventh to the forty-second degree gives us five degrees north and south, and, in the widest portion of the State, six degrees east and west. It is nearly a square, except that the corner is taken off by that western line. We go thence, due east along the forty-second degree of north latitude to a point formed by its intersection with the thirty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington; thence due south down the thirty-seventh degree of west longitude to the place at which we began.

The people of Nevada, in forming a State constitution, inserted in its provision that the thirty-seventh degree should be its eastern boundary, if Congress would consent; so that if this bill be passed we can assume immediate jurisdiction. There has been some prospecting for gold and silver in the territory for which we ask, and next spring there will be some population there. There will be a considerable population there if they can have protection and laws. They cannot get them from Utah. Brigham Young is opposed to developing the mining region at all. He is opposed to mining. He does not want the miners there. He says that they interfere with his sway. Consequently, unless this territory be ceded to Nevada, this range of mountains which is on our eastern border must remain unprospected and undeveloped altogether, or the miners must take the hazard of protecting themselves. It will be a great advantage to those who desire to develop that country to have it within our State at once, so that they may be protected there this next year. Our people particularly desire this. The Legislature has passed a resolution asking Congress to do this. They want it because they desire to go there and mine.

I assure Senators that when we get this territory we shall have of a country that can be developed, that can be inhabited, a State not as large as Massachusetts, not capable of supporting as large a population as the State of Massachusetts. We are not asking for a country in which we can have an empire, in which we can have a large population; but we are asking for a sufficient amount of territory so that the mining region will support a respectable State. We need this territory to give us a respectable State, to give us a State large enough to support itself properly. We need it for the purpose of protecting those who desire to go there and mine.

This territory is so situated that you will have no other States formed out of it. No difficulty of that kind can arise. A State cannot be formed between us and Utah. You cannot divide the present Territory of Utah into two States. I am in favor of cutting it down to the size of a legitimate State by adding from it to the surrounding Territories and States as they are formed, and not give them a larger territory than we have. Besides, Utah is more of an agricultural country than Nevada. They do not need this territory when they form a State as much as we do. There would be more propriety in our going two degrees further east than in our remaining where we are; it would be a more fair division of the territory. You will never attempt in that desert country between us and Utah to form a separate State. No State can exist there; no State will ever be formed there.

Give us that additional range of mountains, place the eastern boundary of the State in the desert where it belongs, and we shall not call upon you then for a survey. If you keep our present eastern boundary where it is, next year we shall have to ask for an appropriation for a survey. It will be necessary for the people to ascertain where they are in order that they may have an administration of justice. It will be necessary to go to considerable expense to make that survey. If you go a degree further east—I have seen something of the country myself, and I have taken the pains to inform myself from others who are accurately acquainted with it—there will be no necessity for a survey; but if you let the line remain where it is, through a country that is to be inhabited next year, you must give us a survey to determine the lines. I think the point of expense, the point of convenience, and every other consideration is in favor of the passage of this bill. The objections which gentlemen make to it are very natural, because they regard this country as an agricultural country, and they imagine that the whole country can be settled up like the western States. We have no such country. If gentlemen will go there and see what we have and see what is necessary, I am confident they will all be satisfied about it.

I do not think a postponement of this measure will accomplish anything, because you can get no information with regard to the country other than you can get from us. My colleague and myself have traveled over the country; we are familiar with it; we know its resources; we know what is necessary to give us a reasonable extent of country for a State. You have no description of the country. This country has been put upon the maps heretofore as the "unexplored region." You have no description of it; you do not know how much of it is agricultural; you do not know how much of it is mineral; you do not know how much of it is inhabited. We tell you that two thirds, and perhaps three fourths of it, is a desert and cannot be inhabited and cannot support a population; and we need this much territory to make a State with fair proportions. If you take our statement for it you can pass the bill now. You can get no other information, because you have not had the country explored; you have no maps of it, you have no authentic information except what you get from individuals who have traveled over it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to suggest to the Senators from Nevada that I think the probability of the passage of this measure would be very much promoted if it should lie over for a day or two. I know that I would look upon any measure affecting that new State with a great deal of interest, but I could not vote for the bill this evening, and I think that is the disposition of many Senators. I therefore suggest to the Senators from Nevada to let the bill lie over for the present.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Indiana must be aware that it imperils any bill, at this stage of the session, to delay it for two or three days, with the pressure of public business here. I think, with the Senators from Nevada, that if it is to be passed at all, it must be passed now; and let us have a vote upon it.

What has been said by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] in regard to the disposition of Brigham Young toward the settlement of that country for mining purposes is all true, and to a greater extent than he has stated it. I have a constant correspondence with General Conner, located in Utah, having the Mormon problem in charge, and I understand it is only by his protection that miners have been allowed to enter into the Territory of Utah and mine; and that he cannot—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If this measure must be forced upon its merits now, I wish to ask the Senator if he is advised whether the Legislature of the State of Nevada or any other authorities have asked for it, and whether they have furnished the reasons and the facts upon which they did ask it.

Mr. STEWART. They have asked it. The constitutional convention asked it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Have we that document here?

Mr. STEWART. The constitution of the State when it was formed provided that this should be the boundary line, if Congress would consent; thereby asking Congress to consent, and the Legislature, before we left there, passed a memorial—whether it has reached here or not I am not advised—asking for it, and setting forth substantially the reasons we have given to-day for this boundary. I do not know whether that memorial has arrived or not. The constitution of the State provides that this shall be the boundary, if Congress will consent.

Mr. CONNESS. I will not continue to occupy the time of the Senate, and hope the Senator will withdraw his motion to postpone and let us take a vote upon the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on postponing the present and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of Senate bill No. 359; and the Chair will suggest that under the rules of the Senate debate upon that question does not involve the merits of either bill, but should be confined to giving the reasons for and against taking up the one or the other of the bills.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will simply state, in reference to this matter, that I think the Senators from Nevada themselves would advance their measure by a postponement of it until another day. I am not prepared to vote upon it now, and if called upon to vote upon it this afternoon it is altogether likely that I should vote against it. Would it not be better to wait until this memorial arrives here, or at least for a short time? I cannot consent to withdraw my motion.

Mr. STEWART. I think if the bill is to be passed at all it ought to be passed in time to go through the other House at this session. Next year we shall have a population in this territory, and we shall be asking appropriations to make surveys. It is highly important that this measure should be passed at this session. If the members of the Senate could see the country and understand the situation, no gentleman certainly would vote against it; it would be apparent to all that we need this additional territory. I have no objection to the bill lying over, but I am fearful at this stage of the session that if it is laid over there will not be time to get it through the House; and it is quite important for the accommodation of those who desire to develop that country that if it is to be acted upon at all it should be passed at this session. If there were any means of information open to the Senate, any means of investigation, if the description of the country was in the books, if they had not ultimately to take the statements of individuals who have seen it, if they had any access to any other information, I would not press it; but it is not probable that they will have any this year or next year unless we can induce gentlemen to go out with us next year and see the country.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This will be the unfinished business in the morning; the Senate is getting very thin—

Mr. CONNESS. There is a motion to postpone pending.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know there is a motion to postpone; and in order to get rid of all these motions, and have it come up right in the morning, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 8, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 408) entitled "An act in addition to the several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

On motion of Mr. A. W. CLARK, by unanimous consent, joint resolution of the Senate

(No. 106) providing for the compilation of the Congressional Directory at each session, was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think this is a very proper resolution and may as well be passed now. It will enable us to get the Directory in time to be of some service to us, and not oblige us to wait weeks for it, as we have to do now. I ask for the reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read. It provides for the compilation of the Congressional Directory under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, and to be published by the Superintendent of Public Printing, the first edition for each session to be ready for distribution within one week after the commencement of the session.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I withdraw the motion to refer.

The joint resolution was then ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would state to the House, that as the business of the House now stands, there seems to be very little probability that the committees of this House can be called for reports at this session. And as every gentleman knows how our desks are filled with reports ready to be made from all the several committees, I would ask that unanimous consent be given that the morning hour of every other day than Monday shall be appropriated to the call of committees for reports, and that the call shall proceed regularly.

No objection being made, the order was accordingly made.

PEACE NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House such information as he may deem not incompatible with the public interest relative to the recent conference between himself and the Secretary of State and Messrs. Stephens, Hunter, and Campbell, in Hampton Roads.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas charges of gross fraud and corruption in office have been made recently against the Commissioner of Patents and placed on the desks of the members of this House, and signed by a gentleman who offers to prove the same: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed to investigate the said charges, and report their action to this House.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN FLOWER.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask leave to withdraw the papers of John Flower from the Committee of Claims, to which committee they were improperly referred on my motion, when they should have gone to the War Department.

No objection was made.

AMENDMENTS OF THE RULES.

Mr. COX. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. STEVENS. Is this report in order, or has the Committee on Amendments of the Rules a right to report at any time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know of any rule that gives that committee the right to report at any time; though reports from that committee have usually been received at any time they have been presented.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to receiving the report if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] will allow it to be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would suggest to my colleague on the committee [Mr. Cox] to have the report printed and postponed to a future day.

Mr. COX. I would then ask to have it set down for next Tuesday.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was accordingly read, as follows:

Resolved, That rule 74 be amended so as to add to the standing committees to be appointed at the commencement of each Congress, and to consist of nine members each:

Committee on Appropriations;
Committee on Banking and Currency;
Committee on the Pacific Railroad; said amendment to take effect from and after the close of the present Congress.

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the House from and after the close of the present Congress:

RULE — It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things relative to railroads or telegraph lines between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific coast as shall be presented, or shall come in question and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient.

RULE — It shall be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration all reports of the Treasury Department and such other propositions relative to raising revenue, and providing ways and means for the support of the Government as shall be presented, or shall come in question and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereon by bill or otherwise, as to them shall seem expedient.

RULE — It shall be the duty of the Committee on Banking and Bank Currency to take into consideration all propositions relative to banking and the currency as shall be presented or shall come in question and be referred to them by the House; and to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That from and after the close of the present Congress, rule 76 be amended as follows: Strike out all after the word "consideration," in line two, to and including the word "expedient," in line six, and insert in lieu thereof, "All executive communications and such other propositions in regard to carrying on the several Departments of the Government as may be presented and referred to them by the House." Strike out in line one the words "Ways and Means," where they occur, and insert in lieu thereof the words "on Appropriations."

Resolved, That from and after the close of the present Congress, rule 77 be amended by striking out the words "of Ways and Means," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "on Appropriations."

Mr. COX. I ask that the report be printed and postponed till Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the report can be received and printed, and a motion to reconsider entered, which will enable the gentleman to bring it up again at any time.

Mr. COX. I will then make the motion that the report be laid on the table, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I ask that a motion to reconsider the printing be entered upon the Journal.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution relative to alleged exemption from military duty of certain preachers of the gospel; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BUST OF THE LATE CHIEF JUSTICE TANNEY.

Mr. FRANK, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Library a bill providing for a bust of the late Chief Justice Taney, to be placed in the room of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. FRANK. I ask that this bill may be considered at the present time.

No objection was made.

The bill was then read a first and second time. It provides that the sum of $1,000 be appropriated to enable the Joint Committee on the Library to contract for a marble bust of the late Chief Justice Roger B. Taney, to be placed in the room of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRANK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

APPLICATIONS FOR PENSIONS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to remedy the almost insuperable difficulties which now exist in procuring the proof required by the Commissioner of Pensions, arising out of the fact that an order has been issued by the Adjutant General forbidding all officers furnishing information of any kind connected with the death or term of service of soldiers under their commands; and also to report what legislation, if any, is needed to insure to applicants for pensions the return of their papers of discharge, when required, from the files of the Pension Office.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. COLE, of California, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution relative to the Pacific railroad; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the select committee on the Pacific railroad.

PRINTING AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. The Committee on Printing have instructed me to report back the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and is hereby, instructed to print fifteen thousand extra copies of the Agricultural Report for the year 1863, for the benefit and use of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I should like to have some explanation in regard to the printing of this additional number.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. This resolution was offered in the House by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, [Mr. CLAY], after having been indorsed by that committee; and it is now reported back by the Committee on Printing. In response to the gentleman's request for information, I ask the Clerk to read the letter which I now send forward.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 3, 1865.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry, as well as that of other members of your committee, to wit:

"How many additional copies of the Report of the Department of Agriculture for 1863 do you require to supply the necessary demands made upon you?"

I beg to say that I made a communication on the 7th ultimo to Hon. BRUTUS J. CLAY, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, in answer to the above interrogatory; but since that the further examination of the matter, and the unprecedented demands, daily increasing, many of them from new and unlooked for sections of our country, induce me to correct that statement and submit the following instead:

From the House of Representatives I received ten thousand copies, and seven thousand from the Senate—seven thousand.

The Department is called upon to supply, first, its own correspondents, of whom there are, of those who furnish statistical information and facts about the crops, say eight thousand—sometimes a few more or less, the number having been daily and largely increased the past few weeks by accessions from Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Of agricultural societies and clubs there are about one thousand; these average one hundred members each. Ten copies to each society is a small allowance.

For the Smithsonian Institute observers, our consuls abroad, who furnish the Department with important information, and foreign agricultural and literary societies, who have been in the habit of receiving the Reports, about one thousand are required.

On examination of the Department books, I find that the last year about eight thousand copies of the Report of 1862 were distributed at large to individuals applying personally or by letter. The demand for the Report of 1863 is much greater, so far, than last year; for this purpose at least ten thousand copies will be required.

There should certainly be reserved three thousand copies for calls in after years.

This statement, then, would show that I required about fifteen thousand copies more, to wit:

For correspondents .....	8,000
For societies .....	10,000
For consuls and Smithsonian observers.....	1,000
For general distribution .....	10,000
For reserved copies .....	3,000

Number of copies received.....

Number of copies required.....

15,000

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
ISAAC NEWTON,
Commissioner.

Hon. AMBROSE W. CLARK, Chairman Committee on Printing, House of Representatives.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call for a moment.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I did not learn, by the reading of that letter, the aggregate number of copies which, if we adopt this resolution, will have been appropriated to the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture. I think the number will be between thirty and forty thousand.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Thirty-two thousand.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to state, for the benefit of members of the House, that the copies of the Agricultural Report which have already been printed seem to have been "gobbled up" by the Commissioner of Agriculture, while we have none to send to our constituents. I do not believe that we should become a great book-publishing concern, to give this Department any number of these Reports that it may desire, to send to everybody in the country. To do so would be an unjustifiable expenditure of the public money. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. A. W. CLARK]—

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir; for a moment.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to inquire whether, in the letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture there is not an item of ten thousand copies for distribution by the Commissioner among agricultural and literary societies? Now, sir, I take it that every literary and agricultural society in the various States is furnished with copies of this Report by the members of Congress. It is regarded by each member as one of his first duties to send to such societies a copy of the Agricultural Report. I can, therefore, see no need for appropriating ten thousand copies to the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture with a view to distribution among these societies.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire that the chairman of the Committee on Printing shall state the precise number of these Reports needed for the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I will answer the interrogatory of my friend from Illinois by sending to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Superintendent of Public Printing which has just been laid upon my table with the request that I shall lay it before the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT PUBLIC PRINTING,
WASHINGTON, February 7, 1865.

DEAR SIR: I understand that an effort is to be made to induce the House to order fifteen thousand additional copies of the Agricultural Report of 1863 to be printed.

One hundred and eighty-three thousand five hundred copies of that work have already been ordered. Such is the demand of the War Department and the other Executive Departments on the press facilities of the office that they cannot all be printed for several months. Why add to the number at a cost of about twenty thousand dollars, when, if ordered, they cannot be printed for a long time?

The amount of printing rendered necessary for the Executive Departments by our present condition is immense. The expenditure of this office, from appearances, will reach over two million dollars the present year. Ought not every possible curtailment be made?

Very respectfully yours, &c.,

JOHN D. DEFREES,
Superintendent Public Printing.

Hon. A. W. CLARK, Chairman Committee on Printing, House of Representatives.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I believe that that letter does not answer the question I put to the gentleman from New York. I desire to know how many thousand copies the Commissioner of Agriculture has had.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Seventeen thousand.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I appeal to the gentleman to permit me to say one word.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SLOAN. I think that the objection to giving so large a number of volumes of this Report to the Agricultural Department grows out of the fact that its distribution has been unjust and unequal. The mode of distribution provided through members of Congress distributes these books through all parts of the country, and each district is supplied; but the volumes given to the Department are distributed unequally, some States getting three or four times the number that others do.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope that I may be allowed to put a question to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I have only one word to say in regard to that proposition. This is the last Department of the Government in reference to which I would care to enforce a rigid economy. I believe if there is a Department in which the people generally feel a deep interest, it is this Agricultural Department, and I believe that I would be willing to vote for an appropriation that would cover double the number of volumes if I had any faith in the proper distribution of the books themselves. It strikes me, in the short experience I have had here and with that Department, that the discretion lodged with the Commissioner of Agriculture is entirely too large; and that it results in favoritism. I believe that it is a discretion in the wrong direction, and that it does more harm than good.

Why, sir, I have not been able at the present session even to get one paper of sorghum seed, though I understand that there are other gentlemen upon this floor who can command baskets full. If these appropriations are to be made, if these books are to be printed, if these seeds are to be imported, I claim that they should be distributed upon some basis which will deal a greater equality than grows out of the discretion of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that thirty-two thousand copies of this Agricultural Report have been printed, and that of that number seventeen thousand copies have been given to the Department of Agriculture, and only five thousand copies to the members of this House.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not understand that seventeen thousand copies of the Report for 1863 have been sent to the Commissioner on Agriculture.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield any further. I wish to say that I am not aware any of the representations made in regard to the distribution of these books are true, or whether there is any foundation for them. If the statements of the letter which has been read be correct, and I have no doubt that they are, it is very plain that a great many copies are needed by the Department. We lodge the same discretion in the heads of other Departments in regard to their reports, such as the Patent Office report. I do not propose to argue the question, and I now call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. CLAY. I should like to make a statement.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that he doubts the statements which have been made. Now I wish to indorse the statement made by my colleague of the injustice of the distribution of these books.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am willing to withdraw my motion to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I insist on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. The statement of my colleague is true, for the distribution by the Commissioner has been fraudulent so far as my district is concerned.

The House divided on Mr. WASHBURN's motion, and there were—ayes 78, noes 39.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN A. McCLOSKEY.

On motion of Mr. A. MYERS, the Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John A. McCloskey; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk inform the Senate that this House is now ready to receive that body for the purpose of proceeding to open and count the votes of the electors of the several States for President and Vice President of the United States.

ADMISSION OF LADIES TO THE HALL.

Mr. MORRILL. Upon the request of many members, I desire to move, as there are many ladies who cannot find accommodations in the galleries, that the wives and families of members of Congress have the privilege of coming into the cloak-rooms of the House.

Mr. GANSON. I suggest to the gentleman that he include all ladies.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rose for the purpose of making the same suggestion.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARRINGTON and others objected.

SUPPLY OF WATER ON CAPITOL HILL.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire whether any legislation is necessary to prevent the drawing off of the water from the Washington aqueduct so as to prevent the free use of it on the main floor of the Capitol and in the dwelling-houses on Capitol Hill, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether the present laws relating to internal revenue are sufficient to insure thorough and correct assessments of property and incomes, and whether further legislation is necessary to secure that end, and report by bill or otherwise.

ASSIGNMENT OF SEATS FOR SENATORS.

The SPEAKER. By the amended joint rules of the two Houses, adopted by concurrent resolution, the seats upon the right of the Chair are to be reserved for Senators when they enter the Hall. The seats between the first aisle and the southern part of the Hall will be reserved for that purpose. Members occupying those seats will be kind enough to obtain some other seats, to be ready for Senators when they arrive.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, a bill providing for the confinement of juvenile offenders against the laws of the United States in houses of refuge.

The bill directs that juvenile offenders against the laws of the United States, being under the age of sixteen years, and who may hereafter be convicted of crime by any court of the United States, the punishment whereof shall be imprisonment, shall be confined during the term of sentence in some house of refuge to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, and shall be transported and delivered to the warden or keeper of such house of refuge by the marshal of the district where such conviction shall have occurred; or if such conviction be had in the District of Columbia, then and in such case the transportation and delivery shall be by the warden of the jail of said District, and the reasonable actual expense of the transportation, necessary subsistence and hire, and transportation of assistants and the marshal or warden only, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Interior out of the judiciary fund.

The bill further provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to contract with the managers or persons having control of such houses of refuge for the imprisonment, subsistence, and proper employment of all such juvenile offenders, and to give the several courts of the United States and of the District of Columbia notice of the places so provided for the confinement of said offenders; and such offenders shall be sentenced to confinement in the house of refuge nearest the place of conviction so designated by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Will it be in order to move to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that this bill relates not only to the District of Columbia but to all the United States. It is a general bill. It has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and is now reported back with the approval of that committee. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOUTHERN PEACE SENTIMENTS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That we hail with profound emotions of satisfaction the disposition of the southern people to submit the questions that have so long drenched our land in blood to the arbitrament of reason rather than the sword; and we pledge our earnest efforts to sustain all measures looking to a settlement that an honorable Government, seeking to sustain its integrity, can offer.

Mr. GRINNELL objected.

ADMISSION OF LADIES TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. COX. I move that ladies who wish to have a place on the floor of the Hall be admitted by the Doorkeeper.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I object, and demand the regular order of business.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 602) to guaranty to certain States, whose governments have been usurped or overthrown, a republican form of government; and upon that question the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I hardly think the House would desire to have that bill taken up just now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman will give way, I will move to postpone it.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move to take a recess until the arrival of the Senate, the hour of one o'clock having nearly arrived.

The question was taken; and the House refused to take a recess.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, if it is the desire of the House that I shall occupy its time—

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me for one moment. I want to make a request of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I have no objection.

SESSIONS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee for the District of Columbia have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

No objection was made, and the leave was granted.

Mr. COBB. I desire to ask leave that the Committee on Enrolled Bills may sit during the sessions of the House.

No objection was made, and the leave was granted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the Committee on Military Affairs have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I will not object if the same privilege be extended to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. BROOKS. No, I will except this particular case.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know that there is any special reason for it. We have already had that leave granted us.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the impression that the privilege was granted only during the last session.

No objection being made, the leave asked for by Mr. GARFIELD was granted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TONNAGE OF VESSELS.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill requiring ship-owners to make annual returns of the tonnage of vessels; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WILLIAM B. CUTTER.

On motion of Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of William B. Cutter.

PRIVILEGES OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I rise to a question of privilege. The rules require that no one except members shall be allowed inside the bar of the House. I have objected to admitting outsiders, but there are some upon this floor who have been admitted by the negro barber through a window. I ask that all except members be required to retire.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that other persons besides members are entitled to the privilege of the floor.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I ask, then, that all except those who are entitled to the privilege of the floor by the rules of the House be required to withdraw.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana insists that all those who are not privileged shall retire.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it in order to move that those now upon the floor may remain?

The SPEAKER. It would require unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. I will move a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The rules can only be suspended on Monday after the morning hour.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not understand that the ante-rooms are within the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER. They are not.

Mr. COLE, of California. I would inquire if members of the Electoral College are not entitled to the privilege of the floor upon this occasion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know of any rule which entitles them to the floor. They might be permitted to remain by courtesy, but the Chair can give no order on the subject.

Mr. COLE, of California. I move that they be permitted to occupy places on the floor.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. THAYER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill to provide for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Arizona; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I would inquire what the regular order of business is at this hour, [one o'clock, p. m.] under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. Until the Senate arrives, the bill in regard to reconstruction is in order, upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Have not the House fixed that they will proceed at this hour to count the electoral votes?

The SPEAKER. They have; but the Senate has not yet come.

Mr. DAWES. Before we proceed with the regular order, I desire to move that the evening session for this evening be dispensed with, and I would like to submit a few remarks upon that subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend his remarks.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTES.

At five minutes past one o'clock, p. m., the Doorkeeper announced the Senate of the United States.

The Senate entered the Hall, preceded by its Sergeant-at-Arms and headed by the Vice President and the Secretary of the Senate, the members and officers of the House rising to receive them. The Senators took the seats set apart for them in the eastern section of the Hall.

The VICE PRESIDENT took his seat as Presiding Officer of the joint convention of the two Houses, the Speaker occupying a chair on the left of the Vice President.

Senator TRUMBULL, the teller appointed on the part of the Senate, and Messrs. WILSON and DAWSON, the two tellers appointed on the part of the House, took their seats at the Clerk's desk, at which the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House also occupied seats; two of the clerks of the Senate occupying seats at the reporters' desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate and House of Representatives having met under the provisions of the Constitution for the purpose of opening, determining, and declaring the votes for the offices of President and Vice President of the United States for the term of four years commencing on the 4th of March next, and it being my duty, in the presence of both Houses thus convened, to open the votes, I now proceed to discharge that duty.

The Vice President then proceeded to open and hand to the tellers the votes of the several States for President and Vice President of the United States, commencing with the State of Maine.

Senator TRUMBULL, one of the tellers, read in full the certificate of the vote of the State of Maine, giving seven votes for Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, for President of the United States, and seven votes for Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, for Vice President of the United States.

Senator WADE. Mr. President, I move to dispense with the reading of everything in the certificate except the result of the vote.

Mr. COX. Mr. President, I believe that it is not competent for this joint convention to have any motion submitted, but I suggest, as General Cass suggested in 1857, that only the result of the votes shall be announced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can be done, as suggested. The Chair does not think that it is within his power to receive the motion, unless the Senator from Ohio desire that the Senate shall separate in order to pass upon the question.

Senator WADE. I do not propose any such thing. I believe we may dispense with the reading of all but the results.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will, therefore, if there be no objection, direct the results of the returns only to be read. The tellers will now read the results of the vote of the State of New Hampshire.

The tellers reported, through Senator TRUMBULL, that they had examined the vote of the State of New Hampshire, that they found it in due form, that all the votes given for President of the United States were five, all which were for Abraham Lincoln, of the State of Illinois; and that all the votes given for Vice President of the United States were five, all of which were for Andrew Johnson, of the State of Tennessee.

The same form was observed in announcing the votes of the other States.

The tellers having read, through Mr. WILSON, the certificate from the State of Nevada, showing that two votes had been given for Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, for President, and two votes for Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, for Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT said: The Chair will state to the convention that the messenger who bore the returns from the State of Nevada communicated the fact that the third elector did not appear when the vote was taken. The State having been but recently admitted into the Union, had no law by which the vacancy could be filled; and consequently but two votes were given for President and Vice President.

The vote of the State of Nevada having been recorded, Senator COWAN said: Mr. President, I inquire whether there are any further returns to be counted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are not.

Senator COWAN. And if there be, I would inquire why they are not submitted to this body in joint convention, which is alone capable of determining whether they should be counted or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has in his possession returns from the States of Louisiana and Tennessee, but in obedience to the law of the land the Chair holds it to be his duty not to present them to the convention.

Senator COWAN. I ask whether the joint resolution on that subject has become a law by having received the approval of the President of the United States?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair believes that the official communication of its approval by the President has not been received by either House. The Chair, however, has been apprised of the fact that the joint resolution has received the approval of the President.

Senator COWAN. Then, as a motion is not in order in this body, I suggest that the votes of Louisiana and Tennessee be counted, and that this convention determine the fact.

Mr. COX. I suggest the reading of the joint resolution by which our action is to be determined.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution under which the House and Senate are now acting.

The Secretary of the Senate then read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring therein,) That the following be added to the joint rules of the two Houses, namely:

The two Houses shall assemble in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of one o'clock, p. m., on the second Wednesday in February next succeeding the meeting of the electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and the President of the Senate shall be their Presiding Officer. One teller shall be appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, the certificates of the electoral votes; and said tellers having read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses thus assembled, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been counted, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote and the names of the persons, if any, elected, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with the list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

If, upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise in regard to counting the votes therein certified, the same having been stated by the Presiding Officer, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and said question shall be submitted to that body for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall in like manner submit said question to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no question shall be decided affirmatively, and no vote objected to shall be counted, except by the concurrent votes of the two Houses, which being obtained, the two Houses shall immediately reassemble, and the Presiding Officer shall then announce the decision of the question submitted; and upon any such question there shall be no debate in either House. And any other question pertinent to the object for which the two Houses are assembled may be submitted and determined in like manner.

At such joint meeting of the two Houses seats shall be provided as follows: for the President of the Senate, the Speaker's chair; for the Speaker, a chair immediately upon his left; for Senators, in the body of the Hall upon the right of the Presiding Officer; for the Representatives, in the body of the Hall not occupied by the Senators; for the tellers, Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, at the Clerk's desk; for the other officers of the two Houses, in front of the Clerk's desk and upon either side of the Speaker's platform.

Such joint meeting shall not be dissolved until the electoral votes are all counted and the result declared, and no recess shall be taken unless a question shall have arisen in regard to the counting of any such votes, in which case it shall be competent for either House, acting separately in the manner hereinbefore provided, to direct a recess not beyond the next day at the hour of one o'clock, p. m.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not think any question has arisen which requires the two Houses to separate. That, according to the wording of the joint resolution, can only be upon the reading of the returns which have been opened by the President of the convention.

Senator COWAN. I merely wish to say that, believing as I do that it rests with this joint convention, in its joint capacity, to determine all questions which ought to arise here, I have done what I have thought to be my duty in bringing to the attention of the convention the question which I have raised. Having done so, I now beg leave to withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] as making any distinct motion, but merely a simple suggestion.

Senator COWAN. I understood that no motion could be entertained in this convention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Motions can be entertained upon any matters pertinent to the purpose for which the convention has assembled. The decision of those motions must be determined by the two Houses separately, after the Senate shall have withdrawn from the convention.

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. President, if it requires a distinct motion to determine the question, I will move that all the returns before this joint convention be opened and presented for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion of the member from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] is in order, being pertinent to the object for which the House and Senate have assembled in joint convention. The member will reduce his motion to writing, so that the precise question shall be in possession of the Senate when it shall retire for the determination of the question presented for the consideration of the convention.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to inquire whether a second proposition, one in regard to the counting of the votes, can be entertained before the two Houses shall separate. If so I desire to move that the tellers be instructed not to count the vote of the so-called State of West Virginia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair the motion of the member from New York [Mr. PRUYN] is made too late, the vote of the State of West Virginia having been already announced and declared.

Mr. PRUYN. With all respect to the Vice President, I desire to say that I understand the rule to be this: the certificates of the votes of the respective States have been opened, read, and announced, and now the tellers, as the proper officers of this joint convention, are to pass upon those votes, and announce the result. My motion is that the tellers be instructed not to count the vote of the so-called State of West Virginia.

Mr. WHALEY. If it be in order, I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] to state his reasons for his motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The language of the rule under which the two Houses are now acting is as follows:

"If upon the reading of any such certificate by the tellers, any question shall arise as to the counting of the votes therein certified," &c.

The question must be raised when the vote is announced. In the opinion of the Chair the member from New York [Mr. PRUYN] should have made his motion, in order to come within the rule, at the time the tellers announced the vote of the State of West Virginia.

Mr. COX. If the rule is that which has just been enunciated by the Chair, how is it that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] can submit his motion before the Vice President shall have opened, and the tellers shall have announced, the votes of the States of Louisiana and Tennessee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair the motion of the member from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] is in order. It does not apply to a return where objection is made, but it applies to a return which has not been submitted to the convention. It is a distinct motion that a return shall be submitted to the convention. It comes within the latter clause of the joint resolution, which relates to any other motion pertinent to the object for which the two Houses have met in convention.

Senator FARWELL. I would suggest that the question raised by the member from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] has already been decided by the two Houses of Congress in the passage of the joint resolution which has just been read. It is not in order, therefore, to again raise the question in this convention, the point of order having already been determined by the two Houses of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine [Mr. FARWELL] raise a question of order upon the ruling of the Chair?

Senator FARWELL. I raise the question of order that this question has already been decided by the two Houses of Congress in passing the joint resolution under which this convention is acting, which joint resolution has been approved by the President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The fact of that approval of the President is within the knowledge of the Chair, and in consequence of that knowledge the Chair has seen fit to withhold the returns of the States in question. There has been no official promulgation of that approval of the President. Still, in the opinion of the Chair, if either branch of Congress shall be disposed to order the returns now upon the table to be read, it is within their power to do so. The reading of the returns would be one thing; then would arise another question, whether the vote in the return so read should be added to the count of the tellers. In the opinion of the Chair the motion of the member from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] is in order.

Mr. YEAMAN. Before I submit my motion in writing, I would inquire whether the submission of that motion would require the temporary dissolution of this convention and the resolving of the two Houses into their separate bodies in their respective Chambers?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no doubt upon that point. Each House must determine the question in its own Chamber; and each House has a negative upon the determination of the other.

Mr. YEAMAN. Then I desire to submit another suggestion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to any debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All debate is out of order. The rule itself prescribes that no question shall be debated in the convention.

Mr. YEAMAN. Then I withdraw my motion, if it requires the separation of the convention into the two Houses.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

Senator TRUMBULL, on the part of the tellers, announced the following as the result of the vote for President and Vice President of the United States:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The tellers report that the whole number of votes cast for President and Vice President of the United States is 233; necessary to a choice, 117. For President of the United States, the tellers report that Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, has received 212 votes; George B. McClellan, of New Jersey, has received 21 votes. For Vice President of the United States, the tellers announce that Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, has received 212 votes, and George H. Pendleton, of Ohio, has received 21 votes.

Wherefore, I do declare that ABRAHAM LINCOLN, of the State of Illinois, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes, is duly elected President of the United States for four years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; and that ANDREW JOHNSON, of the State of Tennessee, having received a majority of the whole number of electoral votes for Vice President of the United States, is duly elected Vice President of the United States for four years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865.

[The announcement of the result of the vote was received with applause upon the floor and in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The object for which the House and the Senate have assembled in joint convention having transpired, the Senate will retire to its Chamber.

The Senate accordingly retired from the Hall of the House of Representatives, when

The House was again called to order.

EVENING SESSION DISPENSED WITH.

The SPEAKER. The pending question, at the time of the entrance of the Senate into the Hall, was on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that the session of this evening be dispensed with.

Mr. STEVENS. If that motion be adopted, will the tax bill come up as the first business in the morning?

The SPEAKER. There is but one special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union which antedates the tax bill, and that is the Indian appropriation bill, which, by unanimous consent, is understood to be passed over. As by unanimous consent the tax bill was made the special order for this evening at seven o'clock, and until disposed of, therefore, if there should be no session this evening, to-morrow morning, after the morning hour, the tax bill will be the special order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I have no objection to the motion to dispense with the session this evening.

Mr. DAWES. I supposed, in making the motion, that I was acting in accordance with the wishes of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion of Mr. DAWES was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to ask what will be the first business to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. There will be a morning hour, during which the committees will be called for public business, beginning with the Committee on Public Lands. After that, the reconstruction bill will come up, unless the House should go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in which case the tax bill will be the special order.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon the House (at two o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 9, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The SECRETARY. The Senate will please come to order. I have received from the President of the Senate the following letter:

VICE PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER,
WASHINGTON, February 9, 1865.

SIR: I shall be absent from Washington for several days from date. Please inform the Senate of this fact.

H. HAMLIN.

Hon. J. W. FORNEY, Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. Secretary, I offer this resolution:

Resolved, That, in the absence of the Vice President, Hon. DANIEL CLARK, of New Hampshire, be, and he is hereby, chosen President of the Senate pro tempore.

The resolution was adopted nem. con., and the Secretary designated Messrs. FOOT, ANTHONY, and BUCKALEW to escort Mr. CLARK to the chair. On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That the Secretary wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that, in the absence of the Vice President, the Senate has chosen Hon. DANIEL CLARK, of New Hampshire, President of the Senate pro tempore, and that he make a similar communication to the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer proceedings of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, relating to various subjects. I move that so much of the document as relates to a general tax on sales of merchandise be referred to the Committee on Finance; so much as relates to a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, to the Committee on Military Affairs; so much as relates to a monthly or semi-monthly line of steamers from San Francisco to China and Japan, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; and so much as relates to fast-sailing ships of the Navy being made to answer the double purposes of cruisers and mail packets, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be necessary to print the communication by unanimous consent of the Senate, in order that the different portions may go to the respective committees.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the order to print be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order may be made by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection, and the order is made.

Mr. MORGAN. I also present a memorial of merchants of the city of New York remonstrating against the passage of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States. As that bill has been reported from the committee, I move that this memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial from the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, praying for the establishment of a naval depot in the harbor of Milwaukee; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented the petition of Cyrus Leland, first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster of the thirteenth regiment Kansas volunteers, and acting assistant quartermaster at Post Van Buren, Arkansas, praying relief from all liability to the Government in consequence of the capture of the Government train containing all of his retained copies of returns, reports, books, accounts, and the public property in his possession, by the enemy, at the battle of Marks's Mills, near the Saline river, Arkansas, on the 25th of April, 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. COWAN presented the petition of officers in the Army of the United States in the year 1863, praying a repeal of so much of the act of Congress as makes them liable to pay a special income tax of five per cent. on their pay as officers in the Army for that year; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. CHANDLER presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from La C La Belle to the Cliff mine, in Keweenaw county, thence along the Mineral range to some point on the Montreal river; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further petitions or memorials to be presented, reports from committees are in order.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the Senate at this time by unanimous consent to take up a resolution reported by me from the Committee on Agriculture. It will excite no discussion, I am sure.

Mr. CONNESS. We adjourned last evening with some business pending, and I hope that the regular order will go on this morning until we can take up and finish that.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. When the Senator hears my statement he will consent to the passage of the resolution. It is for the printing of two thousand copies of the agricultural part of the Census Report of 1860, for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture. Time is important, for unless the resolution is soon acted upon, the type will be distributed.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to the resolution, but I think it can wait yet a little while. The type will not be distributed until the morning hour is over, certainly.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. But when the morning hour is over I shall not be able to get it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is objection made to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I withdraw the motion at present.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 424) to facilitate the collection of certain debts due the United States, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 75) declaring what States of the Union are entitled to vote at the approaching presidential election, reported it without amendment, and moved that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 143) to facilitate the adjustment of certain accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of recaptured Africans in Liberia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, reported a bill (S. No. 432) to extend the time limited for the completion of the railroads mentioned in the act entitled "An act making a grant of land to the Territory of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said Territory, and granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Alabama to aid in the construction of a certain railroad in said State," approved March 3, 1857; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 624) to provide for the payment of the value of certain lands and improvements of certain citizens, appropriated by the United States for Indian reservations, in the Territory of Washington, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of Dennis Nolan, praying that he may be allowed to purchase or lease a strip of land now occupied by him, lying between the inclosure of the light-house and the shore of Lake Michigan, in Michigan City, Indiana, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 414) to authorize the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad eastward to Ontonagon, in the State of Michigan, and provide for its connection eastward with the Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Canadian systems of railroads at Port Huron, Detroit, Toledo, Fort Wayne, and Dayton, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of the crier and bailiffs of the United States courts in the District of Columbia, praying for an increase of their pay, and back pay from January 1, 1863, to the present time, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 419) for the better organization of the pay department of the United States Army, reported it without amendment.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 13th ultimo, information in relation to the present condition of Mexico and the case of the French war-transport-steamers Rhine; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 23d of January, 1865, information in relation to contracts made by Hanson A. Risley, supervising special agent of the Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior transmitting a copy of a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in relation to the balance due to claimants under the third article of the treaty of September 10, 1853, with the Rogue river Indians, for property destroyed by those Indians, and for improvements made by land claimants on the Indian reserve, and recommending an appropriation of the sum necessary to complete the payment of those claims; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. WILKINSON presented the credentials of Hon. Daniel S. Norton, chosen by the Legislature of Minnesota a Senator from that State for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1865; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 433) to extend the homestead act of May 20, 1862, to settlers on lands reserved for railroad purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 434) more effectually to provide for the national defense by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 435) to amend an act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July 2, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 436) making a grant of lands to the Territories of Dakota, Montana, and Idaho, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said Territories, to connect with the railroad system of Minnesota and Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer the following concurrent resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

A concurrent resolution requesting the President of the United States to transmit to the Executives of the several United States the amendment proposed by Congress to the Constitution respecting the extinction of slavery therein.

Resolved, &c., That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to the Executives of the several States copies of the article of amendment proposed by Congress to be added to the Constitution of the United States respecting the extinction of slavery in the United States, to the end that if either of the said States may not have already acted upon the said proposed amendment they may proceed to do so; and that he request the Executive of each State which has ratified or shall hereafter ratify such amendment to transmit to the Secretary of State a certified copy of such ratification.

This is a concurrent resolution, requiring but one reading, I think. I ask for its present consideration. I presume there will be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the title of the resolution should be amended. It says the "several United States;" it should be the "several States."

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is a copy of the resolution that was adopted in regard to the other amendments, and if the Senator from Maryland will have the first part of it read again he will see, I think, that there is no objection to the phraseology of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the title of the resolution again.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The words "several United States" are surely wrong; I suppose it means "several States."

Mr. TRUMBULL. It was copied by the Secretary, and I think copied from a former resolution. I have no objection to that change in the phraseology.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is right in the resolution; but wrong in the title. There is but one United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

SOLOMON WADSWORTH.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 431.

Mr. FOOT. I hope the ordinary morning business will be gone through with before any motion of this kind shall be entertained. Some four or five mornings have passed in which such motions have been made, cutting off the usual morning business before an opportunity for presenting it was had. I desire to offer a resolution; and I know there is a large quantity of business of the usual character for the morning hour not yet presented.

Mr. HARLAN. This bill will not occupy more than three or four minutes. It is a bill to correct the description of a piece of land owned by a citizen of my State, to which I am sure there will be no objection. I prefer that the rule should not be changed just now, the first time I have asked a favor of this kind for some months. I think the Senate has not proceeded according to the rules of the Senate for the last four years. The Senate has not been transacting business as arranged on the Calendar at any time since the election of the present incumbent of the Executive office. Every bill that has been passed has been taken up out of its order; and I would regret that my friend should insist on his objection now.

Mr. FOOT. I do not insist upon it.

Mr. HARLAN. I move, then, to take up the bill I have indicated.

Mr. CONNESS. I will ask whether, if this bill is taken up, it will displace the business that was pending when the adjournment took place yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that it will not. The unfinished business does not come up until one o'clock.

Mr. CONNESS. My impression was that it would be in order after the ordinary morning business, during the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It comes up at one o'clock. It was the unfinished business of the session of yesterday.

The motion of Mr. HARLAN was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 431) for the relief of Solomon Wadsworth, which proposes to amend the act for the relief of Solomon Wadsworth, approved June 16, 1860, by striking out the word "ninety-four" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ninety-five."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT-ELECT.

Under the resolution adopted yesterday Mr. TRUMBULL was appointed on the part of the Senate to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House to notify Abraham Lincoln of Illinois, and Andrew Johnson of Tennessee, of their election as President and Vice President of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is still in order.

Mr. CONNESS. If there are no more bills or joint resolutions to be introduced, as the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, has given us notice that he will call for the precedence of his legislative appropriation bills this morning as soon as the hour of one o'clock arrives, I move now to postpone all prior orders and take up the unfinished business when the Senate adjourned yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask the indulgence of the Senator to allow the Chair to go through with resolutions, and then it will be in order for him to submit his motion.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE INAUGURATION.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate to make the necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the President-elect of the United States on the 4th of March next.

Mr. FOOT. As the mover of the resolution I have to request that the Presiding Officer, in the appointment of this committee, will waive the parliamentary usage in the appointment of its chairman.

The President pro tempore appointed Messrs. FOSTER, DOOLITTLE, and HENDERSON as the committee.

STATE BANKS.

Mr. WILLEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance inquire into the propriety of amending the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, so as to allow

State banks having branches to become national banking associations under the said act, and still use a portion of their capital for banking purposes, and keep offices of discount and deposit at the several places where such branches are now located.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; and

A bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

MILITARY SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House, and agree to the committee of conference.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire the Senator first to explain what the disagreeing vote is about.

Mr. FOOT. Let the record be read.

The Secretary read the amendments of the Senate disagreed to by the House, which were to add at the end of the bill the following as additional sections:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That it is not within the intent of the first section of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to authorize the brevetting of volunteer and other officers in the United States service," authorizing the President to confer brevet rank for gallant actions and meritorious conduct, to make a distinction as to pay between officers of volunteers and other forces, including the regular Army; but that such brevet rank does not entitle any officer, either of the regular Army or volunteers, to any increase of pay or emoluments.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That if a soldier, discharged for wounds received in battle, die before receiving the bounty provided by the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend an act to authorize the employment of volunteers, and so forth," the bounty due shall descend to his heirs in the same manner and order of succession as if he had died in service.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That no alien who has resided in the United States for five years prior to the 19th day of April, 1861, and who, if naturalized, would have been subject to military duty, shall be hereafter naturalized, any act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Amend the title of the bill by adding at the end thereof the words "and for other purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the committee on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent; and Messrs. WILSON, GRIMES, and LANE, of Indiana, were appointed the committee of conference on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment a joint resolution (S. R. No. 106) providing for the compilation of a Congressional Directory at each session.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 748) providing for a bust of the late Chief Justice Taney to be placed in the Supreme Court Room of the United States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 749) providing for the confinement of juvenile offenders against the laws of the United States in houses of refuge.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

Mr. WADE. I now move to take up the unfinished business of yesterday. I do not suppose it will take long.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that that bill be laid aside informally, so that I may be allowed to move to make House bill No. 307 the special order for Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion may be entertained at this time by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move now that House bill No. 307 be made the special order for Monday next. I will simply state that the chairman of the Committee on Finance objected the other day to making it a special order, because he had a couple of bills that he desired to have considered. I will say to that Senator that I shall not antagonize this bill with any of his financial bills; but I desire to get a vote upon it, and I will press it to a vote at the earliest possible moment. As Saturday has been assigned for the business of the District of Columbia, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance has to-day and to-morrow for his business, I move, if it be agreeable to the Senate, that this bill be made the special order for Monday next at one o'clock.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to inquire what the bill is.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is House bill No. 307.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Its title will be read for information.

The SECRETARY. "A bill to regulate commerce among the several States."

Mr. WRIGHT. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion has already been received, and the question is upon it.

The motion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote.

BOUNDARIES OF NEVADA.

Mr. WADE. Now let us go on with the bill I have called up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 430) to amend an act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I was very anxious that the Senators from Nevada should take their seats in this body; but I am surprised that they have commenced so soon to absorb the lands that adjoin them. I am not prepared to adopt as a system the policy of making these western States so large as Nevada will be by the passage of this bill. I should like to learn from the two Senators how many square miles there will be in the State of Nevada when they have made this their first grab.

Mr. STEWART. I have not figured the number of square miles that there will be; it will be something over one hundred thousand square miles, desert and all; and I suppose that of that number there will not be exceeding twenty-five thousand square miles which can be inhabited. The great majority of our territory is barren waste; we have a few small valleys, and the remainder is a mountainous country, containing silver and gold and other minerals. When the mines shall become exhausted we shall have a very small territory to cultivate and support the population of a State. We need this, at least.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. FARWELL. I do not like to raise any opposition to this new State that has just come in here, but it does appear to me this is extraordinary legislation. The Senators from that State say this is an unknown, unexplored country. They, of course, cannot have explored this vast territory very much, and there is a very great degree of ignorance certainly in this Senate in regard to the condition and location of it. Now, if this country is once annexed finally and becomes a part of the State of Nevada, Congress will have no power or authority hereafter to change the arrangement. I should have no objection to providing that the jurisdiction of Nevada may extend over this territory, with a reservation that if it shall be found necessary or convenient hereafter to make a new Territory of it, Congress shall retain the power to take it back. It is a large section of land; it is a section of land which is being annexed, without any knowledge on the part of the Senate, to a State much larger than many of the original States, much larger than many States in the Union, and it may interfere very much with the necessary legislation for the organization of that country. I wish the Senators would so change this bill as to leave in Congress authority hereafter, if it may be necessary, to make a different arrangement in regard to this whole degree, sixty miles wide, perhaps three or four hundred miles long. It may be all right, but I certainly think we have not the necessary information to justify us in this sort of legislation. I do not doubt that every word the Senators have stated is true, so far as they know; but they do not pretend that they have explored this country, or any considerable portion of it. I did not so understand them.

Mr. WADE. I am surprised that this bill meets with the opposition here that it does. Here are a State and a Territory lying side by side. The Mormon Territory, that will some time be made a State probably, will contain at least one third more territory than Nevada if you leave the latter as it is now; but if you remove this boundary, as the bill proposes, the two will be very nearly equal in extent of territory. And yet it seems even here that the Saints are preferred to the Gentiles in the extent of territory they shall have. The objection is that we do not know very much about this territory. That may be true, but we know as much about it as we do about any one of the new States that we have admitted into the Union for some considerable time past. We know, in my judgment, much more about the country that is covered by this bill than we do about many portions of the State of Oregon and perhaps of the State of California. We do know that this is a mountainous region, that it is not an agricultural country, and never can be very thickly inhabited. We all know that. It is only valuable for its mining interests; not much else. The State will not be larger than the States we have already organized West. It will not be as large as Oregon; it will not be half as large as California; it will not be much larger than any of the extreme western States on this side of the mountains, and it is a State that perhaps ought to have boundaries larger than any of them when we consider the nature of the soil, &c. I do not wish to make an argument; I want to vote on it.

Mr. FARWELL. I did not wish to interfere with this bill, and I feel called upon to explain why I interfered. The objection I had was that I had no faith or belief that Utah would ever be admitted as a State into the Union with her present population and institutions. We are about getting rid of one unwholesome institution, and I trust we shall not adopt another one that is full its equal. I thought possibly it might be necessary at a future time, for the arrangement of this whole subject, that Congress should have jurisdiction over this territory which it is now proposed to annex to the State of Nevada. I merely made the suggestion; I do not propose to vote against the bill if the Senate are satisfied with the arrangement.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With this amount of territory added to Nevada, it will not be much if any larger than the State of Oregon; it will not be much more than two thirds as large as the State of California; it will not be half as large as the State of Texas; it will not be very much larger than the State of Minnesota; and you must take into consideration the fact that probably two thirds of the whole area of Nevada is a desert, uninhabitable and uncultivated, and impossible to be cultivated, because there is no rain there, and they cannot irrigate it, because there is no river to irrigate it. The rich territory embracing the good land will not be larger than that contained in the State of New York or Wisconsin.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the Senate that the latter condition, uncultivability, certainly includes nine tenths or nineteenth twentieths of it. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO.

On motion of Mr. COWAN, it was ordered that the bill (S. No. 392) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," be recalled from the House of Representatives in order that a motion to reconsider may be entertained.

BRIDGE AT CINCINNATI.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the bill (S. No. 413) to establish a certain post road was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

As originally introduced, the bill declared that the bridge across the Ohio river at Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, and at Covington, in the State of Kentucky, shall be, when completed, a lawful structure in its present position, and at the elevation of one hundred feet above low water, and shall be so held and taken to be, anything in any law or laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding. It also proposed to declare the bridge to be a post road for the passage of the mails of the United States, and to authorize the Covington and Cincinnati Bridge Company to have and maintain their bridge at its present site, and at the elevation of one hundred feet above low water at the center; and the officers and crews of all vessels and boats navigating the river are required to regulate the use of their vessels and boats, and of any pipes or chimneys belonging thereto, so as not to interfere with the elevation and construction of the bridge.

The amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and insert the following:

That the bridge across the Ohio river, at Cincinnati, in the State of Ohio, and at Covington, in the State of Kentucky, is hereby declared to be, when completed in accordance with the laws of the States of Kentucky and Ohio, a lawful structure and post road for the conveyance of the mails of the United States.

Mr. COWAN. I do not know that I understand the amendment. I have no objection to the bridge built according to the description of the bill; but if that description is to be stricken out, and this amendment inserted, I do not know what the bridge is to be. The amendment provides that it shall be constructed according to the laws of Ohio and Kentucky. I do not know what those laws are. I know what the description of the bridge is in that part of the bill proposed to be stricken out, but I cannot tell what it will be under these unknown laws. I should like to be informed, therefore, whether the description of the bridge contained in the original bill, that is to be stricken out, is the same as is contemplated under the laws of Kentucky and Ohio.

Mr. COLLAMER. Those laws provide that the bridge shall be of the height stated—one hundred feet high in the center—and shall be a thousand feet span.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there a provision for a draw?

Mr. COLLAMER. No, there is no necessity for a draw. It is to be one hundred feet above low-water mark in the center, and with a single span of one thousand and fifty feet, I think.

Mr. COWAN. If that is the case I have no objection to the bill whatever, but I would prefer that the bill itself should prescribe the width of the bridge and the length of the span.

Mr. COLLAMER. It appeared to the committee that the original bill did not contain so definite a description of the bridge as is contained in the laws of Ohio and Kentucky. Two piers are already up to some extent. They begin at the second street in Cincinnati, and run, I believe, to the second street in Covington. They have the piers up nearly to the bank, and it was thought rather indefinite to speak of the "present bridge." The House committee have had the same subject before them, and we have recommended this amendment so as to have the propositions exactly alike in both Houses, in order to facilitate the passage of this bill in the other body.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator tell me how the bridge is being built? Is it under an act of Congress?

Mr. COLLAMER. No, sir; it is being built under an act of the State of Kentucky, and a corresponding act of the State of Ohio, describing it in the manner I have mentioned. This bill is now to declare by the United States that it shall be a legal structure if built according to these charters.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was informed, but no doubt erroneously, that it was being built under the authority of an act of Congress.

Mr. COLLAMER. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was an act of Congress passed, I think, at the last session of Congress, giving some general authority to bridge the Ohio river.

Mr. COLLAMER. That was a general act for building bridges on the Ohio river above the mouth of the Big Sandy.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is true.

Mr. COLLAMER. But this is below that point, and this bridge is being built in pursuance of the laws of the two States of Kentucky and Ohio.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask my friend from Vermont whether there is any testimony as to the effect of the bridge, if built, on the navigation of the river. Will it interfere with the navigation?

Mr. COLLAMER. We had before us in the committee some men experienced in the navigation of the Ohio river, steamboat men and others, and it was clearly shown that it will be no interruption to navigation if carried one hundred feet above low-water mark, and with a thousand feet span.

Mr. POWELL. I feel a great deal of interest in this matter, and I am very well satisfied that this bridge will not interfere with the navigation of the Ohio river. I think the statement of the Senator from Vermont is correct in every particular. I hope the bill will pass.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill to establish a bridge across the Ohio river at Cincinnati, Ohio, a post road."

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed the bill (S. No. 225) for the relief of certain friendly Indians of the Sioux nation in Minnesota; and the bill (S. No. 234) for the relief of Louis Roberts.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 748) providing for a bust of the late Chief Justice Taney to be placed in the Supreme Court Room of the United States, and the bill (H. R. No. 749) providing for the confinement of juvenile offenders against the laws of the United States in houses of refuge, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MISSOURI MILITIA CLAIMS.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 359) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FOSTER. With the consent of the honorable Senator from Missouri, I wish to suggest that I am very desirous of moving a number of amendments to the bankrupt bill. They are to perfect the bill and generally to change its phraseology. It will take but a few moments to move these amendments. I wish to do it now, because it is very desirable to have the bill printed with the amendments, the present edition of the bill which has been printed having been exhausted, so great is the demand for it. I should feel it to be a great favor if the honorable Senator from Missouri would allow his bill to be laid aside for a few moments for that purpose, not to have any discussion, but simply to have my amendments voted on, that the bill may then be printed as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not desire to object, but I notify Senators that there is a special order for one o'clock, and I shall feel it to be my duty to insist upon going on with it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope my friend from Connecticut will withdraw his request, and let this bill be considered. It is a matter of very great importance, and I desire that it should be acted on at once.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator can get his bill through before one o'clock I shall not insist on my suggestion. I cannot get what I want done by that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the bill that is before us read.

The Secretary read the bill. It proposes to direct the President to appoint immediately a commissioner, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the amount of moneys expended by the State of Missouri in enrolling, equipping, subsisting, and paying such State forces as have been called into service in that State since August 24, 1861, to act in concert with the United States forces in the suppression of rebellion against the United States.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 43.

The commissioner so appointed is to proceed at once to examine all the items of expenditure made by the State for the purposes named in the bill, allowing only for disbursements made and amounts assumed by the State for enrolling, equipping, subsisting, and paying such troops as were called into service by the Governor, at the request of the United States department commander commanding the district in which Missouri may at the time have been included, or by the express order, consent, or concurrence of such commander. No allowance is to be made for any troops which did not perform actual military service in full concert and cooperation with the authorities of the United States, and subject to their orders.

In making up the account, for the convenience of the accounting officers of the Government, the commissioner is to state separately the amounts expended, respectively, for enrolling, equipping, arming, subsisting, and paying the troops, and from the aggregate amount he is to deduct the amount of direct tax due by the State to the United States under the act approved August 5, 1861, or the act entitled "An act to allow and pay to the State of Missouri the amount of money expended by said State in the arming and paying of troops employed in the suppression of insurrection against the laws of the United States," approved July 17, 1862.

In the adjustment of accounts the commissioner is not to allow for any expenditure or compensation for service at a rate greater than was at the time authorized by the laws of the United States in similar cases. So soon as he shall have made up the account and ascertained the balance he is to make a written report showing the different items of expenditure to the Secretary of the Treasury; and if from that report it shall appear that any sum remains due to the State he shall draw his warrant for the same, payable to the Governor of the State, and deliver it to him.

The commissioner, before proceeding to the discharge of his duties, is to be sworn that he will carefully examine the accounts existing between the United States and the State of Missouri, and that he will, to the best of his ability, make a just, true, and impartial statement thereof, as required by the act. He is to receive such compensation for his services as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. The bill appropriates the sum of $4,000,000 to carry its provisions into effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time has arrived for the consideration of the special order.

Mr. HENDERSON. Inasmuch as the Missouri bill is now before the Senate, and will require but a few minutes for its disposition, I move that the special order be passed over informally.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no desire to debate this bill I have no objection to its being acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order will be passed over informally.

Mr. HENDERSON. This bill provides for an appropriation of money, and therefore I know that there will be unwillingness on the part of Senators to pass it, as there has been; and it is proper, it is nothing but right to examine carefully and critically all measures of this character. I do not come here asking for any bonus to the State of Missouri, or anything that is not perfectly and legally just. There is a report made by my colleague (report No. 107) from the Committee on Military Affairs, where the subject was thoroughly examined. That sets out all the facts connected with this matter. A bill was passed in 1862 to adjust affairs of this character in the State of Missouri, but no adjustment was ever made, and not one dollar has ever been paid under that bill. It provided that the direct tax which had been levied on the State by the act of 1861 should be set off against the moneys appropriated for the payment of our troops.

The circumstances may be readily stated. In 1861, at the time of the beginning of the insurrection in the State, we had no Federal troops there, and large numbers of militia were called out, first by General Lyon, and afterward by General Fremont. There was an act passed that provided for the payment of these troops, and that has been settled; but the State convention passed a military bill in the fall of 1861; and in the spring of 1862 another invasion of the State was made under Coffee, Hughes, and various other parties, who had under their command a large force in northern Arkansas. They came into the State in large force, and we found ourselves entirely without the necessary military force to eject them. A provision had been made by which the military commander of the department of Missouri was to be the major general of the State militia. The design of this, the Senate will see, was to have entire and perfect cooperation between the State forces and the United States forces. The design was that the State militia should in no way be used in opposition to the commands of the United States officers. The United States officers called them out. The Senators will see, for instance, on page 14 of the report, what General Schofield says in regard to portions of this force:

"The 'ten provisional regiments' which the Governor organized for continuous service and placed under my command, enabled me to relieve an equal force of United States troops, and send them to General Grant. On several occasions I have called out from one to four additional regiments for temporary service to meet the emergencies as they have arisen. With a few exceptions, they have responded with promptness and alacrity, and have done good service."

"As an example illustrating the value of this organization, on the 18th instant I called out the seventh regiment of St. Louis to relieve troops in the city, which I wished to send after Shelby. Within six hours after the order was made the whole city was under the guard of this regiment and a few colored recruits, and the old troops were on their way to Jefferson City. The regiment was just as valuable to me, during the short time that its services were required, as a regiment of regular troops would have been."

Senators will see on pages 9 and 10 of this report the number of regiments that have been called into the field under the militia laws of the State, and the time that they have actually served. There have been at various times as many as seventy or eighty-odd regiments called out, because the militia organization in the State is perfect and complete. They have been called into service only at times of actual invasion or uprising in the State, when we could not do without them.

They have always been called out under the orders of the major general whom the President has sent to take command of that department. For instance, Senators will see on page 15 that General Curtis, under date of April 23, 1863, says:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE MISSOURI,
ST. LOUIS, April 23, 1863.

"I desire to strengthen my forces on the Southwestern Branch railroad, and also on the Iron Mountain road."

A formidable rebel force has entered southeast Missouri, which must be immediately repelled.

I desire you to call out three or four regiments of enrolled militia on each of the three roads for thirty days' service, and that three regiments may be added to the strength of this city.

I have the honor to be, Governor, your obedient servant,
S. R. CURTIS,
Major General.

His Excellency Governor H. R. GAMBLE.

And the Governor immediately gave the following order:

ST. LOUIS, April 23, 1863.

The adjutant general will order General McCormick to call out three regiments for active service—say thirty-second, sixty-fourth, and sixty-eighth. He will order Brigadier General Crawford to call out three regiments for active service, to be embodied at suitable points. He will order Brigadier General Edwards to call into service three regiments of his command. All for thirty days.

H. R. GAMBLE.

I have before me the figures showing the money that had been expended by the State up to July last; but General Rosecrans called a large force into the field during the last fall, and in regard to that subject I have no figures. The State of Missouri is now called upon to pay that force. I have no figures either from the quartermaster's department or the pay department in regard to the troops called out by General Rosecrans.

I will state, further, that General Dodge has called out a large force there very recently, under an order dated January 30, 1865. I notice that in his order he has embodied this provision:

"The troops when called out will be clothed and subsisted by the General Government, and armed, equipped, and paid by the State, as provided by the military bill."

Though these men have been called out by the Federal authority, the State of Missouri has been required to pay the troops. Not only that, but in the early part of the war they compelled us to supply quartermasters' stores for these troops.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was any settlement made under the act of 1862?

Mr. HENDERSON. No further than to adjust the accounts so far as our direct tax was concerned. The Secretary of the Treasury was required, under the act of 1862, to offset our direct tax against the expenditures we had made for the militia.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that tax to be deducted out of this payment?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes. One of the provisions of the bill is that it shall be deducted. The pay department accounts show that the amount due to us up to July last was $4,006,919 49, and the quartermaster's up to January 1 of last year was $984,314 61, making an actual payment by the State of Missouri of $4,991,234 10. Our direct tax under the act of 1861 was $761,127 33, leaving an amount due of $4,230,106 77; but, as I have stated, these figures do not include the expenses of the organization called out last fall by General Rosecrans.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to know whether the appropriation of $4,000,000 made by this bill is in full of all the demands.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask no more, and I have asked no more, because I cannot well do it. I have not the figures from the pay department and the quartermaster's department. The quartermaster's department will be able to send but few figures because the United States have subsisted the troops that have been called out within the last year, and from the pay department I have no figures since the 1st of July, and have not attempted to include them. I do not want anything unless it be found by the commissioner to be appointed by the United States under this bill that the accounts are just and proper, that the troops were called out as specified in the bill, by United States officers, under the command of United States officers, and acted in conjunction with the Federal troops, and acted only when they were absolutely needed, and not a dollar is to be paid out at higher rates than were allowed for the same service by the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the special order is proceeded with, I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio to allow me to move those amendments to the bankrupt bill to which I before referred, for the purpose of having them printed. It will not occupy beyond eight minutes certainly, and it is desirable to have the amendments made in order that the bill may be printed as amended. I have been waiting for a number of days for an opportunity to present them, and if the occasion passes by now the matter must go over I know not how long. The pressure is so great from all quarters for business that unless I can get something of this sort done now, I do not know when the bill will be in a condition to be presented to the Senate for action.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to an order being made to print the amendments with the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senate will consent that the amendments that I offer shall be printed with the bill as amended, it is all that I ask.

Mr. SHERMAN. That order, no doubt, may be made without objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 684) to provide for Acting Assistant Treasurers and depositaries of the United States in certain cases; which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC.; APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. As this bill is some forty pages long, it is scarcely worth while to read it in full at first, unless some Senator desires that it shall be read, as it must be read in detail in order to consider the various amendments. It will take probably an hour to read the bill through, and nobody will listen to that reading. I suggest, therefore, that the bill be read in detail, and that as each amendment is reached it be acted on in its order.

Mr. SUMNER. If I understand the Senator, he means that the bill shall be read on, and as we come to any amendment of the Committee on Finance we shall act upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I think that is the best way. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken if there be no objection.

Mr. HALE. I want to know for what reason this bill has preference of a special order which was made on my motion, at the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] about a week ago. I attempted to address the Senate on a matter of interest some two or three mornings successively by installments of a few minutes each time, and at the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin the resolution on which I was speaking was postponed and made the special order for this day a week ago, I think. It has been constantly overridden ever since by unfinished business or something of that sort. How the Senator from Ohio now gets in his bill ahead of me I do not understand. I wish to be corrected from the record if that resolution is not the special order which should now come up regularly.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was an old special order which is superseded by this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from New Hampshire that it appears by the record that the resolution to which he refers was made the special order for Thursday of last week, but was then passed by, and thereby lost its place. This bill was made the special order for to-day by assignment of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. It was only passed by because the Chair decided that the unfinished business had precedence of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That displaced it.

Mr. HALE. Then does not the special order take its place when the unfinished business is out of the way?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it does not. The unfinished business displaces it as a special order until it shall be reassigned. If the unfinished business had been disposed of the same day, it would have been the next special order.

Mr. HALE. But the unfinished business occupied several days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the special order lost its place.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from New Hampshire simply desires to make his resolution the special order for some future time, I have no objection.

Mr. HALE. That is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion may be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. I move that the resolution be made the special order for next Tuesday, at one o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest that a bill has already been made the special order for Monday which may be debated and run over into Tuesday. It is the bill regulating commerce among the States, and the Senator from Michigan, who has it in charge, has declared it to be his purpose to keep it before the Senate until it is voted upon.

Mr. HALE. But I suppose that I can get the Senate to make the resolution the special order again, or else say that I shall not have the floor at all. I do not much care which.

Mr. CONNESS. What measure is proposed to be made a special order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands it to be a resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS.] Is there any objection to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion cannot be entertained. The Secretary will read the bill before the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and as he reached a portion that the Committee on Finance proposed to amend, the question was put on the amendment.

The first amendment was in line fifty-three, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty," so as to appropriate $20,000 for reporting the proceedings of the Senate in the Daily Globe for the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line fifty-four, among the items for "contingent expenses of the Senate:"

For paying the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, according to the number of copies taken, one cent for every five pages exceeding three thousand, including the indexes and the laws of the United States, $12,900.

For one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Senator in the Thirty-Ninth Congress who has not already received them, $6,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to increase the appropriation for Capitol police, on the part of the Senate, from $10,234 to $19,170.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines seventy-three, seventy-four, and seventy-five, as follows:

For removing the unsightly high fence, or railing, which has been erected in the old Hall of Representatives, $100, or as much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SUMNER. Why should we strike that out?

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee found that the fence or railing was erected in the old Hall of the House of Representatives by order of Congress, made at the last session, and that it is not unsightly but is very serviceable, and indispensably necessary to protect the sculpture and valuable property placed behind the railing. In order to see the cause for this clause, we examined the debate in the other House and we also examined the Commissioner of Public Buildings and the architect who prepared the plan, and after a full examination we were satisfied that the clause was inserted in the bill under a misapprehension. At any rate, even if it was the desire of Congress to remove the railing, it should be done by a simple order or joint resolution, and not by such a clause as this in an appropriation bill, characterizing the work as unsightly and improper, and authorizing somebody, it does not say whom, to remove it, and appropriating $100 for that purpose. The truth is that the clause was hastily inserted in the appropriation bill in the House of Representatives, and did not come from any committee. It was done on the motion of a single member, probably without very much consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. I would simply remark that as this fence is in the part of the Capitol that, if I may so say, rather belongs to the House of Representatives than to the Senate, I should be disposed to leave to the House the jurisdiction of the matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then it only shows the haste with which it was put in, because the item is inserted among the items of appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Senate. It is really a fence or railing put up by virtue of an act of Congress passed at the last session for the protection of the sculpture and other works of art in the old Hall of the House of Representatives. This is a strong, firm railing, erected after reflection and consideration, intended to protect the property. The complaint made in the debate in the House was that it was not a small railing which would not impede the sight.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and five, to increase the appropriation, on the part of the House of Representatives, for the pay of the Capitol police, from $13,920 to $19,170; and to increase the aggregate appropriation for annual salaries paid by the House from $104,178 to $109,428.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, after line one hundred and sixty-one, the following:

For completing the tiling of the floor of the old Hall of Representatives, under the same authority that the work has already been done, $3,875.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and twenty-three, after the word "laws," to strike out the words "in pamphlet form;" in line two hundred and twenty-five, to strike out "seventeen" and insert "thirteen," and after the word "thousand," to strike out the words "one hundred and twenty-five;" so that the clause will read:

For publishing the laws and in newspapers of the States and Territories and in the city of Washington, $13,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The amendment which has just been adopted leaves the sentence imperfect and ungrammatical. It now reads:

For publishing the laws and in newspapers of the States and Territories, &c.

The word "and" after the word "laws" should be stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "and" should have been included in the brackets, and ought to be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is due to the Senate that I should explain that Messrs. Little & Brown, who have heretofore published the laws of Congress, have informed us by letter and also in person that they cannot publish the laws at the old prices. They ask, I think, half as much again. After a full examination and conference with the Committee on Printing, it was deemed advisable to print them at the Public Printing Office. According to the estimates furnished to us, they could be printed at the Public Printing Office just as well and in the same form precisely that they are now printed by Little & Brown. Extra copies of the laws are now printed at the Public Printing Office; and, on the whole, we concluded it was better to discontinue the arrangement with Little & Brown, so far as they were concerned, rather than increase their compensation.

As this is a matter that will probably excite some objection in certain quarters, I deemed it proper to call the attention of the Senate to it, so that they may know they have acted upon that question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire what has become of the contract heretofore made for this publication. Has it expired by limitation of time?

Mr. SHERMAN. The contract is only in the nature of an appropriation from year to year for this pamphlet copy. The original contract was for so many pamphlet copies of the laws in a certain style. That has been renewed from year to year by an appropriation. I can state to the Senate that there can be no controversy about the contract, because Little & Brown do not look upon it as a contract binding upon them, and they will decline to print for the United States the number of copies heretofore printed at the price heretofore paid. There can be no controversy, therefore, as to the existence of this contract, because both parties regard it as abandoned, and the effect of withholding the appropriation will be to abandon the contract with Little & Brown. They say they cannot furnish these pamphlet copies at the price they were heretofore paid, and we must either give them an increased price or else we must print them somewhere else.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I would like to inquire further what arrangements, if any, have been made for side notes and indexes to these laws. The Senator from Ohio is aware that in the edition published by Little & Brown they have side notes and indexes, and references frequently to other statutes. Some arrangement ought certainly to be made, if it has not been already made, to continue these notes. They were very useful in the examination of the statutes, which have now become so voluminous.

Mr. SHERMAN. That matter has been looked into also. The present marginal notes and indexes were prepared by a clerk of the State Department for Little & Brown, and Little & Brown paid that clerk, I believe, some compensation for that work.

Mr. SUMNER. Four hundred dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the marginal notes and indexes for the edition published at the Government Printing Office are also prepared at the State Department, and, in the opinion of the Committee on Printing and in my opinion, they are better than those prepared by Little & Brown; so that every year we prepare marginal notes for the copy printed at the Government Printing Office, and a better index than is furnished by Little & Brown. Both indexes, however, are prepared at the State Department. If the index prepared by Little & Brown is considered better than that prepared by Congress, all we have got to do is to set the clerk in the State Department who prepared that index to prepare the index for a congressional edition.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Finance what additional price Little & Brown are willing to continue the work for. Having frequent occasion to use the book, it appears to me that the work, from the time they have undertaken it up to the present time, has been most admirably performed. The paper itself is of the very best kind; the print is remarkably good; and the marginal notes, by whoever prepared, are all, I think, that is necessary to inform the reader of the contents of each section. It is very desirable, if there is to be a change, that the form of publication should be precisely the same with that which has been heretofore printed. I understood the honorable member to say that the committee were of opinion they could get the work done cheaper at the Public Printing Office than by increasing the price which Little & Brown heretofore received. I should like to know how much additional price they do ask.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have now the letter of Little & Brown before me. It seems that the old price was thirty-seven and a half cents per copy, and Congress took eleven thousand copies. The average size then was about one hundred pages. They say the size has increased to four or five times the old size, and the price of paper, materials, &c., has increased two and a half times. They do not state how much they would furnish them for. They say it is impossible to furnish them at the present prices, and probably they would ask six or seven times as much as we now pay.

Mr. JOHNSON. The expense of printing them in the Public Printing Office would also be increased. You will have to pay paper, and employ hands, and the price of paper and labor and everything else has increased in proportion.

Mr. SHERMAN. But in the Public Printing Office we already set up the type to print these identical laws; we already have them indexed and notes prepared for them by the Public Printer; and the only additional expense is the paper and the additional impression.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no reason why an edition of the laws uniform with that published by Little & Brown may not be published at the Public Printing Office, in precisely the same style, and with considerable economy to the Government. The work is edited here now; the proof is read here; and that would be better and more conveniently done if it were printed here than if it were printed in Boston. I was not disposed to interfere with this contract so long as it existed and was to be carried on by both parties at the old rates; but I have no doubt a considerable saving will be produced by the proposition of the Finance Committee. We print one edition of the laws for distribution as a congressional document; and that can be printed in the same style as the present edition, to be bound uniform with the Revised Statutes, and the type-setting of one edition will be saved. I believe that the edition printed by the Senate and House of Representatives at the last session was found by gentlemen of the profession, in its index and marginal references, to be at least equal to the Boston one, and I think it was superior.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know what edition the chairman of the Committee on Printing refers to.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator has it in his hand.

Mr. JOHNSON. This has no marginal notes, and is inferior in every respect to the edition of Little & Brown.

Mr. ANTHONY. It has marginal references, has it not?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not see any. It has an index. The index is very good, but the paper is very inferior.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hold in my hand the Acts and Resolutions of the second session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and that has marginal references.

Mr. JOHNSON. The book I have here is the laws for the last session, and this has none. Is it the purpose, if the work is to be printed at the Public Printing Office, to print it in the same form as Little & Brown have heretofore done?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly. There are no marginal notes to the last edition of the laws, but there will be no difficulty in preparing them. The man who prepares them for Little & Brown is a clerk in the State Department, and he can prepare them for the Public Printer.

Mr. SUMNER. This is perhaps a more important matter than some which on their face may seem to be more important. It certainly is not unimportant how the statutes of the country shall be printed. They ought to be printed, in the first place, uniformly with the previous statutes; and I wish to call the attention of my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, to that point, that in any arrangements that may be made for the printing of the statutes hereafter, reference should be had to the existing statutes, so that the series shall go on with a certain uniformity.

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SUMNER. Without that uniformity the statutes will have a bad appearance, and they may be inconvenient in use. In the next place, we must consult accuracy. There must be very considerable care in the superintendence of the publication. Then they must also be edited. That, as I understand, was secured through the contract with Little & Brown. They always, from the beginning, kept a competent person, latterly a gentleman who had been on the bench and who had retired, to superintend the publication, and who performed what may be called the editorial labor. He made those side notes, and also the index. I do not understand that the index was made, as the Senator from Ohio, in rather an off-hand way said, by some clerk. It was made by an eminent member of the bar. It is a service that cannot be performed by an ordinary person. It must be performed by a man who has a certain familiarity with the statutes of the country, and with the language of legislation. Only such a person can make a proper index.

I do not know that this subject properly comes up for consideration now, but I make these remarks in order to bring the attention of the Senate to the question. I do not wish that we should take a leap in the dark; that we should pass from the very good system which we now have of publication by competent publishers, like Little & Brown, to something that is vague and unknown. The publications of the Government, as a general rule, do not compare with those by private publishers. You have only, for instance, to go to the publications of the statutes before the contract with Little & Brown in order to see what we gained by handing over the publication of our laws to a private firm, rather than undertaking to print them ourselves. Look at any of the old volumes, and you will find how crude they are; you can hardly use them. But the volumes that we now have published by Little & Brown are very convenient. They are illustrated by these side notes to which reference has been made, and by good indexes. I hope that in any change that may be made these conditions will be preserved. I do not know what means have been taken in order to secure them; and I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing whether any means have been taken in order to secure the continuance of the conditions under which the statutes have been heretofore edited and printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the editing and printing of the statutes is done under the direction of the State Department. I thought it was done by some employé of the State Department; but I am not sure of that. It is to be done to the satisfaction of the State Department, and it must be so done under the system that is now proposed. I do not see any reason why it cannot be done at the Public Printing Office as well as in Boston. The comparison which the Senator from Massachusetts suggests between the statutes as printed by Little & Brown and the statutes as printed before they took the contract would be a very unfair one indeed; because the statutes, before they took the contract, were printed by private contractors, whose only object was to make all the money they could out of the Government, and they were printed on the poorest paper and in the most slovenly manner. But since the public printing has been done by the Government itself, it has not only effected a great saving, but the printing has been done in a handsome manner. For instance, look at the Rules of the Senate which each Senator has on his table. It is a book fit to be placed in any gentleman's library, and does not cost more than two thirds as much as it used to cost under the old system. Little & Brown have performed their contract, I think, to the entire satisfaction of the Department and of the country, and no fault whatever is to be found with them. But when the Government Printing Office was first erected and organized, the intention was that all the Government printing should be executed there. The printing of the Supreme Court requires the greatest care and accuracy of any printing that is done by the Government; and it was at one time proposed that that printing should be done, as it was done before, by certain private contractors, but the Senate decided that it should be printed at the Public Printing Office; and I believe it has been done there to the entire satisfaction of everybody. The Senator from Maryland can answer as to that better than I can.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is very well done.

Mr. ANTHONY. I see no reason why these laws cannot be published as well by the Government Printer as by the Boston publishing house. But at the same time I desire to bear my testimony, with the professional gentlemen of the Senate, to the accuracy and general elegance with which they have printed the laws.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask my friend if there should not then be some legislation or resolution of Congress on the subject directing the State Department how these volumes shall be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think there is no such regulation now. I understand it is merely in the nature of an appropriation.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator does not meet my point. What assurance have we that the statutes will continue to be published in the same shape that we have them in now—uniform?

Mr. ANTHONY. That would be so obviously proper that I suppose the Secretary of State would give such directions, or the Superintendent of Public Printing would see the propriety of it without any directions.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask, would it not be advisable to have some definite action on that point by calling the attention of the Senator's committee to it?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it very likely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) This amendment having been agreed to, the reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and sixty to strike out the word "which" and insert the word "who."

The amendment was agreed to.

"The next amendment was in line two hundred and seventy-three to strike out the word "which" and insert the word "who."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and eighty to strike out the word "which" and insert the word "who."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines three hundred and twenty-five, three hundred and twenty-six, and three hundred and twenty-seven to strike out the words "and for additional compensation to clerks in same Department: Provided, That the temporary clerks herein provided for may," and to insert the word "to;" in line three hundred and twenty-eight, after the word "services," to insert "$25,000;" and also to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury may award such additional compensation to clerks as in his judgment may be deemed just and may be required by the public service, $250,000; but the said Secretary shall not have the authority to award any such additional compensation to such clerks after the 1st day of July, 1866.

So that the clause will read:

For compensation of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, to be classified according to the character of their services, $25,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance have reconsidered their proposed amendment on this item and desire to withdraw it. It is necessary for me to make an explanation in regard to it.

This provision of law is somewhat new. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and to give additional compensation to the clerks now in the office and to all the officers of that Department, and places at his disposal a fund of $250,000 for that purpose. The Committee on Finance were not disposed to intrust the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer of the Government with this power, not from any want of confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury, but simply because the principle was a bad one. The compensation of these officers ought to be fixed by law and ought not to be changed. But we are met with this difficulty: some of the officers in the nature of experts in the Treasury Department cannot be retained in their present positions unless there is some mode of increasing their compensation. These officers are now very much needed by the banks that have organized throughout the United States and in other employments of a peculiar character, and it is impossible for the Secretary to retain these persons in his employment unless he can give them additional compensation. The Committee on Finance thought it better not to embark in the general system of an increase of salaries; and on the whole we deemed it better to adopt the provision made by the House of Representatives, and place at his disposal a fund out of which he might increase certain salaries as the exigencies of the public service required. This provision confines the increase to one year, to the next fiscal year. In the last appropriation bill, we appropriated, I believe, $200,000 for the payment of temporary clerks in the Treasury Department. Many of those clerks are now made permanent by this bill. This appropriation will enable the Secretary to employ temporary clerks, and also in certain cases to increase their salaries. We have to leave the distribution of this money to his discretion. I hope, therefore, the amendment of the Committee on Finance will not be concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Finance.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to insert after line five hundred and fifteen the following:

For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia, and also for jurors and witnesses, in aid of and arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, and previous years, and likewise for defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, and of prosecutions for offenses committed against the United States, and for the safe keeping of prisoners, $300,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that probably by an oversight the House of Representatives have neglected to make the ordinary appropriation for the judiciary fund, unless they designed to put it on some other bill, and the Committee on Finance have inserted it here in its proper place.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to the following clause:

For compensation of the clerks in the office of Military Justice, $7,200.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will inquire of the chairman of the committee, what is "the office of Military Justice?"

Mr. SHERMAN. Judge Holt is the head of that office.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that the title of it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; it is called the Bureau of Military Justice, and was organized at the last session of Congress.

The next amendment was in the appropriations for the Mint at Philadelphia, in line seven hundred and thirty-eight, to insert the words "ores and" before the word "coins;" so that the clause will read:

For specimens of ores and coins to be preserved in the cabinet of the Mint, $300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to the eight hundred and ninety-seventh line.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not notice that the Secretary had progressed so far. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to propose an amendment at the end of the eight hundred and eighty-fourth line.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senator will allow the usual course to be taken; let the amendments of the Committee on Finance be disposed of first.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not know you had any others.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have several yet.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

The next amendment was after line eight hundred and ninety-seven to strike out the following clause:

For salaries of additional clerks in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at Boston, which are hereby authorized, $11,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line nine hundred and two, after the word "treasurer" to strike out the words "of the Mint," so that the clause will read:

For salaries of clerks, messengers, and watchmen, in office of the Assistant Treasurer at Philadelphia, $13,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line nine hundred and forty-nine, to strike out the proviso to the following appropriation:

For necessary expenses in carrying into effect the several acts of Congress authorizing loans and the issue of Treasury notes, $2,000,000.

The proviso is as follows:

Provided, That no further expenditures shall be made for the experimental system of hydrostatic printing by the Treasury Department until such experiments shall have been definitely authorized by law, and a distinct appropriation made therefor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senate will allow this amendment to be passed over informally for the present, as I have another proviso to offer as a substitute, and let the whole matter be acted upon together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over if there be no objection.

The next amendment of the committee was in line one thousand and eleven, after the word "clerks," to strike out the words "be and the same;" at the end of line one thousand and sixteen, to strike out the word "the;" in line one thousand and seventeen, after the word "proportion," to strike out the word "equal;" in line one thousand and nineteen, after the word "Washington," to strike out the words "and Georgetown;" and in line one thousand and twenty, after the word "county," to strike out the words "be and they;" so that the clause will read:

For salaries and other necessary expenses of the Metropolitan Police for the District of Columbia, $110,000. And the compensation of said Metropolitan Police force, officers, and clerks, is hereby increased fifty per cent. upon the amount hereby appropriated, commencing on the 1st day of July, 1865, said increase to be borne by the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, in proportion to the number of patrolmen allotted severally to the city of Washington, to the city of Georgetown, and the county of Washington, and the levy court of said county are hereby authorized and empowered to levy a special tax, not exceeding one quarter of one per cent. for the purpose aforesaid.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure, and I suppose we ought to ascertain, whether this county is not named the "county of Washington and Georgetown."

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no; it is the "county of Washington." It is right as the committee propose to amend it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the Committee on Finance have now been gone through with.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have several other amendments to offer from the Committee on Finance. On page 8, line one hundred and eighty-three, I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "ninety;" so that the clause will read:

For lithographing and engraving for the Senate and House of Representatives, $90,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to insert at the end of the eight hundred and eighty-fourth line, on the 37th page, this provision, which the Committee on the Judiciary have determined ought to be inserted:

For the repair of the building at St. Augustine, Florida, heretofore used for holding the courts of the United States for the northern district of Florida, $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for that purpose.

I send to the Chair the papers which were before the committee. They show that the building now is in no condition at all to be occupied by the court. The committee were unanimous in thinking the appropriation ought to be made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is St. Augustine in our undisputed possession now? I am very much afraid that if we spend this money the guerrillas may interfere with the building after we put it in order.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It seems that the courthouse for the repairs of which this amendment is proposed has been very much dilapidated and injured by being occupied by United States troops. It has been occupied by the troops of the United States, and in consequence of their occupancy these repairs have become necessary. This remark applies to the building itself, but does not apply to a wall which it is proposed to repair. But I have received no information that the building is not now occupied by United States troops, or that if it shall be repaired by the Government it will not be again occupied by United States troops and injured in the same way by their occupancy. So far as I am concerned, I think an appropriation at the present time for this purpose is premature. I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment is the recommendation of the Committee on the Judiciary. The papers which I have sent to the Chair were communicated to the committee by the Interior Department, and they show that the house is now needed for the use of the court, and that it cannot be used unless repairs are made to it, and the repairs can be made within the limit of the appropriation. We have a court there now; we have recently appointed a district attorney, and if the court is to be used at all, it ought to have a building to meet in.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a few more amendments to offer from the Committee on Finance. On page 18, line four hundred and thirty-three, I move to strike out "three thousand" and insert "twelve thousand five hundred," so as to make the clause read:

For repairs of the Patent Office building, $12,500.

We have the statement of the Secretary of the Interior showing that the appropriation contained in the bill is totally inadequate, and on the showing made we could not refuse to increase the appropriation. I can have the letter read if any Senator desires.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. In line nine hundred and twenty-four, on page 38, after the word "of," where it first occurs, I move to insert the words "officers and;" in line nine hundred and twenty-six, after the word "Treasury," to insert "and the tenth section of act of March 3, 1853, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854;" and in line nine hundred and twenty-six, after the word "such," to insert "further," and in line nine hundred and twenty-seven to strike out " $38,060" and insert " $50,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of additional clerks, and additional compensation of officers and clerks under act of August 6, 1846, for the better organization of the Treasury, and the tenth section of act of March 3, 1853, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854, at such further rates as the Secretary may deem just and reasonable, $50,000.

I ought probably to explain this amendment. Under the sub-Treasury act, as it is called, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to employ additional clerks and to give additional compensation in certain cases to clerks already employed for extra work, sometimes done at night, sometimes done under circumstances which demand additional compensation. The ordinary appropriation is about what is stated here, $38,060; but the Secretary also finds it necessary to give additional compensation to certain persons employed in that bureau who are called officers and clerks—the assayers and some other officers that would not be reached by the word "clerks." An appropriation was called for for additional clerks at Boston. It will be remembered that that clause has been stricken out, and the amount of this appropriation is increased so as to enable the Secretary to award compensation and to employ, if necessary, additional clerks at Boston out of this fund.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that the same thing is accomplished by this?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. It is found necessary also to give additional compensation to officers and clerks in the assay office, and therefore I have moved to insert the descriptive words of the act organizing the assay office in New York so as to cover the whole in this appropriation.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to be informed on this subject. Will this appropriation place the amount of the increase of the salaries of the clerks at the discretion of the head of the Department?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is so by the law now. The sub-Treasury law which was passed many years ago authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make additional compensation in certain cases, and every year since that time an appropriation has been made for the purpose, sometimes more and sometimes less. This does not change the present law, except that it extends the authority to the "officers" as well as the "clerks."

Mr. HARLAN. Is it intended to include another class of persons besides those embraced in the old law?

Mr. SHERMAN. It does. It includes officers as well as clerks. That is the material change. Under this, the Secretary of the Treasury may pay some of the money to the officers of the sub-Treasury as well as to the clerks. The officers are, the assayers, and the Assistant Treasurers, and others.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move in lieu of the following proviso on page 39—

Provided, That no further expenditures shall be made for the experimental system of hydrostatic printing by the Treasury Department until such experiments shall have been definitely authorized by law, and a distinct appropriation made therefor—

To insert these words:

Provided, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to examine and adjust the accounts of Stewart Gwynne for printing presses, machinery, material, and labor furnished and supplied to the Treasury Department, and for expenditures under the authority of the Secretary, and to award to him such sum as may be equitably his due, to be paid from the appropriation for the expenses of national loans: Provided further, That for items furnished or supplied under contract no greater sum than the contract price shall be allowed: And provided further, That before any payment shall be made, the said Stewart Gwynne shall, in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, fully convey and secure to the United States the right to use said presses and any additional number thereof, with their machinery and future improvements, in the Treasury building or any other buildings directed by the Secretary, for any and all printing the Government may desire for its own use and purposes.

The subject of the Treasury Department printing has been controverted a great deal, and very much has been said about it. I believe an examination took place in the House of Representatives by a committee of that House in regard to the mode of printing the United States notes in the Treasury Department, and the subject gave rise to a great deal of feeling. This proviso was inserted in this bill by the House of Representatives on the motion of a member, and came to us, and we were therefore compelled to examine into the subject of the hydrostatic printing. A sub-committee of the Committee on Finance was appointed to examine the matter. I was not a member of the sub-committee, but they gave the subject a very careful and patient investigation. It was also examined by the Committee on Finance. I can only state generally, without going into the voluminous papers that relate to it, that we were all satisfied that the experiments in hydrostatic printing were, to say the least, beneficial in some respects; and we were satisfied, I believe without exception, that the plan of printing in the Treasury Department was wise and economical, and that the preparation of the paper and the printing of all the notes and securities of the Government should be carried on in the Department. Whether the hydrostatic mode of printing is the best in the world, we were not experts and could not say; but from the best testimony we had before us from persons on both sides, we were satisfied that in some respects it was a success, and on the whole we thought it very unwise by a provision of law to refuse to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to print by this mode of printing, if there was any doubt about it. So far as I am concerned, I would not deny the Secretary the power to print in this particular mode unless it was perfectly clear from the experiments had that the mode was not a proper one. We concluded therefore to strike out the proviso.

The amendment I now submit authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to settle with Stewart Gwynne the disputed claim about which so much has been said. In regard to that I can only say that the Secretary has the power under the law as it now stands to settle this claim. He can pay for the presses and materials used in printing. The power conferred on him by the law is ample for that purpose; but at the same time, as he says himself, he felt a delicacy about paying this claim when, as he knew very well, it was disputed, and was alleged by some to be improper. He thought that Congress should take the responsibility of directing the mode in which the claim should be settled. To meet this point the provision was drawn up, requiring the account to be made out in the usual form as a voucher against the United States, and to be submitted to the accounting officers to be settled by them. That is the effect of the amendment. I do not think it gives any additional power to the Secretary of the Treasury; it simply requires that this claim shall be presented in the usual form, shall pass through the various accounting offices, and be settled according to the principles here laid down. If the Senate desire to go into the whole of this controversy, I have the papers here before me, and they can enlighten the Senate on the subject. I give this brief statement simply to present an outline of this controverted matter to the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I am extremely anxious to have a decision upon a point of order on this question. It is seldom that a point of order is raised against the Committee on Finance, but I will raise a point now and submit it to the decision of the Chair. The point is that this is a private claim in behalf of Mr. Stewart Gwynne, and that under the rules of the Senate it cannot be put on an appropriation bill, even on the motion of the Committee on Finance. If I am overruled in this point the flood-gates are opened, and the Senator from Ohio and the Senators who are associated with him upon the Finance Committee must expect hereafter to take the consequences of the decision which they ask the Senate to make in this case. I submit the point of order that this is a private claim.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very desirous that the rules of the Senate shall be enforced strictly against the Committee on Finance, because I shall seek to enforce them on all others. If there is any doubt about the point of order, I would rather the claim should be excluded. But the reason why it does not come within the rule is this: the provision is already contained in the bill that affects this claim, that destroys this property; the provision as it comes to us from the House of Representatives denies the Secretary of the Treasury the right to use these machines for printing on the hydrostatic principle. It is here. We cannot refuse him the right to use them without affecting the claim of Mr. Gwynne, or whoever owns the presses. The amendment I offer now is simply a substitute for the proviso. The proviso itself affects the claim, and the amendment also affects it. I admit that I do not think the amendment would be proper if the House had not already inserted in the bill a provision which affects this claim. If the point of order is decided against the amendment, I shall be very happy to get rid of the controversy in this way; but we felt it to be our duty to report the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether this appropriation is to carry out any law of Congress? If so, the Chair will decide that the amendment is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. The appropriation is already made. There is no appropriation in the proviso. The fund is already provided for in the preceding clause of the same paragraph, which is in these words:

For necessary expenses in carrying into effect the several acts of Congress authorizing loans and the issue of Treasury notes, $2,000,000.

That is the appropriation; and the question now is whether any portion of this money shall be applied to the payment of Stewart Gwynne.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no appropriation made in the amendment, there is no question of order involved.

Mr. JOHNSON. The first part of the clause contains the only appropriation, and the proviso is merely to say that out of that appropriation certain things shall not hereafter be done. What is hereafter to be done, according to that proviso, is that no portion of that $2,000,000 shall be expended for carrying out further the experiment of hydrostatic printing at the Treasury Department until such experiments shall be definitely approved. I understand that this kind of printing has been going on for a year or two, whether successfully or not is not the question. Dr. Gwynne has been permitted to have rooms in the Treasury—no doubt the Department thought they had authority to authorize it—and he has been apparently an officer of the Treasury Department, and he has gone into the community and he has purchased a variety of machinery; he has purchased these presses. The persons with whom he contracted were under the impression—I know it to be true as to some of them—that they were dealing with the Government. For example, he contracted near Baltimore for the building of some of these presses, and the work has been furnished, and it has been used by the Government to some extent. A portion of it is still undelivered; has been ready to be delivered, and has only not been delivered because the contractors, supposing, as I have stated, that they were doing the work for the Government, were advised by the investigation by the other House that it was doubtful whether Dr. Gwynne had any authority to bind the Government. But the Government has received some of the presses, the Government has the presses now, and the Government has been using the presses.

Then there are two questions: first, whether you will limit the Secretary of the Treasury so as to control his right to go on with this kind of printing, although he may think it the best kind under the circumstances; and, second, whether, after you have permitted an individual to go into the country and contract large debts, apparently on the credit of the Government, and you have got the machinery which has been furnished under those contracts, and you hold the machinery still, you will not pay for it. There is due, as I understand, some thirty-three or thirty-four thousand dollars—I do not know exactly how much the amount is in the aggregate—for what has been furnished in that way. It seems to me very clear that the Government ought to pay for it; and all that will be done by striking out the proviso and substituting the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance, is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to audit the accounts and to pay only such as he thinks are just. The Government, having received the labor and the materials which have been furnished, as I have said, upon the credit of the Government, it should pay for them.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no controversy with the Senator from Indiana, or with anybody else in regard to the merits of the claim of Mr. Stewart Gwynne. There may be a legitimate and honest debt due to him from the Government of the United States. The only question before the Senate is whether or not the attempt to provide for the payment of the claim by the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Finance is not a violation of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. That question has been decided.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not understand that it has been decided; but if it has been, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquired of the Senator from Ohio if this amendment was to carry out any existing law, and if so, the Chair said he would decide it to be in order. But as the amendment makes no appropriation the Chair decided that the question could not be raised.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Chair permit me to read the 30th rule of the Senate?

"30. No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments."

If the rule stopped there, I admit that my point of order would not apply to this amendment, but it goes on to say:

"And no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation."

What does this do? This proposition directs that the Secretary of the Treasury shall investigate the claim of Stewart Gwynne and "award" to him. What is meant by that? As my friend from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] well says to me, it means to pay. It means nothing else. How are you going to get rid of this last clause of your rule, "no amendment," no matter where it comes from, no matter what committee may propose it, "no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation?" Is there an existing law here that is proposed to be carried out? Is there any treaty stipulation here? Does not the argument of the Senator from Maryland admit that this is a private claim? Has he not told us how this private claim originated? Has he not told us that persons have claims through Mr. Stewart Gwynne, men of whom he purchased these materials, thinking that they were selling them really to the Government when in fact they were selling to Stewart Gwynne to the amount of $34,000? So far as this particular case is concerned, I have no interest in it, but I want the rules of the Senate observed.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Iowa has misunderstood me. I have not said that whatever claim Stewart Gwynne may have is, in the sense of that rule, a private claim, by any means. All that I said was that he had gone into the country and had contracted for this material, and it was furnished by the persons who made the contracts with him, as they supposed, to the Government. How was he authorized to go abroad and buy that machinery and bring it in and put it in the Treasury Department? Was it done without any law? I presume there was a law that authorized it.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator point us to the law?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know all the laws. I suppose there was some general law. I take it for granted there was some law that authorized it. I understand the chairman of the committee to say that the Secretary had authority to do what was done, and the only question is whether he did it; and I understand him also as saying that the present Secretary thinks he is authorized to pay the claim.

Mr. GRIMES. Then why does he not do it?

Mr. JOHNSON. He is unwilling to take the responsibility of doing so because the subject itself has been a matter of investigation at the instance of the House of Representatives; but as far as the law is concerned, if I am correctly informed, he believes that he was properly employed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and having been properly employed, there is an obligation to pay him. What I referred to, was the great practical hardship, the great injustice, even if there was any doubt upon the subject, of permitting this man to hold himself out as an officer of the Government, apparently an officer of the Government, acting under the actual authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, contracting all these debts for the Government, and then not paying those who dealt with him on the credit of the Government. I do not know what the amount is.

Mr. GRIMES. It may be all true, and from what I have heard from others as well as from the Senator from Maryland, I have no doubt it is a fact that great hardship has been suffered by various persons who have had transactions with Stewart Gwynne. I am not going to controvert the fact that Mr. Stewart Gwynne has an honest, substantial claim against the Government. That is not the question now in issue before us. I admit that he has for the purpose of this argument. But what has that to do with the question whether or not this amendment comes within the rule? If he has an honest claim it is excluded from this bill by the rule; if he has an honest claim it cannot be put in this way.

The Senator from Ohio says that the Secretary of the Treasury can pay it now. Undoubtedly he can, under the provision appropriating $2,000,000 for necessary expenses in carrying into effect the several acts of Congress authorizing loans and the issue of Treasury notes. We have made a similar provision in a previous appropriation bill. Under that provision the Secretary of the Treasury, if he believed these hydrostatic presses were necessary in order to carry into effect the law of Congress authorizing him to do this printing, might pay for them. Why does he not pay the claim? Why are we asked to come in here and interpose in behalf of this particular man when equal hardships have been inflicted in thousands of other cases upon honest creditors of the Government? Is Stewart Gwynne the only man who has an honest claim against this Government unpaid?

Mr. CLARK. That is not the point.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what the point is. I should like to see where the point is that makes this an exception to the rule.

Mr. CLARK. I will state, if the Senator will allow me, what is the state of the case. Under the provision of the law, without the amendment the Secretary undoubtedly has power to pay for this printing to Stewart Gwynne, but as this has been a disputed claim he wants it to go before the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, so that it shall go upon the record that the claim is a just one, and that it is adjudicated by the accounting officers before he pays it. That is all he requires. He desires that Congress shall direct it to be done. It is not to make any provision for paying a claim that would not otherwise be paid, but simply to specify how this claim shall be examined.

Mr. GRIMES. Does he desire that it shall go on an appropriation bill?

Mr. CLARK. No, but it is in the appropriation bill before; the amendment does not put it there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am disposed to give a good deal of attention to the point made by the Senator from Iowa, because I desire to enforce the rule strictly myself, and therefore, if there is any strength in the objection made by him, I desire to give it full effect; but I have modified the amendment so that I think he will admit that it does not come within the rule, and I should like to have him examine it in the modified form with that view.

The rule simply forbids an amendment to be offered providing for a private claim in a general appropriation bill. That is a very wise rule, which ought not to be departed from. In this case there is a general appropriation for certain purposes, for carrying on this printing bureau. There is no doubt about the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to take a portion of this money and pay for printing by the hydrostatic process, or any other means. Consequently, so far as the amendment I offer is concerned, it is not for the benefit of Mr. Gwynne. It is not offered for his benefit. It is really for the benefit of the Secretary in this respect. Here is a claim that is controverted and disputed, about which a great deal has been said in the other House. If he passes upon it, and pays it in the usual way, he pays it out of a special fund on his own examination. The purpose of the amendment is simply to require this claim of Stewart Gwynne to undergo a supervision and an inspection, and an examination that it would not undergo were it not for this amendment. That is the only effect and the only purpose of it. I will now read it as I have modified it:

Provided, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to examine and adjust the accounts of Stewart Gwynne for printing presses, machinery, material, and labor furnished and supplied to the Treasury Department, and for expenditures under the authority of the Secretary, and to report to him such sum as may be equitably due said Gwynne.

I have stricken out all about making an award, and then I provide further that no payment shall be made until Stewart Gwynne shall file in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury a release for all patents and of all claims growing out of improvements in the Treasury Department. That is to avoid the objection which has been made that these improvements have been made in the Treasury Departments out of money furnished by the Government, and that the Government ought not to pay for any inventions made by its officers in experimenting for the benefit of the Government. That is right enough, and this amendment is intended to protect the Government against any claim by Stewart Gwynne or his associates for any patent right. That is the purpose of the amendment. It does not seem to me to be subject to the objection; but if it is, I do not want it to go on the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio to divide his amendment. The one proviso has no connection with the other really, and the question of striking out and inserting is under our rules indivisible.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will submit it, then, as a separate amendment. The motion to strike out the House proviso is one thing, and the motion to insert is another.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa withdraw his point of order?

Mr. GRIMES. Are these to be offered as separate amendments?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it that the question now is on striking out the proviso as it is in the House bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to hear something about this matter from the committee who are said to have examined it. I understand that the proviso which it is now moved to strike out is to stop this experimenting with that hydrostatic press business; I have a general information that there has been expended on that experiment something over a third of a million of dollars, between three and four hundred thousand dollars already, and if any work is produced from it of any value, it is more than we are informed. I do not understand that this proviso prohibits the use of these presses. It is that no further expenditure shall be made with the experimental system of hydrostatic printing.

Mr. CLARK. What they call the experiment is the use of the presses.

Mr. COLLAMER. The proviso is that the Department shall make no more expenditures on the system. If they can use it as it is, there is nothing here to prohibit that. No one, surely, will deny that. If the Secretary can use the presses he has now, he may use them. The men who have examined the subject have stated to the community, and I believe it is generally understood, that the experiments have gone far enough; the amount expended is extravagant, and we do not want any more experiments about it. If what they have is of any use, let them go on and use it. I hope the sub-committee who have examined into the subject will inform us in regard to it.

Mr. CLARK. I was one of the sub-committee who went to make an examination of this method of printing. I did not go so far in the examination as I should like to have done before this debate occurred, nor so far as I intend to go before I get through with the matter; but I went so far, and I think the sub-committee went so far as to satisfy them entirely, and to satisfy the Committee on Finance that it was unwise to make this limitation, and to prevent any further experimenting on this system. It is well known that there has grown up a division in the Treasury Department, and in the country, in regard to printing paper for the Government. It is printed now in the Treasury Department by two methods. It is printed by the hydrostatic method of printing and by the old method of the hand press. Those who have been used to the hand press still adhere to it; and you may go down into the Treasury Department to-day and find the old spoke-wheel press, where a man turns it around with his hand and uses his foot to help him along, which has been in use forty years in printing bills. When I asked the man who stood at that printing press the other day how it happened that they used that old press which has been in use for forty years, when in almost every other branch of machinery improvements had been made, all he could say to me was: "I do not know, sir; I have been a printer thirty years and I have used it all the time; and I suppose it is because the old fogies like it." That was the man who stood at the press; but I do not propose to enter into that diversity of opinion or quarrel. The committee examined the method of printing by the hydrostatic process, and came to the conclusion that it was by no means wise to prohibit the experiment.

One design of the hydrostatic printing is to prevent the wetting of the paper as you have to do by the hand press, and drying it, and shrinking it by the process of wetting and drying. When the paper is wetted and dried it dries unevenly, and pulls the plates by shrinking unevenly, and thus the lines get out of form. It became very desirable, therefore, that there should be a method of printing the paper without wetting it. This is accomplished by the hydrostatic process. The paper is laid on the plate dry, receives the impression, and comes out precisely as it went into the press as to form. The advantage gained in that particular is in several ways. In the first place, you avoid the expense of wetting it down; then you avoid the expense of drying it; and then you avoid the expense of pressing by power presses as you always have to do paper which has been wetted and printed. But there is another great advantage in that regard, that when the paper has been printed it comes out in sheets. Take a sheet on which you have printed the fractional currency, upon which there may be sixteen or eighteen different bills. The old method, when it was printed by hand, was to take your shears and trim that all around, and then cut them all apart, because you were obliged to follow the lines as they had altered in shrinking. You can take now a sheet, printed by the hydrostatic method, put it into a machine; it goes through almost immediately, and comes out all cut up and laid into a little hopper by itself; and the machine is so perfect that, when you have run through a certain amount of sheets of a given denomination, say ten dollars of currency, when ten dollars of that currency is laid in the hopper, the machine itself rings a bell and notifies you that you have got just ten dollars in that place. So of the bills for the banks; they are all trimmed in the same way whenever printed by the hydrostatic method.

The experiment has gone along so far that the committee would not be warranted, and I do not think the Secretary of the Treasury would be warranted—and he does not desire nor does he think it advisable—to stop that method of printing, but to go on with it to perfection. I am so well satisfied with it by my examination and from the acquaintance I have with machinery as to be able to say that I have full confidence that it is to be a success.

I desire the Senate to understand that in making these remarks I have no allusion to the character of, or what may have been said about, any employed in the Treasury Department.

The committee examined further than the mere machinery and hydrostatic printing. They examined the system that is carried on there in regard to the safe-keeping of the money, and I think they would like to examine further on that point; not because they do not find all the proper securities so far as they have gone, but to make the research more extended, more critical, and more satisfactory that it is safe for the Government. I can say—and I think I shall be justified in saying it from the committee, and be borne out in it by the conclusions of the individual members of the committee—that I have never been in an establishment where the securities seemed so great as in that Department.

One of the first requisites was—and this will bear more upon the other point (I mean the accounts of Dr. Gwynne) than upon this particular proviso—the production of a paper in the Treasury Department that should be entirely distinctive from any other paper. You can go into the book-stores here on your streets and buy the ordinary bank-note paper; you can go down to Hudson Taylor's and buy bank-note paper; you can buy the bank-note paper on which some of your currency has been printed, because there has not been enough produced in the Treasury Department for the production of all your currency. It is very desirable to prevent counterfeiting and to produce a paper that cannot be photographed. I have in my pocket and will exhibit to the Senate—they will see nothing particular about it at any distance—a piece of paper produced in the Treasury Department, [exhibiting one of the denominations of the fractional currency of the latest issue.] It has the appearance of being rather coarse, but the bit of paper which I now hold in my hand has been washed, has been dipped in a tumbler, thoroughly wetted and soaked, and then washed with soap, and rubbed as hard as you would rub an ordinary piece of cloth, and yet it cannot be destroyed; and one peculiarity of this paper is that it cannot be by any process of wetting returned to pulp again. But it has another advantage beyond this: there is mixed with the pulp that produces the paper a chemical preparation, a fibrous preparation which you can hardly notice by looking at it, but which photographs black when an attempt is made to photograph it, so that it can be detected at once. One great design and desire of the Department is to prevent the counterfeiting of your currency.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator tell me how much of the currency has been printed on that paper?

Mr. CLARK. I cannot from any figures that I have.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very little of it.

Mr. CLARK. Not a very large amount.

Mr. GRIMES. Does it exceed $400,000?

Mr. CLARK. I cannot tell.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are they going on to use that kind of paper?

Mr. CLARK. They are. It is particularly desirable for the currency. The committee examined so far as to see that these experiments were very valuable to the Government.

Mr. COLLAMER. That paper has nothing to do with the hydrostatic printing.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will remember that I said this bore more particularly upon the Dr. Gwynne part of the case than upon the question of striking out the proviso; but this is clearly connected with the other experiments that have been going on, and tends to show somewhat the value of the experiments. I think that the experiments now going on in the Treasury Department are only a repetition of what has occurred in the world before, and what will probably occur many times again, so often as you have improvements in machinery that aid in the process of manufacture.

Here are two systems; here is the machinery for the hydrostatic system of printing, which is in operation. I ask Senators if it is wise to limit the appropriation so that further developments of this system cannot be made, so that further experiments cannot be had to ascertain the value of any improvement that may be made. Is it wise to shut right down upon the system here and say we will have no further experiment in this matter? That is not the opinion of the sub-committee; that is not the opinion of the Finance Committee; that is not the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury; it is not, I think, the opinion of anybody who has examined the matter to see what is the advantage of this system. I know there are persons who are opposed to it. I know there are persons who come to us to give us information on the subject, but the bias of those gentlemen could easily be detected on examination. The committee attempted to satisfy themselves, not upon the testimony of individuals, but of their own eyes as far as they could; and by their own examination, having spent considerable time in the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRIMES. As the Senator has given a great deal of attention to this subject, I should like a little information that he has not given us. About a year ago we had a large amount of fractional currency, of the denominations that he has exhibited to the Senate, printed upon a paper that was in the habit of splitting. I desire to know whether or not that was printed by the hydrostatic process, and whether that paper was or was not manufactured by Mr. Gwynne.

Mr. CLARK. I do not understand that they used the paper manufactured by Dr. Gwynne. I cannot speak, however, on that point with that certainty that I can in regard to some other things. I know there was complaint of a paper that did split. I know that was one of the complaints made in the reports on this matter.

Mr. GRIMES. There was laid on our desks, yesterday, a book that purported to be a report from Mr. Clark, the gentleman who has charge of the printing in the Treasury Department. I do not know how it got here, or how it came to be published; it has no imprint of any publishing establishment on its face. It does not bear the appearance of having been sent here by the Secretary of the Treasury, to whom it is addressed, but I take it as the genuine report of this gentleman. If I am not mistaken, his report states that that split paper was the product of one of these experiments of Mr. Gwynne; and the purpose I had in making the inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire was to ascertain if he could tell us how much that experiment cost the Government.

Mr. CLARK. I have no information on that subject. I do not know that that was an experiment.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know how much these various experiments that have been made with the hydrostatic presses have cost the Government. Is the committee prepared to inform the Senate how much these various presses have cost, how many have been broken down, how much has been expended for repairs?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can tell the Senator precisely. The contract, which I have here among these papers, was $1,100 for each press. Seventy presses were delivered. The amount spent for repairs was comparatively a small item. All the particulars of the claim are here. The total amount for the presses was $77,000, together with some expenses for repairs.

Mr. GRIMES. How many of them have been abandoned as incapable of being repaired? How many of them are lying in a pile outside of the Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no information, except from the reports before me. The difficulty with some of them was that the frame-work was too weak to bear the enormous pressure caused by the system. That was the result of a dispute as to whether wrought iron or cast iron would resist the greater pressure. Since the change has been made to the present machines they are perfectly satisfactory. The only change is in reference to the form. As I am not a machinist, and do not understand printing or anything about it, I may be mistaken in regard to this; but the cost of repairing has been comparatively very slight.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to make one statement farther in regard to the capacity of these presses. By a hand press two persons will print in a day from about seven hundred to eight hundred impressions. By a hydrostatic press, if a man could ink fast enough, you could have four thousand impressions; but ordinarily the person who inks the plate cannot stand any such labor, and they get through about two thousand impressions a day, and those impressions are paid for by the piece. They pay for impressions on the hand press a dollar for one hundred impressions. On the hydrostatic press they pay a dollar for the first four hundred, and then seventy cents a hundred for the remainder of a day's work, bringing the whole cost about seventy-five cents to the hundred; that is three fourths of the cost upon a hand press. I was satisfied that the fact was so as the prices are now. There is no question that when this method of printing first came to be attempted, the printing went on slowly, as is the case with all new kinds of business; but it has been brought to a very great degree of perfection, and I think if gentlemen would take the trouble to go and see for themselves, especially if they have any idea of mechanics and machinery—

Mr. COLLAMER. When the work is done, how is the impression? Will it rub off, or is it good?

Mr. CLARK. There has been a great deal of complaint made that the work done by the hydrostatic press was not so good as that done by the ordinary press. I am not a printer; but I took the impressions, and I took a microscope to examine them, and, in my judgment, the work done by the hydrostatic press is full as good as that done by the ordinary power press. The Senator from Vermont inquires if it rubs off. He will see that that is not so from the exhibition of this bill which I have already presented to the Senate, which has been rubbed, soaked, and washed in soap and water, and the impression has not started a particle. I say I have not examined this matter so far as I desire to do, as a matter of curiosity and knowledge, even.

Mr. COLLAMER. The question is, will it endure?

Mr. CLARK. The gentleman can tell by examination as well as I can. I understand it wears admirably well.

Mr. GRIMES. How long is it since that kind of paper has been used?

Mr. CLARK. I cannot tell how much of it has been used or how long. I put it to the test that I have stated. I could not try it as the old man said he had tried his locust posts. He said they would last forever, for he had tried them out and out. But so far as I have been able to put this to the test, it wears admirably well. I do not think it is quite wise for the Senate to stop these experiments. I think they should go further.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I understand the Senator to admit that this system has not reached that degree of perfection which he expects it will attain.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly I do; and I will admit it as to everything else in the world, even as to mankind. I hope we have not yet got to that degree of perfection which we expect to reach. I will admit it in regard to the Senator's iron-clads. [Laughter.] It is the very reason I want to go further. I do not want to stop here.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know that anything more need be said on this point; but I was one of the sub-committee who were instructed by the Finance Committee to look into this matter somewhat, and I desire to say in reply to some inquiries originated here by the Senator from Iowa, that we were not instructed to investigate the past operations of the Currency Bureau, or of that branch of the Treasury Department. Our investigations were directed to the particular matter referred to in the proviso now proposed to be struck out. The House of Representatives had voted to prohibit any further experiments upon this new method of printing our currency, and we were instructed to look into the matter, make up our minds whether it was advisable to prohibit further experiments or not, and our investigations were directed therefore to two methods now in vogue in that bureau of printing this paper. The two methods have been described to you by the Senator from New Hampshire. So far as my own examination went, it was directed mainly with a view of determining in my own mind which of the two methods was the most economical, and which was the safest, which furnished the best security to the Government. Unquestionably there is great danger of loss, let this vast amount of paper be printed where it will. I was satisfied equally with the Senator from New Hampshire who has just testified upon that point that every security was thrown about this branch of your service that I could conceive was practicable by either method of printing.

It will be manifest to the judgment of every one that the more hands this paper is passed through the greater is the danger of loss. By printing on the hydrostatic press, it will pass through at least the hands of three less sets of hands than when printed on the old press. If printed on the old press it has to go, when the impression is placed on one side, first into the wetting room, and a class of laborers are employed in the wetting room; then the impression is laid upon one side; then it has to go into the drying room and passed through under a new set of men; and then it has to go, after the impression is put upon the other side, into the trimming room, as the Senator from New Hampshire has described to you, and be trimmed. If printed on the hydrostatic press, it does not go to the wetting room, it does not go to the drying room, it does not go to the trimming room. There are three sets of hands, there are three classes of laborers who handle the money printed on one of the presses that do not touch it when printed on the other. I think that necessarily furnishes some additional security to the Government, or if it does not furnish additional security it saves some of the risk to which the Government is liable in the printing of this paper.

Now, as to the economy of the two methods, I cannot testify on that point with so much positiveness as the Senator from New Hampshire has done. The result of my examination is that, so far, it has been proved the hands have printed more sheets in the day on the old press than on the hydrostatic press. Nevertheless we stood there and saw both presses at work, and it is true, as is said by the Senator from New Hampshire, that on the hydrostatic press sheets may be thrown off just as rapidly as one man can put on the ink. While that press is at work, one man has as much as he can do to ink the plates, whereas on the other press, on the old press, the same man not only inks the plates but passes them through the press. My own judgment was that a plate would pass through that press in about the time it would through the new press. Some members of the committee, I believe, differed with me on that. I do not know but that the Senator from New Hampshire thought it would pass through the new press in less time than through the old press. I thought it took about the same time.

There is another fact, that two hands are employed upon the old press, and three hands are employed upon the new press; and there is but one experienced workman employed on either of the presses. To the amount of labor expended in actually printing a thousand sheets on the old press must be added the amount of labor expended in wetting the sheets, in drying them, and in trimming them, so that about the same amount of labor probably is actually expended in getting at a thousand sheets of currency on one press as on the other.

My own judgment is that the experiment is not complete. The Senator from Vermont says that a vast amount of money has been expended. It is true; but though I profess to have no sort of intimate acquaintance with mechanics of any kind, it seems to me so manifest that a press which will keep one hand employed all the time in inking, must, when made to work perfectly, print more economically than a press which requires the same man who puts on the ink to run the plates through the press, that in consideration of the large amount of money we have already expended, I think it is not judicious to prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from making further experiments in the same direction. Therefore I acquiesced with my colleagues on the sub-committee and on the Finance Committee in the propriety of striking out this proviso.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know that it is necessary for me to say anything, but I was one of the committee who visited the Treasury Department in order to examine these two modes of printing; and my impression is that our examination was hardly sufficient to enable us to pass an opinion that the Senate can rely upon in reference to these two modes of printing. The hydrostatic system of printing has been adopted there, as I understand, for the purpose of giving us a bill that cannot be photographed or counterfeited. How far that has been accomplished by this system of printing, I am unable to say; I really cannot tell. I cannot say that the one cannot be as easily counterfeited as the other. There is this thing most assuredly about it, that the machinery necessary for the hydrostatic printing costs eight, ten, fifteen, or twenty times as much as the machinery necessary for the other printing.

I differ with my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, about the rapidity of this printing. Although I am not prepared to say that the hydrostatic printing ought to be rejected, I cannot say that it is as rapid a mode of printing as the other. I examined the books in the Department. I ran over the books showing the rapidity of work for a great many days. The hydrostatic or dry system of printing and the wet system of printing are kept in separate rooms; the books are kept separately and distinctly. I examined them, and my understanding is that they average about eight or nine hundred sheets per day upon the old presses, and about five, six, and seven hundred upon the hydrostatic presses; not exceeding that. I am not prepared to say that I would condemn them as being less economical on that account, because there are other things to be taken into consideration which have been alluded to by the Senator. It takes three persons to run one of these hydrostatic presses and to produce an impression, and yet those three persons cannot produce as many impressions during the day as the old wet press. I am perfectly satisfied of that.

I have no prejudices against the hydrostatic printing; I intend to support this amendment; I am not prepared to say either that further experiments ought not to be made in this thing; but I am prepared to say that a vast amount of money has been expended in the Treasury without any compensating benefits that I can see so far. They may be there, and something may be produced in the future that will triumph over many of the difficulties that I see in that Department now. I am not prepared to say that when this distinctive paper—a matter that I did not attempt to look into—shall have been produced in the Treasury Department, a system of printing may not be adopted upon these hydrostatic presses that will prevent counterfeiting in all future time. That would certainly be a very great item to be taken into consideration in the examination of a question of this sort.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will ask the Senator whether, when we have that sort of paper, we have not the same security in either form of printing.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is one of the points that Mr. Clark urged upon us when we were examining this subject; but really I am not prepared to say that the distinctive paper may not be printed upon either press.

Mr. CLARK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I know it can be; but I was about to remark, I am not prepared to say it can be printed upon either press and yet avoid counterfeiting. In the hydrostatic system of printing the object to be attained is simply this: to procure power enough to force the ink into dry paper. In the other system the paper is made moist. It does not require much force to put the ink in the paper in this moist condition. It is forced into it with much less trouble. I am not sufficiently acquainted with matters of this sort to pass any judgment as to the superiority of one or the other of the systems. The press that will turn off nine hundred sheets a day, that is the old press, or the wet system of printing with the paper moistened, costs $125; the hydrostatic press will cost $1,100. It has to be made very strong, because the water pressure that is thrown upon the machinery is estimated, I believe, at forty tons. I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire if that is not so.

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. You can put, of course, any weight you desire upon it. There is no trouble about obtaining any amount of force that you wish to apply; it can be easily obtained. But whether this ink can be forced into the dry paper so as to make it stay there is a question that I really did have some doubts about. I know that Mr. Clark, who is the superintendent of this Department, insists that there is no doubt about it at all, and I know it is the belief of both the distinguished gentlemen who have recently been at the head of the Treasury Department that it is a success, and therefore I am not prepared, from the examination I have made, to say that it should be entirely discarded.

But, sir, while I am up I desire to say a word or two in reference to a matter that I do really have a very great deal to complain of. It seems that these gentlemen, Mr. Clark and Mr. Gwynne, have been making these experiments in the Treasury Department. Perhaps the experiments were all necessary. I do not know what may be accomplished by them. Perhaps we may arrive at a perfection in the system of printing by these experiments that nobody else would find out, and if so, the Government would save a great deal of money. The Senate can judge of that just as well as I can; and they would not be any wiser after they had gone there and examined it. The hydrostatic system is the most expensive one in the machinery; and I do not see, taking everything into consideration, that there is a great deal of difference in the handling of the paper after the impressions are produced, or in the production of the impressions. As the Senator from New Hampshire very properly says, in the wet system you have got to dry the paper twice, and then it has to be again pressed, in order to straighten it out, and then you have to trim it; but the Senator forgets one thing that he might have mentioned; and that is, that in the hydrostatic system of printing the paper has to be trimmed also. It is trimmed before it is printed, and not afterward.

Mr. CLARK. It is trimmed by machinery.

Mr. HENDERSON. Both of them can be trimmed by machinery, and both of them were trimmed by machinery. There is no doubt of that.

I was going to remark that there have been expended in the Treasury at least $300,000 in that machinery. How far a large portion of it may have been necessary under any given state of circumstances I cannot say; but one thing is certain, that these parties, after experimenting with the Government money, have gone and taken out patents in the Patent Office for four of these machines, or for four improvements.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will remember, and it is due to these men to say, that they have never presented any claim to the United States for this patent; that they themselves propose to surrender any such claim. Indeed, this amendment provides that they shall surrender any such claim. If other parties outside of the Government of the United States desire to use this machinery, they claim the patent right.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then we take the benefit of it so far as we are concerned; but, as the Senator from Iowa very properly said, whenever machinery fails there and is cast aside, whose loss is it? The Government loses it. These parties have gone on and they have tried machine after machine, and whenever a machine fails the loss falls upon the Government. I object to the modus operandi of getting up this machinery and of experimenting. A large sum of money has been expended in that way. Whether the benefits already derived, or hereafter to be derived, are sufficient to compensate the Government for this loss, is another question. The Senate can judge of that just as well as I can. But I wish merely to state that these patents have been obtained, and although the amendment—

Mr. GRIMES. Who owns these patents?

Mr. HENDERSON. They do; Stewart Gwynne and Clark. Some of them are owned by them jointly, and others are owned by either the one or the other. I think one is taken out in Clark's name, one in Clark & Gwynne's name, and the other perhaps in Gwynne's name alone. I know it is said by Senators that if this amendment be adopted the Government will have the use of this machinery. I admit that fact; but do not these parties hold that machinery against all other parties in the world except the Government of the United States?

Mr. WILSON. What objection is there to that?

Mr. HENDERSON. Why, sir, if the Government of the United States would furnish me $300,000 to experiment upon and give me the benefit of those experiments, I could make any amount of money out of it; and so could any other mechanic. There is not a mechanic in the country that would not take up such an offer from the Government. There is no doubt that if you would furnish any man with $300,000 to make experiments, and let him experiment for four or five years, and then allow him to patent the machinery after it has been perfected and matured, leaving the Government to lose all the machinery that has been defective, he certainly could do well out of it. That is a very serious objection, and Senators will see it at a glance.

While I am upon this subject I desire to make a remark upon another branch of it, because I do not wish to trouble the Senate any more about it.

One of the members of the sub-committee, who examined this printing with me, has remarked that he saw nothing whatever in the examination to show otherwise than that there was perfect security in the production of these sheets. The Senator remarked, also, that at any paper store in town the paper might be purchased upon which this money is printed.

Mr. CLARK. I said at Philp & Solomon's.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, at Philp & Solomon's, or at any other paper store. I think, from my examination, that one of the greatest advantages to be derived from the experiments that have been carried on in the Treasury Department will be in the production of a distinctive paper. If that distinctive paper can be produced, it will be worth all the experiments that have been made. There is no doubt about that. I do not know whether they will be able to secure it or not. I care not what the printing may be in the future; whether it be the dry printing or the moist printing, it is certainly desirable that a distinctive paper should be produced; and I, for one, would be willing to see money appropriated for the purpose of producing that paper.

But, Mr. President, I am not so well satisfied upon another subject that has been alluded to, and that is, the perfect security of the Government in the printing of these notes and bonds. So far as my examination went, I saw nothing in the manner in which this department is being conducted to show any design whatever on the part of Mr. Clark to do otherwise than what was right; I saw no disposition manifested on his part that would indicate that he desired in any manner whatever to take any advantage of the Government; but I supposed the Senators who were with me in that examination came to this conclusion, that if Mr. Clark so desired, serious loss could be entailed upon the Government through his management there. When the paper upon which all our bonds and notes are printed is brought into the Treasury Department, it first goes into the hands of Mr. Clark. It is true that recently some sort of a check has been devised in having a paper department; but, as I understand, all this paper first falls into Mr. Clark's hands, and the paper department never gets the control of the paper, except through his hands. It first goes to him, and it is turned over by him to this paper department, and the paper department turns it back again to him upon his order. I know the Secretary of the Treasury has provided that a mark be put upon the paper before it is delivered to Mr. Clark; but the Senator from New Hampshire will bear me witness that Mr. Clark himself said that he did not regard the mark upon it as any protection whatever against wrong, and the gentleman who has charge of the paper department admitted that there was no sufficient protection of the Government, and that he was attempting to perfect the system so as to have a complete check upon it. The very mark that is put upon the paper in this paper department is taken off the paper before it is printed, or at the time it is printed, and it is cut off before the notes go out; so that there is no mark left upon it at all.

I must say, from my examination into this matter—although I saw no evidence of a disposition on the part of anybody to defraud the Government; although I saw in every department there an earnest desire apparently, and especially so on the part of Mr. Clark himself, to give us all the information we could possibly desire and that might be necessary to a correct understanding of this whole subject—that that department is not properly conducted; that there ought to be checks there that do not exist there; that another system ought to be adopted.

I examined the books in the different departments of this business. Most of the books are kept by ladies. I suppose they are not experienced book-keepers. I doubt whether any examination has ever been made of the books by the heads of the different departments; and I doubt whether there is to-day a single book-keeper that knows anything about the other books of the office. I have never seen any report here; but I doubt exceedingly whether, upon a correct examination of those books from the beginning of this immense work of printing the notes and bonds of the Government in that establishment, they would perfectly compare.

I had no time to examine into this thing; in fact it would take many days to do it; and I was not sent there for that purpose, but for the other purpose of examining merely, as I understood, into the two different modes of printing, and whether it was justifiable on the part of the Secretary to continue these experiments in printing. I turned my attention mostly to that. The other matters came up incidentally, and I mention them incidentally here. I think there ought to be some legislation on the part of Congress in reference to this subject.

Much has been said in the country against Mr. Clark. I saw nothing prejudicial to him in my examination; but I desire to state here, and I will state it while upon the subject, that Mr. Clark has almost entire and perfect control of all the vast machinery of printing these notes and bonds for the Government. He is the soul of the whole thing. His word is law in the whole department.

Mr. HOWE. Oh, no.

Mr. HENDERSON. In this department of printing. I apprehend that if Mr. Clark were to ask that forty or fifty sheets of money be printed upon either system, or forty or fifty bonds be printed and turned over to him, there is not an employe in that department that would object to it, or that could object to it. I understand from clerks of that department that such has been the case; that he has asked these things to be done; and it is necessary at times that they should be done. I do not mention the fact for the purpose of creating any suspicion against Mr. Clark. I desire to do no such thing. I understand that two thousand five hundred millions of money have been printed upon these presses, and I say that no one man ought to have entire control of a department of this character. I know there are checks; but what checks are there? They are such checks as Mr. Clark himself has established. I do not understand that the Secretary of the Treasury has ever prescribed a single check over him. If so, where is it? Where did you find it? As I understood from Mr. Clark himself, he said that this paper check was all nonsense; that it was no check upon him. He said, "I can go to Philp & Solomon's and buy as much paper as I desire to purchase, and come back here and have it printed by corrupting three or four different individuals in this department." He is perfectly frank on that subject. I say this vast power ought not to be intrusted to one, two, three, or four different individuals; but there ought to be a system of checks provided, not by Mr. Clark, but by the Secretary of the Treasury, over this whole matter. It is a subject of exceeding importance to the nation, in my judgment. I merely allude to it now, from the little examination I have made, in order that the Senate may, at the proper time, take the subject into consideration.

Mr. HENDRICKS obtained the floor.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to protract this debate, but I cannot permit the statement of the Senator from Missouri to go out unchallenged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator wants to speak now, I have no objection to giving way. I merely wanted to move that the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock. ["Oh, no."] This bill, I suppose, ought to be finished to-night, and we cannot do it unless we have an evening session. ["Oh, no."] I withdraw the motion; I see Senators do not desire it.

Mr. CLARK. I could not but feel, as the Senator from Missouri was making his remarks, although I have no doubt he intended them to be fair and to convey his impressions rightfully to the Senate, that he was giving a very wrong impression in some particulars in regard to the method and manner and the security of printing this paper money; and I hope the Senate will bear with me for a few minutes while I give them somewhat in detail the method in which this paper money is printed.

It is true that the invoice of the paper which comes from abroad is made to Mr. Clark, or it comes into his possession. Then it goes from him to the counting or paper clerk, as he is called. He makes an examination of all the paper, and he stamps every sheet with these words, "Treasury Department;" and he stamps every sheet in such a way that if you are printing two bonds upon one sheet, upon each of these bonds will be this stamp of "Treasury Department." He takes an account of it, and has it in his department; and that paper clerk is not under the control of Mr. Clark. When Mr. Clark makes a requisition upon the paper clerk for paper, he answers the requisition, delivers him the paper, and charges it to him upon his books; and those books in that department, as I said before, are not under the control of Mr. Clark; and the paper clerk can tell at any time how much paper he has delivered to him stamped in this way.

Then it goes from the paper clerk to the counting clerk; and the counting clerk is under the direction and control of Mr. Clark. She takes the paper and has it counted twice by two individuals. If they are found to agree, she enters upon the book the amount that she got from the paper clerk. If they are not found to agree, she at once notifies the paper clerk of the discrepancy there is in the paper, and the account is ascertained and made right.

Then the counting clerk delivers it to the next person who has to handle it; and that is the man who bronzes it, or puts on the bronze figures. The man requiring the paper to bronze makes a requisition on the counting clerk for so many sheets, say a thousand sheets. She counts it out to him, and charges it to him. He takes it, and goes into his department, and there he counts it to see if it is right. If it is right, he enters upon his book that he has received so many sheets from the counting clerk. If it is not right, he then notifies the accounting clerk that it is not right, and that mistake is corrected. The bronzer then puts the paper through his bronzing machine, and when it is all bronzed it is counted again by the man bronzing it. If he finds he has exactly the number of sheets charged to him in the morning for bronzing, he takes it back to the counting clerk and delivers the paper over to her, and then he is credited with so much paper. That makes his account correct. There, in the simple process of getting the paper from the paper clerk and delivering it to the bronzer and carrying it back, it has been counted four times.

Then after it goes back to the counting clerk, and is needed to be delivered to some other person for some other operation, say to the man who is going to make the first impression; so many sheets are counted out to him, and charged to him. He does his work, and finding it right, carries it back, and his account is correct. So it is with every operation until the whole work is perfected, and the last work to be done is to put on the seal. It then comes back to the counting clerk; is there again counted; is delivered to the sealing clerk, and then brought back and counted again.

In this operation sheets are destroyed sometimes. For instance, a sheet will be torn, and it is necessary to replace it. How is it done? Say a thousand sheets are counted out, and given to a clerk who has it in charge distinct from the counting clerk, which are put in packages by themselves. When a sheet is wanted for the purpose of duplicating one which has been destroyed one is taken out from the package, and this destroyed or imperfect sheet is put right in its place, so that when every one of these sheets is used in this way, you have a thousand imperfect sheets in their place brought in.

I do not undertake to say that this operation cannot be made more secure. I think it very likely it can; because I think it can be improved, as everything else can; but I think the statement of the Senator from Missouri was calculated to convey a wrong impression. It certainly conveyed a different impression from what I got. It undoubtedly conveyed faithfully the impression the Senator got.

But that is not precisely the point. The point is, whether these experiments should be continued further; because this objection as to insecurity applies to the printing of the paper, wet as well as dry; it applies to the whole system of printing in the Treasury Department, and involves the important question of the work being done there or in New York. I desire to state one thing to illustrate this method of printing in the Treasury Department or printing in New York.

The engraver takes a piece of steel plate, and he engraves upon it the precise bill that he wants, upon softened steel. Then that plate is hardened, made as hard as the workman can make it. Then there is a hard piece of steel, what they call a roller, laid upon one end, and a pressure brought upon it, and it is rolled over this plate; so that that roller takes the impression from the plate upon the roller itself, that roller being softened. Then after it is upon the roller, the roller is hardened, so as to be made as hard as the workman can make it, and from that roller, rolled upon plates one after another, you can get as many impressions of that plate, almost, as you please. Now, some of these engravings were made in New York, and some of those rollers were made in New York, and a controversy arose between the Secretary of the Treasury and the engravers in New York, who should have these rolls to keep, and have charge of them. The bank-note companies refused to let him have them; and they have got these rolls today, and can take as many impressions as they choose. You rely upon their honesty, and I dare say they may be perfectly honest people. I only mention it to show that these rollers are out of the control of the Government; whereas if your work is done here the rollers are all kept here, and they are kept under the direction of men beyond the control of Mr. Clark. I mention this to show the necessity of this work being under the control of the Government.

Mr. CONNESS obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to make one remark, if the Senator pleases, while this subject is fresh in my mind.

Mr. CONNESS. I yield.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from New Hampshire certainly misunderstood me if he understood me to cast any reflection upon any officer in the Department.

Mr. CLARK. I did not understand the Senator so, and did not mean to say so. What I did say was that his remarks were calculated to give a wrong impression about the security there might be there.

Mr. HENDERSON. If there is a want of security in the Treasury Department in printing this paper the sooner the Senate knows it the better. I say there is a want of security in it. I undertake to say that if Mr. Clark were a dishonest man he could take out of the Treasury Department every evening twenty-five, fifty, or one hundred thousand dollars in bonds or anything of that sort that he desired. I say that that can be done.

The Senator says he can get no paper unless it is stamped. What sort of a stamp is that? Why, sir, I would not have observed it hardly if the gentleman who is at the head of the paper department had not called my attention to it. It is a very small stamp just on the margin of the sheet. In making the impression it does not reach the stamp, and in trimming the sheets afterward, the stamp is always cut off. You cannot see that stamp upon a bond or upon a Treasury note. This old paper clerk never sees it after it leaves him, and whether he has any settlement or not I do not know. I think he said he never had any settlement. I asked Mr. Clark himself, (and I believe the Senator was present at the time,) "Is that any check upon you?" He replied, "I can put that stamp upon a thousand sheets in the course of a few hours; I can go and make a stamp, and put it on the sheets as fast as I choose." I had that from Mr. Clark himself, and I think it was stated in the presence of the Senator from New Hampshire. Any mechanic could make such a stamp; and I look upon Mr. Clark as one of the finest mechanics in the country, perhaps superior to any I have ever seen. There is no difficulty in making a stamp to compare with this stamp, and to make a similar impression with this stamp. Even if it were not so, it is subsequently cut off or taken off, and it affords no check at all.

The Senator talks about this paper clerk being a check. Where is he a check? I asked Mr. Clark himself, "Do you receive the paper first from the paper makers? Is it shipped to you, or is it shipped to the paper clerk?" He told me it was shipped to him and not to the clerk; that he turned it over himself to the clerk. Is he bound to turn it all over? May he not keep fifty thousand sheets back? He can go and buy it. This is what I complained of. I say if he were a dishonest man, and I do not pretend to say he is, he could abstract as much paper and as many bonds as he chose.

The Senator says this paper is counted by different individuals. Does not the Senator know that in making these impressions there are hundreds and hundreds of sheets that are returned in a damaged condition?

Mr. CLARK. Not that many.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, say six or seven sheets with one workman during the day. They are working a great many wet presses there; some one hundred and fifty or two hundred I suppose; and they are working a large number of hydrostatic presses. A great number of those impressions are badly made. Take the case of a newspaper. It is not every impression that is a good one. Those upon which bad impressions are made are cast aside. If a workman during the day loses eight or ten out of his nine hundred, he only accounts for the good impressions. Now I ask, may not a workman return at night eight or nine bad impressions of $1,000 bonds?

Mr. HOWE. My friend will allow me to ask him if each one of those workmen who takes possession of any portion of this paper does not account for each sheet of the paper?

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator will wait a moment I will explain that.

Mr. CONNESS. I yielded to the Senator from Missouri because I did not think he would occupy a great deal of time; but if he is going to discuss the question at length I must claim the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not going to discuss it at length. If the Senator had not interrupted me he would have seen what I was driving at. I know the workmen have to account for the bad sheets; they have to return them; but I say that Mr. Clark may put into the hands of one single workman, if he chooses to do it, and get forty $1,000 notes printed, on paper that never went into the paper clerk's hands at all.

Mr. HOWE. How so?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will see in an instant. It would only be necessary for him to corrupt one man. He has only to corrupt one single individual in the Department; because there is not a sufficient check on the paper department.

Mr. HOWE. I cannot assent to that proposition.

Mr. GRIMES. Who appoints them?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know who appoints them.

Mr. JOHNSON. I submit to my friend from Missouri whether upon the question immediately before the Senate the topics to which he is referring are pertinent.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am aware that this is out of order; but I desire to say a word or two in answer to the statement of my friend from New Hampshire, that I was mistaken on this subject. It is a matter of importance; and while this subject is up, I think there is nothing improper in referring to a matter of such vast importance in order that the proper legislation may be had to provide checks that I do not perceive to be at present in that Department.

Mr. CONNESS. When the question now before the Senate—whether the proposition of the House of Representatives discontinuing these experiments in paper should be stricken out and we should insert in lieu thereof an authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain how much is due to the parties connected with furnishing these machines spoken of, and that it may be paid—was before the Finance Committee, they examined it with all the care that could possibly be applied to it. In order that it might be examined with relation to the exact quality and kind of printing, a sub-committee was appointed, consisting of the Senators who have addressed the Senate to-day. With due respect to these Senators, with great deference to their judgment, and for the examination they have made, I submit that it has not been so thorough, nor complete, as in my opinion to authorize the expression of a definite opinion now; I mean as to the amount of checks necessary to be imposed, and as to the manner in which the printing is carried on. As I understand, that sub-committee expects to continue their investigations and complete their researches, and then it will be for them to suggest what additional safeguards and checks may be adopted in connection with this printing, which is of so much importance.

But the question now directly before us has been passed upon by the Finance Committee, examined with all the care that they could apply to it, and I cannot see, upon a question of this kind, that the Senate can do better than to accept the recommendation that that committee have made. They have certainly been guided by the greatest regard for the public interests. I hope, sir, that we shall come to a vote upon the proposition as it is before the Senate, so that we may get through with the bill which the Senator from Ohio now has before us. We have all got business waiting, important to us, but we cannot get at it until we are relieved from the pressure, worse than a hydrostatic pressure, from the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us vote on this amendment. We are all ready now.

Mr. GRIMES. No, we are not.

Mr. WILSON. I insist on my motion.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not wish to discuss now a matter that is irrelevant. When I said we were ready to vote the Senator from Iowa said, "No, we are not." I listen with great attention to the Senator from Iowa when he discusses naval affairs, and when he goes into the minutiae of the subject, and feel that I am instructed when he speaks; but I hope he will not continue the discussion of this proposition, and prevent us from voting on the subject. I hope we shall get a vote.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The motion of Mr. WILSON was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 9, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Mr. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. ROBINSON, who has been called away from his seat by indisposition in his family.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. PRUYN. I desire to make an inquiry in regard to the minutes. I wish to know in what manner the proceedings of the joint convention of the two Houses yesterday have been brought upon the Journal of this House.

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of the law which provides that the proceedings of the joint convention shall be spread upon the Journals of both Houses.

Mr. PRUYN. I did not hear that part of the Journal read, and I want to know in what manner those proceedings are introduced. Is it on the report of the Speaker as to what took place?

The SPEAKER. The uniform usage, following, as the Chair understands, the provision of the law, is that such proceedings shall be placed upon the Journals of both Houses; and of course that is done in each House under the direction of the Journal Clerk, who is responsible for the Journal.

Mr. PRUYN. The parliamentary method of stating the matter, according to the practice in other legislative bodies, would be that the Senate had met the House in joint convention, and that, when the House resumed its session, the Speaker reported that the joint convention had transacted certain business, stating that business. I do not know how the proceedings of yesterday are introduced in our Journal. I was not here when the Clerk read that portion of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the matter during the day, referring to the law or rule on the subject.

Mr. PRUYN. I think that this is a question of parliamentary practice, in regard to which our Journal should be right if it is wrong.

The SPEAKER. The present understanding of the Chair is that the rule or law makes it imperative that the proceedings shall be placed upon the Journals of both Houses.

Mr. PRUYN. I think that the practice has been in other cases that, when the House has resumed its session, the Speaker has reported what has taken place in the joint meeting.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken so far as the practice of this House is concerned. The present occupant of the chair has been present on two previous occasions when the presidential vote was counted, and the form of proceeding has been in this respect the same as that read from the Journal to-day.

Mr. PRUYN. In what way do the proceedings get upon our Journal?

The SPEAKER. They are placed there by the Journal Clerk.

Mr. PRUYN. Let the Clerk read that portion of the Journal which introduces the proceedings of the joint convention.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The Senate attended in the Hall of the House.

"The President of the Senate took the Speaker's chair, as the Presiding Officer, in pursuance of the joint rule of the two Houses, the Speaker being seated on his left, and the Senators having taken the seats provided for them.

"The President of the Senate then proceeded, in the presence of the two Houses of Congress, to open the certificates of the electors of the several States," &c.

Mr. PRUYN. That is clearly not parliamentary. I refer to it as a matter of parliamentary practice. Our Journal Clerk undertakes to say what was done in the joint convention of the two Houses. That should be an announcement from the Speaker to the House when the House resumes its session.

The SPEAKER. That would be at variance with the practice heretofore followed upon the Journals of the House on such occasions. The Chair does not feel at liberty to order the change proposed, but he will entertain a motion for the correction of the Journal.

Mr. PRUYN. It is only a question of parliamentary practice, as to the manner in which we get these proceedings upon our Journal. I do not see how our Clerk can put them there, as he has done.

The SPEAKER. The joint rules for the guidance of both Houses require that the Vice President shall take the chair, and that the Clerks of the two Houses shall, with the tellers, take seats in front.

Mr. PRUYN. Those proceedings are not our proceedings; they are the proceedings of the joint convention of the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. The Journal has been made up in strict accordance with the usage.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. I ask to take up and concur in an amendment of the Senate to a House bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not object if the morning hour has not commenced.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House yesterday looked to the fact that there should be a morning hour, and when the regular order shall be demanded the morning hour will commence, and not before.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My purpose will be subverted, then, by demanding the regular order of business when I want the morning hour to commence?

The SPEAKER. By the order of the House, making a morning hour imperative, conference reports and other privileged questions will have to come in after the morning hour. The intention was that there should be a morning hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That, undoubtedly, was my understanding. The morning hour has not yet commenced?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

ACTING ASSISTANT TREASURERS, ETC.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, moved to take up House bill No. 689, to provide for Acting Assistant Treasurers or depositaries of the United States in certain cases.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate was to insert the words, "with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. KASSON moved to concur in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MAJOR DAVID H. HASTINGS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House, the record of the late trial by court-martial of Major David H. Hastings.

Mr. DAWES. I move that it be laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the case, that we should have all that mass of papers printed?

The SPEAKER. It is the case that has been referred to so frequently in debate upon the floor.

Mr. DAWES. The importance of the case demands that these papers should be printed in order that the people may see them.

Mr. COX. Is all of that large bundle to be printed?

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. COX. Does not the motion to print go to the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. It does not; only motions to print extra copies go to that committee.

Mr. COX. Is the motion divisible?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COX. Then I ask that it be divided.

Mr. DAWES. On the question of printing, allow me to say that, although those documents are voluminous, it is a precedent to the country. I want to know whether a man who stands convicted of twenty-six forgeries is only to be suspended for a term from rank and pay.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw that motion; and I desire to say one word in support of the motion to print. At the end of six months this man goes back into the Army, with the record in the War Department that he has been convicted by court-martial of twenty-six forgeries and the embezzlement of $26,000. Such is the record. Now, he may have been improperly convicted; the evidence may not have sustained the conviction. I know nothing at all about it; but he is either guilty or he is not guilty. If he is not guilty of those charges, it seems to me the War Department ought to have set aside the verdict, and ordered him to be tried again, rather than have permitted the conviction to remain, and alter the sentence to the miserable adjudication that the amount of penalty which is to be affixed upon forgery and embezzlement in this country is only a suspension of pay and rank for six calendar months.

I understand from the proceedings on the trial that not only was this man convicted on these charges, but that he hired witnesses to absent themselves; that the witnesses testified upon the stand to his giving them three and five thousand dollars, and other sums, to absent themselves in Canada, out of reach of process. This case may be all wrong, and he may have been convicted upon insufficient or unreliable testimony; but if that is so I want to know why the verdict was not set aside; why the War Department did not say that he was improperly convicted. But while the judgment stands in this way, with the finding of guilty approved, with the penalty affixed to it, it appears that the judgment of the War Department is that a sufficient penalty for these enormous crimes is simply a suspension of rank and pay for six calendar months.

It is a matter of money-making on his part; he goes off with the $26,000 in his pocket, not being required to restore it, for such is the finding and such the record left in the War Department. Now, as I have already said, I know not whether justly or unjustly, he stands convicted, but the War Department seemed to be dissatisfied that the court which convicted him should sentence him to a penalty which seems to me to be a proper one for so enormous a crime. The sentence of the court-martial was that he should pay a fine of $5,000, be confined two years, should restore the $26,000 that he had embezzled, and should continue in confinement until he had paid the fine and restored the $26,000, if the confinement did not exceed five years. That seems to me a punishment in some measure adequate, but the War Department, without setting aside the verdict of guilty, set aside the sentence attached to that verdict of guilty, and substituted this paltry sentence of suspension of pay and reduction of rank for six calendar months. He goes back into the Army with his associates, as one of them, with this brand of forgery and embezzlement upon him, and yet only forfeits his pay and rank.

Mr. GANSON. I would inquire of the gentleman what he expects to accomplish, beyond allowing us to read the papers.

Mr. DAWES. I intend to get this matter printed, so that we can see what peculiar reason there was for the War Department attaching such a penalty for such a crime. The proceedings of the court-martial presented to me were accompanied by the proceedings of a court-martial upon a poor soldier who, being drunk, happened to insult an officer, and he was sent for five years to the Dry Tortugas; and yet nobody in the War Department ever thought that too heavy a penalty upon the poor soldier. But when a horse inspector, or something of that kind, plunders the United States by vouchers forged by him, or by others used by him, and knowing them to be forged, he is only worthy, in the opinion of the War Department, of six months' suspension of pay and rank, at the expiration of which period he goes back whitewashed into the Army.

Mr. COX. I desire to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that, when I made objection to printing this document, I did not know that it related to the case referred to by the gentleman the other day. I will not object to printing the document, although the bundle appears to be large. The case calls for publicity, and the only way of correcting these enormous outrages is to expose them to the people. If this case be as is stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, it ought to be spread before the country broadcast, in order to correct by public opinion the action of the War Department.

Mr. GANSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that the best way would be to call the head of the Department upon the floor, and interrogate him as to what has been done.

Mr. COX. I do not want him to be called into this House. That remark is entirely out of this case.

Mr. DAWES. When the case is printed I desire to have it go before the country, that they may pass judgment upon the remarkable state of things which the record discloses.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps it is just to the Department that the concluding report of the Judge Advocate General should be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

It is recommended that the findings and sentence be disapproved.

J. HOLT,
Judge Advocate General.

Mr. BROOKS. I suggest that the whole document ought to be read if any part of it is read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand the reading of it?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to demand the reading of the entire document on the motion to print.

Mr. DAWES. I have the official record here, signed by E. D. Townsend, in which the only thing set aside is the sentence. The verdict of "guilty" stands recorded to-day. I should like to have a letter which my friend from Pennsylvania before me [Mr. THAYER] has, from the judge advocate who conducted the trial, read at the desk, if any part of the record is read. I call the previous question on the motion to print.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the communication was ordered to be printed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate, in the absence of the Vice President, had elected Hon. DANIEL CLARK, of New Hampshire, President pro tempore of the Senate.

SALE OF MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. JULIAN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business during the morning hour, which now commences, is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back bill of the House No. 730, to provide for the subdivision and sale of the gold and silver lands of the United States, and others containing valuable minerals, for the coining of the products of such lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to have the bill read. It is a bill upon a very important subject, which I have not been able to examine, and one in which I take a great deal of interest.

Mr. JULIAN. The bill is not reported for action now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I will not insist on the reading.

The SPEAKER. The time consumed by the reading would not come out of the time of the gentleman from Indiana, but it would come out of the morning hour, and the morning hour would expire before the conclusion of the gentleman's hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Indiana does not desire to consider the bill now, of course I will not take up the time of the House by having it read.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Government in dealing with the vast mineral resources of the nation is a subject of the highest moment to the people, and invokes the early and earnest attention of Congress. No one can overstate its magnitude, considered in relation to the actual facts of our condition to-day. In seasons of prosperity and peace our country can endure much mal-administration and very serious financial mistakes; but these are not to be hazarded in this crisis of her history. We are compassed about with perils and pressing necessities, and must husband both our wisdom and our resources, if we hope to save the Republic.

The measure I have had the honor to report from the Committee on Public Lands proposes a radical and entire change in the present policy of the Government respecting its lands containing the precious metals. It provides for vesting the fee in individual proprietors by public and private sale, instead of retaining the title in the Government and treating their occupants as tenants at will. It contemplates their survey and subdivision into small tracts, and fixes a minimum price upon them, graded according to size, locality, and mineral value. It prohibits combinations among bidders at the public sales, and the purchase of any lands by foreigners, except those who shall have declared their intention to become citizens. It provides that actual discoverers and workers of mining localities shall have the right to purchase them at the minimum price, and thus relieve themselves from the disadvantage of competing with rich capitalists. It limits the quantity of mineral land which any single purchaser may buy to forty acres. It requires that the gold and silver extracted shall be coined in the mints of the United States, empowers the President to lay off the mining regions into suitable coining districts, and compels miners to have their gold and silver coined in the districts in which they are found. It further provides that every purchaser shall first take the oath of loyalty to the United States prescribed by law, and that the net proceeds of the sales of these lands shall be dedicated and applied to the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds of the United States. This is a brief outline of the main features of the bill; and I propose, in entering upon its discussion, to refer to some preliminary considerations which fairly open the way.

That the present condition of our currency is an unsound one, is a proposition which no man will dispute. That the only safe basis for a financial medium of exchange is coin, may be affirmed as equally true. It is needless to deny this fact or dispute about its philosophy. The civilized world has so adjudged. The question may fairly be accepted as a settled one, that gold and silver constitute the true medium of exchange and the permanent standard of value. No financial policy therefore can be trusted which does not contemplate a return to specie payments as soon as practicable. This is the opinion of Mr. McCulloch, the able Comptroller of our national banks. He says, "it should be the object of all honorable bankers to expedite, as far as possible, rather than to postpone, a return to specie payments," and that "it must never be forgotten that the business of the country rests upon an unsound basis, or rather is without a proper basis, as long as the Government and the banks are not meeting their obligations in coin." Our Government securities may be very current to-day, because they are sustained by popular confidence and the tide of fortune which seems to be sweeping away all obstacles to the triumph of the national cause. But this confidence may not be abiding. What we most of all need is such a policy as will sustain popular confidence, even under military failures and a prolonged war; and such a policy must embody the fundamental principle just stated.

But to this end, Mr. Speaker, the quantity of the precious metals must be increased. The startling disproportion of gold and silver to other values, and to our commercial wants, must in some way be destroyed or greatly reduced. The property of the United States within the last ten years has increased about nine hundred million dollars per year. This increase is estimated to be more than two hundred times greater than the increase of coin during the same period. These are very suggestive and significant facts. The growth of our commerce and the issue of paper money and Government securities still further complicate our financial condition, and demand, as an absolute necessity, an increase of the quantity of gold and silver. If this is not provided for the price of coin will continue to advance, and by its effect upon Government stocks and prices generally must seriously cripple the prosecution of the war, and most injuriously affect the welfare of the whole country. Here is the real problem of our finances, if not also a problem involving the national life. That we are to crush the rebellion, and that speedily, few men can any longer doubt. Every passing day is demonstrating that our military power is amply adequate to the task it has in hand. Of the questions growing out of the war which yet remain to be settled, the grand one, and by far the most difficult of solution, is that of our finances. How can the further inflation of the currency be prevented, and a return to specie payments become possible, without increasing the quantity of specie? Even should the war be ended within the present year, and permanent peace be restored, the question I am presenting must continue a vital one, demanding the early and most earnest consideration of statesmen.

Perhaps it will be said that increased taxation can meet the financial difficulty. I agree that it may partially do so. If Congress, in the early stages of the war, had known how to tax, and had possessed the courage to impose such burdens upon the people as the national exigency demanded, our financial condition would have been incalculably better than we now find it. The price of gold would not have gone up as we have seen it. The great mass of the people, who are interested in stable and moderate prices, would not have been compelled to buy the necessities of life at the enormous and ruinous rates which have resulted from the inflation of the currency, unaccompanied by courageous efforts in the way of taxation to defray the expenses of the war as it progressed. The Government, in the purchase of its vast supplies for our grand armies, would have been able to do so at such reasonable rates as to have saved hundreds of millions of dollars, thus husbanding our resources, maintaining the national credit, and insuring the confidence of the people. A system of vigorous taxation, inaugurated early in the year 1862, before the derangement of the currency was made manifest, and steadily maintained since that time, would have saved to the country more than a million dollars per day, thus averting the frightful national debt which has accumulated, and is rapidly increasing through the failure of timely and adequate taxation.

But these legislative mistakes cannot be undone. We are compelled to deal with the present as the past has made it. Congress, within the last three years, has been learning the science of taxation. Our burdens, while they are by no means crushing, are heavy. Undoubtedly we shall be compelled to increase them in any event of the future; but no rate of taxation which any public man will dare propose, or which the people would endure, will help the country out of its financial crisis. Some policy which will secure to the Government a fresh and liberal supply of the precious metals will be found absolutely necessary. If, therefore, there is anywhere an available source of revenue yet untouched, by which the burdens of the people may be greatly relieved and the nation itself rescued from the great financial maelstrom which threatens to swallow it up, it becomes our chosen and highest duty to seek that source of revenue, and coin it into the national service. Sir, I believe it requires no divining-rod to find it, and that all we need, in the words of Mr. Ruggles, is to "uncover the mountains of gold and silver garnered up by Providence to meet the cost of saving our nation's life."

The auriferous region of the United States on the western portion of the continent extends from thirty-one degrees and thirty minutes north latitude to the forty-ninth parallel, and from one hundred degrees of longitude to the Pacific, embracing portions of Dakota, Nebraska, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana, and covering an area of more than a million square miles. These vast regions are described in official reports as stretching longitudinally and in lateral spurs, crossed and linked together by intervening ridges, connecting the whole system by five principal ranges, dividing the country into an equal number of basins, each being nearly surrounded by mountains and watered by mountain streams and snows, thereby interspersing this immense territory with bodies of agricultural lands equal to the support not only of miners, but of a dense population. These mountains are literally stocked with minerals, gold and silver being interspersed in profusion over this immense surface, and daily brought to light by new discoveries.

According to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a greater amount of mineral wealth is to be found in the territory of the United States than in all other habitable countries. Before the discovery of the precious metals in California the annual production of gold in all parts of the world did not exceed an average of $18,000,000. The present annual production in California alone is estimated at $70,000,000. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his report for 1862, estimated the production of gold in that year, in California and the other western gold-bearing regions, at $100,000,000; and the Secretary of the Interior, in his report of the same year, estimated that if an amount of labor relatively equal to that expended in California had been applied to the gold fields known to exist outside of that State, the production, including that of California, would have exceeded $400,000,000. Taking into account subsequent and quite recent discoveries in our mining regions, and especially in Arizona, I think it safe to say that an annual product of $1,000,000,000 might be realized under a just policy which would at once invite laborers to our western Territories and reward them by rich returns. I quote the following facts from the official report just referred to:

"The usual size of a mining claim in the quartz region is one hundred feet on the line of the lode or vein, and one hundred feet on each side, equal to an area of twenty thousand square feet, or say twelve hundred claims to the square mile. Allow that only one hundredth part of the mountain surface is occupied by paying lodes or veins, and there will be space for three million six hundred thousand claims. But Governor Evans, of Colorado, estimates the already discovered gold bearing region of that Territory as affording ample room for eight hundred thousand claims, and states that new discoveries are daily increasing with area. A glance at the map is sufficient to show that the mineral region of Colorado occupies less than one sixth of the whole extent under consideration; but assume it to be one sixth, and there will be ample extent on this basis for four million eight hundred thousand claims, which, if worked, would give employment to twenty million men."

These pregnant facts, Mr. Speaker, are supplied by the Government itself; and yet, weighed down with debt, and threatened with bankruptcy and ruin through the scarcity of gold and silver, it has adopted no policy whatever in dealing with our mineral lands, except the negative one of reserving them from sale. The United States have left them open to our people and to the greed of monopolists from foreign countries for the past sixteen years, during which $1,000,000,000 have been extracted, without a dollar of revenue to the national Treasury. Sir, this is financial profligacy. It is legislative madness. If not repented of, and that speedily, it may end in national suicide. Our system of taxation reaches everywhere, drawing revenue from all quarters, except these prime sources of supply. They are exempt, while every other interest is made to groan under the pressure; and yet the Government, slumbering over its grand opportunity, declines to adopt any policy respecting them. It does not sell its mineral lands; it does not lease them; it simply abandons them, while owning them in fee, and solemnly bound, as the trustee of the people and by the Constitution itself, to "make all needful rules and regulations" for their government and the development of their wealth. How long will the people thus sport with their resources and bear with their public servants who are thus recreant to the public good?

But assuming that this "let-alone" policy is to be abandoned by the Government, the important question remains as to the disposition of these mineral lands. As a saving financial expedient and a wise national policy, what shall be done with them? This becomes an immediate, practical question. Three several methods of solving it have been advocated, namely, the system of leasing, the imposition of a tax upon the mining products, and the absolute sale of the fee. The two methods first named rest upon substantially the same principle. They both recognize the United States as the perpetual landlord of these vast possessions, and the people who enter upon them as tenants, either for years or at will. They are both at war with our republican institutions. They are both in direct antagonism with the policy of sale which would utterly divest the title of the Government, and vest it in individual proprietors. It is this latter policy which is submitted in the bill I have reported, and which I propose briefly to argue.

The ordinance of 1785, for the disposal of the lands in the "Western Territory" contained the first reservation of mineral land from sale. Some fifteen years later, authority of law was given for leasing such lands. The folly of our rulers at one time went so far as to provide by law for leasing agricultural lands, and I mention this to show how unsafe it is to make the past action of our Government the guide of our steps to-day. In 1807 the power to lease was confined to lead mines. In the Canadian bounty-land act of 1816 lead mines and salt springs were excluded from location. Congress, however, by act of March 3, 1829, conferred authority on the President to expose to sale as other public lands "the several lead mines and contiguous lands in the State of Missouri," under certain specified restrictions; but with this exception the policy of reserving mineral lands from sale, and of leasing lead and copper mines, continued till the year 1846, when Congress, on the 11th day of July, ordered "the reserved lead mines and contiguous lands in the States of Illinois and Arkansas" and the then "Territories of Wisconsin and Iowa" to be exposed to sale under certain conditions, the price being not less than two dollars and a half per acre. In the following year Congress ordered the organization of the Lake Superior district in the upper peninsula of Michigan, and the Chippewa land district in Wisconsin, and provided for the sale of lands containing copper, lead, or other valuable ores, at a minimum price of five dollars per acre.

These acts of Congress show how long and patiently the Government acted the part of national landlord over its national tenants, the miners of the Northwest. And the experiment failed utterly. The leasing policy drew into the mining regions a population of vagrants, gamblers, and ruffians, excluding sober and intelligent citizens, and making the establishment of organized civil communities impossible. Their houses were mere hovels and shanties. They resisted the payment of taxes on the products of the mines, and killed the agents of the Government. The settlement and civilization of these mining regions was not only thus prevented, but neither the national Treasury nor the miner was the pecuniary gainer under this policy. The Government at length was forced to adopt the policy of selling the fee, when a new class of men took possession of these regions as the owners of the soil, brought their families with them, laid the foundations of social order, expelled the barbarians who had secured a temporary occupancy, and thus at once promoted their own welfare, the real prosperity of the country, and the financial interests of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, this signal and very instructive failure of the leasing policy in the mines of Illinois, was preceded by a similar one in the lead mines of Missouri. The Government, as already stated, adopted the policy in 1807, and tried it for more than twenty years in that State. Many leases were taken, and great quantities of lead were dug from the mines, but no rents were paid to the Government—"no, not a dollar; not one cent." I quote the words of Colonel Benton in the Senate of the United States, in the year 1823, after the experiment had been tried in his State fifteen years; and I fortify my argument by his high authority. I shall bring to my aid both his facts and his reasoning in discussing the measure I have submitted. "The spirit of tenancy," said he, "is everywhere the same; it is a spirit adverse to improvements, always leaning toward the injury of the property in possession, and always holding back from the payment of rent." The truth of this principle will be universally admitted, and as an argument against the policy in question is unanswerable, and in itself sufficient to demand a totally different system. Every landlord and tenant, whether of mineral or agricultural lands, must admit its force.

Colonel Benton declared that the fruit of this false system has been "injury to the national prosperity, loss to the national Treasury, and a resource to foreign Powers to supply us with the articles of which God in His providence has given to us more than He has given to them." He argued that to continue this system would be "to perpetuate the relation of landlord and tenant throughout the vast extent of the mineral districts of the Republic, that landlord being the Federal Government, and holding its domains and a body of tenantry within the limits of a sovereign State." He denied such a power to the Federal Government. "I take my stand," said he, "upon the words of the Constitution, and deny to the Federal Government a power to hold lands in any State, except upon grants made, in cases enumerated, and for the purposes specified in the Constitution. The monarchies of Europe have their serfs and vassals, but the genius of the Republic disclaims the tenure and the spirit of vassalage, and calls for freemen, owners of the soil, masters of their own castles, and free from the influence of a foreign sovereign." The effects of this policy he said would be "population retarded, the improvement of the country delayed, large bodies of land held free of taxation, and their elections more or less influenced by the presence of men holding their leases at the will of the Federal Government." He would "deliver up the mines and salines of the Republic to the pursuit of individual industry, to the activity of individual enterprise, to the care of individual interest, guided and sustained by the skill and capital of those who may choose to hold them."

He argued that the Government would "find its indemnity in the price which would be paid for them, and in the increased wealth of its citizens, which is, in fact, the wealth of the Government itself. Besides, without a freehold in the soil, the experience of all countries proves that the riches of the mineral kingdom can never be discovered or brought into action. A lessee for years cannot incur the expense of sinking shafts, connecting them by galleries, opening ventilators, constructing hydraulic machines, and building permanent furnaces. And without these labors, the mineral riches which lie some hundred feet in the bowels of the earth can never be discovered. All this is now proved on the mineral lands of the United States in Missouri. Fifty or sixty mines have been opened, exhausted, and abandoned. Yes, in the space of a few months a mine is exhausted, while in England mines are now worked which were opened two thousand years ago. The reason is obvious: the English miner, having the freehold of the soil, husbands and improves his property, and follows the vein downward even to the distance of two thousand feet. The American lessee can only take what he finds near the surface of the ground. He cannot pierce the rock in pursuit of the descending veins which lead to the great beds of ore below. He can only pick out the eyes of the mine, without touching its body; nor is it possible to tell where nature has deposited her hidden treasures, except by opening the earth to the places where they lie."

In concluding his speech, embodying so much both of argument and fact, and so forcibly expressed, Colonel Benton referred to the example of England:

"In the early ages her base metals were considered as too precious for the people, and were reserved as Crown property. Her mines were leased out, and the great tin mines of Cornwall brought the imposing sum of one hundred marks per annum, and the rest in proportion. In the reign of Philip and Mary this policy was changed. The mineral kingdom, by an act of Parliament, ceased to be a monopoly in the hands of the Crown. It was delivered up to the skill and capital and industry of individuals, and the result has been that the iron, lead, copper, tin, coal, and salt of England have carried the wealth and power of the British empire to a height to which the mines of Peru and Mexico could never have exalted her. Let us follow her example, not the example of her dark ages, but of that enlightened period which has made of a small island in the sea one of the richest and most powerful empires on the face of the globe."

These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the arguments of the great statesman of Missouri, as embodied in a speech delivered in the Senate of the United States forty-two years ago. They did not fail of their purpose; for, though not heeded at the time, they at length found their vindication in the act of Congress of 1829, already referred to, abolishing the system of tenancy in Missouri, and subjecting her mineral lands to sale; and still further in the acts of 1846 and 1847, inaugurating the same reform in the lead and copper regions of Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin. To the extent of this legislation the reasoning of Colonel Benton has prevailed in the policy of the Government, and has been fully justified by time. If it be said that the policy of selling the fee of lands containing other minerals than those mentioned has not been tried, I reply that for that very reason there is no fact which can be adduced against it; and I reply further, that the arguments I have employed, showing the principle of tenancy to be a vicious one, apply as legitimately to lands containing gold and silver as to those containing copper and lead; to our great western Territories as well as to regions far less remote. On the other hand, there is one unbroken chain of testimony against the policy of retaining the fee of mineral lands in the Government, and dealing with their occupants as tenants, whether the lands contain the precious or the useful metals, and whether they lie on this or the other side of the Rocky mountains. On this point fact and argument join hands, and leave that policy totally unsupported.

Mr. Speaker, the sale of our mineral lands is demanded by considerations which appeal, with irresistible force, to the common sense of every man who will allow himself to think. In the first place, it will give security to land titles, and thus necessarily invite into the mining regions a population of permanent settlers, and sober, intelligent, wealth-producing people. This has been shown in the case to which I have already referred of the lead mines of Illinois. It must be remembered that population is not always wealth. It should be permanent, industrious, and able to find its support in the rewards of labor and the general prosperity which that labor secures. Under the policy which treats miners as mere tenants at will permanent settlements are impossible. No settler can have any security for the claim he may select. He can have no sure protection against its forfeiture. Since he has no better title to the land he occupies than he has to the whole of the unoccupied country around him, he is perpetually tempted to change his temporary habitation. Having no tie of ownership to bind him to the soil, and no permanent improvements on it, he is at perfect liberty at any moment to "take up his bed and walk." Hence it is that our miners are proverbially nomadic. Their unsettled and roving habits will not allow them to accumulate property for themselves, while they contribute nothing to the permanent growth of the country. What Colonel Benton said of the leasing system in Missouri applies, in all its force, to the superficial mining of these wandering tribes, who have no title to the soil. It is madness to hope for revenue to the Government, or the development of our mineral resources, through the agency of such a population and such a policy; nor is there any possible remedy save in the sale of these lands in fee to actual settlers.

The policy for which I plead is urged by kindred and stronger reasons. Under our present system there can be no homes in the mining regions. Where there is no security for land titles, no permanent communities can be established. The miner cannot afford to build him a comfortable house, with substantial improvements around him, because he is simply a tenant at will. His dwelling will be a mere hovel, and every fact of his condition will testify of his transitory character. In a country thus dealt with homes will be exceedingly "few and far between." In fact, a people without substantial habitations, and whose time is largely employed in migrating from place to place, must practically dispense with domestic life. That the proportion of men to women among such a people should be three or four to one is not remarkable, nor should we be surprised that of the few women in the mines of California "a considerable share are neither maids, wives, nor widows." This is the saddest fact connected with our present mining policy. It is a conspiracy against the establishment and sacredness of American homes.

It has been said, with truth, that the best part of the education of every man and woman is received at home. This is the grand school for virtue. The most precious interests of life belong to it. One of our most gifted American writers says that just so far as the family is improved, its duties performed, and its blessings prized, all artificial institutions of society, including Government itself, are superseded. The family is the foundation of the State, the peculiar institution of God. The Government, therefore, should throw its parental wing over it, and guard it as the mother guards the life of her child. My chief quarrel with our existing policy is that it makes the establishment of homes practically impossible in vast regions of our unoccupied territory, which else might be carved up into independent homesteads, and dotted over by smiling habitations. This is the crowning argument against the system of tenancies at will. Under it, civil society, practically speaking, cannot exist in the mining regions. The virtual outlawry of woman forbids it. Public opinion, which in well-regulated communities exerts a wholesome power over the individual, is here unfelt. The better class of miners soon leave the country, while the lower and more brutalized classes are constantly swelled by that law of moral gravitation which draws kindred spirits together. Nothing can arrest the growth and dominating influence of this evil element but the policy of conferring permanent homes upon the occupants of the soil. This will drive out the vicious, the thriftless, the dissipated, as it did in the lead and copper regions of the Northwest, and introduce order, industry, and real civilization in their stead. With these, the wealth of the mines will be extracted, and, by becoming the subject of taxation, increase the revenues of the Government while rewarding the miner for his toil.

The sale of our mineral lands, Mr. Speaker, is to be vindicated by still other considerations. No country can prosper in which land does not become valuable, and increase in value with the increase of population. Our present policy totally overlooks this principle. By denying permanent ownership in the soil, and thus preventing its improvement, it necessarily keeps down its value. While it fails to draw from the mines the wealth which they contain, for reasons already given it cripples enterprise in this and other directions by depriving capital of the best possible security for its investment. Men will not lend their capital to mining projects when the title to the soil is in the Government, and cannot be pledged as security. This non-employment of capital not only retards mining, but keeps idle multitudes of laborers who need employment. Capital, wanting investment somewhere, is sent to New York or to Europe. According to Hittell, to whose valuable and interesting work on the Resources of California the public is greatly indebted, $40,000,000 a year are shipped from that State because there is nothing to give as security. "We offer to pay," says he, "twice as much interest as anybody else, and our offer would be gladly accepted if there were a certainty that we would pay as we promise; but there is no certainty, no security." Every interest suffers under this false policy. It operates unequally. "The farming districts," says the same authority, "where the inhabitants own the land, pay heavy land taxes, whereas mining claims pay no taxes at all. The result is that the taxation upon the men in the valleys is about three times as heavy as upon those in the mountains. The miners generally have no homes and no fixed property, and cannot be forced to pay taxes. Most of the mining counties are deeply in debt, and many are growing deeper every year. The only way to equalize the taxation is to sell the mineral lands; and compel the miner to pay a tax upon his mine as well as the farmer on his farm." The justness of these observations will not be questioned; and they will apply to all our mining regions as perfectly as to California.

Mr. Speaker, I have already referred, in my opening remarks, to the question of our finances, and to the singular fact that our mines of gold and silver have yielded no revenue to the Government. I urged the absolute financial necessity of some radical change in our present policy. The exposure of our mineral lands to sale would not only inaugurate the true policy with a view to the settlement of these lands, and the development of their resources, but would very speedily be felt in its returns to the Treasury. The sales could not fail to be large. The spirit of enterprise, of adventure, was never more alive among our people than to-day. The demand for labor, caused by the waste of war, can scarcely be appreciated, and is recasting the judgment of the whole country as to the value of foreign laborers. Immigration is accordingly largely on the increase, and is destined to pour in upon us to an extent unexampled in the past. The arrivals at the port of New York alone last year were one hundred and eighty-five thousand two hundred and eight; and there is no fact which does not look to its increase, at least for several years to come.

The rapid settlement of our distant Territories within the past few years, partly attributable to the beneficent policy of our homestead law, and the tempting discoveries of their precious metals which have been made, are exceedingly prophetic of their speedy population. The Secretary of the Interior, in his report for the year 1862, estimated that at least five hundred million dollars could be realized by the sale of our mineral lands in one-acre lots, after granting to those now engaged in mining a clear title without cost to the lands they occupy. Should they bring only the half, or even the fourth, of this estimate, it would furnish an argument of no inconsiderable weight in favor of the policy. The people, undoubtedly, would be glad to have their burdens lightened to this extent, and they will demand it of their servants, if not forbidden by the strongest and most conclusive reasons. If peace now prevailed throughout our borders, and the Treasury of the Government were full to overflowing, as we have known it in the past, I would not urge this consideration. I would apply to our mineral lands the great principle embodied in the homestead law, which aims at the settlement and improvement of our public domain as at once the true source of revenue to the Government and of prosperity to the country. I agree to the modification of that principle now, and urge it, because of an absolute public necessity, which demands that this important source of immediate financial relief shall not escape.

And now, sir, permit me to refer to some of the objections which are urged to the policy for which I plead. The sale of our mineral lands, it is asserted, will place them in the grasp of speculators, who will hoard them up for their own aggrandizement, and "to the prejudice and deprivation of the many." This objection suggests several replies. In the first place, this horror of land monopoly is shared by men who see no sort of objection to the wholesale monopoly of all our mineral lands by the Government. If monopolies are pernicious, as I admit them to be, they are so in principle. Government monopolies are not less so than others. They have often been as much worse as their greater power of evil would permit. The feudal system of the Old World was land monopoly in its glory and fruition, in the crowning luxuriance of its infernal sway over the people, who toiled as its slaves. The theory which insists upon retaining the fee of our mineral lands in the Government, and treating the miner as a feudatory or serf, is of European origin. It is borrowed from monarchical institutions and ideas, which we profess to have forsaken, but from which we are by no means yet fully divorced. Our institutions are republican, and our ideas should be democratic, not monarchical. Under the feudal or kingly system Government is everything, the subject nothing. Our American ideas, on the other hand, have respect chiefly to the individual, and regard Government simply as the servant of the people.

Sir, I submit that this popular cry against the monopoly of our mineral lands by speculators, does not sound very well in the mouths of those who justify Government monopoly, and have not yet been able to emancipate themselves from the anti-republican ideas against which our revolutionary fathers contended. Let me add, that what I now say furnishes a reply also, to the argument often urged that the policy of European nations and of other sovereignties on this continent is against the sale of their mineral lands. Our Government is a republic, and the remotest thing possible from a safe precedent for us would be the example of Governments resting upon feudal ideas, and utterly hostile to the rights of the people.

But I ask, Mr. Speaker, why is there more danger from the monopoly of mineral than of agricultural lands? The monopoly of the latter has undoubtedly been a great evil, yet the Government, from the beginning, has parted with the fee to purchasers, and is still doing so. It also sells its lands containing lead, iron, copper, salines, and coal; and I believe the opponents of the measure now proposed offer no objection. Why not extend the same principle to other minerals? True, the intrinsic value of gold and silver gives to them a peculiar relation, and as the representative of values and the medium of exchange they perform a function totally unlike that of any of the merely useful metals. But I am unable to see why this should exempt the lands containing them from the general policy of sale. As to foreign capitalists, the bill I have reported forbids their becoming purchasers unless they shall have declared their intention to become naturalized. Undoubtedly these lands will be the subject of monopolies, just as will our coal and other lands. This cannot wholly be prevented by any possible legislation, or any failure to legislate. Land monopoly notoriously prevails now in the great mining regions under our present policy of withholding the fee. Capitalists, both foreign and domestic, enter these regions, and purchase and monopolize the possessory rights of miners, and will do so in spite of any prohibitions. This is a sufficient reply to all that can be said against the monopoly of the fee of mining lands. I believe, however, the evil of such monopoly will be much less than is apprehended. It is not probable that capitalists would become the first purchasers, or that the richest places would fall into their hands. The men who are on the ground, engaged in actual mining, would secure the best investments; for under this bill they are not required to compete with men who could outbid them. If capitalists buy the lands, they cannot afford to let them remain unproductive. If they should secure enough to be fairly named a monopoly, their own interest would prompt them to develop their riches, and this will bring into the mining regions multitudes of laborers who would find remunerative employment, and help develop the wealth of our country.

Another principal objection to the policy of sale is the difficulty of fixing upon a just minimum price. Unquestionably this is a real practical difficulty. A perfectly just minimum is impossible; but the same is true of our lead, copper, iron, and coal lands. It is even true of our agricultural lands, as to which there is very great inequality of value. If our lands containing gold and silver are exposed to sale, all we can do is to approximate, as nearly as we can, to a just and reasonable price. The method of doing this is provided for in the sixth section of the bill. The geologist for each land district for which the bill makes provision, in connection with the register and receiver, is to classify the mineral lands of the district with reference to their value, and the subdivisions necessary to accommodate actual miners, or those who may intend to become such, and report to the surveyor general and the General Land Office, giving the minimum price of each class, the location and extent of each deposit and of each settlement or mining operation, with the reasons for the facts reported. The Commissioner of the General Land Office then, upon these facts and reasons, is to fix the minimum, and his decision is to be final. Perhaps this process will secure a price for the lands as nearly just to the Government and to the purchaser as any that can be devised. I believe it meets the difficulty; and since the vested rights of miners are protected under the fifth section of the bill, no material injustice can result, either to the Government or the purchaser.

Mr. Speaker, there are other and minor objections, to which I think I need not refer. They are all met or overcome by the arguments already presented, joined to the palpable folly of further maintaining the present suicidal policy of the Government. Nor shall I stop to discuss the details of the bill I have reported, the leading features of which have already been stated. It has been prepared with much care, and with the assistance of some of the ablest men in the country, whose extensive knowledge of our land system gives peculiar weight to their opinions, and who have given to the subject much thought. The policy which it proposes has also the decided approval of many of our most distinguished public characters, including such men as Colonel Benton, Chief Justice Chase, General Fremont, Robert J. Walker, Hugh McCulloch, and Horace Greeley. I may mention also Hon. John Wilson, who so ably presided over our General Land Office years ago, and whose thorough acquaintance with the subject should command great respect for his judgment. I add, further, that the most intelligent men I have met from California and other mining regions, who speak from actual observation and extensive experience in mining, express the same opinion. Undoubtedly, the bill is imperfect. A measure so revolutionary of past ideas and policy, and dealing with interests so vast and peculiar, must of necessity, to some extent, prove an experiment. I believe it will be a grand one.

Holding the principle of the measure to be sound, I would launch it, trusting to time and experience to point out its defects and suggest the needed remedies. I sincerely hope the Thirty-Eighth Congress will not close its labors without adding this bill to the list of those great measures which have already signaled its legislation. The passage of the bill will powerfully stimulate foreign immigration, and the settlement of the great Pacific States of the future. By drawing into our mining regions a large and constantly swelling stream of settlers, it will demand and necessitate the speedy construction of our great railway thoroughfare to the Pacific, which shall belt the continent with ribs of iron, and prove themselves the grandest of commercial enterprises and the mightiest bonds of national union. In securing perfect land titles it will build up permanent settlements, promote a more thorough knowledge of localities, and institute a more profitable system of mining than could otherwise be possible.

The establishment of settlements in the mines will lead to the exploration and purchase of the agricultural lands in the valleys, and thus develop their productive power. It will introduce social order, domestic life, fixed habits, free schools, homogeneous communities, and general prosperity, in the place of itinerant and scattered tribes, whose condition could best be defined by the absence of all these blessings. It would cement and consolidate the Union, by intrenching the Government in the hearts and homes of the teeming millions whose habitations are to be set up in the great empire of States now so rapidly springing into life in the distant West. It would rebuke those feudal ideas to which the Government has so long lent its sanction, and recognize the independence and dignity of labor. Holding these views, Mr. Speaker, and embracing them, as I do, with ardor, I have labored with some zeal to awaken among our public men an interest in the subject; and I shall regard it as one of the many grand and providential compensations of this war if the financial crisis which has been its result shall prepare us to enact this great and far-reaching measure, and thus lay the foundations of Christian civilization and genuine democracy in the budding Commonwealths of the Pacific.

Mr. Speaker, I now move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, but I do not ask a vote on that question now. I am willing to yield the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes of his time left.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask that the motion be passed over for the present, informally.

Mr. SHANNON. I would ask the gentleman if he means to press this question for consideration.

Mr. JULIAN. Not at present. I will yield now to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot state what will be the condition of the motion to recommit if passed over informally, or when it will come before the House, as the motion to recommit is not a privileged motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to object to passing over this motion.

Mr. JULIAN. To avoid any unpleasant feeling on the subject, I ask that the question be taken on the motion to recommit now.

The question was taken, and the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands was agreed to.

GRANT OF LANDS TO A SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. SLOAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with sundry amendments, bill of the Senate No. 241, an act granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public lands to aid in the construction of a ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan, in said State.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the reading of the bill, and it was read at length.

Section one provides for granting to the State of Wisconsin one hundred thousand acres of public land, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from any lands lying within sixty miles of the western terminus of said canal, and not including any to which the rights of pre-emption or homestead have been attached, or any heretofore reserved to the United States, or mineral lands.

Section two provides that said canal shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge for the vessels of the Government engaged upon public service, or vessels employed by the Government in the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

Section three provides that if the canal is not commenced within three years, and completed within ten years, the State of Wisconsin shall pay to the United States the amounts received for the sale by the State of any land hereby granted at a rate not less than $1 25 per acre.

Section four provides that there shall be kept an accurate account of the amount of sales and net proceeds of the lands hereby granted, and all the expenditures in the construction, repairs, and operating the canal, together with the earnings; the statement of the same to be made annually to the Secretary of the Interior; and after the expense of the canal shall have been reimbursed to the State only such tolls shall be imposed as shall be sufficient to pay the necessary expenses of repairs and operating the canal.

Section five provides that before the State shall dispose of any of these lands, the route of the canal shall have been established, and the plot or plots thereof filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the canal to be at least one hundred feet wide, with a depth of water of fifteen feet.

The question recurred upon the first amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The first amendment was to strike out, in line five of section one, the words "said canal," and insert the following:

A harbor on the western shore of Lake Michigan, by the building of a breakwater opposite Sturgeon bay, and a ship-canal from said lake to said bay.

The amendment was adopted.

The next question was upon the second amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. The object of this amendment is to require that the work shall be commenced in one year instead of three years, and be completed in five years instead of ten years.

The amendment was adopted.

The next question was upon the following amendment:

Add a new section, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of by said State only

In the following manner, that is to say, that whenever the Governor of said State shall file with the Commissioner of the General Land Office a certificate subscribed by him and sealed with the official seal of said State, that the sum of $40,000 has been expended upon such work, twenty thousand acres of said land may be sold and a certificate or certificates therefor shall issue to said State, or to any individuals or corporation designated by said State, and for each additional sum of $40,000 expended upon said work and certified as aforesaid twenty thousand acres of land may be sold and a certificate or certificates therefor issue as aforesaid.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SLOAN. I now demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill as amended.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Sundry messages in writing were received from the President, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

A message informed the House that the President had approved and signed joint resolutions and an act of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 91) to terminate the treaty of 1817 regulating the naval force on the lakes; Joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) tendering the thanks of Congress to Major General Philip H. Sheridan and the officers and men under his command; and

An act (H. R. No. 644) to extend to certain persons in the employ of the Government the benefits of the Asylum for the Insane in the District of Columbia.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a copy of a note of the 4th instant, addressed by J. Hume Burnley, Esq., her Britannic Majesty's chargé d'affaires, to the Secretary of State, relative to a sword which it is proposed to present to Captain Henry S. Stollwagen, commanding the United States frigate Constitution, as a mark of gratitude for his services to the British brigantine Mersey. The expediency of sanctioning the acceptance of the gift is submitted to your consideration.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON, February 8, 1863.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

To the honorable the Senate and

House of Representatives:

The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College," has been signed by the Executive in deference to the view of Congress, implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal; and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if he acted were at all essential in the matter. He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting electoral votes; and he also disclaims that, by signing said resolution, he has expressed any opinion on the results of the preamble, or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1863.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT. I rise to a privileged question, and call up the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the Senate amendments to the bill of the House (No. 51) to create a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 51) entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendment to the said bill, and the committee agree to the following as a substitute:

An act to establish a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby established at the seat of Government of the United States a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, whose object shall be the good of the freedmen and the administration of lands and other property falling to the national Government in the rebel States not heretofore appropriated to other uses. And this Department shall be under the care of a Commissioner, who shall be appointed by the President, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with an annual salary of $4,000.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands shall appoint a chief clerk, with an annual salary of $3,000, who shall act also as disbursing officer, and who in all cases during the necessary absence of the Commissioner, or when the principal office shall become vacant, shall perform the duties of Commissioner; and also such number of clerks, not exceeding two of each class, as shall be necessary. And the Commissioner and all persons appointed under this act shall, before entering upon their duties, take the oath of office prescribed in the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862. And the Commissioner and the chief clerk shall, before entering upon their duties, give bonds to the Treasurer of the United States, the former in the sum of $100,000 and the latter in the sum of $10,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties respectively, with sureties to be approved as sufficient by the Attorney General, which bonds shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, to be by him put in suit for the benefit of any injured party upon any breach of the conditions thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, create districts of freedmen and abandoned lands within the rebel States, not to exceed two in each State, so far as the same may be brought under the military power of the United States; and each district shall be under the supervision of an assistant commissioner, with an annual salary of $2,500, under bond as required for the chief clerk, to be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and with authority to appoint local superintendents and clerks, so far as the same may be needed, not, however, more than four in each district, each of whom shall have an annual compensation not exceeding $1,500.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall have the general superintendence of all freedmen throughout the several districts, and he shall watch over the execution of all laws, proclamations, and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen; and he shall establish regulations from time to time, and cause the same to be enforced for their needful and judicious treatment, protecting them in the enjoyment of their rights, promoting their welfare, and securing to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty. And every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a freeman, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners, under the direction of the Commissioner and within their respective districts, shall take possession of all abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons, and all real estate to which the United States have title, or of which the United States have possession, and not already appropriated to Government uses, and all property found on and belonging to such estate, and shall rent or lease such real estate or any portions thereof to freedmen, or permit the same to be cultivated, used, or occupied by them on such terms and under such regulations as the assistant commissioner and such freedmen may agree; and if the lands with the property aforesaid shall not be required for the freedmen, then they shall rent or lease the same to other persons on such terms and under such regulations as shall be mutually agreed upon, and no freedman shall be employed on any estate above mentioned otherwise than according to voluntary contract reduced to writing and certified by the assistant commissioner or local superintendent: Provided, That no lease, permission to occupy, or contract, shall be for a longer period than one year, and all papers required or authorized by this act shall remain valid and effectual although no revenue stamp is attached thereto. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the execution of process against the real estate or property above named issued in due course of law from any court of competent jurisdiction; but the possession of such real estate or property by any purchaser thereof at a judicial sale shall be postponed until the termination of any outstanding contract duly made and executed under the provisions of this act.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners and local superintendents shall, as advisory guardians, aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages, or in the application of their labor; that they shall take care that the freedmen do not suffer from ill-treatment or any failure of contract on the part of others; that they shall do what they can as arbitrators to reconcile and settle any differences in which freedmen may be involved with each other or with other persons; and, in case such differences are carried before any tribunal, civil or military, they shall appear as next friends of the freedmen, so far as to see that the case is fairly stated and heard. And in all such proceedings there shall be no disability or exclusion on account of color.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That leases heretofore made by the supervising special agents of the Treasury Department, under the authority of the General Order, three hundred and thirty-one, of the Secretary of War, dated October 9, 1863, and in accordance with the regulations of the Treasury Department, shall have the same effect as if made by assistant commissioners under this act; but such lease shall not continue beyond the period of one year from its date; and immediately upon the organization of any district of freedmen and abandoned lands such agents shall cease to execute their functions within such district, and shall deliver over to the assistant commissioner thereof all property and papers held by them as agents. But all expenses necessarily incurred by such agents in any district prior to its organization under this act shall be defrayed by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in his hands arising from the leases made by such agents.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall apply the proceeds accruing under this act to defray the expenses of this Department, so that the same may become at an early day self supporting; and any proceeds over and above such expenses shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen who may come under his care, he shall so far as practicable make provision for them with humane and suitable persons, at a just compensation for their services.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is charged with furnishing the military and other support needful to carry this act into effect, and any military officer may be appointed under this act without increase of salary.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, before the commencement of each regular session of Congress, make full report of his proceedings, with exhibits of the state of his accounts, to the President, who shall communicate the same to Congress, and shall also make special reports whenever required to do so by the President or either House of Congress. And the assistant commissioners shall make quarterly reports of their proceedings to the Commissioner, and also such other special reports as from time to time may be required. And it shall be the duty of all officers, civil and military, charged with the execution of any law, proclamation, or military order of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen not mustered into or regularly engaged in the military service, to make return to the Commissioner of all their proceedings in execution thereof, under such regulations as shall from time to time be prescribed.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That all assistant commissioners, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as supervising special agents, shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial or military commissions, to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department within which they act as such assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, or supervising special agents. And for all offenses amounting to a felony, for any act of embezzlement or willful misappropriation of public or private property; for any willful act of oppression of any freedman, or of any loyal inhabitant; for any act of taking or receiving, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value on account of any act done or omitted by them in their official capacity, or for being in any manner interested in any purchase of cotton, tobacco, sugar, or any other article produced upon any lands leased or worked under the provisions of this act, or for any other willful violation of their official duties, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to punishment by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment at hard labor for a period not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the last clause of a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

THOMAS D. ELIOT,
WILLIAM D. KELLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.
CHARLES SUMNER,
J. M. HOWARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, when this report was presented last week, I distinctly stated to the House the character of the provisions of the bill; and it was made to appear at that time that the operative clauses in the bill are the same as those which were passed upon by the House last year, or which were acted upon in the Senate, and all of which have been printed and upon the files of members for several months. I do not propose at this time, Mr. Speaker, to say anything in defense of the bill; but I am prepared and shall be glad to answer all objections that may be urged against the bill, if any shall be, in the course of any debate upon it. Congress has within a few days done all that we could do to make free all the slaves within the United States. But it will be remembered that, although that freedom was initiated by the President in his proclamation of the 1st of January, 1863, yet, up to this time, there has been no legislative action which has had in view the welfare of that class of men. We have legislated for the Treasury. We have done what we could to provide for the leasing of the abandoned lands, in view of revenue. But thus far nothing has been done in connection with the freedmen or their welfare, except a law passed on the 2d of July, I think, of the last session of Congress. That law, in one of its provisions, put into the care of the Treasury Department this whole business. I desire to refer to a few of the provisions of that law.

By that act the agents of the Treasury Department, that is, the special supervising agents, the agents who were appointed under the act, I believe, of March, 1863, to whom was given in charge the taking possession of abandoned lands and other property, and the leasing of lands for the largest revenue that could be obtained, and the selling of property for the use of the Government; these special agents are empowered to "take charge of and lease the abandoned lands, houses, and tenements within the rebel districts; and they shall also provide, in such leases or otherwise, for the employment and general welfare of the freedmen." That is to say, as gentlemen will find by examining the law, these agents are now required to lease the lands, and in those leases or otherwise to provide for the employment of these freedmen; the United States being the lessors, parties going from all sections of the country being the lessees, the freedmen being the subjects of the contract.

Mr. WILSON. On this point, if the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I wish to call his attention to one section in the report, as bearing upon the same question. The ninth section of the report submitted by the committee of conference reads thus:

That whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen who may come under his care, he shall, so far as practicable, make provision for them with humane and suitable persons, at a just compensation for their services.

I should like to hear some explanation in support of the necessity for incorporating such a provision in the law. My own judgment is that the less restraint we put upon these freedmen the sooner we shall make men of them. Therefore I dislike very much to see, in any bill which is to become a law of Congress, a provision which shall give the control of these persons into the hands of any officer of the Government. It seems to me that the better course for us, while legislating so far as may be necessary to protect these persons, is to let them have the responsibility upon themselves of disposing of their own services in such a way as they may deem proper, receiving compensation therefor. I call the gentleman's attention to this point, in order that we may have any explanation which he may be able to make.

Mr. ELIOT. In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa, I would say that the object of this bill is in accordance with the very wish that he expresses; that is to say, that these parties shall be aided, not controlled. There is not in this bill, from the beginning to the end, one word that looks to control. They are to be aided; they are to be assisted. The hand of the Government is to be held out to them, but they are not to be controlled. They are to be treated—and my friend will find throughout the bill that such are its provisions—like freedmen. They are to make contracts themselves. They are not to be contracted for by others, but they are to be parties to the contracts for employment; and so particular are the provisions of the bill in that behalf that the gentleman will find in one portion of it that these contracts for employment are all of them to be reduced to writing and to be certified to by one of the assistant commissioners, so that there shall be proof that the freedman acted as a party to the contract.

One moment, and I will answer more specifically the remark of the gentleman in reference to the section itself to which he called my attention. Now, Mr. Speaker, that section was not the one originally incorporated into the law as the committee passed it, or as the Senate passed it. If gentlemen will examine the debates that occurred upon this bill in the other branch of Congress, they will find that there were objections made to it. The amendment itself was offered, if I am not mistaken, by a Senator from one of the middle States, and the object of it was, that in case it should so happen there were not convenient opportunities to employ these freedmen as they desired to be employed, and as it seemed at the time best, this discretionary authority should be conferred under which provision might be made with leading humane persons for their services. It is not designed to take the control of these freedmen and to direct their labor any further than they themselves shall desire, or at the time shall seem right to them to be done for their interest.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I will call the attention of the honorable gentleman in the same connection to another section. Section nine provides that—

Whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen who may come under his care, he shall, so far as practicable, make provision for them with humane and suitable persons, at a just compensation for their services.

Section four also provides that—

The Commissioner shall have the general superintendence of all freedmen throughout the several districts, and he shall watch over the execution of all laws, proclamations, and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen; and he shall establish regulations, from time to time, and cause the same to be enforced for their needful and judicious treatment, protecting them in the enjoyment of their rights, promoting their welfare, and securing to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty.

I desire to suggest this question to the gentleman: suppose that he should make arrangement for the employment of these freedmen with persons in the loyal or rebellious States, and they should refuse to comply with the arrangement so made; has not the Commissioner, under the fourth section, power to issue such regulations and to compel obedience on the part of the freedmen?

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Iowa omitted to read the last clause of the fourth section simply because, I suppose, in his judgment it did not aid to throw light on the inquiry; but I think that it does. It declares that—

Every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a free man, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law.

Mr. WILSON. Does the gentleman intend this bill, if it should become a law, to continue in operation within the rebel States after the suppression of the rebellion and the reestablishment of civil authority? If he does, I think this an objection to the bill. If he does not so intend, then what courts of justice are to afford the remedies mentioned in that part of the section to which he has referred? No authority is exercised in the districts to be affected by this bill other than military, and no courts of justice are provided. No remedy can be had without a court, and there is no court to afford a remedy.

Mr. ELIOT. It may be so; it ought to be so. But the inquiry of the gentleman has not been replied to. If any of these freedmen should be, as he supposes, at their own request, with their own consent, and under arrangements which they themselves have made, placed under the care of humane or suitable persons at fair compensation for their services, those persons living in the loyal States, which is one part of the inquiry, it is very manifest that after they have gone into those States they would be under the direction and protection of the laws of those States. It is not supposed that the jurisdiction of any commissioner shall extend beyond the district placed in his charge; and the subject of this bill is only that territory embraced within the rebel States.

Now, as to the other part of the inquiry, what if provision has been made for them under the care of some person in the rebel States? Those districts would be within the general jurisdiction of this Department, and I suppose that the rights of these freedmen would be protected under this bill.

I do not exactly see the point which seems to trouble my friend from Iowa. The freedman would be protected and guarded in every particular, and have all the rights that any man could have, within the courts and under the tribunals which are contemplated in this act.

One word more. The gentleman will find in the bill a provision which requires that the commissioners shall act, so far as they can, not only as advisers, but as arbitrators for reconciling differences, settling disputes, and bringing to terms of peace freedmen and those who employ them, or freedmen among themselves, if differences arise.

Mr. WILSON. I would like to know of the gentleman from Massachusetts if it is the intention of the committee that this bill, if it becomes a law, shall be operative after the reestablishment of civil authority?

Mr. ELIOT. As soon as civil authority is re-established, and those States are admitted into the Union, or readmitted, as gentlemen may please, and their social and political relations resumed, there can be no doubt that those States will have the same rights as the State in which my friend lives, or the State in which I live, may have concerning all the matters which may come within the jurisdiction of such States.

Mr. WILSON. I intended that question as a leader to another, which is, that if this law is not to be operative in those States after the reestablishment of civil authority, then what courts does the gentleman refer to when he speaks of those parties having the proper remedies in the courts of justice?

Mr. ELIOT. I have not stated that the law would not be operative, nor would it follow from any remark I have made that such would be the case. I have said, and it is true, that each State would have a right to do all those things within its boundary that the State of Iowa or Massachusetts would have. It may be that for the passing time the operations of this bill might be continued for the care of those freedmen after that point of time should have arrived. That would perhaps depend upon the legislation of each State. When the time comes that action should be had which would terminate the charge which this bill would have, provisions would be made which would probably cover all the difficulties suggested by the gentleman from Iowa.

We must remember that in legislating at all upon this subject we are stepping upon untried ground. There are difficulties which beset us before and behind; but we ought to do something, and we have been trying for years to bring to perfection some legislation. There are difficulties, and I cannot undertake to say that this bill is perfect; but I think it will be found to be sufficient for the purposes it seeks to accomplish.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the gentleman from Massachusetts was polite enough to say that he would yield to questions, and being in search of information honestly in reference to this matter, I desire to make some inquiries in reference to the position of this bill before the House. It seems, in the first place, that the House of Representatives passed a bill of five pages and five sections in reference to this whole matter. It went to the Senate, and that body, paying no attention to the bill which we passed after much deliberation, struck out the whole concern and substituted a bill of no less than thirteen sections. We disagreed to that, and the matter was referred to a committee of conference, and that committee brought in a third bill of fourteen sections more. It seems to me that this is a very strange sort of legislation; and we are called upon now, upon the report of a committee of conference, to act upon a new or very nearly a new bill. If I had known as much about the matter then as I do now, I think I should have raised the point of order that the committee of conference had exceeded their powers. I desire of the gentleman from Massachusetts some explanation of the action of the two Houses, and of the committee of conference.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman from Illinois shall have the information. The gentleman should have remembered that this is by no means a course of unusual procedure. In the action upon the confiscation bill the precise course was taken which was taken here in the committee of conference. The House passed a confiscation bill, and the Senate passed a bill which they called a bill for the punishment of treason. The conference committee could not agree to the provisions of the Senate bill at all, and having had several meetings, it was at one time determined to report a disagreement to the two Houses. But upon a fresh conference it was determined to take the confiscation provisions of the House bill, and the provisions of the Senate bill for the punishment of treason, and put them together in one bill with some new provisions not contained in either of the two bills. After that agreement of the conference committee, that bill was reported by myself to the House. My friend from Iowa

[Mr. Wilson] acted with me upon that conference committee. I would say, moreover, and besides that, that when the revenue bill was passed (I mean the bill which contains the provision for imposing a direct tax of $20,000,000) the same course was taken. The committee of conference rejected the bills which had been agreed upon by the two Houses, and substituted another bill in the form of a report, which was adopted. That course is precisely the one that has been adopted in this case.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts another question: if the principles of his bill as it originally passed the House have not been widely varied and departed from?

Mr. ELIOT. I should think not; not the principles of the House bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I mean the principles and details of the bill. Has it not been entirely changed?

Mr. ELIOT. Oh no, sir. The gentleman will find, if he examines the bills, that the Senate bill, excepting the sections that I referred to the other day, which were upon matters of detail, contains the provisions which the House had acted upon and the principles of the bill which the House had passed. And, Mr. Speaker, I think that the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois, if it had been taken in season, could hardly have prevailed. This report is in accordance with the precedents of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There seems to be one precedent, a precedent which we fought against at the time, and that is what is known as the English Lecompton bill, which we all denounced here at the time.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not know why my friend should say that there has been but one precedent. I have just named two others.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Not that went to this extent.

Mr. ELIOT. I beg pardon; they are upon all-fours with it.

Now, I stated when I began that I did not intend to defend the provisions of this bill unless called upon to do so. I have done nothing except reply to inquiries made, and I shall close by asking to have read at the Clerk's desk some passages from a communication to the President of the United States, and then I wish that the message of the President on the subject shall be read.

Mr. WILSON. Before the gentleman has that read, I desire to ask some further explanation. The power of this Commissioner is to be exercised in that portion of the country occupied by our armies, and he is authorized by the fourth section of this bill to establish regulations. Now, suppose there should be a conflict between the regulations established by the Commissioner and those of the military officer commanding the military department, what remedy does the gentleman propose to apply to that conflict?

Mr. ELIOT. Such difficulties as that might possibly occur under any possible management of this Department wherever it might be. The gentleman must bear in mind that it now stands in the Treasury Department, and that it now stands without any guard or any protection. But if he will refer to the tenth section, he will find that the President is charged with furnishing the military and other support needful to carry this act into effect. The necessary military aid will be thus secured. If it should by possibility happen that a conflict should arise because of some exigency at the moment, the gentleman does not need that I should say to him that the military for the time being must control. It is not to be presumed, however, that any such control will be had to the prejudice of the interests of the parties cared for by this bill, nor can I see how even possibly such difficulties could occur. They are inseparable, however, from the subject itself to a certain extent.

I ask for the reading of the communication.
The Clerk read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 1, 1863.

SIR: We appear before you a committee of gentlemen representing the Freedman's Aid Societies in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati, and, in general, the anxieties and sympathies of the American people in regard to the present position and future prospects of the freedmen created by your proclamation of emancipation.

It is not, Mr. President, that we are seriously in doubt as to the methods to be adopted with the freedmen, for we have not been disappointed in the schemes in their favor we have already planned and executed. It is only that these schemes are small, and must continue so, while the demand for their adoption is large, beyond even our present power to meet it, and growing with prodigious strides every hour. It is the magnitude, not the nature of the work, that appalls us, and drives us to the Government for aid and support. We have found the freedman easy to manage, beyond even our best hopes; willing and able to fight as a soldier; willing and able to work as a laborer; willing and able to learn as a pupil; docile, patient, affectionate, grateful, and although with a great tribal range of intellect from nearly infantile to nearly or quite the best white intelligence, yet with an average mental capacity above the ordinary estimates of it.

We have no doubts of the aptitude of the slave for freedom under any fair circumstances. But we see that his circumstances must inevitably be unfair under the best arrangements the Government can make, and that, independently of a great paternal care on the part of the Government, they will be so bad as to wring cries of shame and indignation from the civilized world, dishearten the friends and advocates of emancipation at home, and give new vitality to the disloyal suggestions of the slaveholders' allies in the North and West.

Has the Government any moral right to free the slave without seeing to it that, with every chain it breaks, the best within its power is done to keep the freedman from hankering after his master and his bondage, from feeling that his liberty is a burden, his life a curse, and his domestic affections even more fatal to his peace under our flag than beneath the plantation whip? Shall he hunger and thirst, shall he go naked and cold, shall he wander houseless and die unburied, shall his aged parents and young children be scattered where he cannot find them, and in unspeakable misery lay their bones together, too old and too young to contend with their fate upon the strange and distant soil to which fear and want have driven them? While anything remains undone within the power of the nation or the Government to do to alleviate or diminish this misery, the Christian principle and pity of our people will allow none who are responsible for it to rest in peace.

It is plain to us, with our experience, that the question is too large for anything short of Government authority, Government resources, and Government ubiquity to deal with. The plans, the means, the agencies within any volunteer control are insignificant in their adequacy to the vastness of the demand. Our relief associations have discharged their highest duty in testing many of the most doubtful questions touching the negro's ability and willingness to come under direction when direction has lost its authoritative character. They have proved the freedman's diligence, docility, and loyalty, his intelligence and value as a laborer. They have alleviated much want and misery also. But were their resources ten times what they are, and ten times what they can be made, they would be no substitute for the governmental watchfulness and provision which so numerous a race under such extraordinary circumstances requires. In our judgment the present and the future of the freedmen demand a kind and degree of study, of guidance, and of aid, which it is in the nature of things impossible the Government should give indirectly, or by means of any existing bureau or combination of bureaus.

We ask, then, your interposition with Congress, recommending the immediate creation of a bureau of emancipation, charged with the study of plans and the execution of measures for easing, guiding, and in every way judiciously and humanely aiding the passage of our emancipated and yet to be emancipated blacks from their old condition of forced labor to their new state of voluntary industry. We ask it for many reasons, but we will content ourselves with stating only two:

1. It is necessary that there should be a central office, to collect from original investigations, and to receive from investigations already made and making, the now scattered information and varied and undigested testimony respecting the condition, wants, and prospects of the freedman. The amount of knowledge now existing in private hands, or local spheres and associations, is already great; but it is nearly useless for want of being arranged and brought into systematic order. If offered to the Government, as it constantly is, it is brought to officials already overburdened with care and duties, and laid before Departments which are not yet agreed as to the precise sphere within which it falls. The honest differences of Departments as to their authority and responsibility in the case have been a chief obstruction to the methods of dealing promptly with the necessities of the freedman. Were a bureau in existence with no other duty but to attend to this vast and ever-expanding class of our fellow-creatures, countrymen, and citizens, it would at once be able to concentrate, and in the shortest possible time to methodize, the now diffused and disjointed testimony in the case, and from its central and commanding point of view to devise plans and measures which would satisfy the humanity and relieve the anxieties of the nation.

2. It is not merely a central office that is wanted. It must be a Government bureau. The various freedmen's associations, rich, numerous, and powerful, might unite and establish a central office at Washington, in which should converge all the light and knowledge collected at the most distant points of the circumference, and from which wise and humane plans might originate and radiate in all directions; but such a central office, disconnected from the Government, as in that case by the hypothesis it would be, without any right to official information or assistance, would lack the chief illumination now required, which is simply this: a knowledge how the existing machinery of the Government in all departments can be brought to bear on the problem of guidance, support, and relief in this temporary though not brief state of the transition of millions of bondmen from forced to free labor. This is a problem in which the vast, costly, omnipresent machinery and agencies of the Government already existing, with the least possible additions and the least possible disturbance, are to be economized and applied to the work of starting and aiding a humane process of emancipation.

But, apart from political economy, there is a moral economy to be considered. It is really a matter of small consequence whether the humane and successful exodus of the negro cost more or less. The honor, the dignity, the moral and religious character of this nation is at stake. Our duties to God and man are not to be sacrificed to any mere pecuniary considerations. We are bound by the highest spiritual obligations to make the process of emancipation for the slaves as safe and as little unhappy and destructive to them as possible. Again, unfortunately, an indifference to human life—the terrible accompaniment of a state of war—is demoralizing in the extreme to civil and social order. White life is not safe when negro life is held cheap.

The neglect of the negro is self-neglect; and his abuse, or his needless decimation, is certain to produce murder, and arson, and violent crimes at home. We cannot escape the vengeance inhabiting violated laws. We are members one of another, and if one of the members suffer all the members suffer with it. It is, therefore, with an instinct of self-preservation, as well as with a fear of the righteous retribution of God, that the moralized and intelligent, the humane and Christian people of this country, cry out to their national Government that the forced and military emancipation of the negro shall be made as humane as the difficult and serious circumstances of the case will permit. The Christian heart, the moralized brain of the nation, will not suffer their Government to do less than the utmost in the ordering of this great and solemn matter.

Let not this anxiety for a bureau of emancipation, as an expression and organ of Government solicitude and care, be confounded with a disposition to overdo the care of the freedmen; to come between them and the natural laws of political economy; to substitute supervision and direction for their own latent energies and self-helpfulness. The utmost extent to which the ordinary principles of free light and labor can be applied to the blacks should be insisted on; the least possible dole for them, the most possible expected of them; as little difference made as can be between them and other laborers, their treatment always leaning rather to too little than too much aid and direction. It is to learn by careful inquiry the utmost extent to which this sound canon of civilization can be applied to the freedmen that the first study of the bureau of emancipation would be directed. But experience has already taught that it cannot be applied to at least a million of them further than it is applied to our own children. If, in obedience to the general principle that all aid and direction is weakening to human beings, we are ready to cast our own offspring at a tender age upon their own resources, we may think it wise to deal with like Spartan severity with the freedmen, of whom so many are children in character when not children in years. We must lead leading-strings to these babes of liberty, and, would we have them go alone, see that they do not dash out their own brains before they learn to walk.

Implored the blessing of God on the nation, the freedman, the country's cause, and the President of the United States, we are, with profound respect, your Excellency's fellow-citizens and fellow-countrymen.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

Mr. COLE, of California. I object.

Mr. ELIOT. I am very glad it is so interesting to the gentleman from Ohio. I now ask the Clerk to read the message of the President of the United States.

The Clerk read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Herewith I lay before you a letter addressed to myself by a committee of gentlemen representing the Freedman's Aid Societies in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati. The subject of the letter, as indicated above, is one of great magnitude and importance, and one which these gentlemen, of known ability and high character, seem to have considered with great attention and care. Not having time to form a mature judgment of my own as to whether the plan they suggest is the best, I submit the whole subject to Congress, deeming that their attention thereto is almost imperatively demanded.

December 17, 1863.

Mr. ELIOT. That letter of the President was written in December, 1863. Nearly one year before that time, in January, 1863, I offered the first bill upon this subject, establishing a Bureau of Emancipation, which was referred, as gentlemen will remember, to a select committee, at the head of which, I think, was Judge White, of Indiana. That committee was prepared to report a bill, but having the charge of the bill concerning Missouri and one or two other bills, they were prevented from doing so.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The bill was again offered at the next session of Congress, and stands No. 1 upon the Calendar. It was referred to a committee, and reported again as House bill No. 51, and it now comes up for action from the committee of conference. Since January, 1863, we have been endeavoring to mature some legislation on this subject. Now, unless some other member desires to propound interrogatories or wishes to speak upon this subject, I propose to call the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Eliot] withdraw that call for the present?

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly well aware that in the few remaining days of this short session not much or long debate would be either proper or in good taste. But I trust the House will excuse me for asking at least a little attention to this subject from another point of view this morning; my excuse being that this subject of providing for refugees, set adrift by the fortunes of war, was, some two months ago, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I am chairman, and that as soon after that time as opportunity could be had, the committee reported to this House a bill which they had printed for the information of the House and recommended to that committee; and that committee now holds itself ready, whenever an opportunity offers, to report that bill back to the House, with two or three small amendments.

I can better, perhaps, present the view taken by the Committee on Military Affairs of this whole subject, by asking to have read from the Clerk's desk the very short bill concerning this matter which that committee are prepared to report. The three verbal amendments proposed by the committee are inserted in the bill, and if the Clerk will read it the House will be in possession of the bill precisely in the shape the committee propose to report it back.

The Clerk read, as follows:

A bill to establish in the War Department a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a bureau be established in the War Department, to continue during the present war of rebellion, to which shall be committed the supervision, management, and control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel States, or from any district of country within the territory embraced in the operations of the Army, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the head of the Department and approved by the President. The said bureau shall have one chief, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose compensation shall be $3,000 per annum, and such number of clerks as may be deemed necessary by the chief of the bureau, and approved by the Secretary of War, not exceeding two of the fourth class, two of the third class, three of the second class, and five of the first class.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President may assign to such bureau, for the benefit of said refugees and freedmen, the temporary use of such abandoned lands and tenements in insurrectionary States, not belonging to loyal owners, as may be necessary, and may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, and their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws conflicting herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. SCHENCK. The bill which has been read by the Clerk was prepared by the Committee on Military Affairs; and as contrasted with the bill from the committee of conference, which is now under consideration, it presents the difference between the two systems proposed. That difference, briefly, is this: the bill of the conference committee, as has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Washburne,] is a bill actually made up and brought into this House by the committee of conference. It is not the bill which was first passed by the House. It is not the bill which was offered to us by the Senate as a substitute for the House bill. But it is made up by an abandonment of both of those bills in order to have a compromise upon an entirely new bill.

The first feature of this new bill produced by the committee of conference is this: the House passed a bill which would have given the whole care of the subject of freedmen to the War Department, and as I think very properly. These men are set adrift by the accidents of war, or, if they be freedmen, by being released from bondage as our armies advance, or they escape within our lines. And whatever relates to them, whatever they do, and whoever they may be, they fall naturally with the lines of operations of the Army as it proceeds, and as its advance is made in any direction.

It seems to me, therefore, that the House was perfectly right in providing that these persons thus set adrift by the accidents and necessities of war, and needing assistance and relief from the Government, should fall within the care and attention of that Department of the Government which is engaged in the conduct of the war, and that a resort to any other system is but to produce a clashing between different Departments; is but to attempt to introduce, as it were, a wheel within a wheel—a system of operations looking for its head and direction to one Department of the Government within the very field of the operations of another Department of the Government. The Senate took a different view, and preferred to leave the care of this matter where it now is, under the present loose legislation that exists upon the subject, in the Treasury Department; thus building up a sort of rivalry by giving the Treasury Department the care of matters which are the incidents and consequences of the war, and within the very area covered by the war-making power in its operations. The committee of conference, in making their compromise, have proposed to us a new thing entirely; that is, that neither the Treasury Department, as the Senate wishes, nor the War Department, as the House proposes, shall have charge of this subject, but that a new Department of the Government shall be established, at the head of which there shall be a Commissioner, with a salary of some four thousand dollars, with various subordinates under him, to take care of this whole subject.

Mr. ELIOT. The gentleman will allow me to say that in the provisions for the appointment of a Commissioner and assistant commissioners, the committee made no change as to the expense.

Mr. SCHENCK. That is a mere matter of detail on which I did not mean to comment or make any criticism. The main point to which I am inviting the attention of the House is that the report of the committee of conference, instead of leaving this subject to the War Department as the House desired, or to the Treasury Department as the Senate proposed, presents a new idea altogether; that is, to create a new and independent Department of the Government to have charge of freedmen. In this consists the first material difference in idea between the bill proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs and that reported by the committee of conference. We do not think it necessary to build up a new Department of vast proportions. We do not think it necessary that that Department should be indefinite as to its duration. We do not think that the present condition of the freedmen in the country is anything more than one of the incidents of the war—temporary in its character from the very nature of things; to be disposed of as the war progresses, and to be ended about the time when the war closes. We think, therefore, that some competent existing Department of the Government should take care of this subject while the war continues, as the subject will probably need no further attention when the war shall have ended. The Committee on Military Affairs think, and have provided accordingly in the bill which they have prepared, that the proper Department to have the care and supervision of this whole matter is the War Department, inasmuch as all these necessities of refugees and freedmen are matters arising as consequences of the war, and having their existence within the line of operations of our armies.

This leads me to remark upon another feature in which the bill which the Committee on Military Affairs would propose to the House differs from this bill. We propose to limit the operation of our bill to the time of the existence of this present war of rebellion. The bill before the House from the committee of conference has no limitation as to time. Now, it would seem proper that there should not be a great system built up, under a new Department, of indefinite duration, to be added to the various other Departments of the Government, when this new Department would have relation only to this subject of freedmen, provision for whom is, from the very nature of things, a temporary and fleeting necessity.

But there is another and a very material difference of idea between the bill proposed by the Military Committee and the bill reported from the committee of conference. We have introduced a bill which makes no discrimination on account of color—a favorite phrase, as is well understood, in these times among us all. The peculiarity of the bill introduced by the Military Committee is that it does not discriminate against whites; that it proposes to take care of all refugees, as well as all freedmen, who may need the help of the Government. Now, I have no objection to the Government authorities taking under their care and supervision, to whatever extent may be necessary, these colored men who may be released from bondage and thrown by the accidents of war upon our hands. I think it a duty which we owe to them to look after them to a certain extent. Yet I think that, with regard to them as well as with regard to white refugees, there is always danger that we may keep them too long in a state of pupillage. It will not do to give them too much as a matter of course the help of the Government, lest, instead of building up in them a feeling of strength and self-dependence, we should create in them rather a habit of dependence on others, a disposition to remain to some extent paupers in charge of the Government, not looking out for themselves, because their condition of dependence would be an easier life than taking care of themselves. That is to be guarded against either as to whites or blacks; and the difference of which I am speaking between the two bills is that the system proposed by the committee of conference, building up the legislation heretofore attempted and which resulted in the difference between the two Houses, looks only to the care and supervision to be extended over freedmen, while nothing whatever is to be done for the white refugees.

We have heard, Mr. Speaker, time and again, and heard related most truthfully, details moving our sympathy, some of them most appalling in their character, of the suffering of the poor creatures who, by the accidents and necessities of war, being released from bondage, live along the border or escape into our lines, and for a time, men, women, and children, all of them, are more or less helpless, depending upon the bounty and care of the Government to save them from destitution and starvation, until they can in some manner be looked after. And whatever is true in regard to the blacks is also true in regard to the whites in relation to this matter. From the very nature of war, its surging over the country back and forth, no matter whose army it may be, that of the rebels or that of our own Government, the march of that army must always result in houses being destroyed, in homes being made desolate, in people being driven from the shelter of these homes in destitution, in suffering. It follows from this cause, and that unfortunately extends alike to blacks and whites and to all colors. The details, if we were to go into them, and if we should have information read which has come before the Committee on Military Affairs, as the gentleman has had an argument read in favor of providing for freedmen; the details would be most harrowing of the sufferings of these white men who have been driven by the progress of our armies or the rebel armies from the country which they had occupied before on the other side of our lines.

The bill proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs does not, as I have said, look to a distinction on account of color; it does not discriminate against the whites; but, if we are to legislate on this subject, would provide for refugees and freedmen, refugees of all colors as well as freedmen, in order that all shall have that temporary relief, that immediate help, which is required in order that they may not undergo great suffering, and in order that they may be put in a condition to shift for themselves and become independent of this help from the authorities of the country at the earliest time when that can be brought about.

There is another general difference in character between the bill proposed by the Military Committee and this bill from the committee of conference. The bill from the committee of conference, like the bill which went from this House to that committee and the Senate substitute, deals very largely in detail. Now, I think in regard to a matter of this kind, which my friend from Massachusetts himself says is experimental legislation, that it is better, from the very nature of the case, as it is a matter which relates to an emergency, to a necessity, to an accident, as it were, of the times and the condition of the war in which we are, that the system should build itself up and grow by accretion and development according to the necessities as they arise or are found to exist. If you attempt to provide in advance for every particular thing, if you have complicated machinery in this bill, or simple machinery even, running so much into detail, you run the risk of not accomplishing the object you seek, but, on the contrary, the further risk of defeating the very object which you are engaged in by raising endless questions as to the meaning or application of this particular provision of this law.

The bill proposed, therefore, is simply that, under proper regulations to be prescribed by the Department and approved by the President, with the help of the officer detailed or appointed for that purpose at the head of the bureau, with such subordinates and clerks as may be required, this bureau shall be established in the War Department, and as the emergency arises and the necessity exists, shall take care of the whole subject; and the only detail is that the President may assign for the benefit of the refugees, black and white, and freedmen, such abandoned lands; not lands in possession, but such abandoned lands of disloyal owners temporarily, as may be required to aid them in having subsistence supplied until they can obtain such subsistence themselves.

Now, sir, with these views upon the subject, and having presented these differences of ideas, I am frank to say that I realize the position in which this matter comes before the House. I know we have to adopt this report of the committee of conference as an entirety; that we have got to take it as a whole or vote it down entirely; that there can be no substitute, as I wish there could be, offered now; and that there can be no amendment proposed now. It is for the House, then, to determine whether it is better to give up entire this which legislates for those freedmen in the manner now proposed by the committee of conference, and run the risk, if they agree with me in my opinions upon this subject, of passing a bill which will cover the whole ground and provide for all refugees who suffer from the war; or whether, wishing to be sure of something in the way of legislation, although not covering the whole ground, they will take this partial legislation now, by agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. GANSON. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio what course is now adopted by the Department in reference to this matter?

Mr. SCHENCK. A very bad one. There are a great many agents, superintendents, and assistant superintendents in the Department, who have charge of the subject of trade, upon which this matter devolves. The law under which they act is as follows:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the captured and abandoned property to be received, collected, and disposed of, as provided in said act, the said agents shall take charge of and lease, for periods not exceeding twelve months, the abandoned lands, houses, and tenements within the districts therein named, and shall also provide, in such leases or otherwise, for the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of national military occupation within said insurrectionary States formerly held as slaves, who are or shall become free. Property, real or personal, shall be regarded as abandoned when the lawful owner thereof shall be voluntarily absent therefrom, and engaged, either in arms or otherwise, in aiding or encouraging the rebellion."

The Secretary of the Treasury, in adopting regulations under that law, has provided that the special agents of the Government and their subordinates shall do all that is required relative to the employment and general welfare of the freedmen; that all these matters shall be carried into effect by the same agents and under the same supervision as are provided under the regulations concerning commercial intercourse. These commercial agents, whose duties lie in an entirely different direction, and who are mixed up with the regulation of all these cotton trades and other matters along our lines, which every gentleman is more or less familiar with, are charged with the execution of everything relating to these destitute people along our lines. There is thrown upon them a duty entirely different from, if not antagonistic to, those more direct duties to which they were appointed, and having no connection with this class of duties; and the consequence has been—I may say without imputing wrong or negligence to any one—that little or nothing has been done, or, perhaps, can be done to take care of the freedmen.

And how stands the matter in reference to these refugees generally, for of that matter I have had extensive opportunity for personal observation? There come continually within the lines of our Army people whose homes have been made desolate, or who have been cut off from supplies of food, clothing, or other necessities which would enable them to remain at their homes, and who have the alternative to stay at home and starve, or throw themselves upon the mercy of our Government or military authorities. When thus they come to us we are compelled, without authority of law, to meet their condition as a mere question of humanity and charity, from which I would not shrink, and would direct commissaries and quartermasters to supply the necessary wants of those people, without which relief they would starve, or freeze, or suffer. In all cases, I believe, and in cases within my own personal knowledge I know, the Government has sanctioned what has thus been done by military commanders; and that, too, where, as in some instances within my own knowledge, that relief has been extended to the wives and children of rebels and of rebel soldiers, and who being within our lines in this destitute and suffering condition, it was not thought should starve or perish miserably on account of the conduct of their fathers and husbands and friends. That relief has sometimes extended to the wives and children of our own soldiers who, called away from home to distant fields suddenly, could not leave their families in such a condition as to get along without aid. That relief has been very frequently applied to persons living along our lines, having no connection with either army, but affected by and driven away from their homes by the movement of one or the other of the two armies.

This matter of suffering is one to which you cannot shut your eyes; and as a matter of humanity and charity you must meet and provide for it. It is a matter to which no man has a right to shut his eyes, or any officer of the Government shrink from affording immediate and speedy relief at the moment when the necessity exists, without which starvation and death will come to the sufferers.

The Government therefore, I say, has been compelled, from the very necessities of the case, to sanction this relief, and yet it is irregular and without law, but has been done under the promptings of the higher law and the necessities of humanity.

Now, I propose to legalize the system; and I propose to legalize the system not merely with respect to freedmen or to a particular class, but as to all parties that suffer in that way along the lines of military operation in consequence of the war which is going on.

I know, and I believe I have already alluded to it, that in reference both to the bill of the committee of conference and the bill which the Committee on Military Affairs propose, there is always a danger that you may raise up, as it were, a large body of paupers living and preferring to live on the Government rather than exercise their own means of obtaining a subsistence for themselves; but that after all is a matter which must be left to the discretion of those engaged in relieving them, as all such things always are; and while I see the danger in one direction upon that side, it is not nearly as great as the necessity which spurs us on, upon the other, to do something for these people. I would pass a law, if I could, which should extend a provision of this kind so as to relieve the sufferings and keep from perishing all men of all color anywhere along within the limits of the operations of our Army who need thus to be relieved.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Schenck] has a little overstated the case in characterizing the bill submitted by the committee of conference as a new bill. It really presents the provisions of the two bills, that which originated in the House and that which originated in the Senate, and contains very little that is not to be found in one or the other of them.

The committee of conference discovered grave objections to putting this matter in charge of either of the Departments to which the House and the Senate bills proposed to confide it. In the one case it was proposed to leave it to the Treasury. That was in the judgment of the committee to make man a mere appendage to cotton, a commercial article to be treated and dealt with with exclusive reference to increasing the revenues of the country. To leave it to the War Department, as was proposed in the other, there were objections, which, without characterizing, I may illustrate by pointing to the alleged treatment of thousands of contrabands by Major General Jefferson C. Davis in the course of Sherman's march through Georgia. It was, therefore, believed by the committee of conference that they could best embody the views of the two Houses by proposing the establishment of the Department provided for in this bill.

The view taken by the gentleman from Ohio, who has certainly presented his suggestions with a great deal of point, is a very narrow one. It does not comprehend the scope of this bill, or of the want for which it proposes to provide. He seems to desire to enlarge its purposes by embracing a class of people not contemplated by the bill, but proposes really to narrow them by reducing the functions simply to those of feeding exiled people or hungry refugees. The bill contemplates a temporary organization for systematizing the labor of the four million people who hold no other relation than life and nativity to our country or its institutions. They have no experience of life beyond the plantation, or if they have, they have derived it as they have gone in gangs from one slave market to another, or from the market to the field of labor. They have not been permitted to know the cares and responsibilities of life.

We provide by national law for the care of the newly-arrived immigrants, and why? Because many of them come to us in ignorance, and most of them without knowledge of our country, its laws, its habits. We protect them against the vices of our own people. We induct them, as it were, into the great temple of American civilization.

The system, or rather want of system, proposed by the gentleman from Ohio would, in my judgment, create and foster an immense body of paupers, while the aim of every provision in the bill of the committee of conference is to elevate into independent, self-sustaining, self-governing men and women the freedmen of the country. They hold no relation, I say, to our laws. They are not witnesses under the laws of the States in rebellion; they may not sue; they may be robbed of their earnings, and there is no court before which they can successfully present or press their claims. They are, thanks to the infernal system of laws under which they have been reared, unable to read or write.

This bill would throw around them for a brief time the care of the Government, and see that contracts are fairly made with them and fairly enforced. It involves no large amount of patronage. It involves no cost. It proposes to add immensely to the revenue of the country by making lands that otherwise would lie waste bloom and bear, and to quicken the industry by giving the stimulant of a just reward to those who, without such care, would wander in vagrancy and pauperism, under the general provisions of the bill which the gentleman from Ohio would substitute.

I have been reminded by a question put to me by the gentleman from Missouri that one of my statements, while practically accurate, may not be technically true; that this people cannot sue in some of the States now in insurrection. I suppose that when their freedom should be acknowledged they would have the right to issue process, to implead a party, but they could not sustain it. Neither their oaths nor the oaths of the people of their race could be heard in support of their suit; and the right to issue a writ, without the right to adduce witnesses to sustain your cause, is practically the denial of the right to sue; so that, although my statement was not technically true, it was substantially and practically true.

Mr. Speaker, it is not often given to a Legislature to perform an act such as we are now to pass upon. We have four million people in poverty, because our laws have denied them the right to acquire property; in ignorance, because our laws have made it a felony to instruct them; without organized habits, because war has broken the shackles which bound them, and has released them from the plantations which were destined to be their world.

We are to organize them into society; we are to guide them, as the guardian guides his ward, for a brief period, until they can acquire habits and become confident and capable of self-control; we are to watch over them, and if we do we have, from their conduct in the field and in the school, evidence that they will more than repay our labor. If we do not we will doom them to vagrancy and pauperism, and throw upon another Congress, and perhaps upon another generation, the duty or the effort to reclaim those whose hopes we will have blasted, whose usefulness we will have destroyed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House, namely:

An act (S. No. 390) relating to the postal laws;

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 689) to provide for Acting Assistant Treasurers or depositaries of the United States in certain cases; when the Speaker signed the same.

REIMBURSEMENT OF MISSOURI.

Mr. KING asked and obtained unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table an act (S. No. 359) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. STILES asked and obtained unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table an act (S. No. 411) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

STATE OF NEVADA.

Mr. WORTHINGTON asked and obtained unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table an act (S. No. 430) to amend an act to enable the people of Nevada to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT addressed the Chair.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield the floor to me for a few minutes.

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly, sir.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was before the House the other day I rose for the purpose of moving its reference to the Judiciary Committee—I did so in good faith, for the purpose of bringing before that committee the character of the bill and the general tenor of its provisions. It appears to me to be a bill to provide for tenants in fee in one case, and for tenants at will in another. The overwhelming pretext of "military necessity" has developed throughout the country a new class of American citizens—men without homes, without rights, without history, and apparently without the protection of the law. I would keep these men within the purview of the pretext which gave them their present status. I would hold them amenable to the military law during the existence of the present rebellion.

I consider the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], of the Military Committee, to be pertinent, wise, and proper, and in looking at the bills presented—the one by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT], from the committee on conference, and the one by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], from the Committee on Military Affairs—I shall support that of the gentleman from Ohio, because it meets the case logically and carries out the established policy of the Administration, in my view, in the most mild and judicious manner. The arguments advanced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] also prove the necessity there exists that those freedmen should be under some stronger hand for their government than that proposed to be laid upon them by the bill presented from the committee on conference.

The position presented to this House by the two races under consideration, in the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is simply this: that on a given line of territory are to be found two races struggling for life, liberty, and happiness, and demanding the protection of the American Government. The major premise is the broad, philanthropic, reasonable, and constitutional one assumed by the gentleman from Ohio. While the clash of arms is ringing in the ears of men from one end of the land to the other, he proposes to throw the protection of the sword around those who are too helpless to protect themselves. Remove that protection, send to the border a commission appointed under the bill of the conference committee, and to what result will it come? That very commission must demand from the military commander of that department the very protection which the Military Committee extend directly to the parties in distress.

Sir, the question of immigration has been brought into consideration. We are all, in one sense, immigrants; we are all the descendants of immigrants; we represent in this country the grand principle of immigration, the development of that principle, and the civilization which follows a free exercise of it. It is useless, for the purpose of argument, to contrast the situation of the immigrant to-day with the situation of the black freedman now thrust upon us. That proves nothing. We invite the immigrant from abroad to seek a home here for the purpose of developing our resources. We have received the runaway slave and the freedman as the result of a military necessity which we could meet in no other way. That line of argument has no force on my mind; it presents no new phase of the argument presented to this House from time to time by the gentlemen who have addressed the House upon this subject. It has but one merit. It proves uncontestedly that at no time, and under no circumstances, will gentlemen who are laboring under certain influences of fanaticism—which has been called, by those who use language stronger than I propose to use at present, a species of lunacy—allow any adjustment of this subject which will give the white race equal protection from this Government, under the same circumstances, to that enjoyed by the blacks. That is all I can see in that argument.

We are told that the military bill is a bill for force. We are not told, however, what will be the advantage of leaving these freedmen without the protection of the military arm. During the existence of military departments throughout the country it is impossible that they can be removed at any time from military surveillance, even if the bill proposed by the committee on conference should pass.

Now, sir, on the question of revenue I have nothing to say. The chief objection offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the proposition was that it proposed to treat this subject as a revenue question. Whether either bill be incidentally a measure of revenue cannot, it seems to me, be an important consideration, if the provisions are in accordance with justice and adapted to promote the welfare of those for whom we are seeking to provide. The objection that this bill is a measure of revenue overlooks, it appears to me, its chief merit. The true merit of the bill seems to be that it will do good, and that it will, by the force that is now in the field, make that good permanent, and secure to certain lessees of the Government tenements to hold at will until the President of the United States, in his wisdom, shall deem it time to make other provision for that class sought to be provided for.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, I propose to occupy the attention of the House but a few minutes in reply to some of the suggestions made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I desire that his vote shall be given for the measure reported by the committee of conference, and I give him notice, Mr. Speaker, that I expect him thus to vote. I do not believe that it will be in his heart to refuse to vote in favor of this bill because he desires that something more shall be accomplished.

What my friend has said in regard to refugees, I do not propose to controvert. It may be that the facts are all exactly as he states them. If at a proper time the committee having charge of this matter of freedmen had had an opportunity to consider the question with regard to refugees, that question would have been treated by them with careful attention, and they would have been prepared to report upon it. What was referred to them was the matter of freedmen, not because it was a discrimination in favor of the black against the white, but because the time had come when, in the order of Providence, some legislation was demanded for those men.

It may be that legislation is also needed for the white refugees. Then let my friend vote with us for this bill; so much will be gained; and when the time shall come, if the gentleman from Ohio will initiate supplemental legislation, he will find nothing in my heart that will prevent me from giving him such support as the character of his bill may properly call for. But let us not destroy all because we cannot now get all. It is perfectly obvious that no change can be made in this report. It must be adopted as a whole or it must be rejected as a whole. Why shall we run the risk of doing nothing because, in the judgment of some gentlemen upon this side of the House, the bill does not go far enough? No, sir; let us care now for the freedmen, because that is the subject immediately under consideration; and when the time shall come we can act together in caring also for those about whom my friend from Ohio has interested himself.

The gentleman from Ohio has argued in favor of placing the care of these freedmen in the hands of the War Department. Well, Mr. Speaker, so I have done myself; and there is very little that has fallen from my distinguished friend with which I would not agree. He forgets, however, one or two difficulties. If this subject be now committed to the care of the War Department, there must be at once a collision and a conflict between the War Department and the Treasury Department. The Treasury Department now has the care of all the abandoned lands. If you put upon the War Department the care of sufficient lands for the use of the freedmen, you create at once a collision between the agents and officers of the War Department, who are seeking to protect the freedmen, and the agents and employees of the Treasury Department, who, under our legislation, are looking out for revenue for the Government. Let me say to the gentleman that this practical difficulty was one which, more than any other, perhaps, induced me to believe that, situated as we now are, it would be better to separate this subject for the time from both the War and the Treasury Departments. I am afraid that, if we should undertake to parcel out the lands, giving to the War Department enough for the freedmen and the Treasury Department the remainder for revenue, it would be difficult to prevent collision. This is the conclusion at which the committee arrived, after much examination, discussion, and deliberation.

But, Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman that it will be the easiest thing in the world to attach this bureau to the War Department, if it should be deemed proper, after this bill shall have passed. When Congress legislated in behalf of agriculture, it was found best at first to create a Department not connected with any of the Executive Departments of the Government. So there was established a Department of Agriculture, acting with the President, and not through the Secretary of the Interior. In the course of not many years it was found advisable to attach that Department to the Department of the Interior, and so it now stands. Thus it can be here. If between this time and next winter it should for any reason be found advisable to connect this Freedmen's Bureau with the War Department, it can be done by act of Congress, and no disturbance will be created. This fact will then be that the War Department will have the management of all the abandoned lands; not those sufficient themselves for freedmen only, but all that shall come within the control of the United States during this rebellion. So I say that the gentleman will find a reason there why he should now sustain the bill, because it will be easy to carry out by subsequent legislation the proposition which he has indicated.

The gentleman has said that this is a permanent establishment. No, sir; it is not permanent. It is temporary. It may not last but for a season. It will last but for a season. We all see that the time must come, in a few years, when the operations of this Department must cease. Not with the war—let me call the gentlemen's attention to this fact—not with the war. It will not do to end our care of freedmen when the war ends. The war may end during the coming summer. We trust that it will end during the present summer. The time for caring for freedmen will not have ended. This is of course temporary. It cannot be lasting, but it cannot be done in a few months, even though the war may have ended.

I agree fully with the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, that this should not be a permanent, enduring plan; but I differ from him when he says that it should end when the war ends. I think that the gentleman on reflection will be willing, even so far as his own protégés are concerned, I mean the refugees, that we should not terminate the care which should be bestowed upon them when the clash of arms shall cease and peace shall be restored to the land. He wants these persons to cease to have help when the war ends, and we do not agree to that, because there may be the same need for help that there is now. That is all there is of it.

When the gentleman from Ohio says that this bill deals in details, I wish to say to him that he has not treated it entirely with fairness. It goes a little more in detail than either the bill which the committee or the House passed. It does deal a little more in detail than the bill which the gentleman from Ohio proposed. But I will call his attention to the fact that his bill, like the bill passed by the House, confers upon the Secretary of War power to make all needful rules and regulations, and under that power all the details, a very few of which are inserted in the bill reported from the conference committee, would be embraced. In other words, a system would have to be devised, a plan would have to be established, to carry into effect the power to make all needful rules and regulations. The Secretary of War would have the same right to institute an elaborate system that the Secretary of the Treasury had under the act of July, 1864, to which reference has been made. No, sir; it does not deal in details. The gentleman will find most of these provisions which he calls details are required; that they are involved in the general provisions of the House bill, and are rather amplifications than specific, independent provisions; and that they indicate that, in the judgment of the House, in any rules or regulations to be adopted these provisions are to be embraced.

I do not think the gentleman from Ohio has considered the question of collision between the two Departments which would be involved by the passage of his bill. Under this there can be no such collision. And gentlemen on this side will bear in mind that the effect of a vote against this report will be to leave the whole care of the subject under the Treasury Department, under the three lines of the law I have referred to. All the special agents, who have been appointed under the act of March, 1863, and other acts, will dispose of abandoned property of all descriptions for revenue purposes. If this report be not favorably received the same hands will be intrusted with this matter that have charge of the Treasury and financial affairs of the Government. The question then presents itself whether the bill reported by the conference committee is not, under the circumstances, the better bill; whether it is not a vast improvement of legislation to adopt rather than to reject this report? There are provisions in that report which I think gentlemen will hardly want to vote against.

So far as freedmen are concerned, let me say that perhaps there has been no subject before this Congress or the last that has received more careful attention than this has at the hands of those who had it in charge. Not a line of the bill has been omitted from a careful examination and scrutiny. Hours have been passed in collecting information and in putting together the best bill that, under the circumstances, could be framed. The question now is, is it not an improvement upon the legislation as it will be if this bill be not accepted? I think, Mr. Speaker, upon that point there can be no division of sentiment. I think as between this bill and the law as it now stands, capable of being effectually carried into effect, as it is, according to its provisions, we shall find gentlemen upon both sides of the Chamber preferring this law to the one now in force. That is the question now; and not proposing to occupy the time of the House further, I call the previous question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. ELIOT. For what purpose?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not bold enough to claim the indulgence of the House or the gentleman for the purpose of discussing the bill. I only rise to ask a question. What is the object of the thirteenth section of the conference report?

Mr. ELIOT. I will explain that to the gentleman. After the House had passed the confiscation act it went to the Senate for its sanction. An honorable gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. Maynard, called upon some of his friends on this side of the House and stated that there was a provision in that act which he thought would be retroactive in its operation, and desired that it should be amended. In order to amend it he offered a single explanatory resolution, providing that the part of the act to which he referred should not be retrospective. That resolution was passed by the House and sent to the Senate. While the resolution was in the Senate the confiscation act was before the President for his examination, it having passed the Senate. Before it came back from the President, for reasons which the gentleman will not perhaps want me to occupy the time of the House in detailing, it was found expedient in the Senate to amend the explanatory resolution which had gone to them from the House by adding to it the clause which is referred to in this thirteenth section; that is to say, the clause which limited the operation of the confiscation act to the life of the parties who owned it when confiscated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I merely want to know if that limitation would be repealed if this report is adopted.

Mr. ELIOT. Most certainly. This thirteenth section repeals the last clause of that explanatory resolution, and will leave the confiscation act in the same condition in which it was when it left this House and went to the Senate.

Mr. GANSON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether, if that repealing clause is kept in this bill, it will not insure a veto from the Executive? I understand the Executive would not approve the original joint resolution upon the ground that it violated, in his opinion, the Constitution, and the explanatory resolution was adopted to meet his objection to the original resolution. Now, if this repealing clause is put in here, and the Executive has not changed his mind as to what the Constitution means, it will insure the veto of this bill.

Mr. ELIOT. The inquiry of the gentleman is, whether in case this bill goes to the President as it is, it will not be vetoed. I think it will be signed. The gentleman from New York has progressed very greatly since July, 1862.

Mr. GANSON. I desire to know whether the President has progressed upon this subject also.

Mr. ELIOT. The President is always progressing in the right direction. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. ROSS. I move to lay the report on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The main question was then ordered to be put, namely, Will the House agree to the report?

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 62, not voting 56; as follows:

So the report was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WILSON stated that Mr. Price had been called from the city, and had paired with Mr. Scott.

Mr. DEMING stated that Mr. BRANDEGEE was detained from the House by indisposition.

Mr. DAWES stated that Mr. Gooch was absent in consequence of sickness in his family.

Mr. WEBSTER stated that Mr. CRESWELL was detained from the House by indisposition.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, announced that Messrs. MARCY, RANDALL of Pennsylvania, and DENISON, were absent on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ASHLEY. I move to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. NOBLE. I demand the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

Mr. ASHLEY. I withdraw the motion.

WAGON ROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. ARNOLD. I ask leave to report from the Committee on Railroads and Canals a bill to provide for the construction of certain wagon roads in the Territories of Idaho, Montana, Dakota, and Nebraska, for the purpose of having the bill printed and recommitted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object if it be understood that the bill shall not be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. ARNOLD. I will not move to reconsider.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I make no objection.

The bill was read a first and second time, re-committed to the Committee on Railroads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

TAX BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order, being the tax bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to allow me to present a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. MORRILL. I will yield this evening, but not now.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I shall not be able to be here this evening.

Mr. MORRILL. I have declined to yield to several members around me, and must insist on my motion.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to—ayes 67, noes 25.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 744, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, at an earlier period of the session it was my purpose on some proper occasion to submit some remarks upon the financial questions which now so largely concern the present and future condition of our country; but at the present time I shall not detain the committee long, but confine myself mainly to the duty of explaining such features of the bill as may be considered novel or not heretofore embraced in our internal revenue laws. The leading object of the legislation now proposed is to make a considerable increase of revenue, and thereby reinforce the Treasury at the same time we are adding to our forces in the field.

It is not to be disguised that our requirements have been on so vast a scale, and must continue to be for yet a time longer, that it requires the coolest sagacity and greatest skill to successfully conduct our financial affairs. It is not necessary to moot the question whether the adoption of the legal-tender paper currency was wise or not, though my own opinion still inclines to the negative, as on all sides it will now be generally conceded that the time has arrived when the further sinking of the value of the United States securities and evidences of debt must be promptly arrested. The only mode of certainly accomplishing this object is by increasing the revenues of the country, even if we should have to go so far as to equalize revenues and expenditures. I do not think this will be necessary; but if it were necessary, I feel certain we might pay as we go. Yet it might be unwise to push taxation to that extent. We are engaged in a war for which posterity can preëminently afford to bear its fair share of the cost. Mr. Gladstone, the financial minister of England, made a futile attempt to place the whole burden of the Crimean war at once upon the British people. Commencing comparatively out of debt, with unstrained resources, and backed up by an all-pervading patriotism of the people, we might do better; but it is not now proposed to try the experiment. The five per cent. war income tax will have produced about thirty-five million dollars, which shows the income of the whole country on incomes exceeding $600 to have been $700,000,000; and if to this we add the probable amount which escaped this tax, the whole annual income of the country could not be computed at less than $1,000,000,000, and this is much more than our annual rate of expenditure has been thus far during the rebellion. Beyond this, I hold that for every dollar we raise now we shall lessen more than a pro rata amount of future indebtedness. We lessen it first by the actual payment of dollar for dollar, and next by the talismanic power exerted upon values, whereby the cost of all the immense war outfits of the Government will be greatly reduced and its magnitude rendered less unwieldy and placed within safer limits. It will also tend to raise the value of that currency paid out to the officers and men belonging to the military, naval, and civil establishments of the Government, and relieve us from the pressure for an increase of pay and salaries. Who will maintain that this is not a more excellent way than it would be to take steps in the opposite direction, by increasing the nominal amount of pay and salaries twenty per cent., only to find, when we return at the next session of Congress, that we had imposed upon the Treasury Department the inexorable necessity of a greenback expansion instead of a curtailment, and that officers and men were as much straitened to live upon their twenty per cent. advance as they were the year before without it? Our great lakes of paper currency will become a shoreless and bottomless sea unless we can confine it here and now within fixed bounds, never to be changed, except by gradual compression within narrower limits.

Those who assume that a great expansion of currency is a great fertilizer and a public benefit, and cling to that idea as a part of the permanent policy of the country, must concede that the rebel States have reached an acme of prosperity to which we have not yet arrived. With us a gold dollar purchases two dollars of United States currency. Among the rebels, two dollars and a half in gold will buy one hundred dollars of their paper. This to me appears to be the road to ruin and not to prosperity.

No one doubts our ultimate success in subduing, thoroughly and forever, the great rebellion. That our people will fight on this idea there is no question; but the query is, will they pay? If this is not so, why is it that Europe is allowed to-day to obtain our bonds at half their nominal value? We all know they will be paid to the uttermost farthing, and their intrinsic value is not less than the nominal; but having provided a means by which our own people can pay for them in a currency depreciated, it is impossible to prevent foreigners from availing themselves of the same privilege. By further taxation we shall be in the market less frequently, and if we sell our bonds for what they will bring, the price obtained will gradually more nearly approximate to their actual value. We shall smooth the path of any future Secretary of the Treasury, and deal more justly by ourselves as well as posterity, whose taxation hereafter as well as our own will be diminished.

The owner of any incumbered estate, with the title in dispute, must pay a higher rate of interest than the owner of an unfettered estate not in dispute. So we must pay, possibly, a higher rate of interest than we should have to pay were there no rebel blood-hounds barking at our heels; but we can at least try to make that rate of interest the only barometer which shall indicate the condition of our public credit.

The stupendous improvements in modern warfare, its costly scientific requirements, will hereafter make all wars far more expensive than in the past history of the world. This was exhibited very prominently in the late struggle of the English and French with the Russians, and our own example points still more strongly in the same direction. More than ever money enters into the calculation of success. The sinews of men may not fail, but they must be fed and clothed, transported, paid, and pensioned, and iron, salt, and saltpeter must be had in abundance. A shot or shell that once answered the purpose at a cost of a few cents, as now fashioned costs as many dollars. A cannon that in 1776 would have been dear enough at $100, is now cheap, perhaps, at $5,000. The skill of a whole nation's cunning workmen is brought into action, whether in the small patent fuse, or the most ponderous engine, and all the operations, by land or sea, are on a Titanic scale.

With these inevitable conditions, any nation involved in war must now husband its resources; or it may be forced to conclude an inglorious peace; and it must call forth its resources, or it will be mired in the first ditch.

But I need not waste the time of the committee on this point. The soundness of the policy of increased revenues is obvious to the merest tyro in finance. I will not, therefore, anticipate any objection on this score to the general purpose of the bill, but suppose it will arise as to its details, if it shall arise at all.

It will be asked, why make so many and so frequent changes? The frankest answer I can make to this is, that besides seeking a larger sum of money, we find it necessary, as the law comes to be practically administered, to add new or amend old provisions, so that the unwilling shall be made to pay equally with the willing, and that the honest portion of the community may not bear all the burdens, while the others—few in number, to be sure—escape. The honest and honorable need very little law, but those of the other sort are prolific in unrighteous ingenuity, and need a great deal of law, and very good law also.

It is due to the engrossing clerks to say that at the last session an unusual amount of labor was imposed upon them, and when the act to which the present bill is an amendment passed they were so jaded and overtaken that several new and unpracticed hands were employed in engrossing it, and hence the reason of the rather numerous verbal mistakes in the act, which we now propose to have rectified.

That any law of this kind can be made absolutely perfect, so as to give satisfactory results at all times and in all seasons, is an impossibility. The English excise laws are the subject of constant complaint and constant revision. It is likely that each year will show to us the need of some change. When the war is over, and that is not very distant, I feel tolerably sure, it will then come in the form of some diminution of taxation, and Congress will be called upon to adjudge what subjects shall be first released. Then it depends greatly upon those who immediately execute the law whether it proves good or bad, just or unjust, efficient or abortive. In the hands of one man it goes on systematically and with little or no complaint, while in the hands of another it lags along painfully, producing discordant lamentations from whomsoever it touches.

The law is getting to be more thoroughly understood by the various officers throughout the country who are called upon to administer it, giving it a more equal interpretation, and the revenue is steadily increasing; and yet it is believed that if the law could be uniformly and strictly enforced in every part of the country there would now be no urgent necessity for a large increase of taxation. To remedy this, in part at least, it has been thought advisable to somewhat increase penalties in certain cases, to change the mode of taxation on cigars, fixing all at one rate, to require all tobacco, snuff, and cigars to be inspected, to give a small commission on all sums collected, however large, so that the collectors shall have an interest in collecting all that may be properly due in their districts, besides various other additions deemed important to accomplish similar ends.

Wherever any inequality appeared to exist in the law the Committee of Ways and Means have endeavored, as it will be the duty of this committee to endeavor, to remove it, as we may expect, whenever we may have reached the close of the present war and public attention shall not be absorbed by matters of far higher import, that small matters will produce irritation and call forth very potent criticism.

The Committee of Ways and Means propose to increase the duty on wine made of grapes from five to ten cents per gallon. The tariff upon foreign wines is high enough to give American wines great advantages, and their increased production has been and will be largely stimulated thereby.

The same remark applies to brandy made of grapes. This is a pure brandy, but may as well be taxed fifty cents as twenty-five, though the amount produced is small.

Brandy made of apples and peaches has not been subjected heretofore to any uniform tax, and $1 50 per gallon is now proposed.

Having at the last session of Congress imposed a duty upon spirits of $2 per gallon, and all that we can possibly collect, and perhaps more than we can collect unless we can effectually close the door against smugglers, it is now barely proposed to raise the duties upon malt liquors to a relative proportion, or $1 50 per barrel. This will be rather under than over-taxed, as the relative competition between beer and whisky will be still in favor of the former article. The general license No. 49 has been found to include altogether too much, and it has been proposed to strike that out and to include a provision for a license for miners, expressmen, insurance brokers, and substitute brokers. The last, at least, will not be objected to.

It is also proposed to tax cotton six cents per pound, in coin. This is a new feature, believed to be eminently proper at the present time; and if on trial it should prove otherwise it can be readily changed. Nor is any drawback proposed for cotton exported, though on manufactured cotton an amount is to be allowed equal to that paid on the raw cotton according to the present existing law. This tax may strike the manufacturer at first as a great hardship. I think it will turn out otherwise. The outlets for cotton are increasing, and even with this duty levied upon it the price cannot be kept up. The losses already entailed upon manufacturers and the owners of cotton goods by the recent decline in the price of cotton have been large, and the duty will at least check a still further too rapid decline in price, while the amount manufactured for exportation, though not large, will in no degree be checked. When we reflect that this American raw material sustains a much larger population by its manufacture abroad than it does here at home, no one will feel disposed to cripple the comparatively small amount of foreign trade it now enjoys.

But, it will be asked, will raw cotton bear this duty and still be exported? The cotton famine has increased the price four or five times its former current rate, and yet, notwithstanding this enormous stimulus to all the cotton lands of the world, the price is still extravagantly high. The crop of India for 1865 is expected to be less than that of 1864, and that from Egypt, always more or less uncertain, will be no greater. There is no cotton, with the single exception of that of Egypt, which competes at all with even the "New Orleans middling," and none whatever which competes with the Sea Island cotton. I do not think the duty would come out of the American planter if exacted, and not returned when exported, and I am the more convinced that this will prove so as the rebel Congress have imposed an export duty on cotton of twenty cents per pound—not much, to be sure, if paid in their currency—which they would not do if they did not suppose they were making the foreign purchaser pay the duty.

Then it is to be paid in coin. There is no article at its value so readily exchangeable for coin as cotton, and it will always be so. The duty is not so high as to prevent traffic. It will still circulate as an article of commerce; and it is not improvident to provide in time for an accession of means to pay the interest on such bonds, now bearing interest in currency, as may be within three years converted into specie-paying bonds. This will serve to fortify these securities, and place them beyond the reach of any peril arising from any possible fluctuations of the tariff, our main reliance for continuing specie payments of interest.

The amount of cotton in the southern States is now at least three million bales, and probably more. Very little of this can now be expected to run the blockade. The British, according to some estimates I have seen, expect to obtain only sixty thousand bales of this. We can probably furnish them with more. Most of it, early or late, can be made to pay tribute to our tax collectors, and no article deserves their hug more cordially. If we could realize the tax on the whole it would amount to over $75,000,000. In quiet times of peace, on the ordinary annual production, we might safely count upon a revenue from this source of not less than thirty-five to forty millions, whatever it may be now. But the amount of the duty we shall realize now will certainly be considerable.

Without reducing the duty on refined petroleum, the Committee of Ways and Means propose to place a duty on crude petroleum, and do not propose any drawback whatever when exported. It is believed that this marvelous production is found almost exclusively in the United States, and, for illuminating purposes, its cheapness and purity is unsurpassed by anything known in commerce. Without sounding its praises, it appears to be our duty, as that of many others, to strike oil, and we have done so at the rate of six cents per gallon. This will be, including the present duty of twenty cents on refined, equal to twenty-eight or twenty-nine cents per gallon, and even then, at its market price, it will be, next to the sun, the most economical light in the world.

The amount of our exports to all parts of the world in 1864 was 31,121,791 gallons, having largely increased since 1862 and 1863. Notwithstanding this increase of exports, the consumption has not tarried behind, as the stock on hand in London and Liverpool on the 1st of January, 1865, was not more than one third of the amount on hand and unsold the year before. To show how firmly established this new article of commerce abroad has already become, I will give some extracts from a recent circular of a large mercantile house in Liverpool. They say:

"The home consumption has steadily increased, and is even now considered far short of what it will ultimately become, the more so as genuine petroleum has been found to be but most slightly affected by the various coal oils that have been daily introduced, but has maintained its superiority in all particulars to a most marked degree. The fluctuations in price, as compared with last year, have been unimportant. Still speculation has been carried on to an even greater extent than hitherto, and as the article is daily finding increased favor, operations of still larger magnitude may yet be expected; the market to-day (January 1, 1865) is very firm." * * * * "The home consumption of crude oil has not increased in proportion to that of refined, the manifest advantages enjoyed by the Americans in refining enabling them to produce a fine oil at a price quite disproportionate to that for which it can be manufactured here, and consequently the British refiners have for the most part closed their works; the smallness of present stocks, however, causes firmness on the part of holders."

I have no doubt these statements are truly made, and if so, the American refiners will have no apprehension of any permanently unfavorable effect on their trade by the bill now before the committee. It is plain that coal oil, and nothing else, competes with refined petroleum, and that British refiners give up the contest as against the superior advantages of the Americans.

It is proposed to add to the duties now levied, in the section embracing manufactures, one fifth; so that where the rate is now five per cent. ad valorem, it will hereafter be six per cent., making exceptions of such articles as might not be able to bear the tax. If any such articles, in order to sustain this burden, shall require an increase of the tariff in proportion, such increase will hereafter be proposed; but it is not believed that so small an increase will render this needful in many cases.

It is to be borne in mind that taxes of this kind on manufactures can only be defended by the necessities of the day, as each addition lessens the power on the part of the people for consumption, and do not, like duties on imports, give any compensation by an impetus to the industry of the country. As legislators at this critical period in our history, I think it indispensable to our success in the great contest now going on, that we should see to it with the most earnest solicitude, that every man, every machine, every engine, and every mill is kept constantly and profitably employed. The capital expended in war is gone forever, and unless the productive energies of the country are skillfully and properly directed to a daily repair of this waste, we shall at the close find the people irretrievably impoverished. Today the universal employment of our people is a leverage that would give us the preponderance though the rebels were our equals in numbers. Our people know how to work, are willing to work, and we should give them a fair chance to work. In all these respects we possess great advantages over our foes. Let us maintain this as at once our staff and rod.

The income tax, intrinsically the most just of all taxes, is yet one extremely difficult of adjustment and collection. The fault found with our present law is that too many large incomes partially escape which ought to contribute more fully. Every man would be content, provided his neighbor paid his just proportion. This we have attempted to remedy by providing that in all cases returns shall be made under oath, and that even then this shall not be final unless the assessor shall be satisfied of their correctness. We also propose that all incomes over $3,000 shall be assessed at ten per cent. Some other modifications will also appear.

Notwithstanding the recent enactment of our law and the sudden repetition of the tax last year, less complaint, it is believed, has been made about it than is constantly made about the income tax in Great Britain, though they have had long years of experience and their law has received numberless modifications. An able British writer upon the subject of taxation, Sir Morton Peto, as late as 1863, asserts of the income tax, that "the tax has carried with it every sort of grievance, trouble, vexation, annoyance, heart-burning, and strife." Our income tax is doubtless regarded as a heavy burden, but no such sweeping charges have been made against it. There will always be difficulty in ascertaining the actual income of reluctant tax-payers, and these will be sufficient in number to form a respectable company of growlers. I do not argue that our law is perfect, by any means. If it were to remain a permanent feature among our statutes, I should urge, as the basis of the ascertainment of every person's income, the adoption of a plan by which to get at the actual amount of property held by such person over and above all indebtedness. This was the principle arrived at by Mr. Hume, in 1851, as the chairman of a parliamentary committee of fifteen, after a very elaborate investigation of the subject. None other appears to me either theoretically or practically more just. By such a plan we should not tax accumulations until they were made. A person may hold a vast amount of property yielding no present income, but which it may be very profitable to hold. Whatever it may be profitable to hold, or a privilege to hold, whether it be merchandise or stocks, lands or houses, mines or ships, horses or plate, cattle or anything else, should be subject to the same rule. This would be essentially a property tax, and the facts could be obtained with more absolute certainty. If this were the rule, the man with a large fortune but who lives a drone, without making his property productive, would not escape with paying a less tax than his more active neighbor, who, with little capital, and borrowing more, bestirs himself to leave the world better than he found it, and does not bury his talent in a napkin.

But it will be time enough when the rebellion shall be ended to speculate upon a system of taxation by which our public debt shall be gradually extinguished, and by which the more rigid forms of equity shall be carried out.

Upon the subject of taxing leaf tobacco the Committee of Ways and Means have spent much time in hearing the views of those engaged in its production and manufacture and of exports from various parts of the country, and became satisfied that it would be better to rely upon our present laws, with some important changes, than to try a new experiment at great cost and with no result so certain as that it would prove a great annoyance and hinderance to the producer. The collection of duties on manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars, is even now far more satisfactory than it was a few months ago. With a more rigid enforcement of the penalties, and with the amendments now offered, it is not seen why the duties on these articles may not be collected as well as upon any others, save that the temptation of high duties always induces more or less fraud. The different rates heretofore exacted upon cigars have been the source of systematic evasions, and now a moderate duty, intended to be about ten dollars per thousand, or one cent on each cigar, is provided for by fixing the duty at sixty cents per pound. In addition to this all cigars are to be boxed and inspected. It is believed that all parties will prefer to pay the duties now proposed rather than to run the risk of neglect, refusal, or fraud.

There are two printed amendments for which neither the Committee of Ways and Means nor myself are responsible. I mean that relating to banks, and that placing a tax on sales. Other gentlemen will offer them at the proper time, and it is enough for me to say that it appears that some further legislation as to the tax on banks is desirable. What that shall be will of course be for the House to determine.

Upon the other question, however, I feel compelled to say that a tax on sales has not appeared to me any more expedient now than when it was broached here three years ago. There are many gentlemen here and throughout the country for whose judgment I entertain the greatest respect, who seem to regard the question with favor, and it has the recommendation of that important officer at the present time, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. It may be that the only way to satisfy its advocates of the impolicy of this measure will be to test it. I feel certain, if adopted, that the first thing our constituents would demand at the next session would be its repeal.

Taxes, to be tolerated at all, should be equal. If taxes were placed upon sales, then those living near the places of production would have advantages not available to those remote, in addition to the less cost of freight. The merchandise, foreign or domestic, from the Atlantic coast, before it reaches the Mississippi passes through the hands of many owners, and according to the theory of taxing sales its cost would be increased at each successive transfer. So a barrel of flour, from St. Louis or Chicago, before it reaches New York is often bought and sold a half dozen times. The tax would be cumulative, and the internal commerce of our country, always free until now, would be choked and dammed up—confined to narrow localities. Instead of being national, so far as our laws could make it so, it would become provincial or sectional. We should destroy that great feature of America; the spirit and enterprise of trade. Of what use would it be to produce or to manufacture, if the channels of trade were to have obstructions placed in the way and rising higher and higher at every step? Better could the manufacturers and producers afford to pay the whole tax than to have it imposed in this form.

Then it would revolutionize trade and drive out of employment the middle-men. In the cities only men of large capital—the importers and wholesale merchants—would be patronized. They would at once combine the trade of wholesale dealers, jobbers, and retailers. Country merchants would buy of the original importer, if he chose to break up original packages, and the occupation of jobbers would be gone. Those who desired to buy at retail would seek the stream of merchandise at its fountain-head before it had trickled through gateways where its cost would be increased by repeated taxation. That merchandise often transferred would become unsalable as compared with that not so transferred. It would be soon understood that the merchant, whose goods when distributed were charged with but one tax, possessed advantages over his more humble neighbor whose goods could not be disposed of without having paid not less than three taxes. I think it important that our laws should disturb the usual agencies of trade as little as possible. This measure would clog and harass every business transaction of the country. It would increase the prices of every raw material and of every perfected manufacture out of all proportion to the amount of revenue to be obtained. According to the laws of trade, a profit would be taxed upon the tax itself as forming a part of the original cost. To the consumer it will be the most expensive of all taxes in proportion to the amount realized. Nor could it be fairly and fully collected. More frauds and evasions would be practiced than under all other provisions of the internal revenue laws. The number of men who do not keep an accurate account of their sales is now large and would be larger. None but merchants do this, and yet vast amounts of property are disposed of by other persons. The farmer and mechanic would be compelled to study book-keeping by double entry. I could pursue this subject much further, but I do not think it necessary. If our aggregate sales should amount to $3,000,000,000, the half of one per cent. would yield but $15,000,000. That is not enough for so large an experiment.

The hour of half past four having arrived, the committee took a recess until seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumed its session at seven o'clock, p. m.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, if there are any other matters connected with this bill which I did not fully explain in my remarks before the recess, I am ready to answer any questions which gentlemen desire to ask.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Has the gentleman from Vermont made any statement of the amount of revenue which he expects would be received under this bill?

Mr. MORRILL. I will say, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that my time has been so much occupied that I have not been able to go through the entire bill. I can give him, however, a rough estimate of what I expect it will produce by certain amendments. I should estimate the amount to be received under the ninety-fourth section, adding twenty per cent. to the present duties, at from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000. I suppose that the increase on the income tax, taxing all incomes above $3,000 at ten per cent., instead of graduating the tax as we now do—a part at five and a part at seven and a half per cent.—might produce somewhere between five and ten million more. I estimate the amount of increase upon ale and beer at about $2,000,000, and the amount to be received upon tobacco perhaps not less than $5,000,000. In consequence of the increase of tax upon the manufactured article, and of other provisions in relation to collecting the tax on tobacco and cigars, I should think it might increase it at least $10,000,000. In regard to the other parts of the bill I have not yet been able to make an accurate estimate.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by clauses, for amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by adding after line twenty the following:

That section fourteen be amended by striking out the word "fifty" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "twenty-five;" so that it will read: In case of a refusal or neglect, except in case of sickness or absence, to make a list or return, or to verify the same as aforesaid, he shall add twenty-five per cent. to such duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend by striking out the following clause:

That section twenty-five be amended by inserting after the words "$400,000" the words "and not exceeding $1,000,000 and one eighth of one per cent. on all sums above $1,000,000;" by inserting after the words "reasonable charges for" the word "advertising;" and by striking out all of the first proviso, and by striking out the word "further" in the second proviso.

The section proposed to be amended is as follows:

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed to collectors, in full compensation for their services and that of their deputies, a salary of $1,500 per annum, to be paid quarterly, and in addition thereto a commission of three per cent. upon the first $100,000, and a commission of one per cent. upon all sums above $100,000 and not exceeding $400,000, and a commission of one half of one per cent. on all sums above $400,000, such commissions to be computed upon the amounts by them respectively collected and paid over and accounted for under the instructions of the Treasury Department. And there shall be further paid, after the account thereof has been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, to each collector his necessary and reasonable charges for stationery and blank-books used in the performance of his official duties, and for postage actually paid on letters and documents received or sent, and exclusively relating to official business; but no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the date and the particular items of every such expenditure, and shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the collector: Provided, That the salary and commissions of no collector, exclusive of stationery, blank-books, and postage, shall exceed $10,000 in the aggregate, nor more than $5,000 exclusive of the expenses for rent, stationery, blank-books, and postage, and pay of deputies and clerks, to which such collector is actually and necessarily subjected in the administration of his office: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to make such further allowances, from time to time, as may be reasonable in cases which, from the territorial extent of the district, or from the amount of internal duties collected, or from other circumstances, it may seem just to make such allowances.

Mr. WILSON. I find that the proviso to which this clause refers is that the salary and commissions of no collector, exclusive of stationery, blank-books, and postage, shall exceed $10,000 in the aggregate, nor more than $5,000 exclusive of the expenses for rent, stationery, blank-books, and postage, and pay of deputies and clerks, to which such collector is actually and necessarily subjected in the administration of his office. If that proviso be struck out there will be no limitation on the salary of a collector. I should like to know whether the gentleman from Vermont can state the maximum sum that may probably be received under this clause by the collector who will have the greatest compensation.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, that will depend very much, of course, on the amount collected. This provision will not touch, perhaps, more than six or eight districts in the whole United States. After a full hearing of the subject the Committee of Ways and Means came to the conclusion, almost unanimously, I think, if not quite so, that it would be for the advantage of the Treasury to allow a small commission on all sums collected over $1,000,000, thereby making it the interest of the collector to close up his accounts and collect all the taxes assessed in his district.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose the Committee of Ways and Means has some data on which they might base an opinion as to the highest compensation that a collector would receive, with or without this limitation.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee came to the conclusion that after the allowance of three, two, and one per cent. ends, and where there is still a considerable amount of taxes uncollected, it would be wise to allow a small commission for collecting them. It will make but a very small increase of compensation, and that will be pretty nearly all absorbed in the expense of collection. It will be a stimulus to greater exertions on the part of the collector.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that the collector has now allowed him compensation for clerk hire, &c.; and I do not see that I have yet received an answer from the Committee of Ways and Means as to what the compensation of the collector may be in the district where the largest amount of taxes is collected. If I cannot get that answer, I will insist on my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. The maximum is already fixed in the original bill, and this will increase it very little.

Mr. WILSON. If it will not increase the compensation much it may as well be struck out.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment. I think we should have some limitation to these salaries. In very many districts the salary of the collector runs up, with percentage, to the full amount of $10,000 allowed by the law of last year. But now it seems we are to have no limit; the proviso is to be removed; and in large cities the percentage is to run on to the extremest dollar. We are told, as a reason why we should do this, that it will encourage the collector to perform his duties thoroughly. Now, I object to the employment, as collectors, of men of that character who require to be influenced in this manner. I should have hoped that the Committee of Ways and Means would have fixed some limit—five, ten, or twenty thousand dollars. I prefer, therefore, to let the law on this point remain as it now is.

Mr. STEVENS. After the commissions on the amount collected shall have reached the maximum amount allowed as compensation to a collector, he will have no personal interest in exerting himself to collect what remains. The commission which we propose to allow to the collector after the first million dollars is only one eighth of one per cent.

Mr. BEAMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] allow me to ask him a single question?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. BEAMAN. Are not the deputies also paid out of the salaries of the collectors?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEAMAN. So I understand.

Mr. STEVENS. The collector has to pay all the expenses.

Mr. BEAMAN. Of the deputies as well as the clerks?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to know if the Committee of Ways and Means have any data by which they can inform the House of the amount usually received by the assessors for their compensation. It seems to me from all the information I can obtain that the assessors are better paid than the collectors. They do not give any bonds; they have no money in their hands; they have no risk to run; and still they have a greater compensation than the collectors. It seems to me that the compensation of the assessors is too high, or that of the collectors is not high enough. Now, I would ask if there is existing in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, or in the provision of the Committee of Ways and Means, any data by which they can inform the House about the actual compensation of the assessors under the law.

Mr. STEVENS. There was nothing from which we could ascertain that with any certainty. One thing is certain, however, that with the exception of the cities the assessors do the most work.

Mr. DAWES. I think there ought to be some different proportion from what the law now establishes, some relative alteration in the compensation of the assessors and the collectors. As it is now fixed by the law, either the collectors are not well enough paid or the assessors are too well paid. The assessors are not compelled by the law to pay their assistants as the collectors are. The assistant assessors are paid a separate compensation. The assessors are also allowed clerk hire, almost without limit; at least such is my observation. They have no responsibility in the custody or the collection of money; nor do they run any risk in the enforcement of the law. Their services are more clerical than that of the collectors; as I have already said, they have no compensation to pay to anybody. They have furnished them rent for their offices, hire for their clerks, and that, too, to an almost unlimited extent, and their own compensation as fixed by the statute, it seems to me amounts to, and I have reason to think actually does amount to, much more than that which the collectors receive under the present law.

Now, I regret exceedingly that the Committee of Ways and Means have not obtained information from some source. I wonder that the Bureau of Internal Revenue does not furnish any evidence of what is the compensation of these assessors. The Internal Revenue Bureau has now been in existence some two years or more, and there ought to have been at least one or two years' settlement with every assessor in the country. And yet I am informed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] that they do not have in their possession, nor can they find in the Internal Revenue Bureau, any data from which can be ascertained what these assessors obtained for their compensation. Why are we then called upon to change one way or the other the compensation of these parties without the slightest data from which we can judge what they actually receive?

Mr. PRUYN. It is fixed in the law now; they can receive $4,000, and not over.

Mr. DAWES. They receive $4,000 and perquisites; perquisites in the shape of office rent and clerk hire. And the entire family of the assessor may be transformed into clerks. How can we tell whether these assessors or collectors have enough or do not have enough? Why is it that their accounts have not been settled in the Department, so that there can be shown us here what compensation they now have; and if we cannot tell what they do have how can the Committee of Ways and Means have any data upon which they can ask us either to make greater or less the compensation of either of them?

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose the gentleman desires particular cases?

Mr. DAWES. How can we legislate upon particular cases?

Mr. STEVENS. We know that no assessor can go beyond a certain amount, $4,000. We know that many go below that amount.

Mr. DAWES. Has the gentleman any data, either in the committee or in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, that justifies him in saying that many of them fall below that amount?

Mr. STEVENS. I have not the returns. I know that in my district, a pretty populous district, the assessor receives less than two thousand six hundred dollars, and the amount of collections is about three quarters of a million of dollars, and I ascertained the same from inquiry in two or three of the surrounding districts.

Mr. DAWES. How much did he receive for office rent and clerk hire?

Mr. STEVENS. He received $800 for clerk hire, and $150 for office rent.

Mr. DAWES. I want to be understood. I have no special complaint as to any particular collector or assessor. Of course, I do not think that those in my district are any too well paid. But there does not seem to me to be the proper relative compensation with regard to the duties performed and the character of those duties.

Mr. ODELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what he intended to convey to the committee in the statement which I understood him to make, that the assessors have perquisites, and that the perquisites are clerk hire and office rent.

Mr. DAWES. I mean to state, Mr. Chairman, that, under the general and liberal provision of the statute in reference to office rent, clerk hire, and other charges—there is some phrase of general character; I am not quoting it exactly—there is, in the administration of the law, a very liberal margin, under which I apprehend—that is as strong as I desire to make it—under which I apprehend the assessors are very liberally compensated. My anxiety was to learn whether there were any data from which we could ascertain just how liberal that compensation is. It can be determined in every district in the United States to a single dollar how much the assessors receive, and I think it ought to be ascertained.

Mr. STEVENS. We cannot tell what the allowance is; that is in the breast of the person who administers this Department. All I know is that, in my district, the amount allowed for clerk hire was just $380 less than the assessor paid. Eleven hundred and eighty dollars was the amount which he paid, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue allowed him only $800. He, therefore, is but very poorly paid. He is an able man, a well-read lawyer, and his real compensation did not last year amount to $2,000. I cannot say how liberal the allowance may have been in other districts. But the amount of allowance for clerk hire and office rent is within the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. So far as I have heard, the complaints are that he has been very close in his allowances.

Mr. ODELL. I do not feel entirely satisfied with the answer of my friend from Massachusetts to my interrogatory, nor do the gentlemen who surround me.

Mr. DAWES. I regret it exceedingly.

Mr. ODELL. I have no doubt that the gentleman will be able to make his explanation more explicit. I wish to know whether I understood the gentleman rightly when I understood him to say that the assessors derive advantage from the allowance for clerk hire and office rent. Does not the Government pay to the assessor in New York just what he has paid for office rent and clerk hire? Does the Government pay any assessor more for clerk hire than is actually paid by him?

Mr. DAWES. I have no particular case in my mind, and therefore I do not refer to the city of New York any more than I do to my own district.

Mr. ODELL. I understand that. I simply referred to New York by way of illustration.

Mr. DAWES. I submit that if my friend from New York will turn to the law and will then recall, from his own observation, the liberal manner in which such laws are sometimes construed at Departments, he will see what opportunity there is for obtaining a liberal compensation. The phrase of the law is, if I mistake not, "necessary clerk hire." Now, what is "necessary clerk hire?" It is just exactly what the assessor can make the Commissioner of Internal Revenue believe is necessary. Now, the assessor may—I do not say that he does in any case—make the Commissioner of Internal Revenue believe that it is necessary to have his entire family resolved into clerks.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It seems to me that there is no difficulty about this, unless there is perjury and corruption, either in the Department or on the part of the assessor or his clerks. The law provides:

"The several assessors shall be paid, after the account thereof shall have been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, their necessary and reasonable charges for clerk hire; but no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the name or names of the clerk or clerks employed, and the precise periods of time for which they were respectively employed, and the rate of compensation agreed upon, and shall be accompanied by an affidavit of the assessors stating that such service was actually required by the necessities of his office, and was actually rendered; and also by the affidavit of each clerk, stating that he has rendered the service charged in such account on his behalf, the compensation agreed upon, and that he has not paid, deposited, or assigned, or contracted to pay, deposit, or assign, any part of such compensation to the use of any other person, or in any way, directly or indirectly, paid or given, or contracted to pay or give any reward or compensation for his office or employment, or the emoluments thereof."

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of all that; and if we could have had from the Committee of Ways and Means the benefit of definite information as to the actual amount paid in different districts under that very provision, I think that my friend from New York would have understood the matter without any remarks from me.

Now, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I am not to have dust thrown in my eyes by "custom-house oaths" or any sort of affidavits. It is the easiest thing in the world for a man to make himself believe that any number of clerks for whom he can get an allowance through the Department here at Washington are "necessary" to him. In some quarters of the country men's consciences are easy on that point.

I only rose to ascertain what was the practical operation of this law, and I have not yet learned it; for there is not a man who is able to tell me what the assessors get under this provision, I have reason to believe, Mr. Chairman—and I adhere to it notwithstanding my friend from Illinois read a long list of affidavits as to the gauntlets through which these men ran.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I can state how much these men get, unless they swear falsely. They only get what the law allows.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts suppose it reasonable that the Committee of Ways and Means are to inquire into the net receipts of every assessor throughout the United States? Does he make any intimation of that kind?

Mr. DAWES. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not want to reflect upon the Committee of Ways and Means. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a change of payment to the assessors, and it occurred to me that I could get some valuable information as to the relative compensation. I believe that the Committee of Ways and Means do everything in their power; and I say that sincerely and frankly.

Mr. WILSON. Has the gentleman knowledge of any case which illustrates what he has said? He has been talking a good while in regard to the compensation of these officers—that he cannot get information from the Committee of Ways and Means, and so on. Now, I ask him whether there is any case he can place before the committee which will illustrate what he has said.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to go back for a moment to the point that we are considering, and that is, whether the amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means should be adopted. We object to striking out the proviso which limits the pay of the collectors.

The first proviso which it is proposed to strike out declares that the salary "and commissions of no collector, exclusive of stationery, blank-books, and postage, shall exceed $10,000 in the aggregate, nor more than $5,000 exclusive of the expenses for rent, stationery, blank-books, and postage, and pay of deputies and clerks, to which such collector is actually and necessarily subjected in the administration of his office." Then the second proviso goes on to say that the Secretary of the Treasury "shall be authorized to make such further allowances, from time to time, as may be reasonable in cases in which, from the territorial extent of the district, or from the amount of internal duties collected, or from other circumstances, it may seem just to make such allowances." Is not that a sufficient guarantee to collectors in the large districts that they will have their allowances paid by the Secretary of the Treasury if their collections are so great as the gentlemen say they may be under certain circumstances?

It will be noted that this amendment proposes to take off the limitation on the collector. We do not then know what their compensation may be. I am able to affirm that in my district we have no salaried officer, State or national, who is anything like as well paid as the Collector of the Internal Revenue. I know that he gets his $5,000, and I am sure he takes care to get $5,000 for clerk hire, &c. When he gets one eighth of one per cent. I tell you that he will receive $7,500 for his own salary. I object to this. I say that $5,000 is enough. If my district be an average one in the United States, I say that it is enough.

Mr. MORRILL. How much tax is collected in the gentleman's district?

Mr. SPALDING. I know that under the law as it stood before it was amended at the last session the collector realized $6,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to know how much tax is collected in that district?

Mr. SPALDING. Probably $2,500,000.

Mr. STEVENS. In one of the districts of Philadelphia, after you reach the maximum of $10,000, all the expense for collecting the balance comes out of the pocket of the collector. I think that it amounts to four or five million dollars. The collector, who is an honorable man, told me that his own receipts, after paying all expenses, were $242.

Mr. WILSON. I should like the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to state why this cannot be adjusted under the present law—under the proviso which was referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. MORRILL. I have no doubt that the object of all who have taken part in discussing this amendment is precisely the same, and that is, to get the largest amount of revenue possible into the Treasury, and at the least expense. Now, if gentlemen will fairly figure up the amount which can be received in each district they will see that what is proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means is no very extravagant proposition. If they will figure up the amount which can be received in the district of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] or in any other district, they will learn that the amount proposed to be allowed is not large.

And let me say here in passing that, except in three or four cities of the United States, and in districts where there are distilleries, there are no such sums as $2,500,000 collected. If this proposition, therefore, should pass, it would affect but very few in number of all the districts of the United States. Under the present law, we allow the collector on the first $100,000 the sum of $3,000. Between the sum of $100,000 and $400,000 one half of one per cent. is allowed. So that if the collector shall collect $400,000 he will have a salary of $4,500. From that point up to $1,000,000—that is for collecting $600,000—he is to receive only $1,000. And let me say here that all these collectors employ deputy collectors, to whom they are compelled to pay a percentage on what they collect; and it is much harder work, after having collected in the district $400,000, to collect $600,000 more, than it is to collect the first $400,000. Then suppose there are collected in the district $1,000,000, the salary is $5,500; and if the amount should be $2,000,000, it is $7,167. If the amount should reach $3,000,000, the salary would reach the outside limit under the present law, namely, $9,834.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me reasonable and proper that if there are districts in which more than three million dollars are collected—a vast sum of money—we should be willing to pay something in order that this sum shall be collected. I have no feeling about it; I only desire to have the best interest of the country consulted.

Mr. STEVENS. My idea is that if we agree to give this one eighth of one per cent. the words "or from the amount of internal duties collected" should be stricken out, still leaving the territorial extent of the district to be considered by the Secretary of the Treasury in making further allowances. That is my idea; and if this amendment prevails I shall move to amend by striking out those words, so as to take away the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury in making allowances on the ground of the amount collected. I do not like to leave that discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury, but would prefer to make it definite in the bill. He may sometimes be mistaken; and if we strike it out we relieve him of that duty, and relieve everybody of the temptation to make a large thing out of it.

Mr. WILSON. If that course be pursued, then the collector in districts in which the amount is not so great as the smallest amount fixed in the law, and still in which extraordinary duties are performed by the collectors, they could not receive an additional compensation from the Secretary of the Treasury. The effect then would be to increase the compensation of the collectors in the heavy districts and take away the power to allow additional compensation to collectors in the smaller districts, where a smaller amount is collected and larger labor performed.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not propose to strike out the words "that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to make such further allowances, from time to time, as may be reasonable in cases in which, from the territorial extent of the district, or from the amount of internal duties collected, or from other circumstances, it may seem just to make such allowances," but only the words "or from the amount of internal duties collected."

Mr. WILSON. If you strike out the words "or from the amount of internal duties collected," and leave in the words "or from other circumstances," the amount of internal duties collected will be one of the other circumstances. So it will be just as broad as it is long.

The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. WILSON—

Mr. WILSON demanded tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will be agreed that a vote may be taken in the House upon this amendment, so that we shall not break up the committee for want of a quorum.

Mr. WILSON. I do not propose to break up the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If, on a division, the House is found without a quorum, the roll must be called.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WILSON and ODELL were appointed.

The committee proceeded to divide; when Mr. WILSON withdrew the call for a division.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must insist on a division, unless it can be agreed that we shall have a vote on this proposition in the House.

Mr. ANCONA. If gentlemen will agree to give us a vote in the House, we will not insist on a division now.

Mr. STEVENS. I am quite willing to agree to that.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to amend, upon page 3 of the bill, by striking out the word "ten," in line thirty-nine, and inserting "twenty" in lieu thereof, so that the clause will read:

That section twenty-eight be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "that each of said collectors shall, within twenty days after receiving his annual collection list from the assessors, give notice, by advertisement, published in each county in his collection district, in one newspaper printed in such county, if any such there be, and by notifications to be posted up in at least four public places in each county in his collection district, that the said duties have become due and payable, and state the time and place within said county at which he or his deputy will attend to receive the same, which time shall not be less than twenty days after such notification."

The section as it now stands gives the collector twenty days to furnish the county newspaper with the notice. That is all the notice the taxpayer gets, and he is required to be ready with his money in ten days. I think he ought to have twenty days. If it takes twenty days for the collector to get his notice in the paper, you certainly ought to give the tax-payer twenty days to get ready with his money and find out that the notice has been given. It is only ten days now.

Mr. HOOPER. If the gentleman will have the goodness to look further on in this section, he will find that the twenty days are there. The section reads:

And if any person shall neglect to pay, as aforesaid, for more than ten days, it shall be the duty of the collector or his deputy to issue to such person a notice, to be left at his dwelling, &c.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I was aware of that; but during those ten days after the first ten days the tax-payer must seek the collector at his office, or at some place where he can find him. The notice is that he will be at a particular place at the end of ten days, and all the tax-payers may come there and pay him; but if they do not see the notice and are not there, then they have ten days more in which to hunt him up anywhere; he may be forty miles away; in any sparsely settled district he may be a long way off; and unless there is some reason why the time should be shorter, I think we ought to give them twenty days.

Mr. HOOPER. The wording is that it shall not be less than ten days—it may be more; but still the tax-payers have ten days after the first ten days from notice, and I think it would be too much to extend the time to twenty days.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I know from my own observation that these notices hitherto published in country districts have never come to the knowledge of a large portion of the tax-payers until the time was up. I do not know what time is required by the present act, but I do know that many people never find it out until the collector has been collecting and has left.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman will notice that the law is changed. Before the penalty for non-payment is now incurred, there must be another notice, giving ten days additional before the penalty is incurred. Formerly the penalty was incurred after ten days' notice. Now, there must be an additional notice served at the dwelling of the party, and before any penalty is incurred ten days must elapse. I think that more than covers the time the gentleman asks for.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] so as to make the time fifteen days instead of twenty. I think that is ample time for the purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. I think if the gentleman from Iowa, and other gentlemen, understand this question, they will not ask any further change than is proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. It will be noticed that this section refers exclusively to the annual tax, and the newspaper notice, I believe, is regarded throughout the country as being useless. The people understand when their taxes become due and pay them accordingly; but the modification proposed by this bill is that the party, in addition to the newspaper notice, shall have personal notice left at his dwelling-house ten days before the penalty can be imposed.

The amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, was rejected.

Mr. SCOFIELD's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. On page 4, line seventy-three, I move to insert after the word "discretion" the words "if any such can be found," so that the clause will read:

And in case of distraint it shall be the duty of the officer charged with the collection to make, or cause to be made, an account of the goods or chattels distrained, a copy of which, signed by the officer making such distraint, shall be left with the owner or possessor of such goods, chattels, or effects, or at his or her dwelling, or usual place of business, with some person of suitable age and discretion, if any such can be found, with a note of the sum demanded and the time and place of sale.

This, I may say, does not refer to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but to the person with whom the notice is to be left.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, it may not be generally known to the committee that persons doing business in cities and residing in the country read the city newspapers and rarely read the local papers. This section provides that the notice shall be published in the county papers. Therefore, in order to provide for the difficulty in regard to persons residing near the cities, I move to insert after line thirty-five the words "and on all ferries and railroad depots," so that it will read:

That each of said collectors shall, within twenty days after receiving his annual collection list from the assessors, give notice, by advertisement published in each county in his collection district, in one newspaper printed in such county, if any such there be, and by notifications to be posted up in at least four public places in each county in his collection district, and on all ferries and railroad depots, that the said duties have become due and payable.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Chairman, I notice a clerical error running through the section. In some places the word "notice" is used, and in other places the word "notification" is used. I move to amend by striking out the word "notification" where it occurs, and inserting the word "notice."

Mr. BOUTWELL. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. There is a distinction between the two words.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, (on the Democratic side of the House.) I wish to know whether they are in Committee of the Whole over there or only in committee of part of the House.

A MEMBER, (on the Republican side.) Come over here. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from New York to propose an amendment?

Mr. PRUYN. Yes, sir.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether provision is made for the bonds of the collectors being changed, as the duties are changed.

Mr. STEVENS. We have not got that far along.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Is it in the law?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury will take care to have the bonds changed when necessary.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. That is not the question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania understands that I am correct. I only ask if he has made any provision in this case.

Mr. STEVENS. For changing the bonds?

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Not at all. It is not necessary.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. That is where I differ, sir. The duties are changed, and the bonds become null and void. And yet there is no provision for the renewal of the bonds. I will, at the first proper place, offer an amendment to this effect.

Mr. KASSON. I understand that the bonds cover the duties imposed by law. If not, there is a general statute meeting all these cases and authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to require a new bond at such times as he shall deem necessary.

MR. KALBFLEISCH. The law has been changed before, but new bonds were not required. I want to provide against the contingency of these bonds becoming null and void.

MR. HOLMAN. I move to amend the last proviso, by inserting the words "school books," so that it will read:

Provided, further, That there shall be exempt from dis-train the tools or implements of a trade or profession, one cow, arms, and provisions, and household furniture kept for use, school books, and apparel necessary for a family.

The amendment was agreed to.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by inserting the following:

And hereafter there shall be assessed and collected a tax of fifty cents per gallon on all domestic spirits on hand for sale.

The question was taken, and there being, on a division, no quorum voting,

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and HOLMAN.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported
—ayes 26, noes 44; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

MR. MORRILL. I suggest that the gentleman from Illinois can offer his amendment to any other part of the bill to-morrow or next day; and I ask him to withdraw it now.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know that I shall be here to-morrow or next day.
I do not see why this matter cannot be compromised by having a vote taken in the House by yeas and nays. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [MR. STEVENS] agreed to that on another question.

MR. NELSON. How often must this question be determined by the House?

MR. STEVENS. The constant repetition of this proposition is destroying and unsettling the business of the country.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let it un-settle it.

The roll was then called, and eighty-two members answered to their names—not a quorum.

The committee then rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, MR. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having found itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the names of the absentees to the House.

The following are the names of the absentees:

Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine,

Joseph W. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin
Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—100.

MR. ELDRIDGE moved that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and, upon a division,
there were—ayes 22, noes 54.

MR. FRANK demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

MR. WILSON moved a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House adjourn. It is useless to remain here.

The question was taken; and, upon a division,
there were—ayes 23, noes 53.

MR. FARNSWORTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House having been ordered, the Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there can be a vote on this amendment to-morrow—

Several MEMBERS. Order! Order!

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order; the Clerk will proceed with the call.

The roll was then called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, William G.

Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees,
Wadsworth, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph
W. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Fernando
Wood, and Yeaman—89.

The list of absentees was then called.

MR. SPALDING moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will now close the doors of the Hall, and the Clerk will call the list of absentees for the purpose of receiving excuses.

The doors were then closed, and the names of the absentees were called, as follows:

JAMES C. ALLEN. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM J. ALLEN. No excuse offered.

LUCIAN ANDERSON. No excuse offered.

ISAAC N. ARNOLD. No excuse offered.

JAMES M. ASHLEY. No excuse offered.

JOSEPH BAILY. No excuse offered.

AUGUSTUS C. BALDWIN. No excuse offered.

JAMES G. BLAINE.

MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the gentleman from Maine [MR. BLAINE] be excused, as he has been confined to his room all day by sickness.

The motion was agreed to.

JACOB B. BLAIR. No excuse offered.

GEORGE BLISS. No excuse offered.

HENRY T. BLOW. No excuse offered.

AUGUSTUS BRANDEGEE.

MR. DEMING. My colleague [MR. BRANDE-GEE] left the Hall this morning in consequence of indisposition. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES BROOKS. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM G. BROWN. No excuse offered.

JOHN W. CHANLER. No excuse offered.

FREEMAN CLARKE. No excuse offered.

BRUTUS J. CLAY. No excuse offered.

ALEXANDER H. COFFROTH. No excuse offered.

CORNELIUS COLE. No excuse offered.

JOHN A. J. CRESWELL.

MR. DAVIS, of New York. The gentleman from Maryland [MR. CRESWELL] has been confined to his room for two or three days past by illness. I move, therefore, that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY WINTER DAVIS.

MR. DAVIS, of New York. The gentleman from Maryland [MR. DAVIS] has also been confined to his room since the day before yesterday by illness. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN L. DAWSON.

MR. MALLORY. I move he be excused.

The motion was not agreed to.

CHARLES DENISON.

MR. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I am not informed as to the cause of the absence of MR.
DENISON; but I know that he is in very poor health, and is unable to attend all the sessions of the House, as is known to many gentlemen. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

NATHAN F. DIXON. No excuse offered.

IGNATIUS DONNELLY. No excuse offered.

EBENEZER DUMONT.

MR. HOLMAN. It is well known that my colleague [MR. DUMONT] is in very poor health.
I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN R. EDEN. No excuse offered.

JAMES E. ENGLISH. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM E. FINCK. No excuse offered.

JOHN GANSON.

MR. MALLORY. I move that he be excused.

The motion was not agreed to.

DANIEL W. GOOCH.

MR. DAWES. My colleague [MR. GOOCH] has been detained at his room for several days by very severe sickness in his family. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY GRIDER.

MR. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I have been so unfortunate in the excuses which I have offered for my friends to-night that I do not know but that I ought to get some other gentleman to present the excuse for my colleague, [MR. GRIDER]; but I will say for him that I have no doubt that he is detained at home by the infirmities incident to old age. He is too old a man to be required to come here; and I move, therefore, that he be excused. Now, gentlemen, be kind.

The motion was not agreed to.

JOSIAH B. GRINNELL.

MR. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would say that my colleague, [MR. GRINNELL], has been quite unwell during the day; and I think he is detained to-night in consequence of sickness. I move that he be excused.

MR. WOODBRIDGE. I would state, also, that the gentleman from Iowa [MR. GRINNELL] was obliged to leave the House this afternoon, before the adjournment, on account of a sudden and apparently quite severe indisposition. I am certain that it would not have been prudent for him to come out of his room to-night.

The motion was agreed to.

AARON HARDING. No excuse offered.

HENRY W. HARRINGTON. No excuse offered.

BENJAMIN G. HARRIS. No excuse offered.

ANSON HERRICK. No excuse offered.

GILES W. HOTCHKISS.

MR. MILLER, of New York. My colleague is detained from the House by sickness; and I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WELLS A. HUTCHINS. No excuse offered.

THOMAS A. JENCKES.

MR. POMEROY. Mr. Speaker, just before the House adjourned this afternoon MR. JENCKES said to me that he was so unwell that he would be compelled to leave. I have no doubt that he is not well enough to be present this evening, and I move that he be excused.

MR. STEVENS. I hope that MR. JENCKES will be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM JOHNSON.

MR. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. MR. JOHN-SON said to me when we were both riding in the cars that he had been unwell for several days,
and I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. JULIAN. No excuse offered.

FRANCIS W. KELLOGG. No excuse offered.

FRANCIS KERNAN.

MR. ODELL. My colleague was called home in consequence of sickness in his family last week, and I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

AUSTIN A. KING. No excuse offered.

ANTHONY L. KNAPP. No excuse offered.

JOHN LAW.

MR. CRAVENS. My colleague is generally very attentive to the business of the House, and as he is an old man I move that he be excused.

MR. EDGERTON. I think that my colleague ought to be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JESSE LAZEAR.

MR. ANCONA. My colleague has gone to Baltimore to meet some members of his family, and I move that he be excused.

MR. GARFIELD. Is he in the city now?

MR. ANCONA. He is not.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS C. LE BLOND. No excuse offered.

BENJAMIN F. LOAN.

MR. BOYD. I understand that my colleagues,
Messrs. LOAN and KING, have had an arrangement to meet the Secretary of War this evening, and that, for that reason, they are not present in the House.

The SPEAKER. The committee on the conduct of the war have gone to meet the Secretary of War this evening, so the Chair understands.

Mr. BOYD. I move that Mr. LOAN, who is a member of that committee, be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague, Mr. JULIAN, is a member of that committee, and ought also to be excused.

The SPEAKER. His name has been passed; but if there be no objection a motion will be received to excuse him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The committee on the conduct of the war have had leave to sit during the sessions of the House, and I make the point of order that they cannot be brought here.

The SPEAKER. That will be reached in due order if the House continues this call.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that my colleague, Mr. JULIAN, be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN W. LONGYEAR.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. LONGYEAR has gone to Baltimore to meet his wife, whom he has not seen for ever a month. I move he be excused. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to.

DANIEL MARCY.

Mr. ANCONA. I think Mr. MARCY had leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. It is in the recollection of the Chair that the gentleman had leave of absence by the House.

JAMES F. McDOWELL.

Mr. CRAVENS. Mr. McDOWELL has been ill for several days past, and is not able this evening to attend the sitting of the House. I move he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WALTER D. MCINDOE.

Mr. COBB. Mr. MCINDOE has been seriously indisposed from a sore throat for several days, and although he has attended the daily sessions of the House, he is not able and it would be improper for him to come here to-night; I therefore move he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN F. MCKINNEY.

Mr. COX. Mr. MCKINNEY left here some half an hour ago, and asked me before he left whether I thought there would be anything before the House this evening. I did not think the gentleman from Illinois would bring up his amendment in reference to spirits, and I told him I thought there would not be anything of consequence; and therefore I propose to take any punishment that may be imposed on my colleague, vicariously. [Laughter.]

JAMES K. MOORHEAD.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. MOORHEAD is detained from the House by injuries received from a railroad collision. I move he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

DANIEL MORRIS.

Mr. WINFIELD. I rise to a question of privilege. Was Mr. MCKINNEY excused?

The SPEAKER. No motion to excuse him was made.

Mr. WINFIELD. I move he be excused.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. BAXTER. Mr. MORRIS, of New York, has been sent for to see a sick daughter, and I move he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM R. MORRISON. No excuse offered.

AMOS MYERS.

Mr. KELLEY. My colleague from the oil district is interested in a very large tract of oil land, is president of a company, and has gone to the telegraph office to learn the result of recent borings; and as the Government looks for a very large revenue from the result, I move that Mr. MYERS be excused.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Then they better send somebody else down there if the Government wants any revenue. [Laughter.]

The motion was not agreed to.

WARREN P. NOBLE. No excuse offered.

JESSE O. NORTON. No excuse offered.

JOHN O'NEILL. No excuse offered.

GODLOVE S. ORTH. No excuse offered.

JAMES W. PATTERSON.

Mr. BEAMAN. I wish to state that Mr. PATTERSON left the House a short time since on account of indisposition. I move he be excused.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. PATTERSON was here a part of the evening, and left, I understood, because he was too ill to remain.

The motion was agreed to.

NEHEMIAH PERRY. No excuse offered.

HIRAM PRICE. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM RADFORD.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My colleague, Mr. RADFORD, has gone home to put himself upon a low diet. [Laughter.] I move he be excused.

The motion was not agreed to.

SAMUEL J. RANDALL.

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. RANDALL has been seriously indisposed since last Saturday, and is confined to his bed at his residence in Georgetown. I move he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. RANDALL. No excuse offered.

ALEXANDER H. RICE.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. RICE, living in the same house with Mr. JENCKES, who is quite sick, having fallen down, is obliged to stay at home to attend to him. [Laughter.] I move he be excused.

Mr. MALLORY. I did not hear that excuse. I wish the gentleman would state it again.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. He is sitting up with JENCKES. [Renewed laughter.]

The motion was not agreed to.

ANDREW J. ROGERS.

Mr. NELSON. I was informed some days since that Mr. ROGERS was sick, and not having seen him or heard of his recovery, I suppose that he must be sick yet. I move, therefore, that he be excused.

Several MEMBERS. He has recovered.

The motion was not agreed to.

EDWARD H. ROLLINS. No excuse offered.

JAMES S. ROLLINS. No excuse offered.

LEWIS W. ROSS. No excuse offered.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understood the Chair to decide that members of committees having leave to sit during the sessions of the House were excused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made no such decision. The Chair has only decided that such members have a right to vote before the announcement of the result.

JOHN C. SCOTT. No excuse offered.

ITHAMAR C. SLOAN. No excuse offered.

GREEN CLAY SMITH.

Mr. WILDER. Mr. SMITH has been sick for a number of days, and I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

NATHANIEL B. SMITHERS.

Mr. ECKLEY. The House will recollect that Mr. SMITHERS has just recovered from a spell of sickness. To my knowledge he did not feel well enough to come to the House this evening. I therefore move that he be excused.

Mr. WINFIELD. If he has recovered, I do not see why he should be excused.

Mr. ECKLEY. Mr. SMITHERS, as I supposed the House knew, had a fever a short time ago, and has not quite recovered.

A MEMBER. He was here to-day.

Mr. ECKLEY. He was here during the session to-day, but did not feel like coming out this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN B. STEELE. No excuse offered.

JOHN T. STUART. No excuse offered.

L. D. M. SWEAT. No excuse offered.

FRANCIS THOMAS.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. THOMAS is well known to be somewhat infirm. I think that all old men ought to be excused. I move that he be excused on account of his great age.

Mr. MALLORY. The presence of the gentleman himself is a sufficient reply to his application to have Governor THOMAS excused. If my friend from Pennsylvania can attend the sessions of the House, why cannot Governor THOMAS?

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT B. VAN VALKENBURGH. No excuse offered.

DANIEL W. VOORHEES.

Mr. CRAVENS. My colleague has been absent for a number of days in consequence of the illness of his wife, who has not yet entirely recovered. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. WADSWORTH.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague is quite unwell, and is unable to attend the session of the House to-night. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

EDWIN H. WEBSTER.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe it is well understood by the House that the gentleman from Maryland has been sick several days. I move that he be excused.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, just before going out the gentleman from Maryland assured me that he was very much indisposed—to stay, as he had been on his feet all day.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw my motion. No other excuse was offered for Mr. WEBSTER.

EZRA WHEELER.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin has been in poor health all winter. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

CHILTON A. WHITE.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. C. A. WHITE] was called home several days ago by indisposition in his family. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH W. WHITE.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, my colleague was along with Mr. MCKINNEY when I gave the information I referred to. I move that he be excused.

Mr. CRAVENS. Mr. Speaker, I am boarding at the same house with Mr. WHITE, and I know he is in delicate health.

Mr. COX. I do not put it on that ground. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAVENS. I do put it on that ground, for I know the fact.

Mr. COX. It is altogether my own fault that these gentlemen went away.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS WILLIAMS.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, my colleague went away quite indisposed, and asked me to mention that fact, if there should be a call of the House. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM WINDOM.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota is detained from the House by sickness in his family. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

BENJAMIN WOOD. No excuse offered.

FERNANDO WOOD.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen have been excused to-night for the reason that they were on the committee on the conduct of the war. I move that my colleague be excused on the ground that he is on the committee on the conduct of the peace. [Laughter.]

Several MEMBERS. Which of them?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Both of them.

The motion was not agreed to.

GEORGE H. YEAMAN.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that my colleague's absence be excused.

The SPEAKER. On what grounds?

Mr. MALLORY. On general grounds. [Laughter.]

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, (at nine o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I suggest whether it may not be necessary to institute a commission to inquire into the sanitary condition of this city.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I suggest that if the doors be opened there will be enough of members to proceed to business. I do not see any necessity for further proceedings under the call.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Speaker be directed to issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in the absentees.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker thereupon issued his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest and bring into the House the absent members who were not excused.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I would inquire whether it is in order to move for a warrant to issue for the arrest of deserters under the present draft?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not in order at this time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the warrant required to be issued be made returnable to-morrow at twelve o'clock, noon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that that motion is not in order, as by adjournment all proceedings under the call are thereby terminated. It has been tried in various Congresses to have the effect of the call operate upon the next day; and it has been repeatedly decided, upon appeal and otherwise, that it cannot be done.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I care nothing about the effect upon the call; I only want my motion adopted.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order. The Digest, on page 35, states that by an adjournment pending the call, all proceedings under the call are terminated.

Mr. PRUYN. Cannot the House take a recess until to-morrow noon?

The SPEAKER. The Digest states that it is not in order to take a recess pending a call.

Mr. PRUYN. The Clerk has concluded the call.

The SPEAKER. The House is now engaged in concluding proceedings under the call.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move to suspend the rule, so that we can take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move to adjourn.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. No; I move to suspend the rule.

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules can only be made on Monday after the morning hour.

Mr. NELSON. Would it be in order to move to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to appoint such members of the House as are now present his assistants?

The SPEAKER. That is not in order.

Mr. ODELL. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is a call of the House; and the House is proceeding under that call now.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I understand that the question pending in the Committee of the Whole, when it was found that there was no quorum, was taxing the stock of whisky on hand. I want to know whether it is in order, pending that question, to consume the stock on hand. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIKE. It seems to me that we have done enough to vindicate the dignity of the House; I therefore move the House do now adjourn.

The question was then taken, and, upon a division, resulted—ayes 21, noes 40.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The Sergeant-at-Arms then appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Messrs. MORRISON, RADFORD, and WEBSTER.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MORRISON, you have been absent from the sessions of this House without leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. MORRISON. I presume I did not start from my lodgings as early as I ought to have done to come to this Hall.

Mr. COX. I move that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] be excused, upon the payment of the usual fee.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then said: Mr. RADFORD, you have been absent from the sessions of this House without leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. RADFORD. I went to bed as soon as I got home; and as soon as I woke up I came here. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the gentleman from New York [Mr. RADFORD] be excused.

A MEMBER. Upon the usual terms?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, upon the usual terms.

Mr. FRANK. I would ask, what are the usual fees?

The SPEAKER. Two dollars for each arrest, one dollar for each day's custody, and ten cents a mile for travel.

Mr. RADFORD. I would ask to amend my excuse, and say that I went to bed sick.

Mr. STEVENS. How did you get up?

Mr. RADFORD. I got up well. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the gentleman from New York [Mr. RADFORD] be absolutely excused.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend that motion by excusing the gentleman upon the payment of the usual fees. I judge by inspection. [Laughter.]

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, and upon a division it resulted—ayes 44, noes 37.

So the amendment was adopted.

The motion of Mr. MALLORY, as amended, was then adopted.

The SPEAKER then said: Mr. WEBSTER, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without leave. What excuse have you to render for that absence?

Mr. WEBSTER. I came into the House early in the evening, and feeling indisposed I requested my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to say as much to the House, if necessary. Afterward, supposing that he might himself feel indisposed, I returned voluntarily to the House. I am not here as a drafted man, but as a volunteer. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would ask the gentleman if he was indisposed, or merely indisposed to stay here?

Mr. WEBSTER. I have made my excuse to the Speaker. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I move that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WEBSTER] be excused.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the motion so that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WEBSTER] be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

The amendment was adopted; and the motion, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I rise to a question of privilege. I am required to pay the costs of this arrest to the Sergeant-at-Arms. I have here in my hand the necessary funds, authorized to be issued by this Government; the Sergeant-at-Arms refuses to take it, as it is not legal tender; yet it is authorized by Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has made tender of the fees in legal tender he has complied with the order of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is not legal tender, but bank notes authorized by the Government.

The SPEAKER. That raises another question. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] have leave to pay from stock on hand. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPALDING, (at ten o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, there being, on a division—ayes 30, noes 47.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. STEVENS. I would inquire whether a quorum is yet present.

The SPEAKER. Not yet.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope we shall wait for a quorum.

The motion of Mr. MALLORY was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Is it in order to have a count of the House, to ascertain whether a quorum be present?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count the House, if it be desired.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that the House be counted.

The Speaker, after counting, announced that eighty-nine members were present.

Mr. WILSON. It is now ten minutes past ten o'clock. The Sergeant-at-Arms has gone into the city to arrest some of the absentees. It will certainly be some time before he can return with any of them. I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were, on a division—ayes 35, noes 41.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FARNSWORTH, and JOHNSON of Pennsylvania, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 31, noes 51.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. UPSON. I move that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] have leave to give the reasons for the exclusion of the presidential vote of West Virginia. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRUYN. I should like to make some remarks on the position which the House now presents before the country, and on the question whether we are not bringing ourselves into contempt before the whole country by the course we are now pursuing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can only make those remarks by unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS. "I object."

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a privileged question. Although not well, I came here to-night intending to participate in the deliberations of the House if anything of importance should be transacted. I do not now feel well, and I would like the House to grant me permission to retire. I wish to go to my bed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks leave of absence during the remainder of this day's session. Shall it be granted?

Leave was granted, there being, on a division—ayes 37, noes 25.

Mr. STEVENS. Can a member be excused when there is no quorum voting?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that he can. A number of absentees have been excused to-night without a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the gentleman from Kentucky be permitted to put in an able-bodied substitute.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. A white man? [Laughter.]

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Seriously, I think that we have carried this thing far enough, and I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. COX. I call for a division of the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

The House divided, and there were—ayes 33, noes 48.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. UPSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the gentleman from Kentucky was excused. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to excuse Mr. MALLORY.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 33, noes 46.

So the House refused to excuse Mr. MALLORY.

Mr. PIKE moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. PRUYN. I move that the doors be opened.

Mr. WILSON. What will be the effect of that?

The SPEAKER. It will have the same effect as a motion to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SPALDING moved that leave be granted to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to go on with his speech on reconstruction.

Objection was made.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt that the gentleman is anxious to give his experiences of being under arrest, and I move that he have permission to do so.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, moved that there be a sanitary commission appointed upon the condition of the absent members who were reported sick.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, moved to adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Will it be in order to move that those who so desire may retire, and that those who want to see the Sergeant-at-Arms return with members in arrest may remain?

The SPEAKER. Excuses must be made in each case.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that my colleague be excused.

Mr. COX. My friend does not want to be excused, as he stands here as a sentinel upon the tower of freedom. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. Is it in order for me to make a report from the Committee on Private Land Claims?

The SPEAKER. It is not. No business can be done without the presence of a quorum.

Mr. WINFIELD. I move that my colleague [Mr. WARD] have leave to make a speech on reciprocity.

The motion was agreed to.

[Cries of "WARD!" "WARD!"]

Mr. GARFIELD. He does not reciprocate. [Laughter.]

A special messenger appeared at the bar with Mr. BALDWIN, of Michigan, in custody.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BALDWIN, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Michigan. I was detained from the House by business, and I have no further excuse.

Mr. STILES. I move that the gentleman be discharged on the payment of costs.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman was absent on business, and I move that he be excused. Gentlemen on the other side will vote for the amendment when they recollect that he voted for the constitutional amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINFIELD. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The SPEAKER. That will carry the motion with it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will it carry the prisoner? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes not.

The motion was disagreed to.

The amendment was disagreed to; and Mr. STILES's motion was adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, moved to adjourn. The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Is it in order for members to leave the Hall?

The SPEAKER. Not without consent of the House.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the Doorkeeper be ordered to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make instant report to the House.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, moved (at eleven o'clock, p. m.) that the House adjourn.

Mr. THAYER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. THAYER and Mr. COX were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 109. [Laughter.]

During the division,

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. I saw several gentlemen pass through the tellers twice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can call the yeas and nays if he doubts the count of the tellers.

The result of the division having been announced, as above,

Mr. RICE, of Maine, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 33, nays 49, not voting 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boutwell, James S. Brown, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Eckley, Farnsworth, Frank, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Asabel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Kalbfleisch, Littlejohn, Long, McAllister, McBride, Middleton, James R. Morris, Charles O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, John H. Rice, Spalding, William G. Steele, Thayer, Tracy, Ward, Elhu B. Washburne, Whaley, and Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boyd, Broomall, Cobb, Dawes, Deming, Driggs, Eldridge, Eliot, Garfield, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, Perlman, Pomroy, Radford, Scofield, Shannon, Starr, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Townsend, Upson, Wilder, Winfield, and Woodbridge—49.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eden, Edgerton, English, Pinck, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Hutchings, Jeuckes, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Noble, Norton, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perry, Pike, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, William B. Washburn, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Worthington, and Yeaman—100.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I notice that Mr. Amos Myers is at the door of the Hall. I move that the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms be authorized to bring him to the bar of the House.

Mr. PIKE. Can that be done?

Mr. ANCONA. Has the gentleman from Maine himself [Mr. PIKE] been excused?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine voted on the last vote.

Mr. ANCONA. I noticed him leaving the Hall some time ago, and I supposed that he was among the absentees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that members are allowed to leave the Hall by the usage, under a call, only on a parole for a few moments by the Speaker, a record of which is kept by the Doorkeeper, and the Chair does not remember that the gentleman from Maine has asked leave of absence at all.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms be permitted to bring in the body of Amos Myers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that motion, if made directory, is in order. There is no doubt in the mind of the Chair that any member may be taken into custody by any special messenger appointed by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The motion was agreed to.

A special messenger appeared at the bar, having in custody Mr. Amos Myers.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Amos Myers, you have been absent from this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. A. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I presume that it will take me a moment or two to make myself correctly understood. [Loud cries of "Go ahead!"] I will state first that I was in the House until perhaps an hour and a half ago, and then I left with the belief that oil would not be reached for some time. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Were you boring?—that is the question. [Laughter.]

Mr. A. MYERS. My colleague asks a question that is rather awkward in its nature.

A MEMBER. It augers well for your cause.

Mr. A. MYERS. I returned and discovered that oil was still not reached. Important business required—however I will not state that. [Cries of "Go on!"] Perhaps without a very great violation of the truth, I might say that I was in search of some information in reference to the question whether "crude oil" could stand a tax of six cents a gallon. [Laughter.] The member of the Committee of Ways and Means who has charge of this bill said very truly that they had "struck ile." I thought they had struck it entirely too hard, and in search of information on that point I got into contact with an officer in the Census Bureau to find out the statistics on the subject.

But, sir, to make a long story short, (for I do not wish to detain the House, and if I have a good excuse, a fair and reasonable apology, I presume the House will let me off easily; I throw myself upon the indulgence of the House,) I came here, and I don't think I was arrested. I should have been in here if the doors had not been shut. [Laughter.] Coming down the avenue as hard as I could, thinking that perhaps something might take place here, although not knowing that anything had taken place, I saw the light shining from the top of this building. Hastening my steps as fast as I could, coming down to Four-and-a-half street, I think it is, an excellent street, on which some very fine persons live, [laughter,] I struck the Sergeant-at-Arms, or rather the Sergeant-at-Arms struck me. [Laughter.] When I discovered that it was the Sergeant-at-Arms, I very innocently asked the question if the House was still in session. "Why, yes," says he, "and I am just after you." I then did not know him at all. [Laughter.] I thought I had been looking after some one, but after he made use of that expression I discovered that he was not the man, at all. [Laughter.] It is a little like the case of a Dutchman I knew out in the oil country—

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. None of your Dutch, now. [Laughter.]

Mr. A. MYERS. I say I was a little in the situation of a Dutchman in the oil country who lost his son Peter; the old man had a short way of calling him "Pete." He lost the boy for three or four weeks. It made a great talk all through that country. Well, on a certain occasion when there was a public sale, and the whole township were gathered together, the people asked him, "How is this, Jake, about your having lost your son Pete? Tell us all about it."

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. Pete is not Dutch. [Laughter.]

Mr. A. MYERS. The crowd gathered all around him. The auctioneer's hammer was still; the cry of "Going, going, gone," had ceased at last for a time. All were anxious, intensely anxious, and one said, "Tell us about your losing your son Pete." Well, the old man commenced his story. I will tell it as nearly as I can as he did, although the old man exhibited some emotion in telling it. The old man said: "I did lose my son Pete. He was gone a long while. I did not know whether he was lost, whether he was killed, whether he was dead, whether he was drowned, or whether he was run away. Anyhow I could not find him. One day I did find him. I was going down the street; my son Pete was coming up the street. I see Pete, Pete see me. I ran upon Pete; Pete ran upon me. I put my hands on Pete's shoulder and my arms round his neck; Pete put his head under my shoulder. I cried, and Pete cried. I raised up my head, and Pete raised up his head. Then Pete raised up his face, and I raised up my face, but it was not him—oh!" [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, when I looked at the Sergeant-at-Arms I first thought it was he, but when I talked with him and he told me what he wanted, I did not think it was he. [Laughter.]

Mr. RADFORD. The gentleman augers well. I move that he be excused.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move, as an amendment, that he be excused on payment of the usual fee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the amendment by adding "and that the Sergeant-at-Arms take it out in oil stocks." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether that would be in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I will not insist on it.

The question was taken on Mr. GARFIELD's amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion as amended, and it was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move that a special messenger be directed to bring in the member from Illinois, [Mr. Ross.]

Mr. PENDLETON. That gentleman is present in the Hall.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire how that gentleman is here.

Mr. ROSS. I waive arrest.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. We have got his corpus here. That is all that we care for.

A special messenger appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Mr. Ross.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Ross, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. ROSS. Guilty, my lord. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the gentleman be excused on payment of the usual fee.

Mr. COX. I suggest that the Speaker reprimand the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROSS. I would say, in mitigation of damages, that, having had an intimation of the want of a quorum in the House, I started to come here. On the way, between the gate and the Capitol, I met a member returning to the city, who told me that he had come near enough to see that the light was out and the flag down. He said he was certain about that. I therefore turned back, and, on my way, met a polite and amiable gentleman who sometimes officiates as Sergeant-at-Arms, and who informed me that the House was in session.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. And the flag still waving.

Mr. ROSS. I made my way up here. I had some pressing calls from some of my constituents who seemed to have a claim on my attention and hospitality. Since some votes taken in the House, and especially since the vote on the resolution introduced by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] in which a majority of the members indorsed the principle that we should negotiate for an honorable peace and for a restoration of the Union, I felt that I might with perfect safety absent myself for a short time, and intrust the business of legislation in the hands of the majority. I do not know that I have any other excuse. I believe I have been here as many days of this Congress as any other member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the flag is not flying over the Representatives' Hall because about ten o'clock the halyards broke, and the officers cannot repair them before morning.

Mr. ROSS. That is the reason why I was not here some time ago.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman states that in consequence of the flag not flying over the Hall he was misled as to the House being in session. I move, as an amendment, that he be excused unconditionally.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. STEVENS's motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I believe that makes a quorum.

The SPEAKER. That makes a quorum if all the members are in the Hall.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. ANCONA and INGERSOLL.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 39, noes 40.

So the House refused to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. COX, (at twenty minutes of twelve, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FARNSWORTH called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CRAVENS moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. MORRILL and CRAVENS to act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 29, noes 39.

So the House refused to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, (at fifteen minutes of twelve o'clock, said: Mr. Speaker, we would now have a quorum in the Hall if some gentlemen had not left by unaccustomed outlets. And as I suppose that no order will be taken in regard to those gentlemen, and perhaps not with any others who may leave, I think our remaining here longer will be useless; I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and decided in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ANCONA. I understand that the Sergeant-at-Arms is here, and has made no arrests. If my information is correct, I would ask that he be directed to report to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper informs the Chair that the Sergeant-at-Arms has not yet returned.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to know from the Doorkeeper whether he has allowed any members who have been here to escape; because, if not, then we have a quorum.

The SPEAKER. There is no door through which members can leave the Hall but the one immediately on the left of the Chair, and no members have passed there but those under parole, to return in a few minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Then we should have a quorum. I therefore move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, in order that we may have a vote on the proposition to tax whisky on hand. I hope we will not adjourn until we have taken a vote on that question.

Upon this question Mr. FRANK demanded tellers.

Tellers were accordingly ordered.

Messrs. FRANK and ANCONA were appointed tellers.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 41.

So the House refused to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. WILSON. Several members are in the Hall who have not voted; I therefore ask for a count of the House.

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen will come in from the cloak-room and the corridors, and will stand so that the Chair can count them, he will count the House.

Subsequently the Speaker announced that he could count but eighty-six members present.

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the Sergeant-at-Arms been heard from by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The last the Chair has heard from the Sergeant-at-Arms has been from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. AMOS MYERS.] He supposes that that officer is endeavoring to find members on whom to serve notices of arrest.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the Doorkeeper be sent after the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The question was taken, and, upon a division, there appeared—ayes 21, noes 31.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ANCONA. Would it be in order to move that the roll be called in order to ascertain whether a quorum is present?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, as a matter of information to the House, it would not be out of order to have the roll called.

Mr. KASSON. It may avoid the necessity of calling the roll again if I may be allowed to state that there is but one wanting to a quorum. The absence of one member, who was once excused, renders the number present less than a quorum by one member.

Mr. ANCONA. Then I withdraw my motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is there no remedy by which this House can enforce its authority? The Sergeant-at-Arms has been absent now for nearly three hours without making any report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the Sergeant-at-Arms is absent in the city looking for members.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms, in having delayed for nearly three hours to execute the order of this House, has rendered himself liable to its censure.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, objected.

Mr. THAYER. It is now twelve o'clock. Has the morning hour now arrived?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour of this day's session has already passed, about eleven hours ago.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move that the House now adjourn, and upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and resulted—ayes 33, nays 49, not voting 100; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boutwell, James S. Brown, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Eckley, Farnsworth, Frank, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Kallbelsch, Littlejohn, Long, McAllister, McBride, Middleton, James R. Morris, Charles O'Neill, Pendleton, Prunty, John H. Rice, Spalding, William G. Steele, Thayer, Tracy, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, and Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boyd, Broomall, Cobb, Dawes, Deming, Driggs, Eldridge, Eliot, Garfield, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, Perham, Pomeroy, Radford, Seofield, Shannon, Starr, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Townsend, Upson, Wilder, Winfield, and Woodbridge—49.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chauler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Colfroth, Cole, Cresswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eden, Edgerton, English, Finck, Ganson, Couch, Grider, Grinnell, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazard, Le Blond, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McIntosh, McKinney, William

H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Noble, Norton, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perry, Pike, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, William B. Washburn, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Worthington, and Yeaman—100.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ROSS. Would it be in order to move that additional Sergeants-at-Arms be appointed, in order to bring in absent members?

The SPEAKER. That motion would hardly be in order, unless the additional officers were named. The Chair will state that probably the Sergeant-at-Arms, after going down into the city saw that the flag was down, and supposed that the House was not in session. The flag has been down since ten o'clock.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the Assistant Doorkeeper be appointed a special messenger to go for the Sergeant-at-Arms, and require his immediate attendance in the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. We are proceeding now against absent members, not against the Sergeant-at-Arms. The motion proposes other business than that before the House.

Mr. DAWES. In order to execute that order, it is necessary to have the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The Sergeant-at-Arms is now executing the order.

Mr. THAYER. My motion proposes no proceeding whatever against the Sergeant-at-Arms. It simply proposes that this House shall command the attendance of one of its officers.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The officer has been in attendance, and is now absent in pursuance of an order of the House.

Mr. THAYER. Well, he is bound to attend as often as the House requires his attendance.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the House has the right at any time to require the presence of its officers. It may see fit to bring the Sergeant-at-Arms back to revoke the order of arrest.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that the Sergeant-at-Arms, during his absence, ought to be treated fairly. I would, therefore, move as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] that a rule be served on the Sergeant-at-Arms by the Doorkeeper of the House, requiring him to show the House why he has not made return of the process that was issued for the arrest of absent members. That is the more usual proceeding against an absent officer.

Mr. THAYER. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] that his motion proposes a proceeding against the Sergeant-at-Arms without any evidence that he is in default.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is certainly in order to send for him that he may show why he has not made return.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether that would be in order. The Chair thinks that the farthest verge to which the House can go is to require the presence of the Sergeant-at-Arms to give him any orders that it may see fit.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are precedents of cases where a proposition has been made and adopted, to require the Sergeant-at-Arms to show cause why he did not serve process.

The SPEAKER. There are no such precedents within the recollection of the Chair, and he thinks that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana cannot be recognized as in order.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the Assistant Doorkeeper be appointed to require the presence of the Sergeant-at-Arms in the Hall.

Mr. ROSS. I hope that that motion will not be adopted. I will say, in behalf of the Sergeant-at-Arms, that it cannot be expected that in a city of three or four miles in extent he could make his return any more promptly than he has done. When I saw him, he was discharging his duties as rapidly as possible. I think that the proper course would be to send more officers to assist him.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania so as to provide that the Assistant Doorkeeper be appointed a special messenger to arrest, under the warrant of the Speaker, the absent members and bring them to the bar of the House.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the amendment is not germane to my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether the amendment is germane. It would be in order as an independent proposition, but not as an amendment to the motion now pending.

The motion of Mr. THAYER was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I now move that the Assistant Doorkeeper be appointed a special messenger to go after absent members and bring them to the bar.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. If we send out another messenger we may have to wait three or four hours longer before we hear from him. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. Then we can send another messenger for him.

The motion of Mr. MILLER, of New York, was not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are several of the absentees now at the door who are unable to enter.

MEMBERS. Who are they?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio, and Mr. FINCK. I move that the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to take them in custody and present them at the bar of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

A special messenger appeared at the bar, having in custody Messrs. O'NEILL and FINCK, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Mr. O'NEILL, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, my health was such that I did not deem it prudent to leave my room when I went home from here this afternoon.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the gentleman be excused unconditionally.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. FINCK, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. FINCK. An informal meeting of the Committees of the Senate and the House on the Post Office and Post Roads took place this evening at the house of the Postmaster General, and I had the honor to be one of that company. It was thought, perhaps, that we might promote the general interest.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the gentleman be excused unconditionally.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 33.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that a quorum is now present, and I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. There ought to be ninety-five members present; but there are only ninety.

Mr. KASSON. Several members are in the refreshment room who have remained beyond their parole.

The SPEAKER. The members will be sent for. No more paroles will be granted until after another call of the yeas and nays to ascertain if a quorum is here.

Mr. HOLMAN's motion was disagreed to.

Mr. RADFORD. I move that the House adjourn, and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, as another absentee is present.

Mr. RADFORD. I withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. COFFROTH, an absentee, is now present, and I move that he be taken into custody by the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms and brought to the bar of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

A special messenger appeared at the bar of the House having in custody Mr. COFFROTH.

The SPEAKER. Mr. COFFROTH, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. COFFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I have a notice which was left at my hotel, and in obedience to that I came here. The only excuse that I have for my absence is that I promised to take a lady to the theater, and bought the tickets this morning before I knew there would be a night session. As I have said, a notice was left at my hotel. I think that it was disrespectful to the House and the member for the Sergeant-at-Arms to leave the notice on so small a piece of paper. [Laughter.] It says:

MY DEAR SIR: You are requested to report at my office immediately, under arrest, for absence from the House.

N. C. ORDWAY,
Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Did you go to the theater?

Mr. COFFROTH. I did.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move that my colleague be discharged on payment of fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. My opinion is that the Sergeant-at-Arms has been delinquent in executing the warrant of the House. He has been three hours absent, and as yet we have had none but Democrats presented here. I protest against the partial action of the Sergeant-at-Arms. No member on that side of the House has been arrested.

A MEMBER. Mr. AMOS MYERS was.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. He came here by himself. I think that it is time we were treated alike. I move, therefore, that all fees be withheld from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. STROUSE. I do not believe that we have the right to discriminate against the Sergeant-at-Arms in reference to fees any more than we can take away the pay of the attachés of the House.

Mr. HIGBY. I object to debate.

Mr. JOHNSON's motion was disagreed to.

Mr. RADFORD, (at twenty-five minutes to one o'clock, a. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and RADFORD, were appointed.

Mr. RADFORD. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew the call for the yeas and nays, and for tellers on the yeas and nays. We can ascertain if there is a quorum in that way.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me suggest that the Speaker count the House, to ascertain if there be a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. There are several members in the cloak-room and lying upon sofas, and it would be impossible for the Speaker to count the House exactly.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOOPER and TOWNSEND were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 15, noes 41.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ceased giving permits to leave the Hall half an hour ago, and every member who is in the Capitol is now in the Hall.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 49, not voting 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Boutwell, Broomall, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cox, Daves, Diggs, Eckley, Edgerton, Griswold, Hale, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kallfleisch, Littlejohn, Long, McAllister, McBrade, Middleton, Morrill, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Peudleton, Pike, Prunty, Radford, John H. Rice, Seefeldt, Shannon, Spalding, Starr, William G. Steele, Strouse, Thayer, Tracy, Ward, and Elisha B. Washburne—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, Boyd, Cobb, Coffroth, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finck, Frank, Garfield, Hall, Charles M. Harris, Highty, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, John O'Neill, Perham, Pomeroy, Ross, Stevens, Stiles, Townsend, Upson, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wilder, Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Worthington—49.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eden, English, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Keran, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McIndoe, McKimney, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Noble, Norton, Orth, Patterson, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—90.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. STEVENS. A quorum being now present, I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, and I hope the House will not adjourn until we have taken a vote on the amendment pending in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

Mr. SPALDING, (at twelve minutes to one o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn—ayes 17, noes 63.

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. SHANNON. Several members have left the Hall since the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The doors were opened as soon as further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. COX. What is the motion before the House?

The SPEAKER. A motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COX. I call for tellers on that motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Can any motion be entertained before a quorum is present?

The SPEAKER. It cannot. The fact that no quorum is found to be present arrests all business until a quorum shall appear.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The roll was called; and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Daves, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eden, English, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Keran, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKimney, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Noble, Norton, Orth, Patterson, Perry, Pike, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will now close the doors of the Hall, and the names of the absentees will be called for excuses.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the names of the members who were excused for cause on the last roll-call be omitted in the present call.

There being no objection,

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will pass over the names of members excused on the first call.

The names of the absentees, who were not excused on the first call, were then called, as follows:

JAMES C. ALLEN. No excuse offered.
 WILLIAM J. ALLEN. No excuse offered.

 FERNANDO WOOD. No excuse offered.
 GEORGE H. YEAMAN. No excuse offered.
 Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, (at a quarter past one o'clock, a. m.) It is evident that there is something at fault in the rules of the House; that something more is required in order to enforce the duty of members to be present when the House is in session. Some members evidently feel too lightly that obligation. Therefore, in view of this evident defect in the rules, which makes it hopeless to attempt to accomplish anything here to-night, I am disposed to move again that we adjourn. It does not annoy me to stay here late. I am accustomed to late hours. My habits in that respect are such that I can sit out the night here comfortably; and I would do it gladly if there were any good object before us that it would seem possible for us to accomplish. There being no hope of reaching the object for which we are struggling, I again move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HIGBY. I hope the House will not adjourn. I hope that some men of this House who have been here and have left will be brought here.

The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. I hope as many members of this side of the House will be brought in here as have been brought in here of the other side, and then we will have a quorum.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope those who have been here and have left will be first brought in.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms, Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms, the Doorkeeper, and Assistant Doorkeeper, be designated as special messengers to bring in absent members.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend by adding that they be especially instructed to first arrest and bring here those who have been here and have left without leave.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is in order. The order must be to arrest absent members.

Mr. POMEROY. It is a matter of notoriety to every man in the House that Mr. FARNSWORTH of Illinois, Mr. SPALDING of Ohio, Mr. PIKE of Maine, Mr. DAWES of Massachusetts, and Mr. WEBSTER of Maryland, who have been once excused to-night upon the payment of the usual fees—and I do not know but some others—have been here and have left the House, some of them saying emphatically that they would not remain here to make up a quorum.

Mr. COX, (sotto voce.) Say that they said they would be damned if they would stay. [Laughter.]

Mr. POMEROY. Well, I will not say what my friend from Ohio [Mr. Cox] has said.

Mr. COX. I did not say it myself.

Mr. POMEROY. I think it is due to those who are remaining here that those men should be brought in here. I say it is an insult to the House that those men should have left under the circumstances they did. I say the House cannot maintain its own dignity properly unless these men are first brought in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that four years ago, while acting as the Presiding Officer pro tempore, during a call of the House in an evening session, he examined the authorities upon this subject, and found no case where orders have been specially given for members named to be brought in.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt that the officers designated for this duty will carry out the wishes of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I will state that my motion to amend was intended rather as directory to the Sergeant-at-Arms than for the action of the House. I withdraw the motion to amend. I am informed that the gentleman from Illinois has departed from the Hall. If so, I wish that the Sergeant-at-Arms would pay particular attention to his case.

Mr. POMEROY. The member from Illinois, from the Galena district, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it will not be pretended, I suppose, that members who have attended here to-night until this late hour should be punished for their punctuality; and hence I think it proper that we should make some provision as to the time for the next meeting of the House. It is very evident that we shall not be in a condition to do anything to-morrow; and therefore I move that when we adjourn it be to meet on to-morrow, that is, Saturday. We cannot, I believe, under the rules, adjourn over until Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move to adjourn till Monday if a quorum is present. This is Thursday's session.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. We cannot adjourn till Monday without a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Not without a quorum. Nor can we adjourn till Saturday without a quorum.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I prefer the motion as I stated it: that when we adjourn it be to meet on to-morrow, or, in other words, on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. In legislative parlance this is Thursday, and will remain so even after twelve o'clock noon, if the House should continue in session.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I call the attention of the Chair to the opinion of Hon. Thomas Benton at the time when the House remained in session until Sunday morning.

The SPEAKER. That opinion has been overruled since. The Chair to-day looked at the Congressional Globe in reference to that very point. Volume forty-four of the Congressional Globe shows that the Senate proceedings of Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, March 2, 3, and 4, are all recorded as of the legislative day of Saturday, March 2, 1861.

Mr. MORRILL. If there is not a quorum, can the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin be adopted?

The SPEAKER. If there is no quorum, the motion cannot prevail; and if there is no quorum, the Chair is of opinion that the motion must be reserved till a quorum appears.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that, by attempting to pursue this proceeding, we are punishing ourselves more than the absentees. I have had considerable experience of these prolonged night sessions. I know exactly how this proceeding will result. I know that the absentees cannot be brought here unless they choose to be brought here. I know that they do not choose to be brought here to-night, and that we shall sit here till nine or ten o'clock to-morrow morning, before we shall get their presence, and that the absentees will have enough votes in the House to excuse them; so that we cannot fine them.

Mr. WILSON. We will try it.

Mr. MORRILL. I have seen it tried over and over again.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire whether the proceedings under the call cannot be continued if we take a recess until quarter before twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule on the subject.

The Clerk read, as follows, from page 35 of Barclay's Digest:

"It is not in order for the House to take a recess during a call of the House."

The SPEAKER. That is the only obstacle in the way of the motion indicated by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. POMEROY. In answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] I have this to say, that after sitting here from nine till one o'clock in order to get a quorum of the House, if the House has not the power to compel the attendance of the members necessary to form a quorum, then the call of the House is a farce. I maintain that it is due to the dignity of this House that we should compel the attendance here of all members who were present when the call of the roll showed that there was no quorum present, and to fine them in such a way as will be a lesson to members hereafter. For one, I desire that every man who was present when the proceedings under the former call were dispensed with shall be brought to the bar of the House and properly punished. In my view it is the greatest indignity that could be offered to this House for members to leave under the circumstances under which the men whose names I mentioned a little while ago left this Hall. I am willing to sit here forty-eight hours rather than permit them to escape proper punishment.

Mr. ANCONA. Would it not be competent for the House to impose the penalty suggested by the gentleman upon delinquent members?

The SPEAKER. Not unless they are brought to the bar and asked to give reasons for their absence.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to substitute in place of the Doorkeeper, Mr. Goodenow, who is at home with a sick wife, Mr. John T. Chancy.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose?

Mr. GARFIELD. To act as special messenger for the arrest of absentees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that they be brought here dead or alive. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I insist on a division of the motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to amend by striking out the words "and alive." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair regards the motion as not in order.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask to be excused from further service during the remainder of this day's session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COX. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has retired, I think that we had better adjourn, as we have lost our head. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Was not a motion to adjourn until Saturday made?

The SPEAKER. That question is reserved until a quorum appears.

Mr. HOLMAN. We can receive it by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Until a quorum appears, no unanimous consent can be granted. No motion is in order except to adjourn or that there be a call of the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I agree with the suggestions made of the utter futility under the present rules of the House to enforce the attendance of a quorum; and I think that we will do well to accept the lessons of this result to the point of the necessity of the modification of the rules of the House. We must leave those gentlemen, who, being here until within a moment of the taking of the question on the business of the day, then left the House, to their constituents and the public press.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. They will never hear of it.

Mr. KELLEY. I think that they will hear of it. At any rate, if they do not, we may revise the rules of the House to prevent them from inflicting such a necessity upon it again.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask that my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. LITTLEJOHN, who, the House will remember, has been in feeble health all the session, be excused from further attendance upon the session of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Committee of Ways and Means, having had extra labor, be all excused.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope not.

Mr. WILSON. They are now attending to their business.

Mr. MORRILL's motion was agreed to.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I propose to offer a resolution. I do not know what the practice may be in this House; but in State Legislatures my proposition has been found efficient to compel the attendance of members. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the members absent without leave of the House be declared in contempt of its authority, and that until they shall purge themselves of such contempt by sufficient excuse, to be rendered at the present or some subsequent session, they be held to have forfeited their rights as members.

I know that that has worked a full cure in the legislative bodies of the States, and I think that it will do so here if there is nothing in the rules to interfere. I care nothing for precedents. If there be nothing in the rules to interfere, and the resolution be adopted, the absentees to-morrow will place themselves at the bar of the House and render their excuses.

Mr. PRUYN. That is a substantive resolution, and requires a majority of the House to pass on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules, in accordance with the usage of the House, that the resolution is not in order. The usage has been, since the formation of the Government, that when a member shall be said to be in contempt he has a right to be heard at the bar before final decision is made.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which Mr. LITTLEJOHN was excused from further attendance.

Mr. MORRILL moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask whether it would not be competent for the House to-morrow to pass a resolution of censure upon those who are absent without leave; and if so, whether that would not meet the difficulty?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that that has not been in accordance with the usage. It is for the House, and not the Chair, to change the rules, and he can only administer them as they have been administered by his predecessors.

Mr. ANCONA. I rise for the purpose of making a motion to adjourn. I have thus far invariably voted against motions of this kind; but after the action the House has just taken, excusing two members, and in view of the inefficiency of the Sergeant-at-Arms in bringing in members, I think it is folly for us to remain here. I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 42, noes 36.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 47, not voting 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Boutwell, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cox, Eckley, Edgerton, Eldridge, Frank, Griswold, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubburd, Ingersoll, Kalbfleisch, Long, McAllister, McBride, Middleton, Morrill, James K. Morris, Amos Myers, Pendleton, Pruyn, Radford, Shannon, Strouse, Tracy, Upson, Ward, and William B. Washburn—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Augustus C. Baldwin, Beaman, Boyd, Broomall, Cobb, Coffroth, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Driggs, Eliot, Finck, Garfield, Hall, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Philip Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Perham, Pomeroy, John H. Rice, Ross, Scofield, Starr, Stiles, Thayer, Townsend, Whaley, Wilder, Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Worthington—47.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chaulier, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Dumont, Eden, English, Farnsworth, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Longyear, Malory, Marey, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, William B. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Noble, Norton, Orth, Patterson, Perry, Pike, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—101.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. For the purpose of suggesting a question of order, I renew the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LITTLEJOHN.]

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the members now absent without leave of the House be declared in contempt of its authority, and that until they shall purge themselves of such contempt by sufficient excuse, to be rendered at the present or some subsequent session, they be held to have forfeited their rights as members.

Mr. WILSON. I will modify the resolution by striking out so much of it as relates to the forfeiture of the rights of absentees as members.

I offer the resolution for the purpose of calling the attention of the Chair to a provision in the Constitution which I think obviates the difficulty suggested by the Speaker in passing this resolution. I find this provision in the Constitution of the United States:

"Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide."

Now, it may be answered that the manner of compelling the attendance of members must be established by the rules of the House prior to the enforcement of the rule.

But, sir, suppose that difficulty should have occurred in the First Congress which convened under the Constitution of the United States, and that Congress, or any Congress at the commencement of a new Congress, had found itself without a quorum before any rule had been established, what remedy would the House have had to compel the attendance of absent members? I suggest, sir, that the House, under this provision of the Constitution, may adjourn from day to day, and provide for the compelling of the attendance of absent members under such penalties as may be prescribed by such portion of the House as may adjourn from day to day. Otherwise there can be no penalty at all, because a majority of the members, being absent, would have it in their power to prevent the adoption of any rule by virtue of which a member may be punished for absence from the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heard with interest the suggestions of the gentleman from Iowa. He ruled the resolution out of order, and reflection has satisfied him that the ruling was right. The section of the Constitution read by the gentleman provides that a smaller number than a quorum may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide. The words "each House" must have some definition. If the gentleman will look at the next clause of the Constitution he will find what those words mean. "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." Nothing less than a majority of the House can adopt rules for the House. "Punish its members for disorderly behavior." Nothing less than a majority can do so. "And, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member." The gentleman from Iowa will not say that two thirds of this body, as it is now situated, without a quorum, can expel a member. It follows, therefore, when the Constitution declares that "each House may provide" penalties, &c., to compel the attendance of absent members, it means a quorum of the House, and no less.

Mr. WILSON. If the Chair will permit me—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cite a precedent to the gentleman from Iowa, which would seem, on a first reading, to be on his side. The Constitution says each House may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as it may direct. In the Twenty-Seventh Congress, under a call of the House, the House passed a resolution declaring that all such members of the House as had not appeared in pursuance of the call of the House and given satisfactory excuse, should be fined the amount of fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms, subject to be released on the payment of the same on appearing afterward and making such excuse as should be satisfactory to the House. That was not done, however, till there was a quorum present. If there were a quorum, then there would be a House authorized to act similarly.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest, in answer to the remarks of the Chair, that the second clause of the section just read by the Chair relates to the powers of the House as an entirety, establishing rules for the punishment of members for disorderly behavior, and for the expulsion of members. That power can only be exercised after the attendance of a quorum has been secured. There are two classes of powers: first, the power to compel the attendance of a quorum. After that has been secured, that quorum of the House may establish rules to punish members for disorderly behavior, and, with a concurrence of two thirds, to expel members. Now, I suggest that disorderly behavior, which may be punished, must be behavior in the presence of the House. Consequently, it is the exercise of a power on the part of the House after a quorum has been secured. But, in the first clause of the section which I have read, the provision of the Constitution was intended to secure the attendance of a sufficient number of members to constitute a quorum, in order that the rules of proceedings should be determined under which members might be punished for disorderly behavior, or, by a vote of two thirds, expelled.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in reply to the suggestions of the gentleman from Iowa, that the section, taken altogether, certainly seems to be in antagonism to the gentleman's views; and what is still more apposite is that the House of Representatives has administered and executed this section of the Constitution. "Each House shall be judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number" may "be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide." The House of Representatives has provided how the attendance of absent members, when there is less than a quorum present, shall be enforced. But less than a quorum cannot affix penalties not specified in the rules. In that opinion the Chair is very clear. The Constitution goes on to provide what each House may do: punish for disorderly behavior, compel attendance, and expel members.

Mr. WILSON. I would then ask the Chair whether an appeal from the decision of the Chair would be entertained.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. If that appeal can be entertained, then by what body can that appeal be determined?

The SPEAKER. The Chair always feels that he is under the control of the House, (except in rare and exceptional cases, which need not be referred to here,) or that portion of the House which may be present. If the House shall determine the question against the opinion of the Chair, still the Chair would not be shaken in his opinion, for he believes that the opinion he has expressed is the true construction of the Constitution, as his predecessors have administered it. But the Chair would feel it a duty to be governed by the decision of the majority of his fellow-members here.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say that the resolution I have offered, for the purpose of raising this question of order, goes further probably than I would desire to go in the enforcement of any penalty against any member of the House for absence. I offer it for the purpose of raising this question; and with all due deference to the Chair, and in order that those present may pass upon this question, and that it may be discussed if desired, I therefore appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. THAYER. The position taken by the Chair is undoubtedly correct. The resolution now before the House does not contemplate the compulsory attendance of the absent members; but it contemplates the punishment of those members in a manner which is tantamount to an expulsion.

Mr. WILSON. I have modified the resolution.

Mr. THAYER. It is clearly incompetent for less than a quorum to expel a member; yet this resolution goes to that extent, for to enact that these members are to be deprived of their privileges as members, is in effect to enact their expulsion.

Mr. WILSON. I modified the resolution by striking out that passage.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say on this subject that there is one point which it seems to me ought to settle the question as the Chair has decided it. And that is that if we have the right to pass a resolution requiring the excuse to be satisfactory to the House before they can be restored to their privileges, then a minority of the House, meeting at the beginning of a session, and acting under a resolution of this character, might defeat the meeting of a quorum by refusing to receive any excuse as satisfactory, and thus prevent the organization of the House. The rule cuts both ways; therefore I think the ruling of the Chair is right on principle as well as on precedent.

Mr. HIGBY. It seems to me that there is one rule by which we can settle this question, and that is this: when the members were called to the bar of the House, and the question was asked them what excuse they had to offer for being absent from the House, they gave no excuse such as the House would receive; and some member then made the motion that they be excused upon paying the usual fees. Now, can the motion be made here that a fine be imposed of ten, fifteen, or twenty dollars? Then arises another question: could the motion be made here, and would it be a valid motion, that the member be considered in contempt of this House for his conduct, provided he gave no excuse, or if whatever he did give showed that it had rather been in contempt of the action of this House?

Then the question is, would it be in the power of this body, having less than a majority, to enter on the record that that person was in contempt of this House? And if under the rules that penalty or punishment, for it would be in the light of a punishment, could not be inflicted upon a member when he is called to the bar, then I can very readily conceive that we have no power to adopt this resolution. But if we have the power, although in a minority—that is, not a quorum present—if we have the power under the rules to inflict that penalty, have we not also the same power now?

Mr. THAYER. The difference lies just here; that we cannot do that until the member has been arraigned at the bar of this House and had an opportunity to be heard. He is not convicted of any contempt until his excuse is pronounced insufficient by this House. If he appears, and his excuse is found to be insufficient, then he can be punished.

Mr. HIGBY. It is simply giving the opportunity to hear his excuse; it is a conditional matter, whatever it may be.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. It seems to me the gentleman overlooks one point in this case. It is not simply bringing members here who have been absent, but to bring those here who have once been brought to the bar of the House, and then have left the House. Suppose that some of these gentlemen who were brought here under the process of the House to-night, had, in the face of this minority of the House, wheeled upon their heels and walked out; is there no power in this minority to compel their attendance here? Has not this minority the power to hold those members here? Has it not the power to inflict a punishment over and above the amount of the fees of the officer who arrests them? Has it not the power to impose upon them a fine of twenty-five, fifty, or one hundred dollars? If not, then I say that we have not the power under the Constitution to compel the attendance of members here until we have a quorum. Therefore, I think that, under a resolution reciting flagrant misconduct, (as leaving the Hall while the House is engaged in trying to compel the attendance of a quorum has been considered by certain gentlemen here,) and therefore calling such delinquents before the bar of the House, we have the right to impose such a penalty as will prevent them from leaving the Hall in that manner again. By holding them, and sending for others, we might eventually get a quorum; otherwise we might never do so, because the back door might let out more than could be brought in at the front door.

Mr. WILSON. Before this debate proceeds further, I ask the Clerk to read the resolution as modified.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the members of this House absent without leave be held to be in contempt until such time as they shall appear and purge themselves thereof by rendering sufficient excuses respectively for their absence.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish, Mr. Speaker, to state briefly what seems to me the teaching of the Constitution in the case before us.

In the first place, there is a House, a quorum of which is empowered to do business. A smaller number than a quorum, not being a House, has two functions under the Constitution, and only two: first, to adjourn from day to day; and second, to compel the attendance of absent members.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman will allow me to direct his attention to a single point. The Constitution does not say that a smaller number than a quorum may compel the attendance of absent members; it says that they "may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members."

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; "may be authorized."

Mr. BOUTWELL. For authority to enforce such attendance, this number less than a quorum must look to the rules established by the House when there is a quorum acting.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will conclude what I have to say.

A smaller number than a quorum may do two things: in the first place, they "may adjourn from day to day;" and in the second place, they "may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members." How? "In such manner and under such penalties as each House may provide." The House has, in its rules, determined how that shall be done. Now, the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] provided for the expulsion of members. But that is not compelling their attendance; it is getting rid of them altogether. It therefore falls entirely outside of the second of the two functions of the House, and is in my judgment clearly unconstitutional.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I beg leave to remind the gentleman that the resolution which was proposed by myself is not now under consideration.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am aware of that. I am speaking of the gentleman's resolution, however, to show that it was clearly out of order.

Now, a smaller number than a quorum may compel the attendance of absent members in such manner as they may be authorized by the House. The House, by its rules, has authorized less than a quorum to proceed as we have been proceeding to-night. But we are not justified, I judge, in going in any direction beyond the rules of the House. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WIL-SON] concedes that the rules, as they now exist, do not admit of this resolution censuring members who are not here, he gives up, it seems to me, the whole question.

In conclusion, let me say that there is one point on which I wish to ask the Speaker a question. How can this House, in its present condition, without a quorum, fine a member when he is brought in? Is there any specific rule of the House that authorizes the fifteen members who may adjourn from day to day, to fine a member when he comes in and fails to present a satisfactory excuse? If the Speaker answers that question, I think the case will be entirely with him. That is the only point on which there is any doubt in my mind.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never yet decided that the portion of the House now present has a right to go beyond a resolution requiring the payment of the usual fees. To enable it to do so would require action by the House of Representatives. The rules themselves declare that a member may be discharged with or without paying the usual fees. So far as the recollection of the Chair extends, no member has ever been seriously required in such a case as this to pay anything except the fees.

Mr. GARFIELD. According to my recollection, (the Chair will correct me if I am in error,) at the last session, on an occasion when there was not a quorum present, a motion was made and entertained—not ruled out of order—proposing to fine a member of the House $250.

The SPEAKER. That motion, the Chair presumes, was entertained simply because no question of order was raised upon it. The gentleman will bear in mind that it is not possible for the Chair, unaided by suggestions from the House, to rule out every inadmissible proposition. As the gentleman knows, members repeatedly engage the Speaker in conversation while the Clerk is reading resolutions. Hence, when the Chair fails to rule out propositions which are out of order it may be owing to the fact that his attention is not drawn to the matter. The Chair sometimes rules out propositions when no point of order is raised, because they strike his mind as being clearly out of order; but, as a general thing, the duty of the Chair is to rule out inadmissible propositions when a point of order is raised on the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no doubt about the correctness of the ruling of the Chair on this point; but I desire, as other gentlemen have interrogated our Speaker, to propound one question to the Chair in reference to a point wherein I think he is wrong. Suppose we were about to arrest absentees who had gone to Boston, or New York, or Chicago, is it the decision of the Chair that we cannot adjourn, and that we must keep in continuous session until the Sergeant-at-Arms has gone to New York, Chicago, or Boston, and returned with the absentees?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer that question with pleasure, and he thinks that the gentleman from Vermont will concede the answer to be correct; that when a quorum is in attendance after a call has been gone through, and the House is in session, they can make an order as they please.

Mr. MORRILL. Suppose there is not a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Then, under the rules, pending a call, nothing would be in order except a motion to adjourn, or that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. THAYER. Is that a rule or precedent?

The SPEAKER. It is the usage of the House.

Mr. THAYER. Then it is not a rule, but a precedent.

The SPEAKER. It is virtually a rule, as the House of Representatives have adopted Barclay's Digest, a compend of parliamentary law, for the House.

Mr. THAYER. I hope that the House is not responsible for every precedent in that book.

The SPEAKER. They are bound by it, having adopted it, to the same extent as if they had adopted Cushing's Manual, or any other. It has always been recognized as authority since its compilation.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to say that this is too important a question to be passed upon by the number of members now present. I have accomplished what I desired to accomplish by presenting it to the House, and that is, to call attention to it. It may be important to have a decision on it by a full House at some other time, so that we may know what power the House has to enforce the attendance of its members. Inasmuch as I have accomplished my present purpose, and in order that it may be determined whether the House is in a humor to adjourn, I withdraw my appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no pride of opinion on this question, and as the House has discussed the point at some length, he would be glad to have it decided now.

Mr. WILSON. I do not want so important a question decided by so thin a House. I therefore withdraw my appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Is it not competent for the House to-morrow, when we have a quorum, to adopt a resolution of censure in reference to these members whose absence has kept us here to-night? I ask whether that will not consummate all that can be consummated by any proceeding we may take?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not decide a question of that gravity before it comes up.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I see no propriety in our staying here all night to bring in absent members. I am pretty well satisfied that when the House has a quorum it will assert its dignity.

A Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody Messrs. McDowell, Steele of New York, McKinney, and J. W. White.

The SPEAKER. Mr. McDowell, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. McDOWELL. I have been in attendance but few hours during the last four days on account of illness. I have been quite unwell, and do not think I have slept two hours in the last three or four nights.

The SPEAKER. It seems to be a mistake that the gentleman was brought here, as he was excused by the House. The gentleman is not under arrest properly, and is discharged.

Mr. CRAVENS. He was excused on my motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was his name in the warrant of arrest?

The SPEAKER. All those excused for cause upon the first call were excused upon the second call. In consequence of the fewness of the clerks to-night, the Clerk of the House himself came in and made out the warrant, and this mistake has accidentally crept in.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Was Mr. McDowell's name in the warrant?

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms has the original warrant.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We seem to be proceeding in a loose way.

The SPEAKER. Mr. STEELE, of New York, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I am not very well at any time, and not being as well as usual to-night, I remained at home.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the gentleman be excused unconditionally.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. As these men are all Democrats, and all "disloyal," of the same class which has been brought here heretofore, I move that they be committed to the Old Capitol prison. It seems that the Sergeant-at-Arms cannot find any other class of members.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds nothing in the rules authorizing that motion to be made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I second the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL.]

The question was taken on Mr. O'NEILL's motion, and it was agreed to; and Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, was excused.

The SPEAKER. Mr. McKINNEY, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. McKINNEY. I was asleep.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move that the gentleman be excused unconditionally.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. As there seems to have been some imputation cast on the Sergeant-at-Arms, it is just to say that I have been informed by him that he did not assume to arrest any member forcibly, but that he gave any member whom he found notice to come here.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. It requires more explanation than that. Fifteen or twenty men have been brought here and not one Republican. I say that it is an outrage upon decency and upon the dignity of this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. There are men here who will resent it here and elsewhere.

The SPEAKER. Mr. JOSEPH W. WHITE, you have been brought here through a mistake which the Chair much regrets. You are discharged from custody.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to reconsider the vote by which Mr. McKINNEY was excused. I do it for the reason that I do not believe in excusing any man who is brought here unless he has an excuse; and I believe in staying here until the men who went from this side of the House are brought back into the House and punished. I hope that members on this side of the House will stay here until that is done.

The excuse that the Sergeant-at-Arms did not attempt to force any member to come here amounts to nothing. If he has any power, it is his duty to force members to come here.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I made the motion to excuse Mr. McKINNEY upon this ground. It was stated that the Sergeant-at-Arms had notified members on both sides of the House to appear. It seems that gentlemen upon this side of the House did not obey that notice, and that gentlemen upon the other side of the House did obey it like men, and on that account I am in favor of excusing them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to inquire if the name of Mr. JOSEPH W. WHITE is in the warrant of arrest.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that his name is in the warrant of arrest, erroneously. It should have been erased, as he was excused.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is the warrant returned?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because the officers are still executing it.

Mr. HIGBY. I only desire to say a word more, in order that I may be correctly understood. I did not make the motion to reconsider out of any feeling toward any one particular member or any class of members. But I think we should not trifle with any member who comes here without an excuse. I hope we shall stay here until we accomplish the object for which we are staying, and that is to bring members into this House. I will now withdraw the motion to reconsider, as gentlemen upon this side of the House seem to be tender-footed about it.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ANSON HERRICK, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HERRICK. I did not feel very well; I had a headache and I went to bed. As soon as I got the notice from the Sergeant-at-Arms, I dressed myself and came here.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the gentleman be unconditionally excused.

Mr. RADFORD. I move to amend that motion by adding "on the payment of the usual fees."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLEY's motion as amended was then adopted, and Mr. HERRICK was excused on payment of fees.

Mr. COX. If I understand the statement of the Speaker in regard to the returns made here, it is the custom for the Sergeant-at-Arms to leave a notice for members to come here and consider themselves under arrest. That is not the way in which process is generally served. The members who are in contempt of this House will never appear; we may stay here till morning and the members of the majority will not appear. We are punishing ourselves simply for the purpose of bringing in Democratic members who do obey this notice to appear. I hope the Speaker or the House will direct the Sergeant-at-Arms, their own agent, to bring these men here in person by arrest, and let us understand whether their contempt of this House is to pass by with perfect immunity. It is a perfect farce and sham, and we ought to adjourn at once if that is not done. Does the Sergeant-at-Arms undertake to favor members of the House because he wishes to be reelected to his office? Is that the idea? I hope not.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I was going to put the question to the gentleman whether, if he was a candidate for reelection, he would like to give offense to men who were going into caucus to choose candidates.

Mr. COX. If I were a candidate for election I would do my duty everywhere, even if I were to injure my prospects by it.

A special messenger appeared at the bar of the House having in custody Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, and Mr. DONNELLY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ROLLINS, you have been brought before the bar of the House for absence from its sessions without leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I have not any excuse.

Mr. A. MYERS. I move that the gentleman from New Hampshire be excused unconditionally.

Mr. RADFORD. I move to amend by saying "on payment of the regular fee."

Mr. SCOFIELD. I would like to inquire whether the member was notified before by the Sergeant-at-Arms and neglected to attend, or whether he evaded the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, shall I reply to the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman may do as he pleases in that respect.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I reported here immediately on being notified by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. LOAN. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether we have authority to take any action in regard to this matter; whether it must not be disposed of by the House, and not by a less number than a quorum?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House a minority has a right to determine whether a member shall be excused, with or without the payment of the usual fee.

The question was taken on Mr. RADFORD's amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question was taken on the motion as amended, and it was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I move, even at this early hour, that the action of the House in regard to all these fines be made uniform. There have been some singular discrepancies in our action, and gentlemen must naturally feel hurt about it. The fines are to result to the benefit of the Sergeant-at-Arms for the performance of his duty. As we have been here from ten o'clock till now, half past two, and have not yet got a quorum, it strikes me that all these fines may very properly be dispensed with.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope that will not be done. Each one of these cases has come up and been disposed of on its own merits. There have been very different circumstances attending the recent cases in comparison with those in the early part of the evening. It would be very unjust to say that a member, having had two notifications from the Sergeant-at-Arms, occupies the same position as the member who has had but one call. The cases that will come before us from this time out will probably be very different from the cases already passed upon.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, is the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is not in order.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I desire to say, in justice to the Sergeant-at-Arms, that I have been informed that he called at my rooms once or twice while I was absent, and of course he could not find me.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. And I desire to say that I have been in my room all the evening, and came here as soon as I was notified.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I understand the Chair to decide that it is not competent for the House, as at present constituted, to go back and remit all the penalties that it has imposed. It seems to me to be so manifestly unjust that these persons should be required to pay the fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms that I feel constrained to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled that each of these cases has been decided on its own merits; that the House has complied with the rules and exhausted its powers by assessing penalties; that it is not now in order to go back and make a sweeping rule applying to all the absentees who have been brought up—the fees vesting in the Sergeant-at-Arms by a vote of the House—and that therefore the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] is not in order. From that decision the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] appeals. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

The question was taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. ANCONA (at two o'clock and thirty minutes) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. ROSS. I have understood the Chair to decide that after a quorum has been ascertained to be present we can proceed to act upon the cases of absent members.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has read the precedent.

Mr. ROSS. Then I suggest that we dispense with further proceedings under the call of the House, and proceed to act upon the cases of absent members. If no question is raised it may be assumed that there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. As soon as any question is taken by yeas and nays, or by a division, and it is shown that no quorum is present, then the House will be as competent to adopt resolutions as before the calls.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would suggest that the Chair count the House in order to see whether there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER having done so, announced that the Chair could count but eighty-nine members present.

The Sergeant-at-Arms now appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody Messrs. YEAMAN and DONNELLY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. YEAMAN, you have been absent from the sessions of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for being absent?

Mr. YEAMAN. I think I have a good excuse. This is the first time I have undertaken to be absent from this House when I knew it was in session, or that any business was to be transacted in it. I did know there was to be a session to-night, but I understood that it was to be for the consideration of unimportant items of the tax bill, and feeling a little wearied with the overmuch labor of the session, I spent the evening, from dinner time till about nine o'clock, reading the History of Civilization, a species of information which I thought members of this House stood very much in need of. [Laughter.] After that I undertook to practice some of the amenities of civilization by paying my respects to the distinguished Senator from New York, [Mr. MORGAN], and finding the ice cream good, the punch good, the music good, and the ladies handsome—upon the whole a very civilized crowd—I remained there a little over time. That is all the reason I have to offer for being absent. I hope the House will excuse me.

Mr. RADFORD. I move that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] be excused upon payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER then said: Mr. DONNELLY, you have been absent from the sessions of this House without its leave; what excuse have you to give for being absent?

Mr. DONNELLY. I believe I have no good excuse to offer. I will have to submit to the action of the House.

Mr. HIGBY. I move that the gentleman be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring the members now absent without leave before the bar of this House at one o'clock to-morrow, or as soon thereafter as possible; and that they then be required to show cause why they should not be declared to be in contempt of the House, and abide the order of the House.

The SPEAKER. There has been no vote of the House yet taken by yeas and nays, to disclose the fact that there is a quorum present. The Chair cannot entertain the resolution until that fact has been shown.

Mr. KASSON. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] to withdraw his resolution for the present, that I may move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BROOMALL. I am willing to let the resolution remain until that has been done.

The SPEAKER. Some vote must be taken to show the presence of a quorum.

Mr. NELSON. I move that the House adjourn, and upon that I call the yeas and nays. That will show that there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The same thing might be shown by voting upon the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. GARFIELD. If that motion is adopted then the doors will be opened, which we do not want done.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn. That will show whether a quorum is present just as well as by any other vote.

Tellers were ordered.

Messrs. ANCONA and THAYER were appointed to act as tellers.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 4, nays 86; no quorum voting.

So the House refused to order the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

On the motion to adjourn there were, on a division—ayes 16, nays 72.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. For the purpose of ascertaining whether there is a quorum present, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, on reflection, thinks that the motion is not probably the proper one at the present time to carry out the evident wishes of the members. The rule declares that "no motion, except to adjourn or with reference to the call, is ever entertained during a call." The motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call, if successful, would prevent further action in regard to absentees.

The Chair will state that his experience is that whenever there is barely a quorum present it is impossible to get a quorum to vote, except on a call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRACY. I move that the House now adjourn, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 23, nays 68, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James S. Brown, Cox, Cravens, Edger-ton, Eldridge, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Littlejohn, McBride, McDowell, McKinney, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Pendleton, Prunty, Scofield, Shannon, Tracy, Ward, and Joseph W. White—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Finck, Frank, Garfield, Griswold, Hall, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Hoffman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Long, Marvin, McAllister, McClurg, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Perham, Pomeroy, Radford, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Starr, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Thayer, Townsend, Upson, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wilder, Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—68.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Daves, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Eden, English, Farnsworth, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Kuapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, McIndoe, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Noble, Norton, Orth, Patterson, Perry, Pike, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Elihu R. Washburne, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Williams, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—89.

No quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the negative, making a quorum; and the motion is disagreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring the members now absent without leave before the bar of the House at one o'clock to-morrow, Friday, February 10, 1865, or as soon thereafter as possible, and that they then be required to show cause why they should not be declared in contempt of the House, and abide the further order of the House.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of order. My point is this: if we adjourn after passing this resolution, will not the adjournment nullify it? Can we continue these proceedings beyond an adjournment?

The SPEAKER. On the 6th day of April, 1842, in the Twenty-Seventh Congress, after prolonged proceedings under a call, Mr. Landaff W. Andrews moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That all such members of the House as have not appeared in pursuance of the call of the House, and given satisfactory excuses, shall be fined the amount of the fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms, subject to be released from the payment of the same on appearing hereafter and making such excuse as shall be deemed satisfactory to the House.

The attendance of a quorum having been secured, the Speaker entertained that resolution, and under the previous question it was adopted. Further proceedings under the call were then dispensed with, the doors were opened, and the House adjourned. This is the precedent of the Twenty-Seventh Congress.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. That settles my point.

The SPEAKER. The Digest seems to correspond with this precedent; for it says:

"No motion except to adjourn, or with reference to the call, is ever entertained during a call."

"By an adjournment pending a call, all proceedings in the call are terminated; but where the House—"

This is now a House—

"has previously passed an order specially directing otherwise, such special direction should doubtless be executed."

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I hope that the motion will be amended so as to make it Saturday.

Mr. BROOMALL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BEAMAN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. BROOMALL. Certainly.

Mr. BEAMAN. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is some little misapprehension about the proceedings in the case referred to. It appears that all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with. I do not understand that it is contemplated by the gentleman that all further proceedings under this call shall be dispensed with; on the contrary, I understand that the proceedings thus far are to be left in the state in which they are now, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall bring these absent members to-morrow morning.

The case instanced by the Speaker is not in point. Have the proceedings, so far as the call is concerned, been suspended? No; the Sergeant-at-Arms is now out executing the order of the House. We are proceeding under the call. After the call was made we made an order to bring in absent members. Our officers are out executing that order, and by adjourning till to-morrow we do not suspend the proceedings under the call, which was the fact in the case cited by the Speaker. After the resolution passed for the purpose of bringing in absentees, then a further motion was made that all further proceedings under the call shall be suspended, and that motion was carried. I do not understand that it is proposed to suspend all further proceedings under this call, but that on the contrary we shall leave it where it is.

Mr. BROOMALL. I have only one remark to make. If the proceedings under the call be dispensed with—the proceedings which are now going on for the purpose of bringing absent members here at the present sitting—that, I understand, will not suspend the action of any resolution the House may pass, the question being put and carried.

The SPEAKER. It matters little whether, when a motion to adjourn has been carried, all further proceedings under the call have been dispensed with or not, as the effect of the motion to adjourn would dispense with all further proceedings under the call. It is declared in Barclay's Digest that by an adjournment, pending a call, all proceedings under the call are terminated; but where the House, that is, a quorum of the House, has previously passed an order specially directing otherwise, such special direction will doubtless be executed.

MR. BEAMAN. It seems that that dictum was founded upon the case put by the Speaker; and if the case does not bear it out, it of course falls. This dictum, in Barclay's Digest, is based upon the decision in that case. Now, the case does not bear out the statement of the Digest.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair differs with the gentleman from Michigan. In that case, as now, after a quorum appeared, a resolution as to absentees was proposed; and after its adoption all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

MR. BROOMALL. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

MR. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MR. MORRILL moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. MORRILL. I suppose that the main purpose of this struggle will not be accomplished unless we spend a few moments in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I make the motion that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MR. ROSS moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

MR. MORRILL's motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the tax bill; the pending question being on the following amendment, moved by MR. WASHBURN, of Illinois:

And hereafter there shall be assessed and collected a tax of fifty cents per gallon on all domestic spirits on hand and for sale.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 72.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk then proceeded with the reading of the bill.

MR. MORRILL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, MR. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the tax bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of MR. KELLEY, (at a quarter past three o'clock, a. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 10, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D.

The reading of yesterday's Journal was, on motion of Mr. Foor, and by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of January 23, 1865, statements showing the amount of public money deposited and the amount withdrawn from each of the national banks during each month from the date of their organization to June 30, 1864; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting copies of correspondence relating to the payment in coin of the annuities of the Chippewas of Lake Superior, as required by the treaty with them, and recommending that the appropriation be special, according to the terms of the treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a communication dated the 14th ultimo, from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and accompanying extract from a letter of Hon. C. D. Poston, of September 1, 1864, in relation to expenses incurred by him while he was superintendent of Indian affairs in Arizona in supplying the Indians of that Territory with provisions upon which to subsist during the present winter, and recommending an appropriation to pay the indebtedness; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPRESENTATION IN ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives:

The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution declaring certain States not entitled to representation in the Electoral College" has been signed by the Executive, in deference to the view of Congress implied in its passage and presentation to him. In his own view, however, the two Houses of Congress, convened under the twelfth article of the Constitution, have complete power to exclude from counting all electoral votes deemed by them to be illegal; and it is not competent for the Executive to defeat or obstruct that power by a veto, as would be the case if his action were at all essential in the matter. He disclaims all right of the Executive to interfere in any way in the matter of canvassing or counting electoral votes, and he also disclaims that, by signing said resolution, he has expressed any opinion on the recitals of the preamble, or any judgment of his own upon the subject of the resolution.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 8, 1865.

MR. JOHNSON. That to me is a very extraordinary course for the President to pursue. I have no doubt his motives are perfectly correct and patriotic; but if his approval is necessary to give effect to the joint resolution, accompanying that approval with a disclaimer of any belief in the doctrines of the resolution is wholly inconsistent with his duty of approving or disapproving. I suppose nobody will contend for a moment that the resolution, if his approval is necessary, though approved in the way in which he has thought proper to approve it, is not just as effective as if he had approved it without saying a word on the subject.

It is, in my judgment, a reflection upon the Senate and upon Congress, although not so designed. If he is sincere (and of course I do not call in question his sincerity) in thinking that it was not a subject for the legislation of Congress, he ought to have disapproved the resolution; but in my judgment he is entirely wrong in point of law. It may be true, and perhaps to that extent is true, that in the absence of any legislation the two Houses of Congress, either acting in convention or acting separately, might establish for themselves rules by which they would be governed in admitting or excluding votes. But it is equally true, in my judgment, (and I speak it with all the deference that I can feel for the opposite opinion announced by the President,) that it is a subject over which Congress has a right to legislate in order to guard against the very mischiefs which would result from leaving the subject, without legislation, to be disposed of by the convention.

This is not the first time in which it has been done. The bill for the reconstruction of the seceded States was passed by an overwhelming vote in both Houses at the last session. The President, to be sure, did not return it with a qualified veto, or with any veto, or with any approval. There not being ten days between the passage of the bill and the adjournment of Congress, he had a right not to act upon it, and by not acting he put it out of the power of Congress to pass it; but immediately after Congress adjourned he issued a manifesto or a proclamation in which he said that, according to his view, there were some good things in the bill passed by Congress and some bad things; as far as they were good he would act upon them; as far as he considered them bad, or not as good as what he proposed himself, he would be governed by his own judgment.

It seems to me to be his clear and manifest duty—and I speak it with no possible want of respect to him; I should say the same thing if any other man was in the presidential office—to approve or disapprove, and not to do it in part by way of approval and in part by way of disapproval. He reads us a lecture, virtually, in this paper. He says we have legislated on a subject with which we have nothing to do. It was for us to decide for ourselves whether it was within our jurisdiction, and we have decided. In the exercise of his constitutional power of acting upon all subjects submitted to him in the form of legislation he has a clear right to disapprove, if he thinks that he ought to disapprove, but not to take the course which he has adopted in this case, or to take the course which he adopted in the other case to which I have adverted.

The message was laid on the table.

BRITISH PRESENT TO CAPTAIN STELLWAGEN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a copy of a note of the 4th instant, addressed by J. Hume Burnley, Esq., her Britannic Majesty's charge d'affaires, to the Secretary of State, relative to a sword which it is proposed to present to Captain Henry S. Stellwagen, commanding the United States frigate Constellation, as a mark of gratitude for his services to the British brigantine Mersey. The expediency of sanctioning the acceptance of the gift is submitted to your consideration.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON, February 8, 1865.

MR. SUMNER. I move the reference of those papers to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

MR. MORGAN presented a petition of merchants of the city of New York, praying for the passage of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

MR. ANTHONY presented a memorial of manufacturing jewelers of the city of Providence, Rhode Island, praying for a reduction of the tax on their business; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

MR. SUMNER. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs have met, and after a full conference have agreed upon a report, which I send to the Chair, and move its adoption by the Senate.

The Secretary commenced the reading of the report.

MR. SAULSBURY. I move to dispense with the reading, and to print the document. This seems to be a new bill entirely.

MR. SUMNER. It was printed ten days ago for the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair,) The reading must proceed, unless it be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

MR. CLARK. I suggest that the reading had better be postponed until we can have an opportunity of examining the report and getting a knowledge of the bill in its present shape. This is the first time it has been called to the attention of the Senate, and of course we want a little time to look it over before we shall be prepared to pass on the report. It may be delayed by unanimous consent for a short time, that we may have an opportunity to look into it.

MR. SUMNER. The Senator makes no proposition?

MR. CLARK. I have no further proposition to make than this: I find myself in the condition of other Senators about me, that we do not know anything about it, and have not seen it.

MR. SUMNER. I will make a brief statement.

MR. DAVIS. I hope the honorable Senator from Massachusetts will let the report lie over until to-morrow.

MR. SUMNER. I was merely going to state that the report was agreed upon some ten days ago and made to the other House, where, according to the rules of Congress, it should have been made, because the measure originated there. I have had the report in my drawer, ready to make it as soon as it was in order, for the last ten days. When it was made in the other House it was at once ordered to be printed, and the House postponed action upon it for a certain time in order to have it printed, and it was acted upon finally yesterday. The Senate will remember that a message came here yesterday informing us that the House had concurred with the committee. The subject then becomes in order for the report of the Senate committee, and it is because it is now in order that I make it. I shall not press it at this moment against the inclination of Senators. It is in order that the report when made shall be read. If Senators desire that it shall lie on the table for another day I shall not object, though my impression is that the subject has been so long before Congress, so maturely considered in committee, and also so much considered in the other House, that we may proceed with it now and come to a conclusion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no motion be interposed, the Chair has no other course to pursue but to direct the reading of the report, and the reading will proceed.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has expressed his willingness that this matter should lie over for a day. If that course be taken, I suppose it is hardly necessary to consume the time of the Senate in reading the report. Every Senator who feels an interest in the subject will of course make himself familiar with it by to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By common consent, then, the report will lie upon the table.

Mr. SUMNER. Until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Until to-morrow. The Chair hears no objection, and the report will lie upon the table, subject to be called up at any time.

Mr. COLLAMER. I doubt very much whether we shall get out of the difficulty in that way. That report has never been printed in this body. Other gentlemen may be more industrious than I am, and may have more time than I have, but I am not able to read the proceedings of the House; it is as much as I can do to keep up with those of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Perhaps the Senator is not aware of the fact that when a document is ordered to be printed in one body it is considered as printed for both. This report was ordered to be printed in the House, and the next day after it was printed it was laid on all our tables. It is now within call, in the Document Room, from any Senator. The Senator from Vermont has only to send a page to the Document Room, and it will be forthcoming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will lie upon the table by common consent.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of P. J. Howard, praying that her husband, John Howard, a soldier who enlisted, as she alleges, for two years and is now held for three years, may be discharged, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print five thousand extra copies of the report of the committee on the conduct of the war relative to the circumstances attending the attack at Petersburg and the explosion of the mine there in July last, reported in favor of the motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 714) supplemental to the act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims," &c., passed July 4, 1864, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 151) to refer the claim of George Ashley, administrator de bonis non of Samuel Holgate, deceased, back to the Court of Claims, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 370) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better organization of Indian affairs in California," reported it with an amendment.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 384) for the relief of C. F. Johnson, of Alabama, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That the statement of all contracts executed by Hanson A. Risley, agent, since July 4, 1864, which accompanied the report of the Secretary of the Treasury yesterday laid before the Senate, be printed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Oregon having had leave of absence for the rest of the session, I move that the Chair be authorized to fill his place on the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATE GALLERIES.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the order of the Senate of the 31st of December, 1860, in relation to the Senate galleries be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the order?

Mr. MORRILL. Let the resolution lie on the table till to-morrow, and then the Senate can see.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know what the order is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

COMMITTEE ON MINES.

Mr. STEWART. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the 34th rule of the Senate be amended by adding the following as an additional clause, to wit: A Committee on Mines and Mining Interests, to consist of five members.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie upon the table, unless the Senator desires the present action of the Senate upon it.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for present action.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let it lie over under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made it will lie over.

MANUFACTURE OF CAPTURED COTTON.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to offer a resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I should like, before his resolution is called up, to ask the Senate to take up Senate joint resolution No. 85. It is a very important matter in relation to Indian affairs which I think will not occupy more than five minutes of the time of the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. What is it about?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is a resolution in relation to refugee Indians in the Indian Territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts will be read for information, unless, by unanimous consent, the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin be interposed.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be, and are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of the national Government directing that such cotton as may have been captured at Savannah, Georgia, be manufactured into cloth and tents for the use of the soldiers of the Army of the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I desire simply to say in regard to this resolution that I have received a communication from the Quartermaster General of the Army covering estimates of the cloth used in the Army for tents, and making this suggestion; and in order to bring the subject before the Committee on Military Affairs I have offered this resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope that we will not even instruct the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of establishing a vast manufactory for the purposes of manufacturing tents for the Army. The resolution is nothing more nor less than that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is manifest that this resolution will lead to some discussion. I have a bill which, I will state to the Senate, is for putting a little money into the Treasury of the United States. I am sure nobody will object to that; and I move to postpone all other orders for the purpose of considering it. It will take but little time, I am sure. That is the only object I have. [Mr.

DOOLITTLE rose.] I know the Senator from Wisconsin will not object to getting a little money into the Treasury.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If it does not lead to discussion, I will give way to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think nobody will object to it. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 424, to facilitate the collection of certain debts due the United States.

COLLECTION OF POST OFFICE DEBTS.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 424) to facilitate the collection of certain debts due the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the reading of the bill, if I can get the attention of the Senate for one minute, I will state what it is. The object of this bill is to enable the Postmaster General to collect sums due in the rebellious States chiefly, though it applies in terms to any of the States of the Union, by postmasters who, when the rebellion took place, were indebted to the Government, and have since gone into the rebellion or left the country, so that service of process cannot be obtained upon them. I am informed that, at Memphis alone, there is some twenty or thirty thousand dollars due the Government, which the Government could collect if it had any way of proceeding against the property of the defaulting postmaster and his sureties. This bill is introduced for the purpose of authorizing an attachment similar to attachments issued in most of the States against these defaulting officers where service cannot be had upon them. The Committee on the Judiciary have considered it, and unanimously recommend its passage. That is all there is in the bill; and unless there should be some objection to the details—which I hope there will not be—it can be passed at once. I ask that, in the reading of the bill, the amendments of the committee, which are mostly verbal, be acted upon as they are reached in their order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that course will be pursued.

The first amendment was in line eight of section one, to strike out "or" and insert "and," so as to read, "such officer and his sureties."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten of section one, to strike out "or" and insert "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eighteen of section one, to strike out "or" and insert "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section one, line thirty, to strike out "marshals" and insert "marshal;" in line thirty-one to strike out "districts" and insert "district;" and in line thirty-three to strike out "marshals" and insert "marshal."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line three, to strike out "of" and insert "before," so as to read, "twenty days before the return day."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out "ten days," before "notice," in line four of section three, so as to read, "on giving to the district attorney notice of his intention."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out, in lines nine, ten, and eleven of section three, the words, "such jury shall consist of six men, a majority of whom shall decide upon the verdict."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the word "common" before "consent" in line eleven of section three.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line five of section five, to strike out "three" and insert "two," and to strike out "six" and insert "four."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four of section six, after the word "them" to insert "and having knowledge of such notice."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word

"them," in line seven of section six, to insert "and having knowledge as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eleven of section six, to strike out the words "and null," so as to read, "illegal and void."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines seven and eight of section seven, to strike out the words "sued for, conditioned for the full payment of all damages, costs, and expenses adjudged by the court," and in lieu of them to insert, "of the value of the property attached, conditioned for the return of said property, or to answer any judgment which may be rendered by the court in the premises."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, provides, in the first section, that where debts are due from postmasters, mail contractors, or other officers, agents, or employes of the Post Office Department, who are in default or delinquency, a warrant of attachment may issue against all property, possessions, and rights legal, equitable, and contingent, belonging to such officer and his sureties, or either of them, in the following cases: First. When any such officer, agent, or employe, and his sureties, or either them, has, within the meaning of the act of July 17, 1862, chapter one hundred and ninety-five, and the proclamation of the President in pursuance thereof, dated July 25, 1862, participated in, aided, abetted, or countenanced any rebellion against the United States. Second. When such officer, agent, or employe, and his sureties, or either of them, is a non-resident of the district where such officer was appointed, or has departed from such district for the purpose of residing permanently out of such district, or of defrauding the United States, or of avoiding the service of civil process. Third. When such officer or his sureties, or either of them, has conveyed away or is about to convey away his property, or any part thereof, or has removed or is about to remove his property, or any part thereof, from the district wherein the same is situated, with intent to defraud the United States. And where such removal has taken place, certified copies of the warrant may be sent to the marshal of any other district into which the property may have been removed, under which certified copies it shall be lawful for the marshal to seize such property and convey it to some convenient point within the jurisdiction of the court from which the warrant originally issued. Alias warrants may issue upon due application, and the validity of the warrant first issued shall continue until the return day thereof.

The second section provides that application for such warrant may be made by any district attorney or assistant district attorney, or any other person authorized by the Postmaster General, before any judge, or, in his absence, before any clerk of any court of the United States having original jurisdiction of the cause of action. The application is to be made upon an affidavit of the applicant, or some other credible person, stating the existence of either of the grounds of attachment enumerated in the first section, and upon production of legal evidence of the debt. Upon such application, and upon due order of any judge of the court, or, in the absence of any judge, without such order, the clerk is to issue a warrant for the attachment of all the property of any kind belonging to the party or parties specified in the affidavit, which warrant is to be executed with all possible dispatch by the marshal, who is to take the property attached into his custody, and hold it subject to all interlocutory or final orders of the court.

By the third section the party whose property is attached may, at any time within twenty days before the return day of the warrant, on giving to the district attorney notice of his intention, file a plea in abatement, traversing the allegations of the affidavit, or denying the ownership of the property attached in the defendants, or either of them; in which case the court may, upon application of either party, order an immediate trial by jury of the issues raised by the affidavit and plea. But the parties may, by consent, waive a trial by jury, in which case the court shall decide the issues raised by the affidavit and plea. Any party claiming ownership of the property attached and its specific return is to be confined to the remedy afforded by the act, but his right to an action of trespass or other action for damages is not to be impaired by it.

The fourth section provides that when the property attached shall be sold on any interlocutory order of the court, or when it shall be producing any revenue, the money arising from such sale or revenue shall be invested in securities of the United States, under the order of the court, and all accretions shall be held subject to the order of the court.

By the fifth section, immediately upon the execution of the warrant of attachment, the marshal is to cause due publication of such attachment to be made, in the case of absconding debtors or adherents of the rebellion, for two months, and in case of non-residents for four months. Such publication is to be made in some newspaper or newspapers within the district where the property attached is situated, and the details of the publication are to be regulated in each case by the order under which the warrant is issued.

By the sixth section it is provided that after the first publication of the notice of attachment in all the newspapers required, every person indebted to the defendants, or either of them, and having knowledge of such notice, whose property is liable to attachment, and every person having possession of any property belonging to such defendants, or either of them, and having such knowledge, is to account and answer for the amount of such debt, and for the value of such property, and any disposal or attempt to dispose of any such property to the injury of the United States shall be illegal and void. When the person or persons so indebted to or having possession of the property of the defendants, or either of them, shall be known to the district attorney, or the marshal, it shall be the duty of such officer to see that personal notice of such attachment is served upon such persons, as in the cases of garnishees; but the want of such notice shall not invalidate the attachment.

The seventh section declares that upon application of the party whose property has been attached the court, or any judge thereof, may discharge the warrant of attachment as to the property of the applicant; but the applicant is to enter into and execute to the United States a good and sufficient penal bond in double the amount of the value of the property attached, conditioned for the return of the property, or to answer any judgment which may be rendered by the court in the premises, which bond is to be approved by the court, or any judge thereof.

The eighth section prescribes that the fees, costs, and expenses of issuing and serving the warrants of attachment shall be regulated, as far as possible, by the existing laws of the United States and the rules of court made in pursuance thereof. In the case of preliminary trials as to the validity of the attachment or the right of property, clerks' and marshals' fees shall be the same as in ordinary cases, and the docket fee of the district attorney shall be ten dollars.

According to the ninth section this act is not to be construed so as to limit or abridge in any manner such rights of the United States as have accrued or been allowed in any district under the former practice of the United States courts or the adoption of State laws by those courts.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In line six of the first section, to make the bill a little more specific, I move to insert the words "real and personal" after "property."

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not very general now? Does it not say "all property?"

Mr. TRUMBULL. It says "against all property;" but I will state to the Senator from Maryland that a subsequent section, section two, makes it the duty of the marshal to take all property into his possession. As the word "property" is used in both instances I was apprehensive it might be construed by the courts to confine the attachment simply to personal property. Of course the marshal cannot take real property into his own possession, and it is not intended that he should take the actual possession of real estate, and turn the party in possession out of occupancy.

Mr. JOHNSON. There was a provision which looked to his taking possession of real estate in one district and removing it to another, but we altered that, I think.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That of course could only apply to personalty.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly; but the language unaltered would seem to include real as well as personal property.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As to the removal?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir; that is the case in the original bill, as I remember.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That would only apply, as a matter of course, to personal property. The amendment I suggest can do no harm, at any rate. I move to insert the words "real and personal" after the word "property" in the sixth line of the first section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In line seventeen of section two, after the word "attached," I move to insert "if personal," so as to read, "who shall take the property attached, if personal, into his custody."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

REFUGEE INDIANS.

On motion by Mr. DOOLITTLE, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 85) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certain bonds for feeding the refugee Indians.

Mr. HARLAN. Under existing laws, it is the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to report to Congress a statement of the manner in which the funds have been expended for the preceding year in support of these refugee Indians. Some of these accounts have been sent in and some have not been. The accounts are not here for the quarter ending the 1st of December last. I have called at the office for the purpose of seeing them, and have been informed that they are in the hands of clerks, going through the process of being copied. Before this resolution is acted on, I should prefer to see those accounts; they will be here in a few days. I therefore suggest to the chairman of the committee that it would be as well to let the joint resolution go over until that statement comes in; and I move that its further consideration be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not feel inclined to oppose the motion of my honorable friend from Iowa. I desire myself to see these accounts, although I am perfectly well satisfied that the expenditures will not exceed the amount which is called for in this resolution. I have no objection to its going over until to-morrow.

Mr. HARLAN. I prefer to take that course. I believe these accounts will be in a few days and we shall be able to look them over. Probably I shall then have no objection to the passage of the resolution.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL CENSUS REPORT.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask consent of the Senate to take from the table a resolution which was reported from the Committee on Agriculture, for printing two thousand copies of a portion of the Census Report. It is important that it should be passed.

Mr. MORRILL. I notice that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] who is not now in his seat, seemed to take an interest in that subject, and I suppose the Senator does not desire to take it up in his absence.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have the consent of the Senator to whom the Senator from Maine alludes, to the passage of this resolution, and am authorized by him to state that the expense of this publication will be very slight indeed, only about forty-six hundred dollars.

Mr. COLLAMER. Four thousand six hundred dollars!

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to state, for the benefit of the Senator from Vermont, that the suggestion he made will not answer the purpose, to deduct one volume from the three furnished to us; that would destroy the usefulness of the three, and the persons to whom he would send one volume would at once want the whole three volumes. It would affect us very materially.

Mr. COLLAMER. That will be the same with every man to whom this is sent; he will want the other volumes.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. But it does not destroy our volumes.

Mr. COLLAMER. The result will be that every man who receives this volume, a quarto volume, through the Commissioner of Agriculture, will of course be importunate to have the other volumes to fill up the sets. I do not believe this is the end.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. But the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont was that he would have one volume extracted from a set. It cannot be done in the way he suggested.

Mr. COLLAMER. Every man who receives this receives a single volume, a broken set, and will want the others.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. This is demanded by the Commissioner, who seems to be very anxious about it. I should like to have the ear of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN.] This is the resolution introduced by him to furnish to the Commissioner of Agriculture two thousand copies of the agricultural portion of the Census Report.

Mr. HARLAN. I understand that the Commissioner of Agriculture desires to use these volumes to distribute to the correspondents with the office. He has several thousand, I think, scattered all over the country, from whom he gains information, statistics, and knowledge of the condition of the crops; and he believes that the possession of these books by those correspondents would enable them to correspond more satisfactorily, and enable him to discharge his duties more sensibly. I think if the cost will be no more than the Senator from Kansas states, it ought to be appropriated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to take up for consideration the resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was considered, as follows:

Resolved, That two thousand copies of the agricultural part of the Census Report for 1860 be printed for the use of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I would like now to have the opinion of the Senator from Rhode Island, whom I see in his seat.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think this resolution ought to pass. I think the documents ought to be given to the Commissioner of Agriculture. The expense will be less than I thought it would be when I first objected. It will cost $4,600 for the printing in the style in which the book is now printed; but it is unnecessary to do that. It can be done for about $3,500.

The resolution was agreed to.

SWAMP LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the provisions of the act "granting swamp and overflowed land to certain States" to the swamp and overflowed lands in the State of Kansas, and to report by bill or otherwise.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866; the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out the following proviso in lines nine hundred and fifty, nine hundred and fifty-one, nine hundred and fifty-two, and nine hundred and fifty-three:

Provided, That no further expenditures shall be made for the experimental system of hydrostatic printing by the Treasury Department until such experiments shall have been definitely authorized by law, and a distinct appropriation made therefor.

Mr. SHERMAN. The debate yesterday took a much wider range than it seems to me it ought to have done, considering the question before the Senate. We are not now discussing whether the guards in the Treasury Department are sufficient for the protection of the Government against fraud. That question is now before the Committee on Finance, and is being investigated, so far as our time will allow. There are other bills that will bring that question directly before the Senate before the close of the present session. The only purpose of this proviso, on the part of the House of Representatives, if I understand it, was to stop the use of the hydrostatic machines. Perhaps the language of the proviso is not broad enough to cover their purpose; but I have read the debate in the House, and it is manifest that the purpose of the mover of this proviso was to stop the use of the hydrostatic presses; and the effect will be, if this proviso is adopted, to stop their use. It is admitted on all hands that some of these presses are defective; some of them have been changed, and are now in good condition, and are working daily to the satisfaction of the Department and the friends of the machines, and others of them need repairs. If the Department is forbidden by this provision from making changes in the machines now on hand; from adopting new improvements; from strengthening these machines, although improvements may promise perfection, this provision will cut off all such improvements.

Now, it seems to me that a few facts ought to settle the controversy in this matter. We know that at great expense the Government has established a Printing Bureau in the Treasury Department. No one who has examined it would be willing to place ourselves again at the mercy of the bank-note companies in the country. It is proved very clearly, by the documents that have been laid on our tables, that the saving in the cost of printing in the Treasury Department is very large, counting even all that may be said about the expenditures on these and all other experiments.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator be kind enough to refer me to that document?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can. The facts will be found in the reports which have been made.

Mr. GRIMES. What reports?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Secretary of the Treasury, at the last session of Congress, made a report on that subject which I think is satisfactory; at any rate it is sufficient for me to say now that there is no proposition before Congress to abolish the printing in the Treasury Department. Every gentleman who has gone from either House of Congress to investigate this subject is satisfied that it would not be wise to stop the printing in the Treasury Department, and I believe no proposition is now pending to change it. It has been organized under the law, and is now being conducted with great success.

In printing notes they have adopted two forms of printing; one is called the wet-press printing, and the other the dry-press printing. Both are being now daily practiced; both are believed to be successful. The friends of one system claim that it is the best, the friends of the other system that it is the best. Now, the question is, whether Congress, with its limited knowledge, will come in and say by law that the officers charged with the execution of the law shall not use a particular kind of machine, or shall not perfect that machine in the way they have been doing. It seems to me that the statement of the proposition is sufficient of itself to induce the Senate to vote against this proviso. As long as we carry on the system of printing notes in the Treasury Department improvements will constantly be made.

I may strengthen this position by saying that not only was the former Secretary of the Treasury Department, now the Chief Justice, in favor of this system, which was established under his supervision, but the present Secretary who is there, and who must be familiar with all the facts connected with it so far as a gentleman of the legal profession can be with practical matters like this, believes that the system is a success. Three members of the Senate Committee on Finance, who certainly were not prejudiced in favor of this mode of printing, went there and examined it with a view to report to the Finance Committee on the subject, and they unanimously agreed that it would be unwise to discontinue the system. It is true some believe it is a success on one point and some on another, but they unanimously agree that the printing should be continued in the Treasury Department.

Under these circumstances, for the Senate and House of Representatives to say by law that the Secretary of the Treasury shall not pursue these experiments, shall not continue this system of printing, it seems to me is rather peculiar legislation. I will not now be led into the discussion of yesterday whether the protections are sufficient. This is not the question before the Senate. The only question now is whether the Senate will say that the Secretary shall not print by the hydrostatic process, or shall not improve on the present system now going on in that Department. I say it will be unwise in Congress to take such action. We had better leave it to the officers who have charge of this service, allow them to make all the improvements they can, allow them to adopt that which is best, to experiment as much as they choose as to the mode and printing, and hold them responsible for the consequences.

Mr. GRIMES. I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Finance that this whole question is in a nut-shell. I agree with him, too, that the question which is now before us is not as to whether there are proper checks and guards in the Currency Bureau; although I am satisfied, from the statement of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] combined with the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] taken in connection with the report that has been laid on our tables, purporting to be the report made by Mr. Clark, the chief of this particular bureau, who has charge of the printing, and purporting to have been submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, that there are not proper guards and balances. But, sir, I am alarmed—I am alarmed as one who is interested in the currency of this country—when I see that the man who has the charge of that bureau is still grasping after and attempting to secure the printing of the national bank currency.

Mr. President, let us look at the history of this matter a little. It seems that the Secretary of the Treasury preceding the present one commenced some experiments in the Bureau of Printing—which Congress, I suppose, authorized him to establish—in regard to hydrostatic printing. I think there are two or three things that are not controverted here between the Senators who are members of the sub-committee of the Committee on Finance. The first of these is that there has been at least $300,000 expended in these experiments. I understood the Senator from Missouri to say so. Am I correct or am I wrong?

Mr. HENDERSON. I cannot state the precise amount, but I suppose it is between two and three hundred thousand dollars—somewhere in that neighborhood. It certainly must be, if we take into consideration the hydrostatic presses that have been furnished.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I am correct in that assertion.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Iowa does not wish to misunderstand the matter.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed that the whole cost of experiments in the Treasury Department in regard to printing, of all forms, will not exceed $250,000, and the entire expense of the hydrostatic printing is less than $100,000, including all the repairs and all the machines. We have the bills before us showing that fact.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand as a further fact that as a result of these experiments four patents have been obtained in the names of Mr. Clark and Mr. Stewart Gwynne, or one of them, for inventions and improvements that have been made in the Treasury Department with our money with which they have been experimenting. I understand that to be a fact asserted by the Senator from Missouri. Am I right about that?

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe that there have been four caveats filed. I so understand. I do not know whether all the patents have been issued or not.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand it further to be a fact that the amount of printing that has been done by these hydrostatic presses up to this time does not exceed a quarter of a million of dollars.

Mr. HENDERSON. I so understand.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the amount of hydrostatic printing on the paper such as was exhibited here yesterday by the Senator from New Hampshire does not exceed a quarter of a million of dollars.

Mr. CLARK. On that particular paper.

Mr. HENDERSON. On any paper whatever. I do not understand that the hydrostatic presses have been in operation any great time.

Mr. CLARK. They have printed over two millions, as you will find by examining the figures.

Mr. HENDERSON. Two millions of currency or of bonds and currency?

Mr. CLARK. Of both.

Mr. HENDERSON. Ah! that may be. I spoke of currency.

Mr. GRIMES. I should presume there had been more than two millions of bonds and currency both; but that is not what the Senator from New Hampshire based his argument upon yesterday.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is but just to say that the hydrostatic presses have been in operation printing the fractional currency, and a great many impressions make but a small amount of money.

Mr. GRIMES. I am astonished that there has not been more than two millions of our bonds and currency in circulation, of one kind and another, printed by the hydrostatic presses during the whole time we have been running those presses.

Mr. CLARK. That is only six months.

Mr. GRIMES. It is more than six months ago since the House of Representatives instituted their investigations into this very subject of hydrostatic presses. The House of Representatives have seen fit to provide as a proviso to this appropriation that no more money shall be expended upon these experiments. They want to stop them where they are. They do not want our money to be used by either Mr. Gwynne or Mr. Clark, or both of them, in perfecting patents by which they are going to fill their own pockets. They are content to leave the Secretary of the Treasury to do his printing as he has done it. If he choose to continue the use of these hydrostatic presses, he has a right to do it under this clause. The proviso is simply that no more money shall be expended in experiments; and I agree with the House. I think it is time we stopped them. I think the proviso was properly put on by the House of Representatives, and I am in favor of maintaining it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have been astonished that this subject should have excited so much debate. It seems to me to be a very plain one. Congress has heretofore decided that the Secretary of the Treasury should exercise his own pleasure whether the currency shall be printed in the Department or by contract. It is not proposed to take away from him that discretion. Then, if the work is to be done in the Department, it is not merely an administrative question how it shall be done, whether upon one kind of press or another, whether upon this sort of paper or that. Is that a question Congress can decide? It seems to me that all Congress can do is to authorize the issue of securities of a particular description, and leave it as an administrative question to the head of the Department as to the manner in which that shall be done. I cannot see that Congress could safely undertake to say whether the printing shall be done in one style or in another. For myself I have not this information which would enable me to give an intelligent vote on a question of that kind. I shall certainly support the amendment of the committee, as I understand that it is in accordance with the views of the Department.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate, but I wish to correct some impressions that I think are wrong in the minds of Senators; and first, in regard to the amount that has been expended in the Treasury for the printing of the currency altogether. It was asserted here yesterday, certainly, by Senators around me, if not in the debate, in such a way as to become known, that there had been two or three millions expended in this printing. The whole amount is one million fifty-four thousand and some hundreds of dollars, as shown by the books, and not one hundred thousand dollars has been expended in this hydrostatic method. About fifteen millions in amount have been printed by the ordinary printing presses, and two millions by the hydrostatic presses, for the reason that the ordinary presses have been running a year and a half, and only fifteen hydrostatic presses for six months. We have seventy-two of them, and the rest have not been running yet; there are only fifteen running now; but it is contemplated to run about double the number we are now running, next week. I think it can be clearly shown that there is a great saving to the Government. We have already paid to the bank-note companies of New York for the work they have done, over two million dollars, they retaining the plates, &c., while we in the Treasury Department have done our own work, and expended a little over a million, and have printed a vast amount of currency.

Mr. JOHNSON. How much was issued by the bank-note companies?

Mr. CLARK. I have not the means of stating, because it does not appear here. I have here the official report of Mr. Clark to the Secretary of the Treasury, giving these figures, and they can be verified by the books of the companies. The report says:

"The quantity and amount of work upon the currency and securities in this division, from the date of its organization to the 1st of October, 1864, is properly divisible into three classes, namely:

"First. Currency and securities, printed wholly or in part by the New York bank-note companies, and finished in this division. These aggregate 12,768,214 sheets, and amount to $629,305,900."

There are certain securities that are printed in part in New York, and then come here unfinished and are finished here.

"Second. Currency and securities printed and finished in this division. These aggregate 6,693,257 sheets, and amount to $1,636,281,239.

"Third. Securities which have been delivered to this division by the Treasurer of the United States and the Comptroller of the Currency, for printing indorsements and certificates thereon. These aggregate 20,022 sheets, and amount to $52,375,350."

I will not take up the time of the Senate to go over and show these various kinds; I will simply turn the attention of the Senate to what was the effect of this printing upon the postal and fractional currency. Senators will bear in mind that some time ago we printed postal currency, as it was called, and now we print what is called fractional currency, being about the same in size and printed in the same way. The postal currency was printed by the bank-note companies, the fractional currency is printed in the Department.

The comparative cost of fractional currency and postal currency, computed at the prices actually paid, is—

	Fractional.	Postal.
Of 50 cent pieces per $1,000.....	$1 59	$6 97
Of 25 " " " " " " " " " "	3 08	13 94
Of 10 " " " " " " " " " "	6 71	28 87
Of 5 " " " " " " " " " "	13 43	55 75
	$24 81	$105 53

The "Treasurer's assortment" of $50,000, would cost—
Of postal currency.....$1,128 51
Of fractional currency.....262 61

Saving on each $50,000.....$865 90

Now, Mr. President, I have to say that a certain amount of printing done in New York, after it was finished cost more to bring it here and deliver it to the Treasury, than it did to print it here, the express charges were so great. Let me call attention to that point:

"The cost of producing issues in New York, instead of in the Treasury, is further augmented by the cost of transmission from New York to Washington of the printing executed by the bank-note companies. The charges for transmission to the Government, though reported to be much less than the charges to individuals for like service, still aggregate a large amount; and on some of the issues the cost of transmission alone exceeds the entire cost of producing in the Treasury. For instance, the charge for transmitting the registered bonds from New York to Washington is fifteen cents for each $1,000 transmitted. Two packages of registered bonds were recently delivered to this division, printed in New York and transmitted by express, marked to contain $32,000,000. Each of these packages could have been carried by hand. The contract price of transmission would be $4,800. The same amount of this issue of the same denominations could have been printed in the Treasury for $110."

I may be permitted here, perhaps, by the indulgence of the Senate, to say one word in regard to the security of this matter. I will not undertake to say, because I have not made the examination sufficiently to know, that this system in the Treasury is entirely secure, but I venture to say that it is much surer than the method of printing in New York. Take an instance which is here given:

"That the check upon production, established by these companies for their own protection, is insufficient, is proven by two marked occurrences in this division. In one case, one of the New York companies sent to me a package containing one thousand more impressions—amounting to $8,000—than was marked upon the package or included in the invoice. I immediately notified the proper officers of the company of its receipt. They at first denied the sending of the excess. Even after the sheets were converted into lawful money, and I had delivered the amount to the Treasurer of the United States and obtained his receipt therefor, they still refused to admit the sending of the excess. It was not until such excessive sending was proven upon them by the consecutiveness of numbers that they reluctantly admitted the error, and rendered a bill for the printing."

Mr. GRIMES. What company in New York was that?

Mr. CLARK. It does not specify which one.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator is going to read against one of the New York companies charges of that kind on the authority of Mr. Clark's report, that does not come here vouched even by his chief, the Secretary of the Treasury, I think he ought at least to tell us which one of the New York companies it was, so that we might have the opportunity to contradict it.

Mr. CLARK. I differ entirely from the Senator from Iowa. There may be a good reason why I should not specify the company.

Mr. GRIMES. But there is a good reason why Clark should.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know any good reason why Mr. Clark should, and I do not think Mr. Clark has the same feeling toward the New York companies that they seem to have in regard to him. He does not desire to find fault with any one company, nor do I, but to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that such things have been done, without charging it upon this or that person, but only to show the system. That is all.

"Within a few days $16,000,000 of the same bonds were received in one package, which could be carried by hand. The contract price of transmission was $2,400. The cost of printing these in the Treasury would have been but sixty-three dollars."

As I said before, we have paid these bank-note companies in New York over two million dollars. I do not find any fault with the companies; I am only discussing the cost of the two systems. The bank-note companies have done over twenty million dollars of work in securities and currency, as shown by this report, and the amount which we have expended in the Treasury for the same purpose, including machinery, paper, and everything, the experiment of making paper and all, a little over a million dollars.

Mr. GRIMES. If that be so, I would inquire how this bill happens to make appropriations to the extent of $3,775,000 for this very bureau.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can answer that question readily. The Senator from Iowa leaps at conclusions too rapidly. He has lumped together three items amounting to three million dollars and over. The first item covers all the expenses of the national loans, the advertising, the printing of notes, the amount paid to banks, &c., as agents. The second item, $1,100,000, is solely for the Internal Revenue Bureau, for procuring dies, stamps, adhesive stamps, paper, printing forms and regulations for the internal revenue. Not one dollar of it ever goes into the Printing Bureau of the Treasury Department. So of the next item. The whole amount of this money which is paid for the Printing Bureau is only a small fraction of the $2,000,000 appropriated in the first clause, and that appropriation of $2,000,000 covers all the expenses of national loans. The second item, as I have said, is entirely paid out by the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Mr. GRIMES. It is the fault, then, of the committees who manufactured the bill originally, if they put it under the wrong head.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. GRIMES. These items are not put under the head of internal revenue, or under anything that relates to any other subject than "the Independent Treasury" and the manufacture of money.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator in that does not do justice to the other House, which framed this bill. He is talking at random. The second item is:

For procuring dies, stamps, adhesive stamps, paper, printing forms and regulations, advertising, and other expenses of carrying into effect the act of June 30, 1864.

That is the act to provide internal revenue.

Mr. GRIMES. Look back to page 37 and see what head you have got your items under.

Mr. SHERMAN. That head only applies to the items relating to the sub-Treasury. These are all independent items.

Mr. GRIMES. That head applies to every item until you get down to "commissioners of direct taxes in insurrectionary districts," only four lines after the item to which the Senator refers. That is the next general head after the one relative to the expenses of the sub-Treasury. If I jumped the stile before I reached it, it is simply because the item was not included by the authors of the bill under the heading to which it properly belonged.

Mr. SHERMAN. Even that criticism is not well taken. This bill is divided into several heads, but there are many items scattered through the bill that do not relate to the particular heads. This is the ordinary form and mode in which these bills have come to us for years from the House of Representatives. These three items in regard to printing, stamps, &c., are all grouped together. They relate to all the different Departments of the Government.

Mr. CLARK. There was some confusion in the debate yesterday in regard to the distinctive paper of the Treasury Department, whether it could be printed both wet and dry. I was under the impression that it might be printed both ways, but on inquiry I find that the fractional currency paper is only to be printed dry. I stated yesterday that in photographing this fractional currency paper the membranous part of it photographed black. I hold in my hand a specimen of the fractional note paper which has been photographed, and Senators by looking at it will see that the result of photographing is to cover the paper all over with black marks like ink marks.

I have here a great variety of this printing from the Treasury Department, which I obtained by giving my receipt for it, with my bond of honor that it should be returned. I shall not allow anybody to take it from my desk, but if anybody desires to see it I will carry it into the Vice President's room and be happy to show it to any one, for I am answerable that it shall go back to the Treasury, it being charged to me, and the sheets being all imperfect. There is not one of them that can be used in its present condition, but I shall be happy to show them to any Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. I would inquire of the honorable Senator if he is the only honest Senator, in the judgment of the Treasury Department, in this body.

Mr. CLARK. Not by any means; but suppose I should let these sheets wander about among the Senators; Senators, while being entirely honest, might not think of bringing them back, or somebody might take them from them, so that I could not find them. I beg the Senator's pardon if he infers from anything I said that I would not trust them with a Senator.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

Mr. COWAN. On giving bond.

Mr. CLARK. I will let any Senator have a specimen without a bond, if he will be responsible to bring it to me again.

Now, Mr. President, I shall conclude what I have to say at this time—I am prepared to go further into the matter—by sending to the Chair a letter from the former Secretary of the Treasury to Mr. Clark, dated the 6th of February, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read the following letter:

WASHINGTON, February 6, 1865.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with much interest, and all the care my duties allowed, your report to Secretary Fessenden on the operations of your division of the National Currency Bureau. I am glad you have prepared this complete vindication of the system of bond and note engraving, printing, and preparation for issue in the Treasury Department. Strange that a system which saves millions of dollars should need any.

Perhaps no one can appreciate your services as I do; for, as I authorized the system and put on you the work of organization and practical operation, I naturally observed your action with much anxiety. I saw what difficulties you encountered and overcame, and predictions of failure and upbraidings both of motive and conduct which hardly any other man could or would have endured. My own faith at times almost entirely gave way. Nothing enabled me to persevere but your perseverance.

Looking back now, and seeing what great benefits have been secured to our country, I greatly rejoice that, though sometimes much discouraged, I did not give up. Not many, it is true, will ever understand what has been done; but the work is there, and a few know it.

The greatest part—by far the greatest part—is yours, and your best reward is consciousness. But I trust that consciousness will not be your only reward. I still hope that your services will be suitably acknowledged by Congress and the Government. Were I yet Secretary you should at least have as much honor as a Secretary's report can give.

Sincerely your friend,

S. P. CHASE.

SPENCER M. CLARK, Inq., Chief First Division National Currency Bureau, Treasury Department.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand there is now on the table a message from the President in answer to a resolution passed by the Senate the other day relating to certain conference with rebels. I ask that the present measure be informally laid aside, and that the message be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The business before the Senate can be laid aside only by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection; it will be laid aside, informally, and the message read.

CONFERENCES WITH REBELS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, requesting information concerning recent conversations or communications with insurgents under executive sanction, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, to whom the resolution was referred.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

FEBRUARY 10, 1865.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, February 10, 1865.

To the President:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate of the 8th instant, requesting "the President of the United States, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, to furnish to the Senate any information in his possession concerning recent conversations or communications with certain rebels, said to have been under executive sanction, including communications with the rebel Jefferson Davis, and any correspondence relating thereto," has the honor to report that the Senate may properly be referred to a special message of the President bearing upon the subject of the resolution and transmitted to the House this day. Appended to this report is a copy of an instruction which has been addressed to Charles Francis Adams, Esq., envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London, and which is the only correspondence found in this Department touching the subject referred to in the resolution.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON CITY, February 7, 1865.

SIR: It is a truism that in times of peace there are always instigators of war. So soon as war begins, there are citizens who impetuously demand negotiations for peace. The advocates of war, after an agitation, longer or shorter, generally gain their fearful end, though the war declared is not infrequently unnecessary and unwise. So peace agitators in time of war ultimately bring about an abandonment of the conflict, sometimes without securing the advantages which were originally expected from the conflict.

The agitators for war in time of peace, and for peace in time of war, are not necessarily, or perhaps ordinarily, unpatriotic in their purposes or motives. Results alone determine whether they are wise or unwise. The treaty of peace concluded at Gaudalope Hidalgo was secured by an irregular negotiator under the ban of the Government. Some of the efforts which have been made to bring about negotiations, with a view to end our civil war, are known to the whole world, because they have employed foreign as well as domestic agents. Others, with whom you have had to deal confidentially, are known to yourself; although they have not publicly transpired. Other efforts have occurred here which are known only to the persons actually moving in them and to this Government. I am now to give for your information an account of an affair of the same general character, which recently received much attention here, and which doubtless will excite inquiry abroad.

A few days ago, Francis P. Blair, Esq., of Maryland, obtained from the President a simple leave to pass through our military lines, without definite views known to the Government. Mr. Blair visited Richmond, and on his return he showed to the President a letter which Jefferson Davis had written to Mr. Blair, in which Davis wrote that Mr. Blair was at liberty to say to President Lincoln that Davis was now, as he always had been, willing to send commissioners if assured they would be received, or to receive any that should be sent; that he was not disposed to find obstacles in forms. He would send commissioners to confer with the President with a view to a restoration of peace between the two countries if he could be assured they would be received. The President thereupon, on the 18th of January, addressed a note to Mr. Blair, in which the President, after acknowledging that he had read the note of Mr. Davis, said that he was, in, and always should be, willing to receive any agents that Mr. Davis or any other influential person, now actually resisting the authority of the Government, might send to confer informally with the President with a view to the restoration of peace to the people of our one common country. Mr. Blair visited Richmond with this letter, and then again came back to Washington.

On the 29th [ultimo] we were advised from the camp of Lieutenant General Grant that Alexander H. Stephens, R. M. Hunter, and John A. Campbell were applying for leave to pass through the lines to Washington as peace commissioners to confer with the President. They were permitted by the Lieutenant General to come to his headquarters to await there the decision of the President. Major Eckert was sent down to meet the party from Richmond at General Grant's headquarters. The major was directed to deliver to them a copy of the President's letter to Mr. Blair, with a note to be addressed to them and signed by the major, in which they were directly informed that if they should be allowed to pass our lines they would be understood as coming for an informal conference upon the basis of the aforementioned letter of the 18th of January to Mr. Blair. If they should express their assent to this condition in writing, then Major Eckert was directed to give them safe conduct to Fortress Monroe, where a person coming from the President would meet them. It being thought probable, from a report of their conversation with Lieutenant General Grant, that the Richmond party would in the manner prescribed accept the condition mentioned, the Secretary of State was charged by the President with the duty of representing this Government in the expected informal conference. The Secretary arrived at Fortress Monroe in the night of the 1st day of February. Major Eckert met him in the morning of the 2d of February with the information that the persons who had come from Richmond had not accepted in writing the condition upon which he was allowed to give them conduct to Fortress Monroe. The major had given the same information by telegraph to the President at Washington. On receiving this information the President prepared a telegram directing the Secretary to return to Washington. The Secretary was preparing at the same moment to so return, without waiting for instructions from the President. But at this juncture Lieutenant General Grant telegraphed to the Secretary of War, as well as to the Secretary of State, that the party from Richmond had reconsidered and accepted the conditions tendered them through Major Eckert; and General Grant urgently advised the President to confer in person with the Richmond party. Under these circumstances the Secretary, by the President's direction, remained at Fortress Monroe, and the President joined him there on the night of the 2d of February. The Richmond party was brought down the James river in a United States steam transport during the day, and the transport was anchored in Hampton Roads.

On the morning of the 3d, the President, attended by the Secretary, received Messrs. Stephens, Hunter, and Campbell on board the United States steam transport River Queen, in Hampton Roads. The conference was altogether informal. There was no attendance of secretaries, clerks, or other witnesses. Nothing was written or read. The conversation, although earnest and free, was calm and courteous and kind on both sides. The Richmond party approached the discussion rather indirectly, and at no time did they either make categorical demands, or tender formal stipulations or absolute refusals. Nevertheless, during the conference, which lasted four hours, the several points at issue between the Government and the insurgents were distinctly raised, and discussed fully, intelligently, and in an amicable spirit. What the insurgent party seemed chiefly to favor was a postponement of the question of separation, upon which the war is waged, and a mutual direction of efforts of the Government, as well as those of the insurgents, to some extrinsic policy or scheme for a season, during which passions might be expected to subside, and the armies be reduced, and trade and intercourse between the people of both sections resumed. It was suggested by them that through such postponement we might now have immediate peace, with some not very certain prospect of an ultimate satisfactory adjustment of political relations between this Government and the States, section, and people now engaged in conflict with it.

This suggestion, though deliberately considered, was nevertheless regarded by the President as one of armistice or truce, and he announced that we can agree to no cessation or suspension of hostilities except on the basis of the disbandment of the insurgent forces and the restoration of the national authority throughout all the States in the Union. Collaterally, and in subordination to the proposition which was thus announced, the anti-slavery policy of the United States was reviewed in all its bearings, and the President announced that he must not be expected to depart from the positions he had heretofore assumed in his proclamation of emancipation and other documents as these positions were reiterated in his last annual message. It was further declared by the President that the complete restoration of the national authority everywhere was an indispensable condition of any assent on our part to whatever form of peace might be proposed. The President assured the other party that while he must adhere to these positions, he would be prepared, so far as power is lodged with the Executive, to exercise liberality. Its power, however, is limited by the Constitution; and when peace shall be made Congress must necessarily act in regard to appropriations of money and to the admission of representatives from the insurrectionary States. The Richmond party were then informed that Congress had on the 31st ultimo adopted by a constitutional majority a joint resolution submitting to the several States the proposition to abolish slavery throughout the Union; and that there is every reason to expect that it will be soon accepted by three fourths of the States, so as to become a part of the national organic law.

The conference came to an end by mutual acquiescence without producing any agreement of views upon the several matters discussed, or any of them. Nevertheless it is perhaps of some importance that we have been able to submit our opinions and views directly to prominent insurgents, and to hear them in answer, in a courteous and not unfriendly manner.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Regarding that message as the most important one that has ever been delivered to the Senate of the United States, I move that it be referred to a select committee of five members of this body, with leave to report in writing.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me that motion had better lie over.

Mr. SUMNER. I think it will be enough if we order the message to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that it lie on the table, and be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to give notice that I shall make the motion I have indicated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless objected to, the message will be laid on the table and printed for the use of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Does the Chair decide that my motion is out of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not so decide. The motion to lay upon the table took precedence of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. My motion is considered, then, as entered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to lay upon the table took precedence of it, and has been agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (S. No. 112) for the relief of the heirs of Almond D. Fisk.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 145) for the relief of Major McFarland, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, which thereupon received the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 431) for the relief of Solomon Wadsworth; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 106) providing for the compilation of a Congressional Directory at each session.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 145) for the relief of Major McFarland, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1866, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, on page 39, line nine hundred and forty-nine, after the word "dollars" to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That no further expenditures shall be made for the experimental system of hydrostatic printing by the Treasury Department until such experiments shall have been definitely authorized by law, and a distinct appropriation made therefor.

Mr. GRIMES. I think it very desirable that we should have accurate information on this subject, and therefore I want to draw a little more from the Senator from New Hampshire, who has investigated the subject. I want to know whether the Senator from New Hampshire includes in his statement with regard to the expense of printing the expense of the clerical force in the bureau?

Mr. CLARK. It includes everything. I have the figures here:

"The payment and expenses of the division from the day it was first started until the 27th day of June, 1864, was reported to Congress by my predecessor on the latter date, and amounted to $669,075 78. This report was printed, and will be found on page 45 of the report of the special committee of the first session of the present Congress. The payments and expenses since that period have been $394,921 27."

If the Senator will add these sums together, I think he will find them to amount to $1,054,937 05. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have another amendment to offer on this subject as a separate and distinct amendment. It is to insert on page 39, line nine hundred and forty-nine, after the word "dollars" the following proviso:

Provided, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to examine and adjust the accounts of Stewart Gwynne for printing presses, machinery, material, and labor furnished and supplied to the Treasury Department, and for expenditures under the authority of the Secretary, and to report to him such sum as may be equitably due said Gwynne: Provided further, That for items furnished or supplied under contract no greater sum than the contract price shall be allowed: And provided further, That before any payment shall be made, the said Stewart Gwynne shall, in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, fully convey and secure to the United States the right to use said presses, and any additional number thereof, with their machinery and future improvements, in the Treasury building or any other buildings directed by the Secretary for any and all printing the Government may desire for its own use and purposes.

Mr. GRIMES. I raise the point of order that I raised yesterday, that this amendment makes provision for the payment of a private claim supposed to be held by Stewart Gwynne against the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. The point of order is not well taken, because the amendment does not make provision for a payment. It does not direct the payment, nor even an award.

I wish to say in regard to this amendment that I offer it really for the protection and at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no particular desire that the amendment be adopted. I do not think it is susceptible to the objection made by the honorable Senator; nor do I see any objection to it. The amendment does not make an appropriation. It does not direct the money to be paid out of this fund. It simply restricts and limits the power of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury may now pay Stewart Gwynne, or anybody else, for work done in this Printing Bureau out of the general fund; but this amendment provides that before he shall pay it the account shall pass through the surveillance of the proper officers of the Treasury Department, and that the Secretary shall not pay it until Stewart Gwynne shall execute a proper release of his patent; so that it is really a restriction of the power of the Secretary to pay this money which he can pay under the law. The amendment itself does not direct the Secretary to pay it, nor does it even authorize the Secretary to pay the money. That he can do under the general provisions of law under the appropriation as it now stands. The Secretary simply desires this amendment so that he may send this matter to the proper accounting officers and have it properly investigated and have the records kept there, and that he may demand of Stewart Gwynne a proper release to the Government of the patents, which are really inventions made by officers of the Government or agents of the Government in the Treasury building. It therefore limits the power of the Secretary, instead of extending it. Nor is the amendment for the benefit of Stewart Gwynne; it is rather for the benefit and protection of the Secretary and for the protection of the Treasury. I do not care myself anything about the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I only raise this point of order that we may have it settled hereafter for my own government and the government of the Senate. I think the amendment is manifestly within the rules. It directs that the Secretary of the Treasury shall examine these accounts—and then there is a negative pregnant: he shall not pay unless certain things are done; which is just as much as to say he shall pay if those things are done. It is a parliamentary question, which I am willing to submit to the decision of the Chair; and I shall be satisfied with the decision of the Senate, let it be whatever it may. I shall know hereafter how to draft amendments; that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) Upon the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio the Senator from Iowa raises a point of order that it is to pay a private claim, and under the rules of the Senate an amendment cannot be made upon an appropriation bill to pay a private claim. The Chair will submit the question of order for the decision of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Presiding Officer will decide the question. It is the duty of the Presiding Officer to decide it. I shall be perfectly satisfied, whichever way he decides it; and I think the Senator from Iowa will be too.

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it of sufficient importance to take the sense of the Senate upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the right of the Chair to submit the question to the Senate. The Chair would rather not decide a question of this sort, being of the impression that the amendment on its face is to pay a private claim. It may, however, be to pay a private claim under an existing law; and if it be to pay a private claim under an existing law it is not objectionable. The Chair is not advised whether there is an existing law which would authorize the payment, and therefore is disposed to submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. It occurred to me when this matter was before the Senate yesterday that this amendment was in the nature of a restriction or limitation. It is certainly not an appropriation, and, technically speaking, it does not come within the rule. It simply provides the manner in which payment either shall or shall not be made, and in that view of the case I was very clear that the amendment as submitted by the Committee on Finance was certainly in order, and not against the 30th rule of the Senate.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to state that, as I understand it, the only question now before us is whether the Secretary of the Treasury had the authority under any preceding law to authorize this sort of work to be done in the Treasury Department. I cannot have any doubt about that. He had an ample authority to cause these notes to be printed, and to be printed in the Treasury Department. I do not doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury had authority to make these experiments upon these hydrostatic presses. The propriety, the policy, the expediency of so doing are altogether different questions. Whether the Secretary of the Treasury did right or not is another question. Whether he could not have saved money by letting the hydrostatic presses alone, and printing upon the old style of press, is quite a different thing from the one that is now before us. The only question is whether he had authority to do this thing. I think we cannot avoid paying for these presses, because this individual, Gwynne, was authorized to put them there. If the Secretary of the Treasury had the power to make the contract, he having made the contract or authorized it, we are under obligations to pay for them, and I think justice would require that we should pay for them. I do not regard it as settling a private claim. I think the authority existed by law in the Secretary to do this work. I may be mistaken, and viewing it in that light I cannot but agree and consent to the payment of the claim.

Mr. GRIMES. This is precisely such a claim as we are referring every day to the Court of Claims. There is not a case that has come before the Senate during this session that is not in some way or other connected with or based upon some law. A man says that by the authority of law somebody has entered into a contract with him, and that contract has not been complied with; and we send his case to the Court of Claims. There is not any doubt, I suppose, but what the Secretary of the Treasury had, under a general appropriation bill, authority generally to make certain printing, and under that authority he has gone and contracted, or authorized somebody to contract, with Stewart Gwynne for certain hydrostatic presses, which the Government has been using; but is that the kind of a law upon which a claim is to be based that does not come within the rule of the Senate? I understand that that rule applies to a case like this: that where there is a positive, unqualified law specifying the amount that is due to a man, it is competent for us to insert it upon an appropriation bill; but I apprehend the chairman of the Committee on Claims has not got a case in his possession to-day referred to the Committee on Claims that is not based just as much on a law, or a contract with the Government, expressed or implied, as this claim. As I said before, I am not particular as to how the Senate decide the question. It is a precedent that is to be followed during the balance of this session; that is all.

As to its not being an appropriation, as suggested by the Senator, there is not any more doubt about that than there is that I stand here. The section goes on and provides that the accounts shall be adjusted by the Secretary of the Treasury, and then that he shall not pay unless certain things be done. Is there a man here that ever reads Blackstone, or that understands the rudiments of the English language, or that knows anything about logic, that does not know that that is just as much as to say, if those things are done the payment shall be made. Is not that what all school-boys know as a negative pregnant? And are we to be told that this is not an appropriation? It is just as much an appropriation as if it was said in express terms that $38,000 should be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the Treasury to Stewart Gwynne.

Mr. HENDERSON. In my view of this matter, the Secretary of the Treasury has full power to adjust this claim. As was very properly stated, however, by the Senator from New Hampshire, yesterday, the Secretary desires that the claim be settled not by him, and he seems to think authority is given to him alone to settle it under the former laws. He wants it to go before the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, and he thinks this amendment will send it before the accounting officers, and it can there be adjusted like any other claim. He does not wish to assume the responsibility of settling it himself, and he does not conceive that the previous laws on the subject authorize it to go before the accounting officers. I understand that that is all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, whether this amendment shall be received, on a point of order being made that it is to pay a private claim.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Furwell, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nesmith, Nye, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Grimes, Harlan, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Colliamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harding, Harris, Hicks, McDougall, Morrill, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, and Van Winkle—18.

So the point of order was not sustained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is received; and the question now is on the adoption of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have another amendment to offer from the Committee on Finance. It is to insert as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to provide temporary accommodations for the State Department, and for the accommodation of such of the clerks of the Treasury Department as cannot be accommodated in the present building, the sum of $35,000 is hereby appropriated. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby required to furnish suitable rooms in the Patent Office building for the accommodation of the Attorney General, Assistant Attorney General, clerks, and messengers in his office; and for the purpose of furnishing and fitting up such rooms the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to move as a further amendment on page 40, line nine hundred and fifty-six, to insert before the word "act" the words "internal revenue," so that the clause will read:

For procuring dies, stamps, adhesive stamps, paper, printing forms and regulations, advertising, and other expenses of carrying into effect the internal revenue act of June 30, 1834, $1,100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the same page, line nine hundred and sixty-one, I am directed by the same committee to insert, after the word "same," the words "in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency," so that the clause will read:

For paper, special dies, and the printing of circulating notes, and expenses necessarily incurred (including express charges) in procuring the same, in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, $675,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also instructed by the Committee on Finance to offer as a new section what is called the deficiency bill. It is scarcely worth while to read it. It is precisely the bill as it has been agreed upon by both Houses, with the exception of the disputed clause about the extra compensation to the clerks and employes of the other House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the proposed amendment will be dispensed with unless called for by some Senator.

Mr. SUMNER. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the deficiency bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no objection be made, the report will be received at this time.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CLARK. I submit the following report from the committee of conference on the deficiency bill:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

T. STEVENS,
G. H. PENDLETON,
J. S. MORRILL,
Managers on the part of the House.
DANIEL CLARK,
JAMES W. GRIMES,
GEORGE READ RIDDLE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be on agreeing to the report of the committee. No recommendation is made by the committee, but they simply report the fact of their disagreement.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment to the House bill; and, Mr. President, if I may be pardoned in taking up the time of the Senate, I desire, for the purpose of bringing this matter before the country more directly than it is, to make a few remarks upon the report.

The only disagreement upon the bill is upon the provision inserted by the House of Representatives appropriating $38,000 out of the contingent fund to pay a gratuity to the clerks and employes of the House.

Mr. CONNESS. In violation of law.

Mr. CLARK. In violation of law, as is suggested by the Senator from California. From the year 1849 to the year 1858 there grew up a practice in one House and the other House of paying toward the end of the session, or at the close of the session, a gratuity to the employes of each House. The House of Representatives, or the Senate, as the case might be, would pass a resolution and pay twenty per cent. extra compensation to the employes of that House. Then the employes of the other House would solicit the same gratuity to them; and the result would be that each House would pass a resolution for a gratuity of twenty per cent. That practice went on until the year 1858, when Congress passed a law that it should not continue any further. That law will be found in the eleventh volume of the Statutes, page 326, and is in these words:

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no part of the appropriations which may be at any time made for the contingent expenses of either House of Congress shall be applied to any other than the ordinary expenditures of the Senate and House of Representatives, nor as extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them, nor as payment or compensation to any clerk, messenger, or other attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them."

After that I think neither House attempted to make such a gratuity to their employes until, at the last session, the House passed a resolution of that kind. When that resolution came to the accounting officers of the Treasury, if not before, it was refused a passage. I think the Clerk of the House did not pay it, but submitted it to the Treasury Department, and was told it could not pass there; and therefore it was not paid. Now, the House, in order to make an appropriation for that gratuity, have appended an amendment upon the deficiency bill. They put it on a former deficiency bill. The Senate rejected it. It went back to the House, and they refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate. It came back here, and a committee of conference was appointed, which disagreed. The Senate agreed to that report, and insisted upon its amendment with great unanimity. Another committee of conference was appointed, and they disagreed. The Senate still insisted, and finally voted, with great unanimity, to adhere to its amendment to the deficiency bill; and the House of Representatives having previously voted to adhere, the deficiency bill failed.

Thereupon the House of Representatives introduced and passed another deficiency bill, and it contained the distinct provision that $38,000 should be appropriated for this precise object, with a little difference in the phraseology. The Senate struck it out. It went back to the House for their approval, and they disagreed to the amendment of the Senate. It is in this view that I desire to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the position of the matter, because the House attempted to cast the odium, if there be any, of the failure of the deficiency bill upon the Senate. I know I shall be pardoned if I read from the Globe this remarkable passage:

"Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman's attention to one fact. I understand from the Secretary of War that at the present time not a single dollar can be expended from his Department for the sick and wounded soldiers in our hospitals because of the delay in the passage of this bill.

"Mr. STEVENS. So far as that subject is concerned, I look upon the action of the Senate as an atrocity."

After the deficiency bill had failed in the House by the disagreement between the two—

Mr. JOHNSON. Was that said in debate?

Mr. CLARK. That was in the debate reported in the Globe; and I do not desire, and am not willing, that it should go out to the country without being challenged. I desire to bring the attention of the country to the precise position of the fact.

Here was a large deficiency in the War Department, and in other Departments, of over one hundred million dollars needed by the Government to carry on the purposes of the Government and put down this rebellion. The soldiers were unpaid; the men in the hospitals were unpaid. The bill had gone to both Houses and had failed, because we could not agree upon this point; and then the House of Representatives—I shall not be charged with speaking with any discourtesy of the House of Representatives, because I mean to confine my remarks to what is reported in the Globe—passed another bill with precisely the same provision in it on which we had disagreed; they put into it a provision which they knew had defeated the bill; and then, because the Senate would not assent to a provision that was contrary to law and give a gratuity of twenty per cent. to the clerks and messengers of the House; because they would not willingly consent to do that, the action of the Senate is charged before the country as an "atrocity!" Then this report goes on to say:

"If the sick and wounded soldiers are not provided for the blame should justly rest with the Senate."

The sick and the wounded soldiers cannot be provided for if they do not put into the deficiency bill providing for them a provision to give $38,000 gratuity to the clerks and messengers of the other House. There is no difference of opinion between us; we have agreed to every provision and every deficiency for the sake of the wounded soldier; but because the Senate will not consent that $38,000 shall be given to these employes, who, in my judgment, are paid for what they do as well as any other employes—

Mr. GRIMES. It is an attempt to take it from the sick and wounded soldiers and pay it to these employes.

Mr. CLARK. As is said by the Senator from Iowa, it is taking so much away from the sick and wounded soldiers. But, I say, because we will not assent to what is contrary to law, and in conformity to very bad practice, which both Houses of Congress agreed to cut up and remove, the action of the Senate is charged before the country as "an atrocity." I hope I may be permitted to say here further that, when the vote shall be taken, we shall put the deficiency bill upon the legislative bill, and let us see if we cannot make provision for the sick and wounded soldiers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the House bill called the deficiency bill and ask for a further conference.

Mr. CLARK. That was not a part of my motion. I moved only to insist; I did not ask for another committee. I am willing that the motion should be simply to insist, and let the House take action on the question whether we shall have another committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is that the Senate further insist upon its amendment striking out a portion of the House bill.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to enter a privileged motion. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which Senate bill No. 392, relative to a bridge across the Ohio river at Louisville, was passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

Mr. POWELL. I would inquire in regard to the rule, whether if I allow the motion to be entered I waive any right to object to the vote being reconsidered because the motion to reconsider is out of order at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think the Senator loses his right to object by the entering of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. POWELL. I only want to know that I shall have a right to make my objection to-morrow as well as to-day. I think, under the 20th rule, no motion to reconsider can be entertained in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may call the attention of the Senate to the time at which the motion is made.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] to amend the bill before the Senate by adding to it the deficiency bill. The reading of the amendment will be dispensed with unless called for by some member, and the question is on its adoption.

Mr. HALE. Omitting the clause in dispute, I suppose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is omitted.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is precisely the deficiency bill as agreed upon by both Houses, omitting the disputed clause.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that is done, I merely wish to call the attention of the Senate to the nature of the possible controversy in which they are about to embark.

Mr. COLLAMER. We have insisted on that.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator have the kindness to hear my statement?

I understand that the motion of the Senator from Ohio is to add, by way of amendment, the deficiency bill to the bill now pending.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir, that is it precisely.

Mr. SUMNER. I take it the motion is without precedent in this body. On that account it perhaps may be open to criticism. But if you look at it in other aspects, if you look at it on its merits, perhaps you may see some occasion to hesitate, at least. I think you will find that from the beginning of our Government all the great appropriation bills have been originated in the other House. The Senator from Vermont, I see, shakes his head. I am simply calling attention to a historical fact. The language of the Constitution is rather general. It says:

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills."

I know very well a question has been raised as to the interpretation of the words, "all bills for raising revenue," and it has been argued that those terms are exclusively applicable to what we sometimes call tariff bills; and we are reminded that appropriation bills are originated in the Senate. To a certain extent that is true; but none of the great standing appropriation bills are originated in the Senate. When this subject was examined in the Senate some eight or nine years ago, after a two days' debate the Senators who were then here will remember very well the conclusion was that the Senate never had undertaken to originate one of the great appropriation bills; the traditions of the Government were all against it. Mr. Seward, who was at that time in this body, made a very elaborate speech in reply to Mr. Hunter, who brought forward a resolution affirming that the Senate might originate appropriation bills. I remember at the time I took some part in the discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator will allow me, it was not a resolution; it was a bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; it was a resolution.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg the Senator's pardon; it was a bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I have looked at the debate within a few days.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not, but my recollection is very distinct about it.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator has looked at the debate within a few days, I will defer to him.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not looked at it for years; but I know we passed an appropriation bill and sent it to the House. The Senator is right in regard to the speeches about it, but I think there was no division taken when the bill was passed.

Mr. SUMNER. What I refer to is a resolution. I had it on my desk until two days ago, when I sent it away.

Mr. SHERMAN. What was it about?

Mr. SUMNER. It was a resolution, reported by Mr. Hunter from the Finance Committee, that the Senate would undertake to originate appropriation bills.

Mr. FOSTER. And we passed the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Passed the resolution, I say.

Mr. FOSTER. We passed the appropriation bill reported by Mr. Hunter, the chairman of the Committee on Finance. We passed, I think, more than one of the regular appropriation bills, and sent them to the House.

Mr. SUMNER. What did the House do?

Mr. FOSTER. The House kept it, passed a similar bill, and then we re-passed it.

Mr. SUMNER. Then what became of the Senate bill?

Mr. FOSTER. The House laid it on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. They treated your act as null and void.

Mr. FOSTER. They laid it on the table, took it up again in another form, passed it, sent it to us, and we passed it.

Mr. SUMNER. We come, then, practically to the point: the House treated the act of the Senate as null and void, and it undertook to originate these measures itself. But I was alluding, when I was interrupted by the Senator from Connecticut—

Mr. FOSTER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SUMNER. It is all right. I am obliged to him for the interruption.

I was alluding to the proposition of Mr. Hunter, on which the debate took place. That was a resolution. Afterward, the resolution, I am aware, was followed by the introduction of certain bills. That was the other stage. To the best of my recollection, those bills were sent to the House, and were at once tabled. The House, then, when it was fully organized, proceeded to originate bills itself, which were sent to the Senate, and they were finally passed upon in due course of legislative proceedings.

I merely call attention to this incident. It is a matter in which I take comparatively little interest; but I am desirous that the Senate should see the character of the step which it is about to take, and that it should not embark unnecessarily in a controversy with the other House.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator warns us against embarking in a controversy with the other House; but let me ask him this question: what shall we do with the deficiency bill? Shall we allow it to fail, and thus refuse to pay for the support of the sick and wounded soldiers now in the hospitals? The deficiency bill contains appropriations for the transportation of the Army and Army supplies, and money is now needed from that fund to pay the expense of transporting the corps lying within reach of this city to its proper military destination. Several of the funds in the War Department are exhausted. The Senator tells us we must not have a controversy with the House. The House will not allow us to provide the ordinary appropriations for the Army, unless the Senate will agree to pay what is prohibited by law. The occupant of the chair [Mr. CLARK] has already dwelt enough on that subject. Shall we let the deficiency bill fail, or shall we be compelled to vote that which our consciences disapprove? There is but one of two ways. We must pass this deficiency bill in some form, if possible. That is a public duty. We cannot separate in Congress until we do it, or if we do, we shall be called back again to complete our duties.

Now the question occurs, shall we yield to the House this point in controversy, or shall we take some other mode of passing the deficiency bill? If we yield to the House, we agree that the House may, against our will, take money from the public Treasury, in violation of a plain law, without our consent. It seems to me the Senate ought not to be placed in that position. The rule is clear that every appropriation in an appropriation bill must be assented to by both Houses, and the Senate and the House have always acted upon the idea that where either House objects conscientiously, or for any reason, to any item of an appropriation bill, to abandon that item. That has been the custom and the practice. The House now insists upon passing a provision for their clerks and employes that they admit to be in violation of law, simply because they say their honor is pledged to pay this sum of money. We can only say, in reply to that, that the law forbids them paying it; that we cannot enter upon that subject without setting a dangerous example—we must make the same provision for our own employes; we must make the same provision for the employes of the Departments and of the Army; we cannot enter upon this matter; it is unwise to do so. That is the deliberate judgment of the Senate, and upon that judgment we stand. Now, shall we be forced to agree to that which our judgments condemn merely to provide for a public exigency? I do not say that I would not in the end yield this point, although I do not think I shall.

There was no other resort, then, but to move this as an amendment to an appropriation bill. The Senator is mistaken in supposing this is without precedent. There are many laws and many appropriation bills which in the second section contain deficiencies. The general appropriation bill of 1862 contained a section which provided for deficiencies, and there was no deficiency bill passed that year. Formerly, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, it was the practice of the Government always to add the deficiency for the current year as a second section to the general appropriation bill; that has been a common practice, and by referring to the statutes the Senator will find many examples.

But the Senator says the Senate cannot originate an appropriation bill. We do not propose to do so in this case. The House sends us a bill making appropriations for the civil fund. We add to that various amendments; we strike out various clauses, and add to it others. We have the right to do it under the Constitution. Even if it was a revenue bill, we could amend it in any particular. We could add five thousand, five million, or one hundred million dollars. The Constitution plainly gives us the right to make amendments. It does not stipulate what amendments we shall make—that is, conceding that it is a revenue bill. But I think it was never even claimed in the House of Representatives that an appropriation bill was a revenue bill.

The Senator has confounded this subject with a controversy that is familiar to me, because I was then a member of the House and took part in it. The Senate undertook to pass a loan bill. That was in 1857 or 1858, shortly after our financial difficulties. It was claimed in the House of Representatives that that was a revenue bill. The Senate, however, insisted that a loan bill was not a revenue bill; and they produced several historical examples. It appeared that in the war of 1812, the Senate had originated a loan bill. It appeared that in the Mexican war the Senate had originated a loan bill. The House, however, insisted upon it that a loan bill was a bill to raise money from the people by loan, and therefore a revenue bill. The controversy grew up on the loan bill, and not on an appropriation bill.

I do not remember in my legislative experience that the House ever contested the right of the Senate to originate an appropriation bill. An appropriation bill is not a revenue bill in any sense. It is for carrying into execution existing laws, and to set aside and appropriate money for that purpose. It is not included in any definition that has ever been given to the term "revenue bill," because it has been exercised very many times. Almost every bill introduced into the Senate appropriating money for a private claim is an appropriation bill. The Senate every day introduces bills to pay five, ten, or twenty thousand dollars to this man or that man, and no one ever objects. I do not think there is the slightest doubt upon the point made by the Senator from Massachusetts. Probably one half the bills introduced into the Senate of the United States contain appropriations of money. If we have a right to appropriate $5,000 for the payment of a private claim, we have a right to pay $10,000,000 to pay the legislative expenses of the Government. There can be no distinction drawn between appropriation bills. An appropriation bill is not a revenue bill in the sense used in the Constitution.

The mode now adopted by the Committee on Finance was the only expedient left. We must provide for this deficiency, and we must do it soon. The public exigencies demand it. We must either, therefore, make up our mind to defeat the deficiency bill entirely, to yield the point that is controverted by the House, or else to make another attempt to provide for this deficiency by an amendment to the legislative bill. It is the only course left us; and it seemed to us so plain that we did not expect there would be any controversy or dispute about it.

Mr. WILSON. I think, Mr. President, that Congress presents to the country to-day a strange spectacle. We owe our armies millions of dollars. Many of our soldiers have not been paid for months. Many of our officers are unpaid, and have been unpaid for months. Many of them have put in the hands of their commanding officers their resignations and are imploring the Government to accept their resignations, for the reason that their families are suffering at home while they are not paid even what the Government owes them, and that is not enough to support them and their families. This is the condition of our soldiers; this is the condition of our officers. Millions are wanted to pay them, and we have not the means to do it as rapidly, at any rate, as we ought to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts, from the high position occupied by him, might convey to the country a very erroneous idea by his remarks.

Mr. WILSON. I do not intend to convey to the country a false impression. I can go a great deal further than I have yet gone.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no deficiency in the appropriation for the pay department. There is ample for the current fiscal year.

Mr. WILSON. There is no deficiency in appropriations, but there is a deficiency in the money. That deficiency is what I am talking about. I was speaking of the want of means to carry out the laws, to pay our soldiers what we have agreed to pay them; and I say we want at once tens of millions of dollars for that purpose.

And now, sir, when the nation is struggling for the means to carry itself through this rebellion, we have an issue made here in Congress to increase the compensation twenty per cent. of a class of men who deserve it less than any other men in the employment of the Government. Here are women in this city working for six or seven hundred dollars a year who ask you to increase their small compensation; here are clerks working from morning till night all the year round, who ask you to increase their compensation, and you refuse to do it; and why? Because you have not the means to do it. You need more money than you can obtain to pay your just debts and to pay what we have already agreed to pay. In the face of all this—and I hope the country will note it—in the face of the fact that we owe tens of millions to our brave soldiers, many of whom have not been paid for many months; in the face of the fact that the officers of our armies are sending in their resignations, and some of our generals hold them by the handful, asking to be allowed to resign that they may go home and take care of their suffering families; in the face of these facts, that we cannot help, or do but little to relieve by reason of the financial condition of the country, we have a contest and an issue raised here in Congress by one branch of this Government, in violation of the laws of the country, to increase the compensation of their employees twenty per cent. It is utterly and wholly indefensible. I do not shrink from a contest on that issue. I welcome the contest here and before the country, if they choose to make it.

I say, sir, the fact as it stands before us and before the country to-day is not creditable to the Congress of the United States, and I hope the Senate will stand firm, put this amendment upon the bill, and stand by it. If gentlemen anywhere choose to make an issue before the country about increasing the compensation of well-paid officers employed here about ten months in two years when we have not the means to increase the compensation of men who do not receive enough now to support their wives and children at home while they are suffering, fighting, bleeding, and dying for the country, let them make that issue before the country. I welcome the contest.

Mr. JOHNSON. Upon the question of power, about which the honorable member from Massachusetts—

Mr. SUMNER. The question of usage, not of power.

Mr. JOHNSON. The usage as evidence of the want of power. I was about to say I did not understand the Senator to say that in his own opinion there did not exist a power in the Senate to pursue the course which it is now proposed to pursue. The origin of this clause of the Constitution was evidently taken from a clause of the same description existing in the English Government with reference to the respective privileges of the House of Lords and the House of Commons. The House of Commons, which has always, from the beginning of their Government up to the present time, been exceedingly jealous upon this subject, will not permit the House of Lords to amend a money bill of any description in the slightest particular; and it has operated very prejudicially in a great many instances. The suggested amendment, which is often necessary to give effect to the bill as it comes from the House of Commons, is sent down to the House of Commons to be there acted upon; and that produces great delay. The reason why the House of Commons has always claimed that particular privilege is stated by Blackstone. It is not necessary to trouble the Senate by reading what Blackstone says on the subject. Mr. Justice Story does not even approve of the extent of the doctrine as it exists in England, and he tells us in the eight hundred and eightieth section of his Commentaries—I cite the section because the editions are not uniform:

"§ 880. What bills are properly 'bills for raising revenue,' in the sense of the Constitution, has been a matter of some discussion. A learned commentator supposes that every bill which indirectly or consequently may raise revenue is, within the sense of the Constitution, a revenue bill. He therefore thinks that the bills for establishing the post office and the Mint, and regulating the value of foreign coin, belong to this class, and ought not to have originated (as in fact they did) in the Senate. But the practical construction of the Constitution has been against his opinion. And, indeed, the history of the origin of the power already suggested abundantly proves that it has been confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the words, and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes, which may incidentally create revenue. No one supposes that a bill to sell any of the public lands or to sell public stock is a bill to raise revenue in the sense of the Constitution. Much less would a bill be so deemed which merely regulated the value of foreign and domestic coins or authorized a discharge of insolvent debtors upon assignments of their estates to the United States, giving a priority of payment to the United States in cases of insolvency, although all of them might incidentally bring revenue into the Treasury."

So that a bill of this description might, upon the authority of Mr. Justice Story (and I speak knowingly when I say he is borne out by the usage) have been originated in the Senate; and if it could have originated in the Senate of course it would have been in the power of the Senate to make the appropriation suggested by the honorable member from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance. One thing is very certain: whether it is a bill to levy taxes or not, we can amend it. If it be a tariff bill for the purpose of raising revenue, we can lower the amount proposed to be levied upon any particular article, or upon all the articles included in the bill, or we may raise the amount proposed to be levied, the power given to the Senate even in the case of bills to raise revenue being a power to amend as contradistinguished from a power to originate; but I have no doubt the Senate, with reference to the power of amendment, is wholly unrestrained even in relation to bills to raise revenue.

Now, in relation to the conduct of the House, I can hardly believe that, when they come to reflect upon the subject, they will, as matters now stand, continue their difference with the Senate. It is impossible, it seems to me, even if the nature of this amendment was not such as to address itself not only to the good sense, but to the patriotism and good feeling of the House, that they would continue a difference with the Senate in which they are so clearly wrong. If they have by what they did at the last session involved themselves in a matter of honor, it is not a matter of honor belonging to the House in its corporate capacity. The question is, whether they had the authority to do what they did. If in exercising an authority which they had not, they have involved themselves in any point of honor, it is an involvement which affects them individually, and it they wish to pay the money, they can pay it out of their own pockets.

But in this particular amendment, as the Senate is aware, there is nothing at all about which there exists any difference of opinion; and the only question then is, whether, as this amendment makes a provision which the honor of the country and the safety of the country, what is due to those in the field as well as what is due to those in the councils of the country in every Department of the Government is involved, the House will hesitate a moment in accepting the amendment? I have no doubt—indeed it would be discourteous and wrong to reflect upon the conduct of the House—they are just as patriotic as we are; they are just as anxious to preserve the true honor of the country as we can be; and they are just as unwilling to trespass upon the constitutional rights of the Senate or to enlarge their own, as we are to trespass upon their rights or to enlarge our own. But in relation to this particular amendment there can be no difference as concerns either subject, because both branches admit that the amendment as it stands is all right.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I am not satisfied of the propriety of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio. I believe he presents it from the Committee on Finance. I understand him to say that there are many instances in which the deficiencies of the Government have been provided for in general appropriation bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have one before me, passed in 1862.

Mr. HENDRICKS. A number of years ago, most of the objects of appropriation were provided for in a general appropriation bill called the civil and diplomatic bill. Subsequently a rule was adopted, or it became a usage, to divide up these objects of appropriation into several bills; and I will ask the Senator from Ohio whether, since that usage obtained in Congress, there is an instance in which the deficiencies of the Government have been provided for in any of the general appropriation bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has been done for the last three years consecutively. I have now a law before me, approved March 3, 1862. It is entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1863, and additional appropriations for the year ending the 30th of June, 1862." The first section goes on and makes the ordinary appropriations, and the second section provides for deficiencies. That year we passed no separate deficiency bill. Both bills were put in one. There is one other case of that kind, I think.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not suppose there had been a recent instance of that sort in which such a usage had obtained; but certainly the usage is a proper one, to make the deficiencies the subject of a separate bill. Deficiencies are not generally received with favor in Congress. They ought to be considered upon their separate merits. The theory of the Government is that there should be no deficiencies; that the executive departments ought not to go beyond the appropriations, and therefore there should be no deficiencies. But, sir, since the war, the deficiency bills have been large; sometimes, I believe, between two and three hundred million dollars. I do not think they should ever have been so large. I concede that there will necessarily be some deficiencies, but I think the deficiencies ought to be provided for in a separate bill. We ought to stand by the usage in that respect.

But I wish to submit to the Senator having this particular bill in charge now, where there is a dispute between the two Houses, whether we ought to increase the differences between the two Houses. Does the Senator from Ohio suppose that the House will yield its point merely because this deficiency is tacked to a general appropriation bill? If the House is unwilling to yield the point upon the deficiency bill, have we a right to presume that it will yield it upon this bill? We not only endanger the deficiency bill, which ought, I suppose, to be provided for, but we endanger this entire bill. I am not willing, when there is a difference between the two Houses, to increase the embarrassment of the Government by adding this deficiency bill to a general appropriation bill.

I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] I do not go so far as he does. I am willing to yield very much to the House of Representatives; and if they stand upon this point of honor, and the public service requires these appropriations, I am not going to see inconvenience and suffering to the soldiers and those requiring the deficiency bill merely upon a question of $38,000. I have thought the Senate was right; I have voted with the majority of the Senate upon that question; but if the House understands that there is a point of honor between it and its employes, and will not yield it, I do not expect to stand up stubbornly, and say we will not respect what the House deems to be a point of honor. I have thought the Senate right; but certainly I am not going, as a Senator here, to vote persistently that the House shall not be gratified upon a question of that sort. To a reasonable extent, I expect to stand upon the position assumed by the Senate; but when we have gone as far as duty seems to require, then I am going to let the House take the responsibility, so far as my vote is concerned; and I will say to the Senator from Ohio, if his proposition carries, and we tack the deficiency bill to this general appropriation bill, and it goes to the House, and the House amends it, I expect to concur in the proposition of the House, and I think it is likely the Senator will find a good many Senators taking the same view of it.

Is it possible these two bills are to be lost upon a question of that sort? The House says it made this promise to its employes; it is a question of honor. They construe the law one way and we another; and are Senators prepared to say we will lose a very important bill, that we will allow embarrassment in the public service upon a question of that sort? I am not prepared to say that. I do not go as far as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] went in his very earnest remarks a few minutes ago; and I do not see that the passage or defeat of the appropriation bill has anything to do with the question that he discussed. He says it is a question of means; it is not a question of appropriation—the payment of the Army. Why have we not the money? The internal revenue measure is bringing as much revenue in the Treasury as was expected. I think the mistake is just here: the present Secretary of the Treasury (for whom I have the very highest regard) esteems it to be his duty to issue no more Treasury notes. I apprehend he will have to come to that. I suppose, while the war continues, especially during a period when we are largely increasing the Army, we will have to look to other means than the internal revenue and loans. I do not concur exactly in this notion that it is the highest political wisdom now to reduce the circulation in the country to any very great extent. That must be done very gradually. I think the interests of commerce require that the currency shall be kept reasonably within the present amount, and that the reduction shall be very gradual. But I do not intend now to discuss that, but to say that I think the proposition of the Senator from Ohio is not a pertinent one.

Mr. SUMNER. Surely, sir, I do not yield to any Senator on this floor, not even to my colleague, in an ardent desire to have all those appropriations in the deficiency bill carried out. I join with him in every one of his ardent words for the payment of the soldiers in the field, and all other debtors of our Republic; but I feel that I do not render a service unworthy of the place when I undertake to call the attention of the Senate to the traditions of the Government, to its usage during its best days, to the end that, so far as I may, I may contribute something to establish harmony between the two legislative bodies. Sir, you cannot conduct the legislation of the country if you perpetually start points and questions of difference and discord between the two legislative branches.

I am not going into the question which is right or wrong on the main occasion of difference between the two Houses. I have voted with the Senate constantly. I have regretted the course of the House; but I am not disposed to add to existing embarrassments. It was on that account that I undertook a few moments ago simply to remind the Senate of the controversy that they were about to open. Senators about me shook their heads, and Senators reminded me that I was mistaken. I undertook to refer to a debate of some importance in which I took part myself, now some eight or nine years ago, and so far as I could, according to my memory, I undertook to state the occasion of that debate. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Foster] again and again said that I was mistaken. I have since then sent to the library for the volume of the Globe. I have it before me. I was not mistaken. The debate occurred on a resolution brought forward by Mr. Hunter, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, on the 4th of February, 1856. Its consideration was postponed to a later day, and made, I think, a special order. It came up finally for consideration on February 7, 1856, and was in the following terms:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to prepare and report such of the general appropriation bills as they may deem expedient.

I think it must have been during the winter of this resolution that the organization of the House was for a long time in suspense. My friend from Ohio [Mr. Sherman] can correct me on that point. I think it was.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was during what was called the Banks contest.

Mr. SUMNER. During what is called the Banks contest; and I presume, (though that has escaped my memory,) the occasion for the introduction of this resolution was that it was supposed that unless the Senate undertook to originate these bills there would not be time to act upon them. It was introduced. The first person who expressed himself with regard to the proposition was Mr. Seward, who made an elaborate speech, and one that I think will compare in its argument and statement with any that he ever made on this floor. It is within my recollection that it was a speech carefully considered in advance, as most of his speeches were, and that it was the result of mature study. In the course of that speech he makes the following statement; I read from the Globe for February, 1856, page 375:

"The practice of this Government from its foundation has been that general appropriation bills for the support of the Government have originated in the House of Representatives, and not in the Senate of the United States. The Government has been in operation since the year 1789, a period of more than half a century, and never yet has a general appropriation bill been prepared or reported or submitted to the Senate or sent to the House of Representatives from this body. On the other hand, the practice for this period of seventy years has been that all appropriation bills of that character have originated in the House of Representatives, and have been sent to this House for its concurrence and amendment.

"As this, then, is a proposition made, not only for the first time within our own experience, but for the first time since the foundation of the Government, we are to presume that it will be admitted that what is proposed is an innovation—a direct, specific, and effective innovation. Since it is an innovation, let us for a moment see what is the nature of it."

He then proceeds to consider the question historically and on principle, and toward the close of his speech proceeds as follows:

"I confess, therefore, sir, to an earnest desire, a strong desire, to retain for the House of Representatives the privileges and rights which it has exercised from the foundation of the Government until this day."

And finally, in another place, he says:

"I think then, sir, that I stand upon the principles and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States in advising against the instruction which is asked for by the Committee on Finance."

In the face of this speech, the resolution of the Committee on Finance reported by Mr. Hunter was adopted by this body; and then, I believe, ensued what was mentioned by the Senator from Connecticut, that appropriation bills were introduced and passed through the Senate and sent to the House; but, sir, nothing came of them. They were simply a vain effort on the part of the Senate; vox et praterca nihil. In the face of that precedent, I submit to the Senate whether upon the whole it is expedient for us to add to the embarrassments between the two bodies by introducing an additional occasion of difference.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the honorable Senator from Massachusetts had made the speech he has now made upon the motion of the honorable Senator occupying the chair, [Mr. Clark,] it would have been pertinent to the case.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will remember that when he introduced it I objected to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before any action was had upon my amendment, and, purposely, because I did not wish to offer this amendment to this bill until there was no hope of an agreement between the two Houses on the deficiency bill, the honorable Senator from New Hampshire moved that the Senate insist on its amendment to the deficiency bill. It was not until the vote was taken upon that motion, and it was decided, so far as there was any appearance in the Senate, by a unanimous vote, that I offered, or asked, a vote on this amendment. There was no other course left. The Senate insisting on its amendment sent the deficiency bill back to the House with the disagreement continuing, and there was no other choice except between a defeat of the deficiency bill and putting it on as an amendment to this appropriation bill.

Now, I do not wish to get up any feeling between the two Houses; I do not wish to get up any controversy between the two Houses. I think the position of the House of Representatives is totally untenable, and I am satisfied that if they could understand it and discuss it and consider it they would yield at once. Their position is simply that they will not appropriate for the Army and the Navy unless we agree to appropriate money from the national Treasury in violation of law. I have no reflection to cast upon them. It is a point of honor with them. They think that as they have by resolution voted this money to their employes, the Senate, as a matter of courtesy to the House, ought to allow the money to be taken and paid to the employes. That is their claim. But, sir, the House of Representatives are yet as much bound by the law as we are or any other branch of the Government. The law expressly forbids the House from doing what they attempted to do in this instance. If we must yield in courtesy to the House when they undertake to violate the law, we must also yield in courtesy to the President when he undertakes to violate the law; and if our national judiciary or any other department of this Government undertakes to violate the law, we must yield rather than make any controversy on the subject.

Here let me say to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that in this whole controversy I have done no more than he. I have voted according to my conscientious convictions of duty on this question of extra pay; so did he; and we have voted together.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. But now, when it is manifest that this disagreement between the two Houses is likely to defeat the deficiency bill, the question comes up, is there any other way in which we can save that bill? I say there is. I say that in the form of an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill, we may again submit the deficiency bill to the House of Representatives. I cannot for a moment suppose that the House will renew the controversy by inserting in this bill the same old controverted matter. I do not believe they will do so. I shall be disappointed and chagrined if they renew the controversy in that way. We propose to them now an amendment upon which there is a concurrence of views, a bill that they have originated and passed, but a bill which, on account of the difference of opinion upon an independent matter, cannot be carried into execution as a law. We propose this bill as an amendment to a bill which has already been originated in the other House, and is now here for amendment.

The point made by the honorable Senator does not arise here. This pending bill originated in the House of Representatives. The Senate might originate it. In the case referred to by him the House did not deny the power of the Senate to originate an appropriation bill. The Globe is before me. The Senate passed the appropriation bill in that case while the House of Representatives was in a state of disorganization and confusion. To avoid delay the Senate originated the bill; but just about the time when the Senate did so—I think within a day or two of the passage of the bill by the Senate—the House became organized by the election of Mr. Banks as Speaker, and the Committee of Ways and Means, of which Mr. Campbell, of Ohio, was made chairman, was appointed, and then, within a very short time, the House in the usual manner originated its own appropriation bill; and that one which went from the Senate was simply laid upon the table, and nothing further was done with it. There is nothing in the debates on that occasion to show that any member of the House of Representatives denied to the Senate the power of originating appropriation bills. The reason for originating them in the Senate on that occasion ceased within a week of the time they were originated here, and they fell, and the bills were originated in the usual way in the House of Representatives, and assumed the ordinary form and came back to the Senate, and no objection, no controversy, was made between the two Houses.

In this case the bill now before the Senate has come to us from the House of Representatives in the usual form. We have made but very few amendments to it. We simply now propose to amend the bill by adding what the House have already agreed to. We do not make the proposition until there is no way that I am aware of to save this controverted matter, and to save the necessary appropriations for deficiencies. It is true the House may recede from its position on the deficiency bill, which has been acted on by the Senate, or may ask for another committee of conference. If it shall agree to the Senate amendment, the deficiency bill will be passed, and then this amendment to this bill will fall as a matter of course. I do not think this proposition now will complicate the matter. On the contrary, I believe it will enable the House of Representatives, without abandoning their position on the original deficiency bill, to assent to this amendment, and thus end the controversy. In that hope I offer it.

Mr. FOSTER. I interrupted the honorable Senator from Massachusetts rather hastily. I did not mean to do it discourteously.

Mr. SUMNER. Not at all.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to explain the reason. I understood that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts was making this point against the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio, that it was in effect originating an appropriation bill in the Senate—the prerogative to do that belonging to the House of Representatives—and therefore it was contrary to the Constitution, and that it was without precedent in the previous legislation of Congress. The Senator alluded to an occurrence in this body some years ago, by way, as I supposed, of vindicating that position, the position being in effect that there was no precedent for such an amendment as that offered by the Senator from Ohio, either upon the House bill or as an original bill in this body. When, therefore, the Senator from Massachusetts went on to speak of that occurrence, and said that a debate arose upon a resolution regarding the power of the Senate to originate such a bill, and that the result was that the project was abandoned, given up, because—

Mr. SUMNER. I had not got to the statement of what the result was.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator says he had not got to the statement of what the result was, and therefore I was too hasty, because I supposed that when he said there was no precedent, he was not going to quote a case which showed there was a precedent.

Mr. SUMNER. I rather think I must have said that in the early and best history of the country there was no precedent. I think I said something like that.

Mr. FOSTER. My impression is that the Senator said broadly that there was no precedent for such an amendment as that offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to interrupt the Senator just there, for I surely intended to limit my testimony in regard to the precedent to the date of that resolution, because I knew that at that date the subject had been carefully discussed, and it had been ascertained that before that there was no precedent.

Mr. FOSTER. I was, as I say, too hasty, because I supposed the Senator, after having laid down his proposition, was quoting a case to support it; and when he spoke of the resolution, I had in my mind the result at which the Senate arrived, and that was the passage of the bill. I was not, therefore, making the point that the Senator had asserted that the debate was on the resolution, instead of on the bill; the point I had in my mind was the point which the Senator had made, that the case here was without precedent. The Senator asserted that it was in regard to a resolution that the question arose. I said no, not in regard to a resolution, but in regard to a bill, my mind being on the important fact of the bill, not upon the unimportant fact of the resolution.

The Senator, however, quotes the Globe, and thinks that he has shown that he was quite right in regard to the fact that the debate was on the resolution. Well, Mr. President, as I said then, I spoke entirely from memory; but I have since furnished myself with the Journal, and I can complete now from the Journal the exact statement of the case as it occurred. I read from the Senate Journal for the first session of the Thirty-fourth Congress. The resolution was originally introduced by Mr. Brodhead, December 11, 1855. In that day's proceedings, I find:

"Mr. Brodhead submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting the appropriation bills for the support of the Government, or adopting other measures with a view of obtaining more speedy action on said bills."

Subsequently, on the 7th of January, 1856:

"The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, submitted by Mr. Brodhead the 11th December, in relation to the adoption of measures for more speedy action on the appropriation bills; and

"The resolution was agreed to."

On the 4th of February, 1856:

"Mr. Hunter, from the Committee on Finance, reported the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to prepare and report such of the general appropriation bills as they may deem expedient."

On the 6th of February:

"The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Hunter, the 4th instant, to instruct the Committee on Finance to prepare and report such of the general appropriation bills as they may deem expedient; and

"On motion by Mr. Hunter,

"Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow at half past twelve o'clock; and be the special order of the day."

On the 7th of February:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution, reported from the Committee on Finance, to instruct the committee to prepare and report such of the general appropriation bills as they may deem expedient; and

"After debate,

"The resolution was agreed to."

On the 5th of March, 1856:

"Mr. Hunter, from the Committee on Finance, reported a bill (S. 141) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for repairs of barracks and quarters, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1857; which was read and passed to the second reading."

On the 9th of March:

"The bill (S. 141) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for repairs of barracks and quarters, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1857, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

"Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

"The said bill was read the third time, by unanimous consent.

"Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

"Ordered, That the Secretary request the concurrence of the House of Representatives therein."

There was an end of legislation on that one bill originating in the Senate, making appropriations for certain purposes, originating here after resolutions instructing the Committee on Finance to report such a bill; and the bill was passed unanimously, and sent to the House of Representatives. I had supposed that the Senator from Massachusetts was referring to the subject-matter of that debate, not to any particular portion of it. Whether the debate was on the resolution or on the bill, was not the point which I was making or supposed that the Senator was making. I supposed that he was making a point to show a precedent here in the Senate adversely to the action now asked by the Senator from Ohio, and therefore I said that the debate was upon the bill, and that the bill was passed and sent to the House of Representatives. It seemed to strike the Senator's mind as a novelty, and he asked what became of the bill. I said that I believed it was laid upon the table in the House; but that has nothing to do with the question whether the Senate, among its legislative privileges and prerogatives, has the power to originate an appropriation bill. What the House of Representatives may do with it has nothing to do with our power. We are to judge of that question. They, of course, are to judge of their constitutional rights and prerogatives. Each must judge for itself; neither for the other.

It is seldom that I am disposed to interrupt a Senator; and if I had but waited and heard the Senator from Massachusetts quote a precedent, not to establish his proposition but to contradict it, I should, of course, have been saved the trouble; but inasmuch as I supposed he was quoting a precedent to prove that the Senate had never exercised this prerogative and that it did not belong to us, I was disposed, not (as he understands, and as every one I hope would understand) offensively, to contradict his claim that there was a precedent to support his proposition. I repeat again that it was not on the point whether the debate was on the resolution or on the bill, but on the point that, so far from there being a precedent to sustain the proposition which he was supporting, the precedent was exactly the other way; and in this I think the Journal vindicates my own recollection, and proves it most distinctly.

Mr. SUMNER. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his explanation. His interruption at the time was entirely legitimate and most agreeable to myself. If the Senator, however, had listened perhaps more carefully to what I said, he would have seen there was no occasion for it. I was trying to develop the idea that in the best periods of our history and down to a very recent period there was no precedent for such an assumption of power on the part of the Senate, and I was proceeding to say that this subject was much discussed since I have been a member of the body on a resolution introduced by Mr. Hunter, of Virginia. It was then that I was interrupted by the Senator, who reminded me that the debate was not on the resolution but on the bill, and I understand the Senator now to assume that I was arguing that there never had been such a precedent in this body. By no means, sir. The Senator entirely misunderstood me. I was perfectly familiar with the precedent to which the Senator has referred, but then I beg to remind the Senator of the time when this precedent was set.

It was in the winter of 1856, when this very rebellion was beginning to brood, and when this Senate was under the reign of those very rebel chiefs who are now filling this land with blood. Sir, I do not consider a precedent under their auspices a proper precedent for us now; and, therefore, in the few remarks which I presumed to address to the Senate I began by confining myself to what I called the best periods of our history, meaning those anterior to the precedent on which the Senator from Connecticut now so confidently leans. Sir, I reject the precedent. A precedent which has for its author and originator Richard Brodhead, of Pennsylvania, and R. M. T. Hunter, of Virginia, is not a precedent for the Senate of the United States at this time, unless it can be sustained by principle and by the better history of our Government. Sir, I put it all aside; all that the Senator has read from the record goes for nothing, worse than nothing; for that very precedent only goes to illustrate those very usurpations on the part of the Senate under the lead of the slave power, of which we so justly complained in those dark days. Sir, I wish none of that darkness brought into the Chamber now. I prefer the long period of light beginning with the Republic and coming down to that very day when this rebellion began to brood in this Chamber.

Mr. FOSTER. I am certainly unwilling to add anything by way of prolonging this discussion. I may agree entirely in the Senator's opinion, that when we are pointed to any action as creating a precedent for this body, we should look to the times, and to the men acting in those times, and that there are some precedents to which we should yield greater respect than to others. But, sir, when we come to the principle whether or not this body, the Senate of the United States, may or may not originate an appropriation bill, I must say that I conceive it to be a point on which men can scarcely differ.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is only amending it.

Mr. FOSTER. To amend one is of course a more clear proposition, if there be any doubt about the first. That reasonable, sensible men should even differ on the question whether we may not originate an appropriation bill proper, I can scarcely believe. That power seems to me as clear as any one of the privileges which belong to this body. The Senator speaks of the better days of the Republic. Let me ask him to show in the better days of the Republic, nay, from the beginning down to this time, when that question was made and it was decided that the Senate had not that power.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to inquire whether it appears by the record that anybody presumed to ask for a division on the question in the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all. There was no division asked on any vote taken on this question from the 11th of December, 1855, when Mr. Brodhead first introduced the resolution, down to the 9th of March following, when the bill was passed. Two resolutions were debated. I think the debate was confined to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and an honorable Senator who was then in this body from New York, and who now holds the position of Secretary of State of the United States. I think those were the only two Senators who spoke in opposition.

Mr. GRIMES. There were a few remarks by Mr. Toucey.

Mr. FOSTER. Not by way of opposition. These two Senators, I believe, were the only ones who spoke in opposition to the power of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. My colleague also.

Mr. FOSTER. There may have been others, but at all events there never was a division asked on any vote taken. All was by unanimous consent, as we pass resolutions and pass bills to which nobody objects. There was no doubt evidenced by a vote as to the power of the Senate over the subject. It is true that the Constitution restricts us from originating a bill for raising revenue. Our Constitution follows the example in that respect of the British constitution, which gives to the Commons the power to originate money bills, as they are called in England, and denies that power to the Lords. That distinction, in this respect, exists in our Constitution between the Senate and the House of Representatives, not with any very good reason, as I apprehend. There is no principle in denying to the Senate the power to originate revenue bills; but our fathers judged it best that it should be so, and they put the prohibition in the Constitution, and therefore that power is denied us. But so far as the power to originate an appropriation bill is concerned, it is not taken from us, and not one sensible reason can be given why we may not exercise it as well as the House of Representatives. But if there were, as the honorable Senator from Maryland well suggests, when we come to amending even a revenue bill, the Senate has as much power, in that regard, as the House, and we can really make a new bill by what we put on to the House revenue bill; thus, in effect, therefore, can practically originate a revenue bill as well as the House.

All that it is proposed to do here by the honorable Senator from Ohio is to put on this bill the deficiency bill which has been previously passed by both Houses. It is true that it was passed by the House of Representatives with another clause to it, which other clause did not pass the Senate. Striking off the clause which did not pass the Senate, it is offered in that shape as an amendment to this appropriation bill; and the Senator from Massachusetts insists that this is a step taken which cannot be justified by the practice of the better days of the Republic; that it is an innovation dangerous to the liberties of the people, a usurpation of a prerogative not belonging to the Senate, and of dangerous example.

Mr. President, it is as dangerous to vote on a motion to adjourn as it is to vote on that proposition, and quite as much an infringement of the Constitution and of our prerogatives. Sir, it is not possible to raise a doubt on the question. About its policy, its expediency, men may differ; but as to the right of the Senate, I repeat, it is not possible to raise a doubt.

As it regards any difference between the two Houses, and any danger that we may get into a serious collision with the other branch, it seems to me that adding the deficiency bill to this bill, under the circumstances, is a way out of controversy rather than a way into a new one. I agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio, that if the House of Representatives are disposed to get out of a troublesome controversy, here is a door opened, here is a way by which each House may retain its honor, if it has any feeling of wounded honor. There is certainly nothing offensive to the House of Representatives in putting the deficiency bill as an amendment on this appropriation bill; there can be nothing offensive in it. It is not legislative matter which is obnoxious to objection on an appropriation bill. The practice of both Houses is, when a legislative matter is put on by one House to which the other objects, for the House putting it on to withdraw it; but this is matter pertinent to the bill, it is matter about which the two Houses do not differ, and under these circumstances it seems to me just, right, and expedient that we adopt it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I did not understand the honorable member from Massachusetts when he was up before as denying the right of the Senate to originate precisely such a bill as this amendment would be if it was before us as a bill originated here in the Senate exclusively. I speak it with due respect and the better reading of the honorable member from Massachusetts; but I never have heard the authority of the Senate to institute a bill of this description doubted by anybody. Whether it was advisable, looking to the character of the two Houses, that the Senate should exert that power was another question. By many it was supposed that it would be better that these bills should come in the first instance from the House of Representatives. There were many reasons why perhaps that usage should be pursued; but that the Senate had the power to do it if they thought proper to do it, and that there might be circumstances which render it proper that it should be done, has always seemed to me to be perfectly clear.

In the case to which the honorable member from Connecticut has referred, in which the proposition was introduced into the Senate by the late Mr. Brodhead, and was supported by the Committee on Finance and was supported by almost every member of the Senate, it is very clear that as the Senate was situated at that time and as Congress were at that time situated, it was very advisable that the power which the Senate was admitted to have should be exerted. From the peculiar condition of Congress, it was exceedingly doubtful whether the appropriation bills would be passed at all if the Senate waited until they were originated first and passed by the House of Representatives; and in order to serve the country, in order to preserve for the time our institutions, and to do justice to the many persons who were depending upon the appropriation bills, the honorable member then from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Brodhead,) with the assent of his colleagues on the Finance Committee, thought proper to introduce that resolution, and the Senate acted upon it.

Now let me say a word before I sit down in answer to the suggestion of the honorable member from Massachusetts, that the precedent established by those men who then controlled the Senate upon this subject is not one to be pursued. Why not? They are in arms, he says. Suppose they are; were they not educated men, experienced men, men who had been in the councils of the country for ages, and some of them very acute men, some of them very able men? And among others Mr. Hunter, with whom the President has recently been carrying on a quasi negotiation, was one among the ablest members that this body has ever had. He has sinned now, I admit; but, as I had occasion to say the other day, he was by those by whom he was surrounded much "more sinned against than sinning." He has been led astray, and is now, I have no doubt, if his heart could be read, in the condition in which he is most unwillingly. But my purpose is not to vindicate Mr. Hunter. My purpose is more specially to vindicate the memory of a man who is now dead, to whom I stood in the relation of friend for years before his decease, Mr. Brodhead. Why not follow a precedent that Mr. Brodhead had anything to do with establishing? He was a lawyer of very respectable ability. He was a patriotic man, exceedingly patriotic; and I say in justice to his memory—and it may perhaps make his memory more acceptable to the honorable member from Massachusetts—that the honorable member himself was not more opposed to the course pursued by those southern gentlemen than the man whose memory he has unwittingly, as I think, aspersed. I speak knowingly when I say that Mr. Brodhead labored day and night to prevent the fatal course which those men thought proper to adopt, and from the moment that it was done, up to the last moment when he left this world, he continued not only to lament but to condemn it; and with all the respect that I may feel for the intelligence of the honorable member from Massachusetts, if Mr. Brodhead was not his equal in general literature, if because he was comparatively poor and had a family to support he was obliged to give his time almost exclusively to his profession, I say that so far as professional ability was concerned, high as I may esteem that of the honorable member from Massachusetts, Mr. Brodhead was at least his equal, and just as competent to decide upon the true interpretation to be given to this or any other clause of the Constitution as any member of this body.

I have said this, Mr. President, because, as I said just now, I stood in the relation of friend to a man who I know was patriotic; not because he agreed with me politically as to the manner in which the Government was to be administered—he was a Democrat always; I never—but as far as his patriotism is concerned, from the moment when my acquaintance with him commenced up to the last moment that I saw him, which was a month or two before he died, his was as pure and perfect as the feeling can be in the bosom of the honorable member from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no desire to protract this discussion, and I am sure that it has gone much beyond anything that I could have anticipated. I shall not follow the Senator from Maryland in the topics, personal or general, which he has introduced. I have no motive to enter upon any criticism of the gentleman to whom he has referred, but I was his associate in this Chamber, and I remember well his position on all critical questions of the time. Perhaps, on that account, I was more familiar with him than the Senator from Maryland. However, let that pass. I do not wish to add to the burden which may perhaps rest upon his memory. The Senator could say less of the other authority. I do not wish even to refer to him. I merely call attention to it to put it aside. I shall not follow the Senator.

Nor, again, am I disposed to follow the Senator from Connecticut in the graver topics which he introduced. I had already said enough perhaps to elucidate the idea which I tried to present. The Senator certainly has exaggerated what I intended to say; I did not intend to present the case as strongly as he makes me present it; and yet I am obliged to meet the Senator on one question. He says that the power of the Senate to originate an appropriation bill is beyond all doubt; nobody can doubt it. Why, sir, the records of this body show that it has been doubted, and by some of the most eminent Senators who have been here. I quoted the words of one of our most eminent Senators. He more than doubted it. Let me add, I more than doubt it. I know full well that the language of the Constitution is not perfectly clear; it is perhaps ambiguous; it requires interpretation; but I do know that there is an unbroken usage of this Government from its beginning down to 1856, and that is enough for me. Even if there were a power in those ambiguous words of the Constitution, I should submit that it was perhaps lost by non-user. Senators know very well that a power that has not been used for more than half a century is a power that we might well hesitate to use. That is all that I wish to suggest.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think that I concur in the views of the Senator from Massachusetts, that if we move to put the deficiency bill upon which the controversy has arisen between the Senate and the House of Representatives upon this appropriation bill, we shall raise another issue, and an issue upon which the consciences and the judgments of the House may sustain them in their action. But if we hold upon the deficiency bill to the issue made on that, and hold it by itself, we have a clear, defined issue upon which I have no doubt that the heart, and the conscience, and the judgment of the House will be with us and against themselves when it comes to be discussed. There is perhaps a little feeling of pride, because a resolution has passed and the money has been appropriated by some of the officials; but the danger is that if we put the deficiency bill on to the legislative bill, we may change the issue, which is now clear and distinct, about which there can be no question, into an issue that the House may say and some of them conscientiously believe that we are trespassing on their constitutional prerogative. Now, without going into the discussion of that point, I think by this course we shall raise a question we had better avoid. Let us stand distinctly upon our position on the deficiency bill and let us take the responsibility. Let us stand fast, and by a unanimous, united voice of the Senate show that we cannot yield on that point. It is impossible for us to yield and allow the House, contrary to law, to pay their employees twenty per cent. more than the law allows. We cannot yield that without doing the same thing by our employees, and the employees around the House and the Senate are better paid I believe than any other employees of the Government. If we yield as to them, we are compelled to yield as to the whole, and there is no end to it. I do not intend to discuss the question further than to express my hope that the Senator from Ohio will not insist on putting this deficiency bill upon the legislative appropriation bill. Let us meet the issue square on the deficiency bill by itself and pass the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly satisfied that the mode adopted by the Committee on Finance will bring us out of this difficulty without further serious controversy; but if it should be otherwise, if the House of Representatives should insist on amending this amendment of ours, we can at any time recede from it and leave the matter stand as it now stands on the difference between the two Houses. We can recede from this amendment at any time, at any stage of the contest. I assure the Senator from Wisconsin that if he wants to accomplish the purpose he declares, he had better vote this amendment on this appropriation bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to offer the following amendment, to come in on page 8, after line one hundred and seventy-two:

For addition to the Public Printing, Office and the necessary presses, machinery, and fixtures, $61,000.

The Committee on Printing have, with a good deal of reluctance, come to the conclusion to recommend this large appropriation, and the reasons for it perhaps will be as well understood from the reading of the letter of the Superintendent of Public Printing as in any other way. I send the letter to the desk to be read.

The Secretary read the following letter:

OFFICE SUPERINTENDENT PUBLIC PRINTING,
WASHINGTON, February 2, 1865.

DEAR SIR: Your letter making inquiry as to the best means to be adopted to facilitate the public printing has been received, and I hasten to reply.

The Government is the owner of sixty-eight feet front on H street running back one hundred and seventy-five feet. An addition to the present building of fifty-eight feet front (leaving a ten-foot alley for light and passage) and running back seventy-five feet, four stories high, would not exceed $25,000 in cash. This would give room on the ground floor for eighteen Adams book presses if found necessary. I think, however, twelve would be sufficient. These would cost, put up, about $3,000 each. The appropriation necessary for the addition and presses would be $61,000. With this outlay, the public work could be done promptly. After the decrease of work for the Executive Departments, which must take place at the close of the war, a daily record of the proceedings and debates in Congress (similar to the Congressional Globe) could be printed at a much less cost to the Government than the amount now paid for that publication.

I think it much better to thus increase the facilities for doing the press-work in this office than to send it out to be done by the token. The amount of money thus saved would soon refund the amount of the appropriation.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

JOHN D. DEFREES,
Superintendent Public Printing.

Hon. H. B. ANTHONY,
Chairman Committee on Printing, U. S. Senate.

P. S. I hand you an estimate of master builders as to the cost of the building, and the cost of Adams presses as shown in the price list of R. Hoe & Co.

Mr. ANTHONY. One of two things must be done in regard to the public printing: either a larger amount than is now done outside of the office must be done—for a considerable amount is now done outside of the office—or the office must be enlarged. It is the opinion of the Superintendent, who is a very careful man, and I think one of the most economical men connected with the Government, that, at the present rates of printing, the expenditure which is called for by this amendment will be saved in about two years over the cost of doing the work out of the Government building; and if the presses shall not be wanted at the termination of the war they are always of considerable value, and probably would be worth one half or two thirds of their actual cost.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. From the same committee I offer this amendment, to come in after line one hundred and sixty-nine, on page 8:

And the Superintendent of Public Printing is hereby authorized to pay the foreman of the binding the same compensation now paid to the foreman of the printing.

I am as reluctant as any Senator can be to make any increase in salaries. The compensation of this officer now is $1,500; that of the foreman of the printing is $1,800. The Superintendent assures me that $1,800 is as low as is paid by other establishments. The officer whom he has with him, and whom he considers very valuable, has offers to go to private establishments for that compensation. The Senate understands that this compensation is to a skilled laborer, and I have no doubt that the difference between a man capable of doing the work and an ordinary man is a great many times the salary paid.

The amendment was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes 15, noes 16.

Mr. SUMNER. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to move an amendment to come in on page 11, under the head "incidental and contingent expenses of the Department of State," after line two hundred and forty-three:

For the payment of the first annual installment of the proportion contributed by the United States toward the capitalization of the Scheldt dues, to fulfill the stipulation contained in the fourth article of the convention between the United States and Belgium on the 20th of May, 1863, the sum of $55,564 in coin, and such further sum as may be necessary to carry out the stipulations of the convention providing for the payment of interest on the said sum and on the portion of the principal remaining unpaid.

This is based on an estimate that has been furnished to me from the Department of State.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand it is to carry into effect a treaty.

Mr. SUMNER. It is to carry into effect an existing treaty.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I submit this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $10,000 for each Congress, and mileage as provided by the act approved August 16, 1856, and other laws pertaining thereto; and that the provisions of this section shall apply to the present Congress, and each Senator, Representative, and Delegate shall be entitled to receive the difference only between their compensation already received under the law now in force, and the compensation provided by this act; and that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with or repugnant to the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. FOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment. I think that is all the argument it is necessary to present to the Senate.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out that part of it which makes this increase applicable to the present Congress.

Mr. COLLAMER. I hope the amendment now proposed will not be sustained. If the pay is to be increased I think we who are now suffering ought to have the benefit of it. My opinion is against the whole proposition; but I think if it is entertained we should not be excluded from it.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if the amendment is in order.

Mr. FOOT, and others. Never mind; let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the call will proceed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Hendricks, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Wright—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Pomeroy, and Van Winkle—10.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the public lands in the State of Nevada shall, for surveying purposes, be attached to and included in the surveying district of California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. There will be a slight verbal amendment now necessary. On page 20, in line four hundred and seventy-two, I move to strike out "Nevada," and in line four hundred and seventy-eight to insert "and Nevada" after "California."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those verbal amendments will be made, to carry out the previous vote of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the bill by striking out lines eight hundred and fifty-nine, eight hundred and sixty, eight hundred and sixty-one, eight hundred and sixty-two, and eight hundred and sixty-three.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

For legal assistance and other necessary expenditures in the disposal of private land claims in California, $10,000.

For special and other extraordinary expenses of California land claims, $10,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. We have from first to last appropriated between two and three hundred thousand dollars for the settlement of these land claims. I think it is time we stopped it. The "legal assistance" which is here provided for is not only legal assistance in California, where the claims originate, but assistance in the Supreme Court of the United States. It has always seemed to me extraordinary that the Attorney General and the Assistant Attorney General have not been entirely competent—perhaps I ought to speak in a different way; I suppose they are competent, I will say willing—to argue all these cases.

Mr. GRIMES. Do they not argue them?

Mr. JOHNSON. No. During the last Administration—and it has been so during the present Administration, as well as I recollect—not a single one of these cases was argued by the Attorney General; and he has paid away as much as $200,000 for assistance. Whatever may have been necessary in the beginning because of the character of these cases, it certainly cannot be necessary now that there should be any extraordinary help. When these cases were first brought before the courts the questions were comparatively new; indeed, perhaps altogether new. They involved the mining laws as they existed under the Spanish and Mexican Governments; and then there were a great many questions of fraud, actual or alleged, which required very great labor either to make out the allegation in point of fact or to disprove it, and that required perhaps very extraordinary efforts which the proper officers of the Government were not in a situation to make. But that is all over now. There is not, as I think, a question that can now arise in any of these cases that has not been so far settled, analogically, at least, by cases that have already been before the Supreme Court, that every Attorney General competent to discharge the duties can very fully represent the interests of the United States; and I have no doubt that the present incumbent of the office, who is a man of ability and a man of great industry, will be found altogether equal to the discharge of these duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move further to amend the bill by striking out the word "one" in the eight hundred and seventieth line and inserting "three;" so as to read, "for traveling expenses of the judge assigned to the tenth circuit, for attending session of the Supreme Court of the United States, $3,000."

Mr. HOWARD. I should like to hear some explanation of this amendment from the honorable Senator from Maryland. It is a very large amount for traveling expenses.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to state why I offered it. The judge of that circuit now, by your recent legislation, is to attend the circuit court in the State of Oregon, and he will have to attend one in Nevada. You give him now $1,000 for the purpose of paying his expenses in coming here. The currency which is used in that country, fortunately for them, is altogether a currency of coin; the notes of the United States are really not negotiable except as an article of barter and sale. As I have understood—not from him; I have heard it from others, but I am sure it is true—the salary, which is $6,000, I think, and then $1,000 for travel, making $7,000, he was obliged to sell, and could only get for it $2,400. Now, it seems to me to be bad policy every way that we should pay a judge of the Supreme Court, whose duties are not only of the highest character to be discharged here, but whose duties require him to go to those three States, only what, in point of fact, in the present condition of the country, is but about twenty-four hundred dollars. I believe the Senators from Nevada and the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] will concur in the opinion which I state that it is altogether inadequate to defray his expenses.

Mr. STEWART. Knowing something about the matter spoken of by the Senator from Maryland, I will state for the information of the Senate that it is much more expensive to travel from here to Nevada or Oregon by the way of California than might at first be supposed. Coming this way, the steamship line on both sides demands coin. I believe that in going from here they take currency from New York to the Isthmus, but on the Pacific side coin is used. Then, in the present condition of traveling, there are many incidental expenses. In going between here and California, a fair average would be at least $200 in coin. If there is any extra baggage, as there always must be with gentlemen traveling, it is twenty cents a pound across the Isthmus. If a gentleman is going to travel continuously, every year, and live for any considerable length of time on the steamers, particularly those on this side, he must have some extras, and must have food that he does not get at the regular table, and he must give something to the servants, unless Vanderbilt's line on this side is reorganized. Perhaps a very healthy man could stand it for one or two trips, but a judge of the Supreme Court cannot live for a term of years and travel over that route without having different supplies from what is ordinarily to be had on the steamships.

I think a gentleman would ordinarily spend in going from here to California, $500 in coin. I do not think that any gentleman in this body could go there and back for less than $1,000 in coin, taking into account all the incidental expenses of the trip. To get that amount of coin would take over $2,000 of your currency. To go from San Francisco to Nevada to hold one term of the court would cost not less than $300 in coin, and about the same to go to Oregon.

Mr. CONNESS. He could not go to Oregon and back for that.

Mr. STEWART. I think it is a very low estimate; $3,000 a year in currency will not defray the necessary traveling expenses of the judge who presides over that circuit. It will no more than place him on an equal footing with the judge on the bench, whose circuit is most remote from this place, but the next to his, and who receives no allowance for traveling fees.

I look at the question in this light: if the Senate is satisfied that this judge ought to have this amount of money in order to enable him to perform the functions which are assigned to him, it is its duty to make this appropriation. I presume the Senate does not wish to call upon a judge of the Supreme Court to defray the legitimate expenses of the Government; that is, to hold courts to accommodate the people and defray his own expenses. If we cannot in that remote region have judges paid so that they shall not be objects of charity, placing themselves under pecuniary and other obligations to litigants as they pass through the country; if we cannot have judges who can by economy live independent of litigants or of borrowing from friends, we had better have no courts. We have had some experiments in paying judges not sufficient to live upon in that western country, and we would not ask for this increase of appropriation if it was not absolutely necessary. If you will not make the necessary appropriation to defray the ordinary expenses of these courts, it is better not to have the courts, or to declare at once that nobody but a man of fortune shall hold a judgeship. I am perfectly confident that a little reflection and a little counting of the cost on the part of the Senate will satisfy every one that $3,000 is as small an allowance as we ought to make, and that the judge in attending upon the duties of this circuit incurs $3,000 of extra expense over the necessary expenses of the judge of any other circuit in the United States.

Mr. NESMITH. I think there is a manifest justice in this amendment, and I hope to see it adopted. When the bill was originally passed which provided for the compensation of the member of the Supreme Court for California, it was declared that in addition to his salary he should have $1,000 a year for traveling expenses. Since that time the currency has not only become very much depreciated, but we have added very largely to his duties. He is now required not only to make the trip from here to California and back annually, but he is compelled to make the trip from San Francisco to Portland in Oregon, and thence returning, to make the trip from San Francisco to the capital of Nevada. This is an increase of duty over what was contemplated by the original law. I think there should be a consequent increase of compensation.

I have had some experience in traveling over that route, and I know that it is utterly impossible for any gentleman to travel from Oregon to Washington city upon $1,000 in the present currency. It may be possible for him to make the trip from New York to Oregon with that amount; but under any circumstances $3,000 will no more than compensate the ordinary expenses of the trip from here to San Francisco, and from San Francisco to Portland, and thence back to San Francisco, and from there to the capital of Nevada, and then back to San Francisco and thence to this city again.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the distinguished member of the Supreme bench for the Pacific States, who discharged his high duties with such distinguished ability, is not in the condition of a member of Congress. A member of Congress from that coast receives a much greater mileage than is provided for even by this amendment, and he is not compelled to return to his constituents during the recess of Congress; but the judge is compelled to hold his courts in California, in Nevada, and in Oregon, during the recess of the Supreme Court. There is no possibility of his evading that duty or avoiding its performance. He is necessarily compelled to make the trip. I introduced a bill some time ago providing that the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States should be allowed the same mileage as members of Congress. I think that is the least we should give them; but inasmuch as the Senate thinks differently from me on that subject I am satisfied to take the best I can get. I trust this amendment will be adopted, so as to afford compensation for the actual traveling expenses.

Mr. HALE. I want to raise a question of order. Is the amendment in order under the 30th rule of the Senate?

Mr. CONNESS. I would not read that rule now. That question was determined yesterday.

Mr. HALE. I rather think not. The 30th rule is that—

"No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was aware of the rule, and is inclined to the opinion that this is not an amendment proposing an additional appropriation. It is an appropriation proposed to be increased, but is not within the rule an additional appropriation, as the Chair understands. The Chair, however, will take the sense of the Senate on the question if the Senator desires.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be read. The Secretary read the amendment, to strike out in line eight hundred and seventy the word "one" and insert "three," so as to make the clause read:

"For traveling expenses of the judge assigned to the tenth circuit for attending session of the Supreme Court of the United States, $3,000."

Mr. HALE. Is not that an additional appropriation?

Mr. CONNESS. I understand the Chair has decided the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the sense of the Senate on the question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like information on this point for myself. The question must have been raised many times in the Senate as to whether an increase of an appropriation already in the bill is prohibited by the rule. Is that an additional appropriation? It certainly is additional in amount; but is it an additional or new appropriation?

Mr. HALE. The words of the rule are, "no amendment proposing additional appropriations."

Mr. CONNESS. As I understand, the Chair has decided the question, and the Senator has not appealed.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand the Chair to have made a decision, but to have said that he would take the sense of the Senate on the point.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand it to be the duty of the Chair to decide, and that the Chair did decide, but said to the Senator that if he appealed the Chair would take the sense of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair gave his own impression; but at the same time said he would take the sense of the Senate, if the Senator desired, which may clearly be done under the rules.

Mr. GRIMES. I trust the Chair will take the sense of the Senate. If the views of the Chair on this occasion are carried out, as I understand them, culminating on the decision made this morning, we shall understand exactly where we are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question in this way: Is this an additional appropriation?

Mr. GRIMES. If it is not, if the point of order is not well taken by the Senator from New Hampshire, I confess I do not understand the English language.

Mr. CONNESS. I regret very much that this new application of the rule is proposed in this case. This slight appropriation is proposed for causes sufficient, I think, as has been stated, and directly after an appropriation of $20,000 applicable to California has been stricken from the bill without any objection from us, showing clearly that our purpose is not to take money from the Treasury and give it to any case applicable to California. Upon a proposition to add a necessary amount to sustain one of the highest magistrates in the land in the performance of a duty to which he is appointed, and to enable him to go to the distant parts of his circuit and to come here annually to transact the important business of his office, this rule is invoked. I trust the Senate will not sustain the point of order. Certainly we give no evidence here of seeking a wasteful appropriation of money for our region of country.

Mr. NESMITH. The provision of the 30th rule just relied on is that "no amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law." Now, there is a law which was passed at the time this judgeship was provided for, making provision for the payment of his salary. Since he was assigned to that position his duties have been augmented by the action of both branches of Congress. It is a question to my mind whether a strict construction of the rule would prohibit this appropriation. The payment of his expenses is provided for by law. It is ascertained that the sum is inadequate. Now we propose to appropriate a sum which is adequate to carry out the very provisions of the law, and not in contravention of the law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire what is the decision of the Chair on the question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair proposes to take the sense of the Senate on the question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought the Chair had decided the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair gave an opinion, but said he would take the sense of the Senate on the question whether the amendment was admissible on the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very much in favor of giving Judge Field an additional allowance for traveling expenses; I have talked with him about it, and therefore would be in favor of this proposition; but if the question of order is submitted to be decided upon the rule, I do not see how any other conclusion can be arrived at but that this is within the rule. The law not only allows him for traveling expenses, but fixes the amount at $1,000. The amount is fixed by law. Now, this is to appropriate money not allowed by law, an additional sum beyond the amount authorized by law; so that if the legal question is submitted to us, I shall be bound to vote that it is within the rule. I can suggest to Senators that it would be very easy to have this matter referred to the Judiciary Committee and have it examined. If the amount is too low, in some subsequent appropriation bill the Judiciary or some other Committee can report the proper amendment. That is the true way. I feel bound by my position to enforce the rule, and if the question is submitted to us, shall decide the question according to the rule as I read it. I think the amendment is clearly out of order under the rule, though I should be glad to vote for the allowance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the amendment be received within the 30th rule?

Mr. STEWART. It seems to me that this is rather a strict construction of this rule. We have increased several appropriations. If the construction now urged be correct, the only thing we can do is to cut out and cut down appropriations after they are reported.

Mr. GRIMES. Those amendments came from committees. This does not come from a committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the honorable Senator from Nevada that the objection is this: it does not come from a committee. A committee may report an amendment raising an amount, but the rule requires that it should be acted on by a committee. Until that is done, it is within the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on receiving the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the question is not on the amendment, but whether it can be received under the rule.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On that proposition I wish to make this suggestion: this is clearly not an additional appropriation but an addition to a proposed appropriation. It is an amendment to a proposed appropriation of the committee. It is a proposed addition instead of an additional appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Before the vote is taken, I will say that it appears to me very clear that it is not in conflict with the rule. I should be entirely confident of that if some of the Senators around me did not entertain a different opinion. To construe the rule as they would have it construed is to place the Senate in this situation: on these general appropriation bills the Senate could do nothing in relation to any of the items except to reduce the amount; they could not increase the amount. I suppose the object of the rule is to prevent any additional item being brought into the appropriation bill, any additional subject. It would be most extraordinary that when we are authorized to amend bills, (for this rule is not against the power of amendment,) when we are authorized to amend appropriation bills as well as other bills, our whole charge over the appropriation bill with reference to the items contained in the bill should be to reduce the amount and not to increase it. If you add a dollar to any single item, it is against the rule, provided it be true that that makes an appropriation within the meaning of the rule. Can that be so? Is that the purpose of the rule? Do the Senate mean to tie up their hands in relation to all the appropriation bills so that they shall consider nothing that does not lessen the amount appropriated for each item?

I do not understand it so. My opinion is that if the item itself is in the bill, if the subject of appropriation is in the bill, you may add to the amount without reference to the restriction of the rule. The whole purpose of providing that an amendment shall come from a committee before it can be incorporated into an appropriation bill in the Senate, is that the committee may decide upon the propriety of introducing some new matter into the bill. That is not proposed here. The bill already proposes to give $1,000 for this purpose. The Senator who makes this point of order supposes that you can reduce the appropriation to any amount, but cannot add a dollar to it, because the addition of a dollar is an additional appropriation. Diminishing it a dollar is in one sense an appropriation; that is, it is appropriating less than the bill appropriated before. I submit to the Senate that there is nothing in the rule inconsistent with the amendment which I have suggested, and I do not understand that there is on the part of the Senate any objection to the amendment upon its merits.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Wilkinson, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Collamer, Davis, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Saulsbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, and Trumbull—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Foot, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Richardson, Riddle, Van Winkle, and Wade—10.

So the Senate decided that the amendment was receivable under the rule.

Mr. HALE. I am opposed to this amendment for one reason, if for no other, and that is, that the amendment on its face does not speak the truth. In saying that, I of course mean no disrespect to the Senator who moves it. I say so because on its face it proposes to give this judge $3,000 for his expenses in traveling to attend the sessions of the Supreme Court, and it is manifest to the Senate, and to everybody else, who will take the trouble to look into it, that the sum already provided by law will pay those expenses.

Mr. JOHNSON. It does not pay anything like them, as the Senator from Nevada has stated.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendment be again read. The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. HALE. It is now proposed to assign him $3,000 for his traveling expenses in attending the sessions of the Supreme Court; and if it shall be read hereafter that that does not cover more than one third of his traveling expenses, we shall be called on to pay more. If the Senate are determined to pay Judge Field this salary, if they think it due to him, I have no objection to it; but I have objection to the Senate voting to pay a man $3,000 for performing a journey which does not cost $1,000. I am opposed to it for that reason, and I am opposed to it because I do not think this is the time to increase salaries. We decided just now by a very large vote not to increase our own salaries. Most of the argument that is presented for this increase to Judge Field might be presented for the increase of our own salaries. The Senate have, not uniformly, but in a great many instances, refused to raise any salary unless it was put in the shape of "the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general;" put in that shape, it has been pretty certain to go through. But I think this is not the time to raise salaries; and if it was, it is not the time to pay for a thing three times what it costs.

Mr. CONNESS. I regret to be compelled to say anything in this case which shall amount to a contradiction of what a Senator has said in debate; but I am bound to state that the Senator from New Hampshire is in error and mistaken in what he has stated in regard to the expenses of the persons spoken of and to whom this amendment is applicable. And I would remind the Senator that, although he sometimes advocates economy, as he does at present, such is not always his course. Recently, if I am not mistaken—I saw it in a printed record—he had $2,000 paid him for going to Halifax.

Mr. HALE. I call the Senator to order. I do not wish to get into any personal controversy here, but I want the rules enforced. I raise a question of order.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his point of order.

Mr. HALE. The point of order is that he has no right to impeach my motives or conduct in any way, nor to refer to my private history for an illustration of his argument.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe I have not impeached the Senator's motives. I certainly declare that that was not my intention. I think if the Senator has raised a question which involves a matter of expenditure he should not be an exception to the rule which illustrates it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the point of order is insisted upon, it is not debatable. If the Senator from California would confine himself to the matter before the Senate, the Senator from New Hampshire perhaps would not insist on the point of order.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose it is in order to state that the Senator recently advocated the increase of the salary of the consul at Halifax. I am satisfied (and I say that to the credit of the Senator) that he would never have done that if he had not ascertained it to be necessary, perhaps by going there. I hope I do not trench on the rules of order in stating this much. This economy that is spasmodic in its character is not the kind to follow.

I have called the attention of the Senate to the fact that we consented to a motion to strike out $20,000 of appropriations from this very bill applicable to our State, thus illustrating clearly that our purpose is not to expend public money in behalf of persons from that country. I know that if the Senator was as well aware as I am of the expenses incurred by this magistrate, he would not take the position he has taken here. I know that from his generosity of character. And I will take leave to say here that there is nothing more difficult than to have gentlemen on this side of the continent understand that it costs more to travel, more to live, more to buy any necessary or comfort or luxury connected with life, on the Pacific coast than it does here. This magistrate has not only to travel back and forth annually and live at this expensive capital, where others have got to live, but he goes to Oregon, he goes to Nevada, and the incidental expenses connected with his performance of duty cannot be and are not paid by his salary and the mileage allowed. It is within my personal knowledge, which I have avoided stating here thus far, that he cannot sustain himself and does not sustain himself from the salary that he receives. I will not state here the details and invade his privacy from whence it comes. Suffice it to say that a purer-minded gentleman does not exist on earth. I say it is not right to impose absolute suffering and want upon such an officer through what is very near akin to parsimony.

We are not here as advocates of increase of salaries or the wasteful expenditure of money. It cannot be charged upon us. I regret very much that I have been called upon even to respond thus in reply to the Senator. I will say, before I take my seat, that I had no intention of invading the courtesies due to the Senator, nor of impeaching his motives. I have no doubt that the Senator on the occasion to which I referred rendered a quid pro quo.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock. ["No," "No."] I desire to state that the Senator who has this bill in charge, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, is exceedingly anxious to get through with it this week and to-morrow is assigned for District of Columbia business.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us vote on this amendment.

Mr. WILKINSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to ask whether the Senator from Ohio, who has charge of this bill, desires the Senate to remain here until it shall be disposed of. I shall be governed by his views on that subject, because he knows what the wants of the country are in reference to this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we can pass the bill to-morrow, I shall be perfectly content; I think we ought to pass it this week; we are getting behind hand.

Mr. HOWARD, and others. We will pass it to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. But the special order for to-morrow is in the way.

Mr. COLLAMER. This business is more important than that.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the understanding that I shall have to-morrow for this bill, I have no objection. ["Agreed."]

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the call for the yeas and nays be withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call may be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

The motion of Mr. WILKINSON was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 10, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced as the select committee appointed under the resolution of the day before yesterday to investigate charges against the Patent Bureau, Messrs. HIGBY, FRANK, CRAVENS, ANCONA, and NORTON.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, one of their clerks, announcing that they had passed a bill (S. No. 424) entitled "An act to facilitate the collection of certain debts due the United States;" in which they requested the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate be appointed by that body to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by that House, to wait upon Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, and to notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1865; and also to notify Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, that he has been duly elected Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1865.

And ordered, That Mr. TRUMBULL be the said committee on the part of the Senate.

PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to propound an inquiry to the Chair touching the privileges of certain members to the floor. I understand that the House last evening passed a resolution ordering the arrest of certain members who were absent upon a call of the House. I am not able myself to give to that resolution an interpretation which satisfies me that those members who are under arrest by virtue of that resolution have a right to participate in the proceedings of the House until they have purged themselves of contempt. The question I desire to propound to the Chair is, whether the members absent last night will be permitted, under that resolution, to participate in the proceedings of the House to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of nothing that would prevent them from participating in the proceedings of the House until one o'clock, or as soon thereafter as possible—five minutes after one—when they are to be presented at the bar by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

BRIDGE OVER THE OHIO RIVER.

On motion of Mr. ARNOLD, by unanimous consent, bill of the Senate No. 413, to establish a bridge across the Ohio river at Cincinnati, Ohio, a post route, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia, presented resolutions of the Legislature of West Virginia, asking an amendment of the act to provide a national currency, approved June 4, 1864; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. COLE, of California, from the select committee on the Pacific railroad, to whom was referred the bill of the House (No. 593) granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of California, reported back the same; which was recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

CENSUS REPORT.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Whereas we are now in the year of our Lord 1865, and it appears nowise likely that the remaining portions of the report of the census of 1860 will be completed before the next census is taken: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to consider the expediency of a joint resolution ordering a discontinuance of all work on the report of the census of 1860, after the volume now in the hands of the printer is completed.

Mr. ANCONA. I object.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation to pay indebtedness incurred on account of Indian affairs in Arizona; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior recommending that appropriations made for the Chippewas of Lake Superior under treaty stipulations be made special, &c.; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

Mr. ORTII submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed thirty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Patents, twenty thousand for the members of the House of Representatives and ten thousand for the Commissioner of Patents.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS.

Mr. ANCONA, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mileage be directed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the rate of mileage to ten cents per mile, with a view to equalizing the compensation of members, and that they be directed to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ANCONA moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Levely, widow of Henry Levely, captain of the private armed schooner Nonsuch, praying for allowance of arrears of pension; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

D. H. FITCH, AND OTHERS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported adversely upon the petitions of D. H. Fitch, D. W. Lunsford, and sundry other soldiers of the war of 1812, praying for the allowance of pensions; and moved that the committee be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be laid on the table.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Patents, reported adversely upon the petition of Sarah P. Mather; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PHEBE ANN FISK.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Patents, also reported back Senate bill No. 112, being "An act for the relief of the heirs of Almon D. Fisk, deceased," with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill was read at length. It provides that Phebe Ann Fisk, or the heirs of Almon D. Fisk, deceased, who obtained a patent for a new and useful improvement in coffins, dated November 14, 1848, for fourteen years, which has now expired, shall be authorized to apply, within thirty days after the approval of this act, for an extension of said patent for seven years, which application must be decided by the Commissioner of Patents within ninety days after it shall have been filed; provided that nothing in the act shall give authority to prosecute persons for damages for use of the patented article between the expiration of the patent and the approval of this act.

Mr. NOBLE moved the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NOBLE] will not call the previous question on a bill which taxes the ashes of our dead soldiers.

Mr. NOBLE. I will withdraw the motion for the previous question, and ask that the accompanying report be read.

The report was read.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, Congress having changed the policy of the country in relation to the reissue of patents, the case ought to be a very strong one wherever we are called upon to give relief in these cases. Now I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NOBLE] if the fact is not true that parties are now engaged all over this country in the manufacture of this article, and whether anything in the bill protects the rights of the persons thus manufacturing? Heretofore it has been usual when there has been a lapse of patent, and parties have engaged in the manufacture of patented articles, to give them a release and protection against the prosecution of the patentee.

Mr. NOBLE. I would answer the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] by saying that it is not true that parties all over the country have engaged in the manufacture of this improvement, nor is it true that they or any of them thus engaged object to the reissue of this patent. Neither is it true that this case comes within the spirit of the new rule in reference to the issuing of patents. This patent was issued under the old law, and in all such cases patents are even now suffered to be extended under the patent law. This widow, who has not been recompensed for the invention of her husband, made application, as I have stated, in due form of law; but, by reason of a mistake made by the Commissioner of Patents, the extension was not granted. The Commissioner of Patents to-day acknowledges that mistake. Any lawyer who understands the facts must agree that this woman is entitled by law to this extension.

Mr. MORRILL. From the reading of the report I understand the facts to be very different from what they would appear by the statement of the gentleman from Ohio. He says that this patent was not reissued by reason of a mistake of the Commissioner. Infer from the report that it was not reissued in consequence of the fraud of the applicant in claiming as the invention more than could rightfully be claimed.

Mr. NOBLE. Mr. Speaker, in answer to that allegation I will say that I do not so understand the case. The original patent was reissued in 1860, and that reissue embraced no more than was contained in the original patent. But the Commissioner, when the objection was made, did decide that it embraced more; the objection was suffered to prevail, to the detriment of the applicant for the extension. These are the facts of the case. The Commissioner is satisfied to-day that he made an error, and so are all the members of the committee. The object of this bill is, not to give this woman any more than justly belongs to her, but to reinstate her legally in the possession of her rights, of which she was deprived by a mistake of the Commissioner.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that the previous question will not be seconded. This question is of more importance than some members appear to think it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order pending a demand for the previous question.

On seconding the previous question there were, on a division—yeas 48, noes 37; no quorum voting.

The Speaker, under the rule, ordered tellers; and Mr. NOBLE, and Mr. WASHBURN of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 59, noes 36.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid on the table; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 86, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Ficenian Clarke, Cole, Dawes, Deming, Eckley, Farnsworth, Garfield, Hughes, Hooper, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Knox, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Morrill, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Porham, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Spalding, Starr, Stevens, Upson, Wadsworth, Eliza B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Worthington—51.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Broome, James S. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Donnelly, Briggs, Dumont, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Charles H. Harris, Herrick, Asabel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, King, Law, Lazer, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Mallory, McAllister, McBride, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, James R. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Odell, John O'Neill, Perry, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Thayer, Thomas, Townsend, Van Valkenburgh, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Yeaman—86.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Brooks, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Denison, Dixon, Eden, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, Knapp, Loan, Marcy, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Patterson, Pendleton, Pike, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sloan, Smith, Stuart, Sweat, Tracy, Voorhees, Ward, Chilton A. White, Wilder, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—45.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The question recurred on ordering the main question to be put.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask permission to make a statement in reference to this matter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois is in arrest for contempt of the House, and I insist that he is not entitled to take part in our proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided in reference to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] that the order of the House does not operate until the Sergeant-at-Arms, at five minutes past one o'clock, presents the members in arrest at the bar of the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] answered on the second call, and is not included in the order of arrest.

The main question was then ordered to be put. The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. NOBLE demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. NOBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. WHALEY. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions, that it may be recommitted and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE. That is not a private bill; it is a public bill, and is not in order to-day. I object.

MAJOR HENRY M'FARLAND.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back House joint resolution No. 145, for the relief of Major Henry McFarland.

The joint resolution provides that $1,000 be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Major Henry McFarland, that being the amount expended by him as a reward for the detection and conviction of a clerk who had stolen a large amount of Government money.

The report states that Major McFarland, an additional paymaster of the Army, on the evening of August 4, 1863, had stolen from his room in Washington city the sum of $40,000, (United States Treasury notes,) which he had on that day drawn from the Treasury for the payment of United States troops; that Major McFarland was under orders to go to the Army with this money on the following morning; that the money was necessarily drawn on that day, as he could not get it in the morning in time for his departure, and the regulations of the Treasury Department were such that he was not allowed to deposit this money after it was drawn; that this money was stolen by the clerk of Major McFarland, in whose custody he left this money for a short time while McFarland went to the post office, about half past eight o'clock p. m.; that the money was in the paymaster's safe; that immediately upon discovering the theft McFarland offered a reward of $1,000 for the detection of the thief and recovery of the money; and that, stimulated by this offer, the Metropolitan police of Washington detected the thief and recovered the money.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is one point to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois. I do not see any statement of the circumstances under which this clerk was employed. What reason had McFarland to believe he was a man of integrity to whom could be intrusted this money?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. These clerks are employed with the approval of the War Department. The Clerk will read what I have marked.

The Clerk read, as follows:

The court of inquiry beforementioned reported that the clerk [McFarland] "had a proper reputation at the time his services were engaged by Major McFarland," and that all due precautions were observed in selecting him; also "that it is a custom of the service, and is necessary for paymasters to intrust their clerks at times with the custody of safes wherein moneys are contained."

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, September 18, 1863.

SIR: I am directed by the Secretary of War to say that the court of inquiry in your case has exonerated you from any blame for the loss of the money stolen by your clerk.

By direction of the Secretary you will report for duty to the Paymaster General of the Army.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. The clerk was tried by court-martial, and convicted and sentenced to Albany penitentiary. He had been previously employed by the Department, and McFarland had a right to suppose that he was an honest man. The money was recovered. And I am informed that Colonel Baker also offered a reward of $1,000. Major McFarland paid this money, which it is proposed to refund to him.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GANSON. I wish to inquire whether these detectives in the employ of the Government were paid for their services at the same time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, sir; it was the Metropolitan police that received the reward.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. The money was paid over to the parties who detected the scoundrels.

The question being on seconding the demand for the previous question,

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ROLLINS of New Hampshire and ANCONA were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas sixty-eight; noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded. The main question was ordered to be put, and under the operation thereof the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I demand the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question recurring on the passage of the resolution,

Mr. J. C. ALLEN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. J. C. ALLEN and Mr. FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 49, noes 49.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative, and the resolution is passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 431) for the relief of Solomon Wadsworth; and a resolution (H. R. No. 106) providing for the compilation of a Congressional Directory at each session of Congress; when the Speaker signed the same.

PROCEEDINGS UNDER THE CALL.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the Sergeant-at-Arms will execute the order of the House of last evening. The Clerk will report the resolution under which the House is now about to act.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring the members now absent without leave before the bar of the House at one o'clock to-morrow, Friday, February 10, 1865, or as soon thereafter as possible, and that they be required to show cause why they shall not be declared in contempt of the House, and abide the order of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. It is to make a report from the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting upon a question of privilege at the present time.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the consent of the House to make a report to be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the pending business be postponed until the message of the President is presented to the House?

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Would it not be in order to move to postpone this privileged question?

The SPEAKER. It would; and then a motion to go to the Speaker's table would be in order, when the President's message would be first reached.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to postpone the privileged question before the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The first business taken from the Speaker's table was a message from the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives:

In response to your resolution of the 8th instant, requesting information in relation to a conference recently held in Hampton Roads, I have the honor to state that on the day of that date I gave Francis P. Blair, sr., a card written as follows:

Allow the bearer, F. P. Blair, sr., to pass our lines, go South, and return. A. LINCOLN.
December 23, 1864.

That at the time I was informed that Mr. Blair sought the card as a means of getting to Richmond, Virginia, but he was given no authority to act or speak for the Government; nor was I informed of anything he would say or do on his own account or otherwise. Afterward Mr. Blair told me that he had been to Richmond, and had seen Mr. Jefferson Davis; and he (Mr. B.) at the same time left with me a manuscript letter, as follows:

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, January 12, 1865.

Sir: I have deemed it proper, and probably desirable to you, to give you, in this form, the substance of remarks made by me to be repeated by you to President Lincoln, &c. I have no disposition to find obstacles in forms, and am willing, now as heretofore, to enter into negotiations for the restoration of peace; am ready to send a commission whenever I have reason to suppose it will be received, or to receive a commission if the United States Government shall choose to send one.

That notwithstanding the rejection of our former offers, I would, if you could promise that a commissioner, minister, or other agent would be received, appoint one immediately, and renew the effort to enter into conference, with a view to secure peace to the two countries.

Yours, &c., JEFFERSON DAVIS.

F. P. BLAIR, Esq.
Afterward, and with the view that it should be shown to Mr. Davis, I wrote and delivered to Mr. Blair a letter as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 18, 1865.

Sir: You having shown me Mr. Davis's letter to you of the 12th instant, you may say to him that I have constantly been, am now, and shall continue, ready to receive any agent whom he or any other influential person now resisting the national authority may informally send me, with the view of securing peace to the people of our one common country.

Yours, &c., A. LINCOLN.

F. P. BLAIR, Esq.
Afterward Mr. Blair dictated for and authorized me to make an entry on the back of my retained copy of the letter last above received, which entry is as follows:

[Indorsement.] JANUARY 28, 1865.

To-day Mr. Blair tells me that on the 21st instant he delivered to Mr. Davis the original of which the within is a copy, and left it with him; that at the time of delivering it, Mr. Davis read it over twice in Mr. Blair's presence, at the close of which he (Mr. Blair) remarked that the part about "our one common country" related to the part of Mr. D.'s letter about "the two countries," to which Mr. D. replied that he so understood it. A. LINCOLN.

Afterward the Secretary of War placed in my hands the following telegram, indorsed by him, as appears:

[Cipher.]

OFFICE UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH,
WAR DEPARTMENT.

The following telegram received at Washington, January 29, 1865, from headquarters army of James, 6.30 p. m., January 29, 1865:

To Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

The following dispatch just received from Major General

Parke, who refers it to me for my action. I refer it to you in Lieutenant General Grant's absence.

E. O. C. ORD,

Major General Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF POTOMAC,

4 p. m., January 29, 1865.

Major General E. O. C. ORD, Headquarters Army of James:

The following dispatch is forwarded to you for your action. Since I have had no knowledge of General Grant's having had any understanding of this kind, I refer the matter to you as the ranking officer at present in the two armies.

JOHN G. PARKE,

Major General Commanding.

HEADQUARTERS NINTH ARMY CORPS, January 29.

Major General JOHN G. PARKE,

Headquarters Army of the Potomac:

Alexander H. Stephens, R. M. T. Hunter, and J. A. Campbell desire to cross my lines in accordance with an understanding claimed to exist with Lieutenant General Grant, on their way to Washington as peace commissioners. Shall they be admitted? They desire an early answer to come through immediately. Would like to reach City Point to-night, if they can. If they cannot do that, they would like to come through at 10 a. m. to-morrow morning.

O. B. WILSON,

Major General Commanding Ninth Corps.

Respectfully referred to the President for such instructions as he may be pleased to give.

EDWIN M. STANTON,

Secretary of War.

[8.30 p. m., January 29, 1865.]

It appears that about the time of placing the foregoing telegram in my hands, the Secretary of War dispatched General Ord as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON CITY, January 29, 1865, 10 p. m.

Major General ORD:

This Department has no knowledge of any understanding by General Grant to allow any person to come within his lines as commissioners of any sort. You will therefore allow no one to come into your lines under such character or professions until you receive the President's instructions, to whom your telegram will be submitted for his directions.

EDWIN M. STANTON,

Secretary of War.

[Sent in cipher at 2 a. m., 30th.]

Afterward, by my directions, the Secretary of War telegraphed General Ord as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON, D. C., 10 a. m., January 30, 1865.

Major General E. O. C. ORD, Headquarters Army James:

By direction of the President you are instructed to inform the three gentlemen, Messrs. Stephens, Hunter, and Campbell, that a messenger will be dispatched to them at or near where they now are without unnecessary delay.

EDWIN M. STANTON,

Secretary of War.

Afterward I prepared and put into the hands of Major Thomas T. Eckert, the following instructions and message:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1865.

Sir: You will proceed with the documents placed in your hands, and on reaching General Ord, will deliver him the letter addressed to him by the Secretary of War, then by General Ord's assistance procure an interview with Messrs. Stephens, Hunter, and Campbell, or any of them, deliver to him or them the paper on which your own letter is written, note on the copy which you retain the time of delivery and to whom delivered; receive their answer in writing, waiting a reasonable time for it, and which, if it contain their decision to come through without further condition, will be your warrant to ask General Ord to pass them through as directed in the letter of the Secretary of War to him. If, by their answer, they decline to come, or propose other terms, do not have them passed through. And this being your whole duty, return and report to me.

Yours truly, A. LINCOLN.

Major T. T. ECKERT.

GENTLEMEN: I am instructed by the President of the United States to place this paper in your hands, with the information that if you pass through the United States military lines it will be understood that you do so for the purpose of an informal conference on the basis of that letter, a copy of which is on the reverse side of this sheet, and that if you choose to pass on under such understanding, and so notify me in writing, I will procure the commanding general to pass you through the lines and to Fortress Monroe, under such military precautions as he may deem prudent, and at which place you will be met in due time by some person or persons, for the purpose of such informal conference; and further, that you shall have protection, conduct, and safe return, in all events.

THOMAS T. ECKERT,

Major and A. D. C.

MESSRS. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, J. A. CAMPBELL, and R. M. T. HUNTER.

CITY POINT, VIRGINIA, February 1, 1865.

WASHINGTON, January 18, 1865.

Sir: You having shown me Mr. Davis's letter to you of the 12th instant, you may say to him that I have constantly been, am now, and shall continue, ready to receive any agent whom he or any other influential person now resisting the national authority may informally send me with the view of securing peace to the people of our one common country.

Yours, &c., A. LINCOLN.

F. P. BLAIR, Esq.

Afterward, but before Major Eckert had departed, the following dispatch was received from General Grant:

[Cipher.]

OFFICE UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH,
WAR DEPARTMENT.

The following telegram, received at Washington, January 31, 1865, from City Point, Virginia, 10.30 a. m., January, 1865:

His Excellency ABRAHAM LINCOLN,
President of the United States:

The following communication was received here yesterday:

PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, January 30, 1865.

Sir: We desire to pass your lines under safe conduct, and to proceed to Washington, to hold a conference with President Lincoln upon the subject of the existing war, and with a view of ascertaining upon what terms it may be terminated, in pursuance of the course indicated by him in his letter to Mr. Blair of January 18, 1865, of which we presume you have a copy; and if not, we wish to see you in person, if convenient, and to confer with you on the subject.

Very respectfully yours,

ALEX. H. STEPHENS,

J. A. CAMPBELL,

R. M. T. HUNTER.

Lieutenant General U. S. GRANT,
Commanding Armies United States.

I have sent directions to receive these gentlemen, and expect to have them at my headquarters this evening, awaiting your instructions.

U. S. GRANT,

Lieut. Gen. Commanding Armies United States.

This, it will be perceived, transferred General Ord's agency in the matter to General Grant. I resolved, however, to send Major Eckert forward with his message, and accordingly telegraphed General Grant as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1865.

Major General GRANT, City Point, Virginia:

A messenger is coming to you on the business contained in your dispatch. Detain the gentlemen in comfortable quarters until he arrives, and then act upon the message he brings as far as applicable, it having been made up to pass through General Ord's hands, and when the gentlemen were supposed to be beyond our lines. A. LINCOLN.
[Sent in cipher at 1.30 p. m.]

When Major Eckert departed, he bore with him a letter of the Secretary of War to General Grant, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 30, 1865.

GENERAL: The President desires that you will please procure for the bearer, Major Thomas T. Eckert, an interview with Messrs. Stephens, Hunter, and Campbell, and if, on his return to you, he requests it, pass them through our lines to Fortress Monroe, by such route and under such military precautions as you may deem prudent, giving them protection and comfortable quarters while there, and that you let none of this have any effect upon your movements or plans.

By order of the President:

EDWIN M. STANTON,

Secretary of War.

Lieutenant General GRANT, Commanding, &c.

Supposing the proper point to be then reached, I dispatched the Secretary of State with the following instructions, Major Eckert, however, going ahead of him:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,

WASHINGTON, January 31, 1865.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State:

You will proceed to Fortress Monroe, Virginia, there to meet and informally confer with Messrs. Stephens, Hunter, and Campbell, on the basis of my letter to F. P. Blair, Esq., of January 18, 1865, a copy of which you have. You will make known to them that three things are indispensable, to wit:

1. The restoration of the national authority throughout all the States.
2. No receding by the Executive of the United States on the slavery question from the position assumed thereon in the late annual message to Congress, and in preceding documents.
3. No cessation of hostilities short of an end of the war and the disbanding of all the forces hostile to the Government.

You will inform them that all propositions of theirs not inconsistent with the above will be considered and passed upon in a spirit of sincere liberality. You will hear all they may choose to say, and report it to me. You will not assume to definitely consummate anything.

Yours, &c.,

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

On the day of its date the following telegram was sent to General Grant:

WAR DEPARTMENT,

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1865.

Lieutenant General GRANT, City Point, Virginia:

Let nothing which is transpiring change, hinder, or delay your military movements or plans.

A. LINCOLN.

[Sent in cipher at 9.30 a. m.]

Afterward the following was received from General Grant:

[In cipher.]

OFFICE UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH,

WAR DEPARTMENT.

The following telegram received at Washington 2.30 February 1, 1865, from City Point, Virginia, February 1, 12.30 p. m.:

His Excellency A. LINCOLN, President of the United States:

Your dispatch received. There will be no armistice in consequence of the presence of Mr. Stephens and others within our lines. The troops are kept in readiness to move at the shortest notice, if occasion should justify it.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant General.

To notify Major Eckert that the Secretary of State would be at Fortress Monroe, and to put them in communication, the following dispatch was sent:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1865.

Major T. T. ECKERT, care General Grant,
City Point, Virginia:

Call at Fortress Monroe, and put yourself under the direction of Mr. S., whom you will find there.

A. LINCOLN.

On the morning of the 2d instant the following telegrams were received by me, respectively from the Secretary of State and Major Eckert:

FORTRESS MONROE, VIRGINIA,
11.30 p. m. February 1, 1864.

The President of the United States:

Arrived at 10 this evening. Richmond party not here. I remain here.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CITY POINT, VIRGINIA, 10 p. m., February 1, 1865.

His Excellency A. LINCOLN, President United States:

I have the honor to report the delivery of your communication and my letter at 4.15 this afternoon, to which I received a reply at 6 p. m., but not satisfactory.

At 8 p. m. the following note, addressed to General Grant, was received:

CITY POINT, VIRGINIA, February 1, 1865.

SIR: We desire to go to Washington city to confer informally with the President personally in reference to the matters mentioned in his letter to Mr. Blair of the 18th January ultimo, without any personal compromise on any question in the letter. We have the permission to do so from the authorities at Richmond.

Very respectfully, yours,

ALEX. H. STEPHENS,
R. M. T. HUNTER,
J. A. CAMPBELL.

To Lieutenant General Grant.

At 9.30 p. m. I notified them that they could not proceed further unless they complied with the terms expressed in my letter. The point of meeting designated in above note would not, in my opinion, be insisted upon. Think Fortress Monroe would be acceptable. Having complied with my instructions, I will return to Washington to-morrow, unless otherwise ordered.

THOS. T. ECKERT, Major, &c.

On reading this dispatch of Major Eckert, I was about to recall him and the Secretary of State when the following telegram of General Grant to the Secretary of War was shown me:

[In cipher.]

OFFICE UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH,
WAR DEPARTMENT.

The following telegram received at Washington 4.35 a. m., February 2, 1865, from City Point, Virginia, February 1, 1865:

Hon. EDWIN M. STANTON, Secretary of War:

Now that the interview between Major Eckert, under his written instructions, and Mr. Stephens and party has ended, I will state confidentially, but not officially, to become a matter of record, that I am convinced, upon conversation with Messrs. Stephens and Hunter, that their intentions are good and their desire sincere to restore peace and union. I have not felt myself at liberty to express even views of my own or to account for my reticence. This has placed me in an awkward position, which I could have avoided by not seeing them in the first instance. I fear now their going back without any expression from any one in authority will have a bad influence. At the same time, I recognize the difficulties in the way of receiving these informal commissioners at this time, and do not know what to recommend. I am sorry, however, that Mr. Lincoln cannot have an interview with the two named in this dispatch, if not all three now within our lines. Their letter to me was all that the President's instructions contemplated to secure their safe conduct if they had used the same language to Major Eckert.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant General.

This dispatch of General Grant changed my purpose, and, accordingly, I telegraphed him and the Secretary of State respectively, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 2, 1865.

Lieutenant General GRANT, City Point, Virginia:

Say to the gentlemen I will meet them personally at Fortress Monroe, as soon as I can get there.

A. LINCOLN.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 2, 1865.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Fortress Monroe, Virginia:

Induced by a dispatch from General Grant, I join you at Fortress Monroe as soon as I can come.

A. LINCOLN.

[Sent in cipher at 9 a. m.]

Before starting, the following dispatch was shown me. I proceeded nevertheless:

OFFICE UNITED STATES MILITARY TELEGRAPH,
WAR DEPARTMENT.

The following telegram, received at Washington, February 2, 1865, from City Point, Virginia, 9 a. m., February 2, 1865:

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Fortress Monroe:

[Copy to Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War, Washington.]

The gentlemen have accepted the proposed terms, and will leave for Fortress Monroe at 9 30 a. m.

U. S. GRANT,
Lieutenant General.

On the night of the 2d I reached Hampton Roads, found the Secretary of State and Major Eckert on a steamer anchored off the shore, and learned that the Richmond gentlemen were on another steamer anchored off shore, in the Roads, and that the Secretary of State had not yet seen or communicated with them. I ascertained that Major Eckert had literally complied with his instructions, and I saw, for the first time, the answer of the Richmond gentlemen to him, which, in his dispatch to me of the 1st, he characterizes as "not satisfactory." That answer is as follows:

CITY POINT, VIRGINIA, February 1, 1865.

MAJOR: Your note, delivered by yourself this day, has been considered. In reply, we have to say that we were furnished with a copy of a letter of President Lincoln to Francis P. Blair, Esq., of the 18th of January ultimo, another copy of which is appended to your note. Our instructions are contained in a letter of which the following is a copy:

RICHMOND, January 28, 1865.

In conformity with the letter of Mr. Lincoln, of which the foregoing is a copy, you are to proceed to Washington city for informal conference with him upon the issues involved in the existing war, and for the purpose of securing peace to the two countries.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The substantial object to be obtained by the informal conference is to ascertain upon what terms the existing war can be terminated honorably.

Our instructions contemplate a personal interview between President Lincoln and ourselves at Washington city, but, with explanation, we are ready to meet any person or persons that President Lincoln may appoint, at such place as he may designate. Our earnest desire is that a just and honorable peace may be agreed upon, and we are prepared to receive or submit propositions which may, possibly, lead to the attainment of that end.

Very respectfully, yours,

ALEX. H. STEPHENS,
R. M. T. HUNTER,
JNO. A. CAMPBELL.

THOMAS T. ECKERT, Major and A. D. C.

A note of these gentlemen, subsequently addressed to General Grant, has already been given in Major Eckert's dispatch of the 1st instant.

I also here saw, for the first time, the following note, addressed by the Richmond gentlemen to Major Eckert:

CITY POINT, VIRGINIA, February 2, 1865.

MAJOR: In reply to your statement that your instructions did not allow you to alter the conditions upon which a passport could be given to us, we say that we are willing to proceed to Fortress Monroe and there to have an informal conference with any person or persons that President Lincoln may appoint on the basis of his letter to Francis P. Blair, of the 18th of January ultimo, or upon any other terms or conditions that he may hereafter propose, not inconsistent with the principles of self-government and popular rights, on which our institutions are founded.

It is our earnest wish to ascertain, after a free interchange of ideas and information, upon what principles and terms, if any, a just and honorable peace can be established without the further effusion of blood, and to contribute our utmost efforts to accomplish such a result.

We think it better to add that in accepting your passport we are not to be understood as committing ourselves to anything, but to carry to this informal conference the views and feelings above mentioned.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.,

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS,
J. A. CAMPBELL,
R. M. T. HUNTER.

THOMAS T. ECKERT, Major and A. D. C.

NOTE.—The above communication was delivered to me at Fortress Monroe at 4.30 p. m., February 2, by Lieutenant Colonel Babcock, of General Grant's staff.

THOMAS T. ECKERT,
Major and A. D. C.

On the morning of the 3d the gentlemen, Messrs. Stephens, Hunter, and Campbell, came aboard our steamer, and had an interview with the Secretary of State and myself of several hours' duration. No question of preliminaries to the meeting was then and there made or mentioned; no other person was present; no papers were exchanged or produced, and it was, in advance, agreed that the conversation was to be informal and verbal merely.

On our part the whole substance of the instructions to the Secretary of State, heretofore recited, stated and insisted upon, and nothing was said inconsistently therewith; while by the other party it was not said that, in any event, or on any condition, they ever would consent to reunion, and yet they equally omitted to declare that they never would so consent. They seemed to desire a postponement of that question, and the adoption of some other course first, which, as some of them seemed to argue, might or might not lead to reunion, but which course we thought would amount to an indefinite postponement. The foregoing, containing, as is believed, all the information sought, is respectfully submitted.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The message was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In view of the last clause of that message, I move that twenty thousand extra copies be printed. I desire to say here that I think this message will meet the cordial approbation of the entire loyal people of this country, and shows wisdom and discretion in the President of the United States in acting upon this whole matter.

Mr. BROOKS. But for the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] I do not know that I should have felt it my duty just now to express any opinion upon these documents, for it is difficult to comprehend them as they are rapidly read here; but I rise to say, as I understand them, I do not think the President will meet the cordial approbation of all the loyal people of these United States. From the documents that are submitted by the President of the United States, and also the report which comes to us from the rebel chief and his commissioners, these two facts seem to be evident: first, that the President of the United States will consent to no armistice whatsoever between us and the rebel States without the previous absolute submission on the part of those rebel States; and next, that the President will enter into no consultation whatsoever with any single State of those rebel States. The President of the United States is silent upon that last particular subject; but it is positively affirmed, both in the remarks of the chief of the rebel States and his commissioners, that our President would not treat with any one of the rebel States. The President is silent upon the subject, while Mr. Davis says:

"I therewith submit, for the information of congress, the report of the eminent citizens above named, showing that the enemy refused to enter into negotiations with the confederate States, or any of them separately, or to give to our people any other terms or guarantees than those which the conqueror may grant, or permit us to have peace upon any other basis than an unconditional submission to their rule, coupled with the acceptance of their recent legislation, including an amendment to the Constitution for the emancipation of all negro slaves, and with the right on the part of the Federal Congress to legislate on the subject of the relations between the white and black population of each State."

The three rebel commissioners and the rebel president thus positively affirm in their official report that the President of the United States would neither consult nor act without previous submission, nor agree to an armistice with any single State of that rebel government any more than with the rebel government itself.

Mr. Speaker, I am reluctant to say, but nevertheless I feel it my duty to say, that in a great civil war like this, where so much blood has been shed and so much treasure expended, the President of the United States, without all these preliminary conferences and arrangements but calculated to embarrass any negotiations whatsoever, should, in the spirit of a larger and nobler mind, have thrust away all these petty intricacies and approached the great subject under consideration. And yet I should be unjust to him if I did not say that under the embarrassments surrounding him he deserves the thanks of the country for even approaching these commissioners, and for making any effort whatsoever for the attainment of peace.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, of the difficulties that already beset any civil power in any effort to make a peace; and I sometimes fear that even now we have reached a period in our history like that which has existed in other nations heretofore engaged in great civil wars, when no legislative or civil power can end a war like this, and when peace is to be obtained by military chieftains only, not altogether on the field of battle, but by the control and subjection of the people in their respective districts to their arms and their wills. The spirit of peace exists; but there is no civilian or statesman great enough to lead or guide it. Thousands and tens of thousands of all parties, North and South, would welcome it on any honorable terms; but no man in power, North or South, dare take bold steps to forward it. The armies, too, North and South, are panting for it, as was shown when, amid the loudest cheers, the rebel commissioners departed from the rebel ranks, and with reëchoing cheers were welcomed into ours. Soldiers even now could and would make honorable peace; but in the storm of passions excited by men in civil life, peace, I fear, is passing beyond the control of civil chiefs.

When the President of the United States left this capital, the fanaticism and the fanatics his policy has here created opened at once in full howl upon him. In view of the demonstrations which have been made in another branch of this Government, to which it would not be parliamentary to refer, it required some courage on his part to take any steps whatsoever for the pacification of our country. If he had had the spirit of a Jackson, or the spirit of a Clay, the higher, the nobler, the more self-relying spirit of the men who, in crises like these, have hitherto controlled the destinies of this country, he would have allowed no men, not even Senators, thus booed and spurred, to mount and rowl him, or he would have unhorsed them and thrown them into that ditch where they ought to have been thrown when they attempted to thwart all pacification.

But the President deserves credit and thanks for resisting, even for a moment, the denunciations hurled forth against him when entering into consultation with the rebels on board of the steamers in the Chesapeake, near Fortress Monroe. I thank him for the effort, no matter what motives may have prompted it. It is what I asked and desired of him in December last, but what was met in some quarters on the other side of the House in a spirit highly condemnatory of the course I suggested. I should be inconsistent, then, with myself, and unjust to him, if I did not avail myself of this opportunity to thank him, amid the denunciations by which he was surrounded, for entering into any preliminary negotiations whatsoever with these rebel commissioners. But I deeply regret to say that when the President approached these commissioners in consultation, he did not carry out the spirit with which he seemed to start, and then act on his own responsibility, that is, on rebel submission to the Constitution of the country, the Constitution which was handed down to us by our fathers, ask no other terms whatsoever, and add that on these terms alone he would enter into preliminary arrangements for peace. It seems to me, also, that when the opportunity was offered to him to negotiate with any one of the rebel States he should have cheerfully availed himself of that opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, there arises a period in the history of civil wars when power passes from the civil to the military authorities alone. Sir, that period is passing, nay, may have already passed, when either an Abraham Lincoln or a Jefferson Davis, if both were never so much disposed, could hush the storm they have raised. Certain it is that while Abraham Lincoln is driven, as often he is, from positions he takes, by the howl of the hounds that beset him, the fate of Actæon in the fable affrights him, lest he be devoured by them; and hence, from the Potomac to the Passamaquoddy, he strives in vain to still the elements of passion and of pelf that there everywhere reign; while not less powerless is Jefferson Davis to put down the specter of rebellion he has conjured up from the Rio Grande to the Rapidan. Sir, neither of those men, high in position as they are, was cradled in the conciliatory school of a Washington, an Adams, a Jefferson, or a Hamilton; and into neither of them at their birth did God breathe the great spirit that could lift them above human passion to comprehend the awful responsibility of their influence over human life and human affairs. Both are but drifting, and drifting now, as if on the white crests of ocean billows, while both dread to steer their craft to any port or harbor for fear of the mutiny they may have on board when the surges cease to roll and to terrify their crews. Sir, when such a crisis arises in the history of civil wars, peace passes not only from the jurisdiction of Presidents but from Federal and rebel Congresses also. Peace passes then from all civil jurisdiction, and all the terms of peace. When the sword is unsheathed too long the toga and the robe can never drive it back to its scabbard. Is not peace already admitted to be only with the sword, or the men of the sword? Are Congressmen anything? Are not armies everything? And in the end, in all probability, if this war is prolonged many years more, that power which dictated peace to the senate and people of Rome, to the commonwealth of England, and to the republic of France, some Augustus Caesar, some General Monk, or some rising Bonaparte will dictate peace to all of us—the peace of despotism and of civil death upon the ruins of the Constitution of our country. This is the peace of civil wars. This is the peace of history. This is the record of two thousand years. And may God avert that unhappy destiny from us which I fear having been given to all other nations, is at last reserved to our unhappy country.

The President, so it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, threw away about the last opportunity he will have to make peace when he refused, as stated by the rebel commissioners, to entertain "terms or proposals of any treaty or agreement looking to an ultimate settlement either with the authorities of the confederate States or from the States separately." The refusal in any form to recognize the government of the confederate States—although a government de facto, yet not a government de jure—because not a government recognized by our Constitution, can be understood; but the refusal to recognize the well-known de jure as well as de facto governments of the States of the South seems to me as unwise and as impolitic as it is indefensible, under our mixed Governments, Federal and State. There are elements of peace in Georgia, in Alabama, in North Carolina, and if the executives of those States, or if those States were separately consulted and negotiated with, peace, in all probability, could be given to the land without further arbitrament of the sword and cannon on the field of battle. North Carolina is ready for peace if she could be preserved from the rebel army. Georgia (and Stephens represents the feelings of Georgia in a great degree) is in a condition to make peace if her institutions, her State rights and sovereignty, can be preserved. Indeed, Mr. Stephens says, in a letter that has been read here, to Major Eckert, that he desires peace "upon any terms or conditions that he," the President, Mr. Lincoln, "may hereafter propose, not inconsistent with the principles of self-government and popular rights, on which our institutions are founded." Give to Georgia, then, the guarantee of self-government and of popular rights within the State, and peace doubtless may be restored to this Union by a separate negotiation with the State. There are, too, elements of peace in Alabama. I regret that the President has thus closed the door of peace and opened the doors of everlasting war by declining any consultation with the separate States of North Carolina, Georgia, or Alabama. There is no other hope of peace now left. Even if Davis himself were to attempt peace in the rebel capital I have but little doubt that civil war would ensue within his domain from resistance to it of wild men there. And if Abraham Lincoln were to restore peace here only on condition of the restoration of the Union, I think I can name five or six northern States that would be soon involved, if not in physical rebellion against the government of Abraham Lincoln—

Mr. ASHLEY. Name one of them now.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the State of Ohio submit to peace on condition of having the Union as it was?

Mr. ASHLEY. Not by my vote.

Mr. BROOKS. I have an answer from the honorable gentleman from Ohio, that his State will not submit to peace on the restoration of the Union as it was. Let me ask him now what would Ohio do on condition that Abraham Lincoln negotiated a treaty of peace on the restoration of the Union as it was?

Mr. ASHLEY. If the constituted authorities of the country would sustain the President the State of Ohio would submit.

Mr. BROOKS. Then the gentleman contradicts himself.

Mr. ASHLEY. No, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from Ohio will not submit to a restoration of the Union as it was.

Mr. ASHLEY. While Ohio is speaking herself for her own citizens, her voice would be, as mine shall be, against a restoration of the Union with the domination of the slave power and with the rebels back in this Capitol.

Mr. BROOKS. It is in the power of the President of the United States alone to negotiate a treaty of peace. This is not like a foreign war in which it is necessary to submit a treaty of peace to the Senate of the United States for ratification; but in this matter of a negotiation for peace the supreme power is in the President of the United States. I desire, therefore, to ask an explicit reply to this question from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY.] Suppose Abraham Lincoln, the constituted authority of this country, should make peace to-morrow with the rebel authorities, and bring them back to this Capitol, upon the basis of the Union as it was, would Ohio submit then to Abraham Lincoln?

Mr. ASHLEY. What does the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] mean by "the restoration of the Union as it was?"

Mr. BROOKS. I mean the right of self-government within the States.

Mr. ASHLEY. Nobody denies that.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] mean the Union of the States as it was on the basis of the forgiveness of rebels, and the return to them of the slaves who have been fighting the battles of the Union?

Mr. BROOKS. The President of the United States has absolute power of pardoning these rebels, and if he chose to pardon them and exercise that power, I have not a reply that I can quite understand from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] whether he would submit or not to the exercise of that prerogative by the President of the United States.

But as the gentleman does not choose explicitly to reply to my question, what I want to know from him, and what the country hereafter will want to know, is whether this war is expressly to be prosecuted on the basis of a new Constitution, new institutions, new Government, new laws, and a new country. I tell him here that if he realizes his project of giving free suffrage, universal, uncontrollable suffrage to the negroes of the South, who shall displace the white man's Government within that region, and bring up only the negroes of the South, to be represented here in this Congress; if that is his new Constitution, I desire no longer to prosecute war for any such purposes as that.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is very well aware of the fact that the question of the right of suffrage is confined exclusively to the States of this Union. If they choose, as the State of New York and other northern States have done, to permit blacks to vote, as many southern States formerly did, that is a question over which Congress has no power.

Mr. BROOKS. Then the honorable gentleman differs altogether from the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and other honorable gentlemen, who are insisting that Louisiana shall not be readmitted into Congress unless the negroes there are first permitted to vote.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to differ from me in opinion upon the question put in issue by the gentleman. I took occasion, some days ago, to spend a few minutes in illustrating the fact that the question of suffrage is a question belonging peculiarly to the people of each State. I have never entertained any other opinion. It has, however, always belonged to Congress to determine who might exercise the right of suffrage within the Territories; but in the States the question belongs to the States themselves.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me ask the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] in order that I may understand him thoroughly, has he proposed to let Louisiana enter into this Union without a preliminary provision permitting the negroes in Louisiana to vote?

Mr. KELLEY. I propose, so far as my vote shall be concerned, to admit Louisiana into the Union whenever she comes here with a constitution republican in form, which shall have been ordained by the people of that State—

Mr. ASHLEY. Loyal people.

Mr. BROOKS. Black people?

Mr. KELLEY. After our armies shall have made conquest of the entire territory of the State, or the rebels now in arms against us shall have submitted to the authority of the supreme Government of the land; that is the administration to which the people for the time being have confided the administration of affairs and the enforcement of the Constitution and laws. I do not propose by any vote of mine, however, to subject the people of that State who are now and at all times have been loyal to the Government to the control of the pardoned but unconverted traitors who have attempted to overthrow my Government and divide my country.

Mr. BROOKS. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania makes a very good speech within my speech, and yet when he speaks of the "people" of Louisiana he means the black people as well as the white people of Louisiana, and more the blacks than the whites, because the black people are largely in the majority there.

Mr. KELLEY. Why, sir, I have always regarded an intelligent black patriot as a better man and a better citizen than the most lily-livered traitor that ever capered in a lady's chamber. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BROOKS. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has made that speech once before in this House during this session—

Mr. KELLEY. I would be glad if the gentleman would refer to the expression I have just uttered. I do not think he can find it in the Globe.

Mr. BROOKS. And if he repeats it again he may again have applause from the surrounding galleries and from certain members on the floor of this House.

But I tell the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania and all other gentlemen, that while I am willing to recognize the equality of the negro before the law in the State from whence I come, yet, whatever may be the law of my State, I do not intend here in Congress to support any effort to impose upon other States or upon Territories terms which shall compel them to allow the negroes there to vote, thus to govern the whites.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me one moment?

Mr. BROOKS. I cannot yield except for a brief question.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire merely to ask a question. The gentleman speaks of Territories. I desire to ask him whether the Congress of the United States has not always regulated the question of suffrage in the Territories when giving them organic laws, and whether any territorial act, either of the Congress of the Confederation or of the Congress of the United States down to 1812, ever excluded the free negro from the exercise of the right of suffrage. Did Congress, by any act prior to 1812, when the Territory of Missouri was organized, ever exclude the free negro from the exercise of suffrage in the Territories?

Mr. BROOKS. Congress never attempted, before the assembling of this Congress or the preceding one, to impose negro suffrage upon any Territory of this Union.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is mistaken. In 1812, the Congress of the United States for the first time excluded the free negro from suffrage in the Territories. Notwithstanding the fact that South Carolina undertook, as early as 1778, to force the insertion of the word "white" into the provision of the Articles of Confederation regulating the right of suffrage, Congress, from the very organization of the Government down to the year 1812, uniformly maintained the right of the negro to suffrage in all the Territories, whether they lay north or south of the slave line.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, it would be too much of a diversion from the main objects of my present remarks to enter into a historical discussion upon negro suffrage as it may have been exercised in different States or Territories. I am well aware that until the abolition excitement began, a small portion of the negroes of North Carolina, and even of Tennessee, had the right of suffrage. All this is aside from the President's message that I rose to discuss, and I do not propose to be further diverted from that discussion now.

Mr. ASHLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BROOKS. I will hear the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHLEY. The gentleman stated some moments ago that in a certain contingency there were six northern States that would rebel against the Government. I asked the gentleman once before to name the States to which he referred, and he declined to do so. I now ask him again to name them.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman has declined to answer my question. I ask him again, if Abraham Lincoln should admit the southern States again, if the rebels formerly representing the southern States here should be pardoned and admitted upon this floor—say Toombs of Georgia, or Jefferson Davis—would the honorable gentleman submit to it?

Mr. ASHLEY. The President may pardon and this House may admit any gentleman elected by a State as its representative. The Representatives from the State of Ohio and the civil authorities of the State of Ohio would submit and bow to the constitutionally expressed will of the majority of this or the other branch of Congress in admitting such men.

Mr. BROOKS. That is not an answer to my question. I ask whether, if the executive authorities of the United States were to exercise this power of pardon, and admit the rebels of the southern States to amnesty and pardon, and those rebels were to be elected to Congress and admitted within this Capitol, would he submit?

Mr. ASHLEY. So far as I am concerned I would submit to the constituted authorities of the land. So far, however, as my vote here is concerned, it shall never be given for the admission of rebels here.

Mr. BROOKS. Is not the President, in the case of pardon, the constituted authority of the United States?

Mr. ASHLEY. I do not recognize the President of the United States as the constituted authority of the land. The coordinate branches of Congress, acting with the President, constitute the Government.

Mr. BROOKS. Then, if sixty or seventy rebel Representatives were admitted upon the floor of this House, and forty or fifty of us were to unite in admitting them, what would the gentleman do?

Mr. ASHLEY. I would submit, of course. I have answered the gentleman's question before. Personally I would vote against them. If a majority of this House, or of the Government as it may be constituted now or hereafter, should permit gentlemen to be admitted from rebel States, I should submit.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman has answered my question now. Taking him, therefore, as the standard of opinion, I do not think then that five or six States would rebel against the authority of the United States, for I now understand him to say that when the President assumes the merciful prerogative of pardon, and exercises that prerogative which the people intrusted to him, and the doors of Congress are again opened to Representatives from the rebel States, the gentleman will sit here with me, if we both happen to be elected members of the House, and submit to amnesty and pardon and to Abraham Lincoln, receiving them as friends and brothers. I am glad to get that concession from so extreme a man as the honorable gentleman from Ohio. I desire that it may reach the ears of the President. I desire it to go out to the South as an invocation from him to the southern rebels to lay down their arms and come once more within the portals of this Capitol.

Mr. INGERSOLL rose.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish the gentleman would pardon me. I want to go on with my remarks.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish to say that the American Congress—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I would rather not. I will yield some other time.

I was about to say, when interrupted in the course of my remarks, that Mr. Lincoln, in refusing to negotiate with the States in rebellion, has not consulted the antecedents in our history. When the State of Pennsylvania was in rebellion against the Government of the United States on the subject of whisky, the then President of the United States, high and lofty as he was—

Mr. THAYER. The State of Pennsylvania never was in rebellion.

Mr. BROOKS. Then I will correct my remark. When a large portion of the people of the State of Pennsylvania were in a state of rebellion, Washington himself did not deem it beneath his dignity to consult with those rebels and institute a commission to negotiate. When in the State of Rhode Island there was rebellion, or when a considerable portion of them was in rebellion, the then President of the United States did not deem it beneath his dignity to consult the rebels. A large portion of the people of Rhode Island were in rebellion.

Mr. JENCKES. Against whom?

Mr. BROOKS. Against their own State.

Mr. JENCKES. And they were treated as they deserved to be.

Mr. BROOKS. And a large portion of the people of Massachusetts were in a state of rebellion prior to the formation of the Constitution of the United States, and the high authorities of that State did not hesitate to enter into negotiation and consultation with Shay and other leaders of that rebellion, and actually settled terms with them when they were in arms. These are but State matters; but I proceed to the consideration of another.

When in 1832 the State of South Carolina was in rebellion, when the Army and Navy of the United States were surrounding the city of Charleston, the high, imperious, and haughty General Jackson, who threatened to string up the traitors upon the lamp-posts, did not hesitate to send General Scott, Colonel Bankhead, and civilians, too, over and over again, to consult with Governor Hayne and General Hamilton, and other leaders of that rebellion, to propitiate the State of South Carolina and avert the storm of civil war. When civil war was imminent, when the armies were approaching each other, Clay, even the fiery spirit of Henry Clay, in the other House of Congress, did not hesitate, for the sake of peace, to throw aside the protective tariff interests of the States of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts and to surrender that mere question of money in order to propitiate that State. And a bill of compromise and concession General Jackson cheerfully signed: Men of such lofty spirit did not hesitate to consult with the leaders of actual organized rebels in South Carolina, in order to avert the storm of civil war; and why should President Lincoln hesitate now to follow in such illustrious steps?

These are the precedents of our history which it seems to me the President of the United States should have consulted when he entered into this negotiation with the rebels in the Chesapeake bay, and when one of their propositions was separate negotiations with the rebel States of the Federal Union.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like to inquire of the gentleman where he obtains the evidence that there was a proposition made to the President of the United States, that the separate States would enter into negotiations for peace upon the basis of the Union, or upon any other basis.

Mr. BROOKS. I have already read the authority.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Where is it to be found?

Mr. BROOKS. It is in the communication made by Jefferson Davis to the rebel congress, and in the letter of the three commissioners to the rebel congress. That is my authority, and there is no denial of it in the documents read at the desk from the President of the United States.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There is no affirmation of it in the document sent to us by the President.

Mr. BROOKS. I regret also that all terms of armistice have been refused by the President of the United States. I deeply regret that there is to be no cessation, no pause in this horrible civil war. And when I heard the honorable gentleman from Indiana yesterday, [Mr. JULIAN,] and the gentleman from Vermont also, [Mr. MORRILL,] anticipate an early conclusion of this war, I could not but recall the illusions I have heard from the floor of this House now for four years past; though I could not help pray from the bottom of my heart that now they might turn out to be better prophets than they have been heretofore. I will not now reëxpress my opinions upon that subject. It is unnecessary. The history, the Anglo-Saxon history, records what must be the result, without any prediction of mine—long and continued war. Even with the suppression of armies and the sack of southern cities, guerrilla warfare will be protracted, no man can tell how long. Why, if there be any part of the South which has been subjugated it is that part within ten or fifteen miles of this Capitol; and yet twice within this winter the guerrillas have been formidable within fifteen miles of this Capitol, once at Rock creek, and again out on the Fairfax road; and no man at this day or hour can venture alone and unarmed over the Potomac twenty miles from this Capitol, or even ten miles within this subjugated country. The overthrow of armies, the sack of cities, the removal of all apparent forces, is not the subjugation of the people nor the end of the war. Hence I deeply regret that the President of the United States did not avail himself of this opportunity for an armistice, in order to give again to the people of the South the means of reasoning and consultation. Armed forces, swords, bayonets, artillery, are not weapons of American civilization—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Is the gentleman from New York in favor of an armistice?

Mr. BROOKS. I am. I repeat, I am. I am in favor of appealing from guns and bayonets and artillery to reason, to sense, to Christianity, and to civilization—

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman agrees with Jeff. Davis and his commissioners upon that subject.

Mr. BROOKS. Why, certainly I am in favor of an armistice. Someday or other this war must stop.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Never until the rebellion is subdued.

Mr. BROOKS. There must, I repeat, be an end of the war, and prior to that, there must be a cessation of hostilities, a truce, or an armistice.

I regret deeply that the President did not avail himself of this opportunity, for I believe that it would have ended the war, and ended it in the restoration of this Union. If we were once again to resort to the arbitrament of reason and sense instead of the logic of artillery, neither our people nor the southern people could again be driven to arms. If the cheers of the army of Grant and of the army of Lee can be permitted once more to echo, the soldiers of those armies, who are fighting the battles of this war, will meet in common fraternization and they will end the war. Our Army are for an honorable peace; our armies are for an armistice for the restoration of the Union; our soldiers want to see our flag, the stars and stripes, float from the Passamaquoddy to the Rio Grande, and the trade of the South again opened to our people; and whenever there is a cessation of hostilities and an opportunity to reason upon the subject, never again will the din and clangor of arms resound.

Mr. Speaker, there is another topic in connection with the armistice which I wish could have arrested the attention of the President of the United States, and that is the condition of our foreign relations. Sir, there is a movement going on of far more importance to us than slavery in the South, or these mere technical preliminary negotiations which the President could not break through—a European movement, that movement which is threatening to plant French arms and the French flag in the States of Sinaloa, Chihuahua, Durango, Sonora, and Lower California, a territory embracing about one half of all Mexico, and larger than New England and New York and Pennsylvania combined. The Monroe doctrine is gone. The unity and honor of our continent are gone. Europe is overriding us. Rebel chiefs even are made dukes and viceroys under the control and direction of the Emperor of France. These States of Sinaloa, Chihuahua, Durango, Sonora, and Lower California, are worth ten times what we are fighting for; and while we are destroying ourselves, the Emperor of France is preventing the further extension of our magnificent empire. For a miserable debt, originally but $125,000, he has taken possession of these vast Mexican States, and there is no resistance whatsoever from the authorities of this Government. The President of the United States is forced to be silent; the Secretary of State dare not remonstrate. The Memorial Diplomatique, a French paper of high authority, published in the city of Paris, a paper which ninety-nine times out of a hundred is accurate in reflecting diplomatic authority—that high authority states that in September and October last Maximilian was not recognized by the constituted authorities of our country only because of the then approaching presidential election, and it is alleged by the same high authority that Mr. Corwin, our minister plenipotentiary, was permitted to depart from Mexico in order to no longer recognize the Juarez Government, but that in due time, after our election, Maximilian would be recognized as the constituted authority of Mexico. I do not know that that is the fact, but I utter it on the authority of the Memorial Diplomatique, a paper of the highest authority among all the diplomatic authorities of the European world assembled in the city of Paris. But whether it be true or not, the fact is on record that while we have been fighting, nominally to abolish slavery, a great republic, a sister republic, the republic of Mexico, has been overthrown, dethroned, enslaved, and an Austrian monarchy has been substituted in its stead, through the silence of our authorities. No remonstrance on record, no resistance, but apparent assent! While we have been fighting, these vast Mexican States, of which I have spoken, have passed even from the Emperor of Mexico, and have been seized upon by the Government of France in payment of a debt of only $125,000. A remonstrance from this House, it is true, has gone forth, none from any other branch of the Government, while we have been officially rebuked by our own executive authority for remonstrating at all!

Then let us hush this unnatural, fraternal, civil war till we can again expel European invasion, at least from the continent of North America. Let not Mexico and Central America be enslaved in order to free a few negroes here. Nay, not even to free a few negroes; for, although but a few days ago we emancipated all the negroes of the southern States, the House yesterday, by a vote of 64 to 62, passed a bill (the freedman's bill) substantially to reenslave all the negroes whom we had liberated by the constitutional amendment a few days before. It is on these grounds, sir, that I deeply regret that the President would not consent to the armistice desired. Some day or other we must come to that and agree to a cessation of hostilities. We have the high authority of President Lincoln for saying that war cannot continue forever; that peace must come, sooner or later. If, as Mr. Stephens hints in his letter, all that the South asked for is self-government and the restoration of popular rights, this is quite the time for an armistice to be accepted by us. We lose nothing by it. We hold on to what we have got, and stand in position to take more. And we are in the hey-day of our prosperity now. Our honor is unsullied. Our armies are triumphant almost everywhere. Now, then, is the day and hour to be magnanimous. The adversities of war may approach us. The adversities of finance may overwhelm us. We are taxed now as no other people on earth is taxed, by Federal, by State, by county, by town, by municipal authorities of all sorts, to carry on this war. The honorable gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] again demands fresh taxation to the amount of forty millions more, and a tax upon incomes more grinding than ever. I venture to say that, within a very few days, the Committee of Ways and Means will again come before the House demanding new loans of millions on millions to carry on this war. These loans cannot always be made. We cannot always borrow. Why not now, then, in this the hey-day of our prosperity, in the midst of the glories of our military achievements, accept what the rebels seem, almost on bended knees, to have asked from us, an armistice of sixty or ninety days, in order to enable them to go back and reason with their people and bring their minds to permanent peace?

Mr. Speaker, these are my sentiments, and I dare to utter them. I know not, and I care not, what may be said of me. What may befall me or my fortune is a matter of entire indifference. Whether I am popular or unpopular, whether I am denounced, calumniated as disloyal, or not, is a matter of entire indifference to me when I have the support of my own sense of right. Here and elsewhere, on all occasions, then, I shall proclaim and advocate what I believe to be this right, namely, that now is the day and hour, with only one condition, the restoration of the Union, for the acceptance of any honorable terms that will immediately end this unnatural war.

Mr. STEVENS addressed the Chair.

MEMBERS EXCUSED.

Mr. NORTON. I desire to ask unanimous consent to make now my excuse for being absent last night without leave of the House.

Mr. COX. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask if it is not a matter of privilege for a member under arrest here to offer his excuses.

Mr. NORTON. I wish to leave the city at three o'clock this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The House has postponed the consideration of the cases of absent members until this matter is disposed of.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that we will understand that if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. NORTON] is necessarily absent, his case will be passed over until his return.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That will do.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to state to the House that I am called upon to leave the city this afternoon, in consequence of the extreme illness and probably death of my father-in-law, now ninety years of age. I may be absent until some time next week.

Messrs. NORTON and ENGLISH were excused temporarily from attendance upon the sessions of the House.

PEACE NEGOTIATIONS—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I have not risen for the purpose of attempting the impossible task of answering such a speech as we have just heard from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] I would rather that this question of printing had been taken without remark. But it has been opened by discussion; and the position of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] it seems to me, is but perfectly natural and just. The rebels of the South have been arraigned by the message of the President. In all justice they were entitled to an advocate upon this floor, and they ought to have one who fully enters into their views and sympathizes with their purposes. I see, therefore, great propriety in the gentleman from New York undertaking that task of love; for he tells us at the outset that he believes—and indeed seems to be electioneering for a further division of this Union—that five States of this Union beyond those already in rebellion will yet be in rebellion. I know not what five States he means. Of course he speaks for the city of New York in one of those States; but the States I do not know. But I trust he will confine himself to his clients and not touch those of the loyal States.

Now, sir, the gentleman is hard to please. Some time ago it was earnestly asked that President Lincoln should send ambassadors, or agents in some shape, to hear what the South would say; the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] was among that number; and they declared that if, upon that being done, they should refuse to treat upon the basis of the integrity of the South, there would hereafter be perfect unanimity among all parties in the North; that all men would be loyal; that all men would support this Government. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] and those who acted with him on that occasion differed somewhat from the loyal people—I mean the other loyal people of the North—and from the gentlemen on this side of the House, for I do not believe there was a man on this side who desired the President to sue for peace for what had already been done. I believe the people were somewhat indignant at the idea that it was done. We therefore differed from the gentleman.

But the President has thought it was best to make the effort, and he has done it in such a masterly style, upon such a firm basis and principle, that I believe even those who thought his mission there was unwise will accord to him sagacity and patriotism, and applaud his action. Now, sir, I understand the gentleman to condemn the President of the United States for not opening a negotiation upon the basis tendered by the rebel commissioners. Now, sir, what was that basis? They tendered no basis upon which negotiations could be inaugurated, except independence of the rebel States and a dissolution of the United States. Does the gentleman mean to say, in the face of this House, in the face of the American people, that he condemns the President of the United States for not entering into negotiations with the confederate States upon the basis of their independence and a dissolution of this Union?

Mr. BROOKS. Does the gentleman desire an answer? I thought I made myself clear upon that subject. I applauded the President of the United States for entering into a negotiation with the rebel commissioners. I thought I was explicit upon that subject, and I have yet to learn, from any documents which have been submitted to us, that any basis of that negotiation was the separation and dissolution of the Union of these States.

Mr. STEVENS. I propose to read a few words from a speech of Jefferson Davis, made when these commissioners returned. It was a speech made in Richmond to a meeting called for the purpose of considering the report of these commissioners. They met in the African church. I do not know what to understand by that. They have got very low when they can do that. However, that is a passing remark. What does he say?

"In my correspondence with Lincoln, continued Mr. Davis, that functionary has always spoken of the United States and the confederate States as one country; but in my replies I have never failed to refer to them as separate and distinct Governments. Sooner than that we should be united again, I would be willing to yield up everything I have on earth; and if it were possible, I would yield up my life a thousand times rather than succumb."

And upon the conclusion of the speech, the following resolutions, among others, were passed in the presence of the rebel commissioners:

"Resolved, That we spurn with indignation the grossly insulting terms which the President of the United States has proffered to the people of the confederate States."

"Resolved, That the terms in which and the circumstances under which it was made, stamp the proffer as a designed and premeditated outrage upon and indignity to our people."

"Resolved, That in this presence"—

That is in the presence of the rebel president and commissioners—

"and in the face of the world, invoking thereto the aid of Almighty God, we renew our resolve to maintain our liberties and achieve our independence, and to this end we mutually pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honors."

And yet a man calling himself a patriot and an American rises upon this floor and sends forth to the country a denunciation of the President of the United States for not entering into negotiations with men holding these doctrines and entertaining these views as the only ones upon which they would negotiate. Sir, the simple statement of the proposition is all that the American people will require to stamp with proper condemnation the man who denounces the President of the United States for the course which he has taken. I will apply no epithets to such a man; I do not know that I could use any which would be sufficiently merited.

Dissolution of the Union being the only condition of the negotiation for peace, the gentleman from New York condemns the President of the United States for not granting an armistice to these traitors. What is an armistice? It is a withdrawal of your armies; it is a cessation of hostilities; it is to enable the traitors whom we are seeking to crush to prepare for renewed hostilities. What would an armistice imply? It would be an admission that in the terms proposed by the rebels there was something that we could accept. If the President had consented to an armistice, thus acknowledging that upon that basis peace might come, he would have deserved to be impeached by this House and convicted by the Senate.

Now, sir, the gentleman says that this war can never end except by the desolation of the South? Whose fault is that, sir? Whose fault is it if these people, instead of laying down their arms and submitting to the law, are determined to resist to the last man and the last dollar? If we should lay waste their country and bring the peace which reigned in Warsaw, it would be but a just retribution for their hellish rebellion; it would be but a just retribution for the entertainment of sentiments such as the gentleman from New York has uttered.

Sir, the President of the United States, in my judgment, ought to do nothing more than he did some time ago: say to the rebels, "Peace is within your reach whenever you cease hostilities; peace is for you to declare, and not for us." We are no suppliants to rebels who have cost our country millions of dollars and shed the best blood of hundreds of thousands of our citizens. What dastard is there who would ask us, under these circumstances, to sue for peace on the basis which the rebels propose, or to lay down our arms for a single moment until they either submit or are exterminated? Sir, I do not hesitate to say that, in my judgment, one or the other of these alternatives must come. That the rebels can maintain themselves for any great length of time, I do not believe. That peace will come as early as some of our sanguine friends have hoped, I do not believe. I have believed from the first that men who for thirty years had concocted without the least cause the vastest and the foulest rebellion that was ever known in any country had made up their minds to take the consequences to the bitter end. I believe that in that vast country, although our superiority in arms must be acknowledged, it is very hard to produce immediate results. Several years ago I did not hesitate to predict that scarcely five years would see the end of this rebellion, and I do not now believe that it will finally be terminated within the period of six or twelve months. I believe that the main armies of the rebellion will be crushed in the ensuing season, unless we agree to the terms advocated by the gentleman from New York, and withdraw our armies from the circle which is now closing in upon the heart and body of the rebellion. I believe we shall speedily crush all the great armies of the rebellion. Still I look for guerrilla warfare for a year or two; but that will be of comparatively little importance.

But the gentleman denounces the idea that we are to dictate terms to these people. Now, sir, was any great war ever ended by force of arms when the conquerors did not dictate terms to the conquered country, imposing upon it, in whole or in part, their own laws? But I understand the gentleman to object to other portions of the President's message. It was, if they come back, they must take the condition of things as they find them. The constitutional amendment, if finally adopted by three fourths of the loyal States, as I have no doubt it will be, will prohibit forever the admission of any State into the Union with slavery in its constitution. If they come back they come back to a free country. That touches the sensibilities of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] The time will come when this nation will suffer no compromise, no attempt to reestablish slavery in the slave States, no matter by whom. Does the gentleman, I ask, wish to reestablish slavery where it has been abolished or is about being abolished by the people? Is that the kind of doctrine which a Representative utters in the American Congress? Is that to be heard in this century, when almost the universal world is crying for general emancipation? When it is proposed to put the black man back into slavery, chains, and bondage, is the President to be condemned because he does not reëcho that sentiment?

Mr. Speaker, when I rose I did not intend to say so much, as I wish to get to the business of the country; but I desired to put before the country the distinct propositions of the two nations, as they are called in the rebel correspondence. I want it to go out that Jefferson Davis has stated that he will sacrifice everything upon earth, and that he will die a thousand times over rather than negotiate upon any other terms than independence of the southern States. That is the proposition which they make, and the one which Abraham Lincoln has rejected. All I ask is that this shall be placed distinctly before the American people.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I think that I heard very distinctly the message of the President when it was read by the Clerk this morning, and I hope, for the sake of history, that the gentleman will not repeat the declaration that these commissioners from Richmond insisted upon southern independence as a basis of negotiations. The President says that that was not insisted upon, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania gets his information from a stump speech, or some sort of speech, made by Jefferson Davis, in Richmond. There is nothing to show that it is authentic. It may have been misprinted. He may have made no such speech as that. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will confine himself to the message delivered to us by Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. STEVENS. I take both; the one introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] from the rebels, and the one introduced in the message of the President. They both show conclusively that they refused to negotiate upon any other terms than the independence of the South.

Mr. MALLORY. The speech which the gentleman from Pennsylvania cites may say that southern independence was insisted upon, but the message of the President declares that no such thing was insisted upon. Now which authority is the gentleman determined to rely upon?

Mr. STEVENS. I did not so understand Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. MALLORY. Then you misunderstood him.

Mr. STEVENS. He said that they had no authority to negotiate upon any other terms than southern independence.

Mr. MALLORY. Let that part of the message be read, in order that the House may see the force of the argument which the gentleman has been making. The declaration of the President is, as compared with the telegraphic correspondence, like the small piece of bread to the vast deal of sack in Falstaff's bill. I call for the reading of that part of the President's message. I want it to go forth with the gentleman's speech.

Mr. STEVENS. It goes right along with it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to have it in the gentleman's speech.

Mr. STEVENS. Both the report of the rebel commissioners and the report of the President of the United States go upon the ground that they would consent to no agreement except upon the concession of their independence. The President of the United States offered to treat distinctly upon the terms of his letter, and they refused to treat upon those terms. The President does not repeat them, but he refers to the letter he wrote to Mr. Blair, which contained the proposition. They refused to treat upon those terms, and thence those who censure the President now for not treating, censure him because he could not agree to severing this Union; and although he offered to pardon many of them and deal liberally with them, they did not ask that, but scorned it. They go upon the ground that they are a nation at war with us, and nothing but the sword can end it. Now, it seems to me that that brings us simply to the point whether we are for disunion or not. I know that the President claims that they must take the Constitution as we have amended it. I understand the gentleman from New York desires that the rebels shall come back under the Constitution as it was, and not the Constitution as it is now made by us. That might suit him very well, because by the aid of the rebels here, and the Representatives of some portions of New York and the West, they would have it all again their own way. That would be the rebel congress transferred to this Hall.

But, sir, I did not suppose I should say so much; and I call the previous question upon the motion to print.

Mr. COX. I ask my friend to yield to me.

Mr. STEVENS. I must insist upon it, there having been a large speech on the one side, and a very small one upon the other.

Mr. COX. I will not consume more than five minutes, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. STEVENS. We must go to work. I had intended to say something more. I intended to answer the charge against Pennsylvania, when, really, that rebellion was nothing but that kind of whisky insurrection which our friend from Illinois [Mr. Washburne] introduced here last night.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania decline to yield to me five minutes? I have granted him more grace than that often.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought the gentleman wanted me to surrender the floor for the purpose of a speech. I will give the gentleman five minutes of my time.

Mr. COX. I would not now detain the House, but for the fact that in some sense the resolution which I offered a few days ago was intended to support the Administration in the policy of peace. I was the more anxious to do this, inasmuch as gentlemen upon the other side were in opposition to their own Administration on this policy. If possible, I would strengthen the arm of the Administration for peace, as I have voted to strengthen it for war to sustain the Government. Gentlemen on this side of the House generously gave it their support in its endeavors to seize the results of war and victory, and thus bring an end to this devastating conflict. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Stevens] and others, upon that side, were opposed (as he has said to-day) to making any inquiry into the disposition of the armed insurgents. They denounced, not the terms or conditions which might be tendered in advance of effort, but the effort itself. They were exasperated at the attempt to ascertain whether peace was possible without sacrificing the Union and its integrity. In other words, they were unwilling to close the war, even by the accomplishment of its object. They want war for bloody and revengeful purposes. Their resentments and hates must be gratified. I prefer to gratify the patriotic object of all our sacrifices, and, if it can be done, to restore peace with its blessings of Union and good-will. Gentlemen affect to believe that the negotiations, whose record has been read, have utterly failed. They please their own minds now with the efforts, since the effort has seemed to them fruitless of results.

But, sir, I am glad that this attempt at negotiation was made, for this reason: if the message be properly studied and the correspondence be read between the lines, it will appear to every one who looks at the matter with careful criticism and dispassionate statesmanship that this negotiation will not end now and here, but if it be followed up in a patriotic spirit may end in a restoration of peace and reunion. In the five minutes allotted to me I can barely hint at my reasons for this conclusion. My hope for peace was great, and my desire greater. The House knows the deep interest I have taken in this movement. This interest may give a bias to my judgment. But I will submit to them the reasons which have impressed me upon the mere reading of the message.

I am sorry that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should have given the emphasis of his great name—great in the country, greater in his party—to propagate the idea that the southern commissioners stood inflexibly on their independence. This is a mischievous torture of the correspondence. I appeal from the inferences of the gentleman [Mr. STEVENS] and from the speech of Jefferson Davis made after this seeming failure to a popular assembly, to the message of Mr. Lincoln, and the facts therein stated.

In the letter from City Point of February 2, 1865, the southern commissioners state their willingness "to proceed to Fortress Monroe and there to have an informal conference with any person or persons that President Lincoln may appoint on the basis of his letter to Francis P. Blair, of the 18th of January ultimo, or upon any other terms or conditions that he may hereafter propose, not inconsistent with the principles of self-government and popular rights, on which our institutions are founded. It is our wish to ascertain, after a free interchange of ideas and information, upon what principles and terms, if any, a just and honorable peace can be established without the further effusion of blood, and to contribute our utmost efforts to accomplish such a result."

What was the letter of President Lincoln to Mr. Blair of the 18th? Its very language, familiar to me before read here, was, "peace to the people of our one common country." It was used in response to the language of Mr. Davis, which was "peace to the two countries." It was used by Mr. Lincoln, and as appears by the indorsement of Mr. Lincoln of January 28, understood by Mr. Davis to have direct reference to the language of the latter as to the "two countries." Hence when the commissioners agreed to meet it was a recession from the point of Mr. Davis as to "two countries," and an agreement to treat for peace to the people of "one common country." All through the correspondence nothing appears to the contrary. Mr. Lincoln says they omitted to declare that they never would consent to reunion. General Grant himself says in his cipher telegram of February 1, and I call the attention of gentlemen to the striking and conclusive significance of his language:

"I am convinced, upon conversation with Messrs. Stephens and Hunter, that their intentions are good and their desire sincere to restore peace and union. I have not felt myself at liberty to express even views of my own, or to account for my reticency. This has placed me in an awkward position. I fear now their going back without any expression from any one in authority will have a bad influence."

Why will it have a bad influence? Why would it hurt our cause if they should return willing for peace and union, and no attempt made to secure such results by negotiation? With such an expression from the Lieutenant General before me, I say, Mr. Speaker, that the thanks of this Congress and the thanks of the country are due to President Lincoln for this effort to negotiate, which has drawn out this significant and hopeful explanation from a majority of these commissioners.

In the entire correspondence, and in the conversation which ended the conference, there is not a word, not a syllable, which does not look to the treatment of peace upon this patriotic basis of Union. If we fail or have failed to treat upon that basis, the fault, I will not say the crime, of failure will lie at the door, if not of the President, of the radicals whose incessant pressure is always at his back. I wish, sir, that the House were possessed of what took place at the concluding interview. All we know is, that the commissioners "desired a postponement" of the question of reunion for a time, and "the adoption of some other course first." This the President regarded as an indefinite postponement. What that other course was we are only left to conjecture. Perhaps it had reference to a union of our armies for a common object—perhaps in Mexico. Whatever it was, there is nothing but the inference of the President that it might have been inconclusive; or, that it might have resulted in an armistice, which the President regarded as an indefinite postponement of the question of reunion. But, whatever it may have been, it is clear that by recommending another "course first," the commissioners did regard peace and Union as feasible at last.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, in answer to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] denounced an armistice. He thought it ought not to be agreed to at this time. I have never thought an armistice indispensable to negotiation; neither is an armistice what it is here defined. It does not mean a withdrawal of force, only its suspension. But, sir, we can let the war go on and still talk of and act for peace. A treaty may be in progress up to the very moment of the end of hostilities; it may be celebrated by the firing of hostile cannon; or, as at New Orleans, in the late war, hostilities may continue after a treaty is signed, in ignorance of its signing. But, sir, I cannot, in the short time allotted, speak on that subject. I only wished for five minutes to speak upon this question, because I stand here as a Representative, as I believe from the vote taken the other day upon my resolution, of the loyal and patriotic sentiment of the people of the country, whose hearts are yearning toward peace and union, and who want to escape taxation and bloodshed and drafting, and to see the old political relations between the States, if it be possible, and as nearly as may be, restored to the whole country. They believe in superadding to the force of the Army and Navy that higher, nobler, and benign Christian element of conciliation toward which the President is approximating, even if it has not been fully tried and exhausted. I do not see, as some of my friends around me do, any discouragement in the negotiations, so far as they have advanced. I would not represent my district or State, certainly not my party, if I did not encourage every effort of the proper authorities to end the war and save the nation.

At the outset of these negotiations the President made three propositions: first, to restore peace on the basis of the restoration of the national authority. We would all agree to that. No man, no Democrat, no Republican, will contravene that as an indispensable condition. Secondly, he says that there will be no receding from his position on the slavery question as developed in his message and documents. I can draw, sir, any proposition on any side of the negro question from these messages and documents. From them may be drawn either the principles of constitutional regard for the local government of the States over slavery, as enunciated in his first message, or the principles of gradual emancipation, or of compensation, or of total abolition. If the President desires to settle the conflict by a resort to his messages, he can in a diplomatic way find the material in his letters or messages. This condition I do not choose to regard as insuperable. In the third place, he says that there shall be no cessation of hostilities short of the end of the war. Very well; then we can still go on and treat for peace. Hostilities may go on without armistice, and negotiations may go on at the same time. There is no reason, therefore—and I choose to give the most charitable interpretation to these negotiations—why the people of this country may not hope for a restoration of peace and the reunion of the States if the President is not broken down in his laudable efforts by the fierce onslaughts of his radical adherents. God help him to do all, and do it courageously, to save our land from its terrible woes, while something worth having of material wealth, social order, and political virtue, remains to be saved.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, for the printing of extra copies was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the President's message was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKY, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate insisted upon its amendments to the bill of the House making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, in which the House had non-concurred.

PROCEEDINGS UNDER THE CALL.

The SPEAKER. The question now comes up in reference to absent members, which was postponed until the President's message was disposed of.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to dispense with all further proceedings in the privileged case now before the House, and to remove the case from the docket. I think we have enough to do without this matter, and that we had better go on with the consideration of the tax bill or some other measure of importance.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, after the resolution was adopted under which the Sergeant-at-Arms is about to execute the order of the House, all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with. A quorum being present, the resolution was adopted, and then all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with. The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and proceeded with the tax bill, and afterward rose and reported. The only way of disposing of the matter, that the Chair sees, is to take up the cases individually, or lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. UPSON. I rise to a question of order. I ask whether the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] is not included in the list of delinquents, and whether he is entitled to make any motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MALLORY. I suppose I have the same right as in an ordinary court of justice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that his predecessors have decided that a gentleman under arrest has no right to make a motion or a speech, except in reference to the motion.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Is not the gentleman from Maine in the same category?

The SPEAKER. He is not.

The question being on Mr. BLAINE's motion—

The SPEAKER said: The Chair will state that he cannot count the vote of any member included in the order of arrest, and now at the bar of the House technically, although he may happen to be in his seat.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, is there any way of disposing of this matter, except by rescinding the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It comes up as a resolution adopted by the House; and the only way to dispose of it is to hear the excuses of the absentees individually, or to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. That was done, and the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. ASHLEY. I understand the Chair to have decided that gentlemen who were absent without leave are not entitled to vote.

The SPEAKER. The names of over fifty gentlemen are included in this list; and neither of those gentlemen is entitled to vote until he is excused by the House.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask that the Clerk be directed to read the names, so that we may know who are entitled to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the names of the gentlemen under arrest.

The Clerk read the list.

The question was taken on Mr. BLAINE's motion, and it was not agreed to—there being, on a division—ayes 9, noes 88.

So the House refused to lay the whole subject on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will now present the gentlemen in his custody at the bar of the House.

The members named in the list appeared in the area in front of the Speaker's chair, in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. L. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I inquire why it is that the name of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] does not appear in the list.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will inform the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I did not happen to be absent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it appears by the Journal that the gentleman from Illinois answered on the second roll-call last evening.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, was there not a call afterward, when the House found itself reduced below a quorum?

The SPEAKER. There were two calls last evening. All further proceedings were dispensed with under the first call of the House, when ninety-two members appeared in their seats. After that call there was an attempt to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on which motion no quorum voted. Another call was ordered, and it appears by the record that on that call the gentleman from Illinois responded.

Mr. STEVENS. Somebody must have answered for him.

Mr. L. MYERS. The gentleman from Illinois had disappeared from the Hall.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken; and he has no right to make the assertion. I was here, and I did answer to my name.

Mr. L. MYERS. I make it, notwithstanding.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman to say that he makes the assertion, nevertheless.

Mr. L. MYERS. I would ask the gentleman if he answered to his name upon the second call.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have already stated that I did answer to my name, and the gentleman is bound to believe it.

Mr. L. MYERS. If the gentleman states that here as a fact, of course I am bound to believe it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have stated it once, and no gentleman has a right to question it.

Mr. L. MYERS. My recollection is different; but of course I must believe the statement of the gentleman.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS then appeared at the bar of the House and said: Mr. Speaker, in obedience to the order of this House, and of your warrant to me directed, I have, with as little delay as possible with the means at my command, notified and caused to appear at the bar of this House the following-named members:

James C. Allen, John B. Alley, Lucien Anderson, Isaac N. Arnold, James M. Ashley, Joseph Bailey, Jacob B. Blair, George Bliss, Henry T. Blow, James Brooks, William G. Brown, John W. Chandler, Freeman Clarke, Brutus J. Clay, Cornelius Cole, Henry L. Dawes, John L. Dawson, John F. Farnsworth, John Ganson, Aaron Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Wells A. Hutchins, Austin A. King, Francis C. Le Blond, Robert Mallory, William H. Miller, Warren P. Noble, Godlove S. Orth, Nehemiah Perry, William H. Randall, Andrew J. Rogers, James S. Rollins, Robert C. Schenck, John G. Scott, Rufus P. Spalding, William G. Steele, L. D. M. Sweet, Robert B. Van Valkenburgh, and Edwin H. Webster.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution of the House under which it is now acting:

The Clerk read, as follows.

"Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring the members now absent without leave before the bar of the House at one o'clock, p. m., to-morrow, February 10, 1865, or as soon thereafter as possible; and that they then be required to show cause why they shall not be declared in contempt of the House, and abide the order of the House."

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen, you have all been brought to the bar of the House by order of the House, for absence from its session without its leave, in order that you may be required to show why you should not be declared in contempt of the House, and why you should not abide the order of the House. Your names will be called in order.

JAMES C. ALLEN.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ALLEN, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, at the time of adjournment yesterday afternoon I retired to my quarters in this city, and in company with one or two friends dined out. I made some inquiry before leaving the House as to the probable course of business at the evening session, and I was advised upon what I conceived to be very high authority indeed, but which I need not name, that there would be no business done except to continue the debate upon the tax bill, and however anxious I felt to hear what gentlemen might have to offer on so important a measure as that, being fatigued with the labors of the day, I did not feel that I was doing injustice to myself, or committing any contempt upon the authority of the House, by failing to attend its session.

At a late hour of the morning I returned to my room. I found a bundle of mail matter lying upon my table when I entered my room. But it was so late that I did not undertake to read my letters before retiring. I retired and slept; slept very soundly indeed. I came to the House this morning, and very shortly after making my appearance in the Hall I was arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms. I did not learn until after I had breakfasted this morning that there had been any call of the House last night.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would inquire whether the hour rule applies to these proceedings. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that by the decision of Speaker Winthrop, made many years ago, the hour rule does apply.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. Even though the hour rule does apply, a member must confine himself to a statement of the causes of his detention—the things which operated to detain him. How he felt and how he slept have nothing to do with the cause of his detention.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I may be a little too obtuse, sir, to understand exactly what would be a good excuse for my absence from this House. I was endeavoring to state the reasons why I had not been here. They may not be satisfactory to my friend from Pennsylvania; I cannot tell how that may be.

I was not aware, sir, that there was a call of the House. I had been advised by those who were presumed to know the order of business, that no legislative business would be transacted last evening. It may be that I ought not to have relied upon what was thus stated to me. I should have been here had I anticipated that my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] would revive the "whisky insurrection," as I understand he did; for on that question, according to my information, arose the call of the House. I am very sorry to hear, however, that, on being defeated, he retired in great disorder from the Hall.

I have said all that I propose to say in exculpation of myself, except that I desire to add that I did not purposely commit a contempt against the House by absenting myself.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN B. ALLEY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ALLEY, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render to the House for your absence?

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General sent a written request to the Committees on the Post Office and Post Roads of both Houses of Congress to meet at his house last evening to consult upon matters connected with his Department. In compliance with that invitation I attended that meeting with the other members of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I deem that a sufficient excuse; but I have another which I think is perhaps even stronger. Before I left home I promised my good wife that I would not keep any bad company or late hours. [Laughter.] During the recess last evening—

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the gentleman to order. I submit that his remarks are, by inference, disrespectful to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not proceeded far enough to enable the Chair to decide that point. The gentleman has not yet said anything out of order.

Mr. ALLEY. My friend from Ohio has misapprehended my remarks entirely. I suppose he thought I intended to reflect upon the House as being bad company.

Mr. GARFIELD. I certainly thought so. If the gentlemen did not intend that, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. ALLEY. Not at all; I referred to the House in speaking of late hours.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood it.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he had any refreshments at the Postmaster General's.

Mr. ALLEY. I believe it is one of the rules of this House, Mr. Speaker, that anything that transpires in committee shall not be divulged. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the members of the Post Office Committee met at the Postmaster General's on business, or whether the meeting was a convivial party.

Mr. ALLEY. We met there on business, of course.

During last evening I received a letter from home stating that my good lady was on her way here to look after me, and would probably be here to-morrow. Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit to you and to the honorable House, how I could answer to the promise I gave if I had been here last evening and staid till three o'clock this morning. [Laughter.] That is my excuse.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio. I move that he be excused unconditionally.

Mr. STEVENS. Has the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads leave to sit during the sessions of the House?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. STEVENS. Then the gentleman had no business to be absent.

Mr. O'NEILL's motion was rejected.

Mr. PRUYN. I move, if it be in order, to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, by providing that all of those who are under arrest, except the members who were present at the first call and left before the second call, be excused on the payment of the usual fees. I think that we have spent enough of the time of the country on this, and at this stage of the session I think we had better get to business.

The SPEAKER. Each member has the right to have a decision on his own case.

Mr. PRUYN. I think there will be no objection to excusing all except those who were present upon the first call and absent on the second call.

The SPEAKER. Let the gentleman name the members he wants excepted.

Mr. PRUYN. I cannot do it; but I suppose the Clerk has their names.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk cannot do it; the Chair therefore cannot entertain the motion.

Mr. BROOMALL's motion was agreed to.

Mr. RADFORD. Is a motion in order?

The SPEAKER. A motion is in order to lay on the table.

Mr. RADFORD. I propose that as many gentlemen as choose to pay the usual fees be discharged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that motion would not deprive any member of his right to be heard. If adopted the members can avail themselves of it or not as they choose.

Mr. RADFORD. That is my motion.

The motion was disagreed to.

LUCIEN ANDERSON.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ANDERSON, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, last night a gentleman from Kentucky, with whom I am well acquainted, having some important business to transact, came to my room and remained till half past ten o'clock; and when he left I went to bed. I was notified about three o'clock this morning, and was on my way to the House when I was told that it had adjourned.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be excused, on the payment of the usual fees. The motion was agreed to.

ISAAC N. ARNOLD.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ARNOLD, having absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave, what excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I regard the passage of the Illinois and Michigan ship-canal bill as of the greatest possible importance to my constituents. That bill is now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. Learning that nothing was to be done in the House except making general speeches on the tax bill, I believed that by conference with members of that committee I could do more service to my constituents than by being here, and I was accordingly in the company of members of that committee during the evening. I was absent, subserving the interests of my constituents.

Mr. WILSON. Was the gentleman notified before the adjournment last night that his presence was needed?

Mr. ARNOLD. I was not.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees. The motion was agreed to.

JAMES M. ASHLEY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ASHLEY, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, understanding there was to be speech making and no business transacted last night, I concluded to remain at home, being somewhat fatigued, and put myself upon low diet. After reading and answering my letters I turned to Dombey and Son, and read some of the extraordinary incidents in that remarkable book. I was unconscious that the Sergeant-at-Arms was out after members. I have no other excuse.

Mr. RADFORD. I move the gentleman be excused, upon the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman one question, and that is, whether he was notified by the Sergeant-at-Arms or any one authorized by him that his presence was needed here?

Mr. ASHLEY. I desire to ask my friend from Iowa why he asks me that question.

Mr. WILSON. If the notice was received by the gentleman from Ohio, or by any other gentleman now at the bar of the House, that his presence was desired in the House, I am in favor of adding to the usual fees a fine for not attending in accordance to notice.

Mr. ASHLEY. Then the gentleman wants me to criminate myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. I would like an answer.

Mr. ASHLEY. Well, I was notified and knew nothing about the matter until this morning. The motion to excuse was agreed to.

JOSEPH BAILY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BAILY, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. BAILY. When I left the Hall yesterday afternoon I supposed the evening session was to be devoted to general debate exclusively. I was not well, and remained in my room all the evening. I had no notice that my presence was needed in the House, or I should have been here.

Mr. GARFIELD. In consideration of what the gentleman says in reference to his health, I move that he be unconditionally excused.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I move to amend the motion by striking out the word "unconditionally," and adding "upon payment of the usual fees."

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion, as amended, was agreed to.

JACOB B. BLAIR.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BLAIR, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. BLAIR rose in his seat to speak.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman must come forward to the bar of the House.

Mr. BLAIR, (stepping forward to the bar of the House,) I rose in my seat for the purpose of being heard, as I want gentlemen to hear my excuse. I was about to observe that most of the members of this House probably know that I have been seriously indisposed in one of my limbs for several weeks, so much so that I have been almost unable to get to the House in the day time. I am in the habit of retiring to my virtuous couch about the time I think all sober and honest men should go to rest. Last evening, at my usual hour, I retired. About half past one o'clock I heard an unusual noise at my door. I got up, went to the door, placed my hand upon the key and was about to turn it, when the thought struck me that possibly some one was there who wished to rob me of that which would not enrich him, but make me poor indeed. I retired again in good order to my bed. A second thought occurred to me that as there was great excitement throughout the country in reference to the question of oil, and particularly the stock of the Blair Oil Company, some one might be there wanting to purchase the few shares that are left. I went to the door and opened it, but instead of finding a purchaser, I found the Sergeant-at-Arms. He told me my presence was required at the House. Just then my foot, which had caused me a great deal of trouble, but which I thought was almost well, commenced hurting me most dreadfully. I appealed to the Sergeant-at-Arms, extending my lame limb toward him, and asked him if he thought I should go out at the dead hour of the night, cold as it was, in that condition. He remarked at once that he thought he would report me as being too unwell to visit the House. I assured him from the bottom of my heart of my most distinguished consideration, and retired again to my bed. I remained there until morning, and when I reached the Hall at twelve o'clock I was informed that I was under arrest. This is the only excuse I have.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the gentleman be excused on paying a fine of ten dollars and the usual fees.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I move to amend by striking out the ten dollars. The gentleman was lame and could not walk up here, and there was no provision made for bringing him.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that he be excused unconditionally.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I accept that in the place of my amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH's motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD's motion was agreed to.

GEORGE BLISS.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BLISS, you have been absent from the session of the House without leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. BLISS. I have but a few words of excuse to offer, and there will be no wit contained in them. I left the House at an advanced hour yesterday afternoon without any intelligence that there was to be an evening session. I supposed that the business of the day was substantially accomplished. The Sergeant-at-Arms is guilty of treating me with neglect last night, for I got notice neither from him nor any other functionary or source of information that the House was in session. Had I known it I should have been here. I was in perfect health, and have no excuse except, perhaps, such negligence as may be imputed to me for not knowing that the House would be in session. The legal and legitimate consequences I am ready to respond to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the gentleman be discharged unconditionally.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend that motion by adding thereto the words "on payment of the usual fees."

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to be heard for a moment on that point.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BROOMALL's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN's motion, as amended, was then agreed to, and Mr. BLISS was excused on payment of the usual fees.

HENRY T. BLOW.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BLOW, you have been absent from the session of this House without leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. BLOW. Mr. Speaker, about a week ago, not anticipating a night session, I accepted an invitation for last evening to a delightful dinner party, as it proved. I did not feel at liberty, under the circumstances, to withdraw the answer I had given to the polite gentleman who had invited me to his house. I remained there until half past eleven o'clock last night, and then proceeded to assist my friend from Illinois [Mr. ARNOLD] in his efforts to secure legislation in reference to the Illinois ship-canal. I saw the Sergeant-at-Arms at a distance at one of the places where I was, and on my way to the Capitol I was made prisoner at the National Hotel—not, however, by the Sergeant-at-Arms. That is all I have to say.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I move that the gentleman be excused on payment of the usual fees.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to inquire of the gentleman if he was notified by the Sergeant-at-Arms that his attendance was required here?

Mr. BLOW. I was.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. At what hour?

Mr. BLOW. The Sergeant-at-Arms can answer that question; I must decline answering.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that under these circumstances something more than the payment of the ordinary fees should be required. It is a case of willful neglect of public duty. I therefore move that an additional penalty of ten dollars be imposed.

Mr. BLOW. I desire to say to the gentleman from Indiana that it was not willful.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I will take back the word "willful."

Mr. HOLMAN's amendment was disagreed to.

The motion of Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire, was then agreed to; and Mr. BLOW was discharged on payment of fees.

Mr. YEAMAN. I move that all the remaining gentlemen at the bar of the House, who see fit to pay the usual fee, be excused.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. If I remember right, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] was before the bar of the House last evening and had a fine imposed upon him. I understand the rule to be that he has no right to take part in the proceedings unless the penalty is paid.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presumes that every member of the House obeys the order of the House. As the gentleman from Kentucky was released on payment of the usual fee, the Chair presumes that he has complied with the order of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. A very violent presumption.

The SPEAKER. That may be.

The question was taken on Mr. YEAMAN's motion, and it was not agreed to.

JAMES BROOKS.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Brooks, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, there was a conflict of authority last night. I obeyed the rules of the House up to nine o'clock. I was then called by the chairman of the Post Office Committee to another sphere of duty at the Postmaster General's. In that other sphere I thought I might render as good public service as if I had remained here.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to inquire whether the gentleman was notified that the Sergeant-at-Arms had called on him.

Mr. BROOKS. I was not notified. I never heard of it till I saw it in the papers this morning.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that my colleague be excused unconditionally.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move, as an amendment, that he be required to pay the usual fees.

The amendment was adopted; and the motion, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, if I pay the Sergeant-at-Arms now, can I vote?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS, (stepping forward to the Sergeant-at-Arms.) Then I will settle up. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY. Do I understand the Chair to decide that until a member who has been fined has paid the Sergeant-at-Arms he is not entitled to vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already decided that he presumes all gentlemen have obeyed the orders of the House unless there be evidence to the contrary.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order. I am told that there is an arrangement between certain gentlemen who were here last night to collect a considerable sum of money for the Sergeant-at-Arms and to have a grand supper at the close of the session. My point of order is that those gentlemen are interested and therefore are not entitled to vote. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. THAYER. The remarks of the gentleman from New York are a reflection on the House.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, as one of those who remained here till four o'clock in the morning, I utterly deny the existence of any such arrangement. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. I understand the Chair to say that the remarks of the gentleman from New York are in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled them out as not being a valid point of order under the rule.

WILLIAM G. BROWN.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BROWN, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. BROWN, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I had an engagement last evening for a few hours with a friend. My health is not very good at any time, and at the conclusion of my engagement I went to bed unwell. Some time in the night, after I had slept for a considerable time, my wife told me that some gentleman had come to the door wanting to see me, and that she sent word to the gentleman that I was unwell. The gentleman then left without my seeing him. It was a fact that I was unwell; and I would not have come here last night for any amount that the House would probably fine me on account of my absence. My condition of health was such that I could not come.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the gentleman be discharged unconditionally. The motion was agreed to.

JOHN W. CHANLER.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CHANLER, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. CHANLER. I left the House on yesterday under the impression that the debate upon the internal revenue bill, which had been commenced by the honorable gentleman who had charge of that bill, [Mr. MORRILL,] would certainly continue until the next morning, and that it would not be necessary for me to be here. Before I started from the Capitol, I left word with one of the officers of the House that in case any other business should transpire I should be sent for. I heard nothing of the order of the House, but came here this morning unaware any call had been made.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

FREEMAN CLARKE.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CLARKE, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. F. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I am not well enough to attend the evening sessions of the House.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be unconditionally excused.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask the gentleman if he was confined to his room last night.

Mr. F. CLARKE. I was not.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] so as to excuse the gentleman upon the payment of the usual fees.

The amendment was adopted; and the motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

BRUTUS J. CLAY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CLAY, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. CLAY. I was not aware, Mr. Speaker, that my services were needed here last night. I left the Hall last evening under the impression that we were to have a night session only for the purpose of allowing gentlemen an opportunity to make speeches for their constituents; not particularly to enlighten members of this House; and as I felt no particular interest in them I did not think it necessary to attend. I went home to my room and remained there, and was not aware of anything that was being transacted here last night; and furthermore I am not much inclined to travel at night over the slippery pavements and steps, and therefore I concluded I would not come up here last night. I had no intention or desire to show any contempt of this House.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move that the gentleman be unconditionally excused.

Mr. RADFORD moved to amend so as to excuse the gentleman upon the payment of the usual fees.

The amendment was adopted; and the motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

CORNELIUS COLE.

The SPEAKER. Mr. COLE, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. COLE, of California. Mr. Speaker, I was by special invitation at a more festive scene than the one transpiring in this House last night. It was between eleven and twelve o'clock when I reached my lodgings, and I supposed then that the House was keeping better hours than the members of the Committees on Post Offices and Post Roads, and I retired for the night. I knew nothing then of the proceedings of the House. When I saw the statement in the papers this morning to the effect that when last heard from the House was still in session, my first impression was to come up here immediately and relieve you from the dilemma in which you were placed. But stopping to obtain my breakfast, I learned that the House had adjourned some time during the morning.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be excused upon payment of the usual fees. The motion was agreed to.

HENRY L. DAWES.

The SPEAKER. Mr. DAWES, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, as the House is well aware, I attended upon the session of the House last evening until a very late hour. During the discussions of last night, as the House is also aware, I unfortunately became involved in a personal difficulty with the venerable and, until then, very much esteemed gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] under the impression that he was attempting to appropriate to himself an article that belonged entirely to me. In the course of the evening I received a message from him of such a character that I was a little uncertain what it meant. I therefore consulted the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] who, we all know, is perfectly au fait in such matters, [laughter,] and he informed me that it admitted of but one construction, and that I must meet the gentleman from Ohio outside of the District and vindicate my honor, [renewed laughter,] and, in company with the gentleman from Ohio, I left the House for that purpose late in the evening. I was not aware of the call of the House after I left. I am happy to say that such explanations took place between the gentleman from Ohio and myself as rendered it entirely satisfactory to me that he had no intention to make the appropriation that I at first supposed he had, and that is the reason why I left the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is one of those who left after the doors were opened, and thus left the House without a quorum; and both for that reason and because he accepted a challenge, I move that he be excused upon paying a fine of ten dollars in addition to the usual fees.

Mr. COX. I do not think we ought to press so hard upon my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] He has said that he left the House upon a belligerent errand. Now, it is so unusual a thing for our New England friends to fight that I think it should be regarded in his case.

Mr. TRACY. I move to amend by striking out the fine of ten dollars.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to amend by striking out "ten dollars" and inserting "one dollar."

The amendment was rejected.

The motion of Mr. STEVENS was then agreed to.

JOHN L. DAWSON.

The SPEAKER. Mr. DAWSON, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, I was present during the regular session of the House on yesterday until the hour for the recess. It seems that the House had resolved to meet again at seven o'clock. I did not learn that fact until after eight o'clock, when I immediately repaired toward the Capitol, but on my way was informed that the House had adjourned. I then returned to my lodgings. I received no notice from any one that the House was in session, and knew nothing of the fact until after I appeared here to-day at twelve o'clock and was informed that such was the case.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that the gentleman be unconditionally excused.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend so as to excuse him upon the payment of the usual fees.

The amendment was adopted; and the motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

JOHN F. FARNSWORTH.

The SPEAKER. Mr. FARNSWORTH, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render to the House for your absence?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I attended the session of the House last evening until nearly one o'clock, until all further proceedings under the call of the House had been dispensed with, and the doors were opened. Presuming that no further business would be transacted, and feeling quite unwell and very much fatigued, I went to my lodgings, and, after taking some refreshment, retired to my virtuous couch. I had just got into my first slumber when "I heard a rapping

As of some one [not very] gently tapping
At my chamber door."

Upon asking who was there, the Sergeant-at-Arms responded, desiring me to get up and come to the House. I told him that was impossible; that I could not, in the condition of my health, get out of my bed at that hour.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment, that I may make a motion which, if it be made at all, must be made before half past four.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cheerfully yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the session of this evening be dispensed with. I desire that we shall get through with the business in which we are now engaged, and I think that we had better continue this afternoon's session until we conclude this matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont moves that the session of this evening be dispensed with. That is a privileged motion, the effect of the adoption of which will be that the session of this afternoon will be extended until a motion to adjourn shall be adopted.

Mr. COX. I move to amend so as to provide that all the evening sessions be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be entertained. The House has resolved by unanimous consent that there shall be a session every evening, unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the House.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I rise to propound an inquiry to the Chair. The House having passed a resolution for evening sessions, can that resolution be repealed in this way?

The SPEAKER. The terms of the resolution provided that there should be a session every evening, unless otherwise ordered; the intention being that, as during last session, a majority should dispense with the evening session when they saw fit.

The motion of Mr. MORRILL was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. As I was stating, I told the Sergeant-at-Arms that I was not able to get up and come to the House, which was true. I dislike, Mr. Speaker, to make excuses on account of the state of my health; and I know that when I tell the House that I have had for several days past that ignoble malady, the fever and ague, I shall not get very much sympathy. I have been taking medicine every day for several days for the chills and fever. Last evening I was not well.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move that my colleague be unconditionally excused.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman was here a part of last evening. I desire to ask him whether, on leaving the House, he asked permission to retire?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I did not.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I suggest that the fact that my colleague is at large is prima facie evidence that he has paid his fine.

Mr. GARFIELD. I regret to ask the House to allow me to make an amendment of the motion. It seems to me that this is one of the clearest cases of positive contempt of the authority of the House that has yet come before us, and I move that the gentleman be fined twenty-five dollars in addition to the usual fees.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to make it ten dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Before I vote on a proposition of that kind I would like to know from the gentlemen from Illinois how he got out of the House last night?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The doors were open.

Mr. STEVENS. If I understood the gentleman, after we obtained a quorum and were going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to transact business, he with others went away and left us without a quorum, so that we had to stay here all night.

Mr. STEVENS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend by striking out twenty-five dollars and providing that the Speaker shall reprimand the gentleman. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Well, then, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I know that the gentleman from Illinois was not well, and I move to amend by making it five dollars.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRANK. I move that it be made $12 50, the same as the gentleman from Massachusetts, who left at the same time.

The amendment was agreed to; and the motion, as amended, was adopted.

JOHN GANSON.

The SPEAKER. Mr. GANSON, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. GANSON. Mr. Speaker, when I left the House in the afternoon I intended to attend the evening session; but I was detained by several agreeable gentlemen. When they left I retired. I was notified by the Sergeant-at-Arms, before morning, that the House was still in session, and at once prepared to come here. I called upon Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, on my way, and found that he was sick. When I reached the Capitol the House had adjourned. I returned home again, getting there at half past four o'clock.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. COX. I move that he be unconditionally excused.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL's motion was then agreed to.

AARON HARDING.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HARDING, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HARDING. Mr. Speaker, although I have attended the sessions of the House for the last three or four days, I have not always felt well enough to remain till the adjournment. Last night I felt better, but was still suffering from disease, so that I did not deem it prudent to come here. For the same reason I declined to accept the invitation to attend the Postmaster General's with the Post Office Committee.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the gentleman be unconditionally excused.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY W. HARRINGTON.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Mr. Speaker, Mr. HARRINGTON started to come to the House, but seeing the flag down, thought the House had adjourned, and returned home.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the halyards broke this morning, and the flag had to be taken down while the House was in session.

Mr. HARRINGTON not being present, his case will be reserved.

BENJAMIN G. HARRIS.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HARRIS, you have been absent without the leave of the House. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I have labored for several days under a bad cold, from which I have not yet recovered. I think that it would be imprudent for me to come out during the night. It would only be exposing my health to do so. I was not notified by the Sergeant-at-Arms. Even if I had been, my health would not have permitted me to come here.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move the gentleman be unconditionally excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WELLS A. HUTCHINS.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HUTCHINS, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I was aware that night sessions of the House had been ordered to commence soon, but that there was to be such a session last evening was a fact that had entirely escaped my mind. By my absence I intended no disrespect to the House, and I was not notified of the fact until I came here to-day.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS W. KELLOGG.

The Sergeant-at-Arms stated that Mr. KELLOGG was out of the city.

AUSTIN A. KING.

The SPEAKER. Mr. KING, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. KING. I was aware that the House had adopted a resolution for night sessions, but I absented myself out of no disrespect to the House. The streets have been very bad to walk upon during the last week, and in the first part of the week I was not able to keep my feet under me, and on one occasion fell and sprained my wrist, and I have hardly been able to use my hand since. After getting my dinner yesterday, at five o'clock, I went to my own room and remained there, and was not notified that my attendance was required at the House. Had I been notified at any hour of the night, I should have felt it my duty to try to come here; but not feeling that there was an absolute necessity for being here, I was not willing to undertake at night to walk up these slippery walks and steps which I have not been able to walk with safety during the day.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I would like to know of my colleague whether he got his fall before or after dinner. [Laughter.]

Mr. RADFORD. I move that the gentleman be unconditionally excused.

The motion was agreed to.

ANTHONY L. KNAPP.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. KNAPP is in the city of New York.

FRANCIS C. LE BLOND.

The SPEAKER. Mr. LE BLOND, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. LE BLOND. I was not aware that there would be any business transacted last evening beyond mere speech making, and therefore I remained at home with my wife. I was neither sick, nor upon any important committee, nor was I served with any process requiring my attendance. I did not know that my presence was needed until I came here this morning. Had I known it I should have come here last night.

Mr. RADFORD. I move the gentleman be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT MALLORY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MALLORY, you have absented yourself from the sitting of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. MALLORY. I came up to the House last night because I understood some questions I felt a great deal of interest in would be taken up for consideration when the tax bill was before the Committee of the Whole. If it had not been for that I should not have come at all, for I did not feel very well. Coming here, I found the House without a quorum, answered to my name, and tried to get the House to exercise mercy toward the delinquents; but the House was a little hard-hearted last night, and it seems they are disposed to be a little hard this morning. As the evening advanced, not feeling very well, I asked leave of the House to retire to my room. Leave was granted; but because I did not avail myself of the privilege immediately, some gentleman moved to reconsider the vote by which such leave was granted. The vote was reconsidered, and the leave was rescinded. [Laughter.]

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman by what means he left the Hall?

Mr. MALLORY. Ah! Mr. Speaker, I do not think that a very pertinent question.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. The doors were all closed.

Mr. MALLORY. I object to his drawing the conclusion that because I am a member of the Committee of Ways and Means I have mean ways. I went out correctly.

Mr. HOLMAN. This being an unusual case, I move the gentleman be excused upon paying $12 50 and the usual fees.

Mr. MALLORY. I presume the gentleman with his usual courtesy will permit me to get through with my excuse.

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought the gentleman had concluded his remarks.

Mr. MALLORY. I was about to remark that I belonged to the Committee of Ways and Means, or mean ways, just as gentlemen see fit to call it; and I have a right to be absent from this House during its sessions. But that is not my excuse. I was unwell and left the House. If that is sufficient the House can excuse me.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now make my motion, omitting, however, the $12 50.

Mr. COX. I must say I never in my life knew my friend from Kentucky so gay and festive as he was last night. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman from Ohio will allow me to say that it was fictitious, something like the prosperity that exists all over our country now. I had just left the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GANSON,] and the gentleman from Ohio knows his character well enough to know how to account for the spirit which I exhibited when I came to this House.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman says it was a hectic flush, I will agree to let him off.

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, no! Not a hectic flush.

Mr. STROUSE. I move that the gentleman be excused unconditionally.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend that motion by adding that he be fined ten dollars in addition to the usual fees.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My colleague has been confined to his room by indisposition, and was here last night very indiscreetly. He ought not to have been here.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I withdraw the motion.

The question was taken on Mr. STROUSE's motion, and it was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. MILLER.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MILLER, you have been absent from the session of the House without leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. When the House passed the resolution providing for evening sessions I was detained at my home by illness. I left the House yesterday afternoon prior to the recess, unwell, and remained in my room; and I knew nothing of this call of the House until this morning.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the gentleman be unconditionally discharged.

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, was discharged from custody.

WARREN P. NOBLE.

The SPEAKER. Mr. NOBLE, you have been absent from the session of the House without leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. NOBLE. I got the impression yesterday about the time the House adjourned that the evening session would be devoted to speaking, and nothing else. Nevertheless, I intended to come here. But when I arrived at the hotel to get my dinner I found two of my constituents there, who demanded my personal attention last night in the transaction of public business. I could not very well leave them. I was, however, sufficiently in health to be here, and meant no contempt of the House by my absence.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Ohio is almost always in his seat; I believe he has scarcely ever been absent. I move that he be unconditionally excused.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend that motion by adding to it "on payment of the usual fees."

The question was put, and on a division there were—ayes 48, noes 35; no quorum voting.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Would it be in order to move that there be a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Then I make that motion. The question was put, and the House refused to order a call.

Mr. BROOMALL. I withdraw my amendment.

The question was then taken on Mr. ELDRIDGE's motion, and it was agreed to; and Mr. NOBLE was excused unconditionally.

GODLOVE S. ORTH.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ORTH, you have been absent from the session of the House without leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. ORTH. I was too unwell to leave my room last night. I retired at a very early hour, and knew nothing of the proceedings of the House until I got here this morning.

Mr. COX. I move that the gentleman be unconditionally excused.

The motion was agreed to.

NEHEMIAH PERRY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. PERRY, you have been absent from the session of the House without leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. PERRY. On Wednesday I received a telegram from New Jersey that made it important for me to go there. I left on Wednesday evening in the half-past seven o'clock train for New Jersey, and transacted the business I had to do. Fearing that my friend WASHBURN would move this whisky amendment, I took the train back and arrived here at six o'clock this morning. That is all the excuse I have to make.

Mr. RADFORD. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to amend that motion so as to excuse him unconditionally.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. RADFORD's motion was then agreed to.

WILLIAM H. RANDALL.

The SPEAKER. Mr. RANDALL, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. RANDALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have any good excuse. I forgot that there was a night session, and was not absent through any contempt of the House at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in consequence of the frankness of the avowal, I move that the gentleman from Kentucky be unconditionally discharged.

Mr. RADFORD. I move, as an amendment, that he be discharged on payment of the usual fees.

The amendment was adopted; and the motion, as amended, was agreed to.

ALEXANDER H. RICE.

The SPEAKER. Mr. RICE, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, for the last fortnight I have been in ill health, and sometimes have not been able to attend the day session of the House. During the whole of that time I have not been out of my house on any evening, for any purpose whatever. I was detained at home by illness last night.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the gentleman from Massachusetts be unconditionally excused. The motion was agreed to.

ANDREW J. ROGERS.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ROGERS, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, my understanding was that there was to be nothing but speaking at last evening's session; and therefore I remained absent, supposing that there was no necessity for my presence. I had no notice from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be excused on payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES S. ROLLINS.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ROLLINS, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, (from his seat.) Mr. Speaker—

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman must come to the bar of the House and answer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, (from the center aisle.) Mr. Speaker—

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman should come to the criminal dock. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, (having stepped to the area in front of the Speaker's chair.) Mr. Speaker, I meant no disrespect to the House by my absence last night. I was not positively certain that there was to be an evening session. There was some doubt in my mind on that question. I represent a very excellent people—a more than average constituency. [Laughter.] A couple of my constituents arrived here yesterday; and I hold it to be the duty of a polite Representative to give all proper attention, not only to his legislative duties, but also to his constituents when they visit this city. I felt it my duty to pay my respects to those gentlemen last night, and finding them very agreeable, I remained with them. That is my excuse.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether he got notice last night that the House was in session.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I did not. I was not notified till this afternoon by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be discharged on payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK.

The SPEAKER. Mr. SCHENCK, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I was present in the House yesterday all day, and in my usual health, being blessed with a tolerably vigorous constitution, for which I am grateful. I knew there was to be an evening session, and I knew that it was to be for the purpose of taking up and acting on the tax bill, and not for the mere purpose of debate. I determined, however, after some inquiry, not to come last evening. I have an impression, Mr. Speaker, that I am the hardest-working man in the House of Representatives. My committee has met every morning for the last three weeks; and it is as much as I can do to get my breakfast and get there punctually for the meeting of the committee, as I always endeavor to anticipate the arrival of the other members. From the committee I come into the House. Last night I felt fagged out and in need of recreation and rest. Still I would not leave the House until I ascertained from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] that the question of the tax upon tobacco, in which my constituents felt great interest, would not be likely to come up. I am perfectly disinterested upon that subject, for I do not use it in any shape, either in smoking, chewing, or snuffing. Still I have many constituents who are large producers of that article.

Owing, therefore, not to any want of health, or want of disposition to do my duty, but simply because I was tired out—and I shall be glad when the 4th of March comes, on that account—I failed to come here last night; and I feel myself quite as much surprised, in view of the labor I have performed this session, in being tried here for neglect of duty, as I think some gentlemen who are trying me must feel that they are engaged in that trial.

I have no other excuse than this to offer, except to state the circumstances attending my absence. I passed a portion of my evening away from my lodgings with some friends. I then returned to my lodgings, and applied myself to some letters which had to be written, and to the preparation in part of some memoranda for a bill, and for an interview with the Secretary of War in relation to some matters before the Military Committee, and I think I got to bed about two o'clock in the morning, which is about my usual time for retiring. The Sergeant-at-Arms did not call upon me or notify me that I was wanted here. This morning, when I read in the papers that the House was still in session when last heard from, I inquired of my family whether any one had called in the course of the evening while I was out and left any notice for me, and was told that no one had done so. My notice from the Sergeant-at-Arms was received in this Hall at one or two o'clock today. This is my excuse for my absence.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose that the absence of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] was owing to the fact that he feels great anxiety to have the business of the House advanced, in order that we may have a call of committees, which will afford an opportunity to the Committee on Military Affairs to submit their reports. I suppose that will account for his absence from the House, and it seems to me that it is a good excuse.

Mr. ODELL. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] says he was absent on account of his position on a very hard-working committee. I only desire to say that other gentlemen who are on that same hard-working committee were here all last night. I do not think that the gentleman should be unconditionally excused, but that he, like others, should be required to pay the usual fees.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] be excused upon payment of the usual fees.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it be in order to add the words "in view of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], the Chair be directed to administer a mild censure to him for the manner in which he spoke of his judges," who are known to be very industrious gentlemen? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] does not propose to press his motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed the gentleman was criticising his judges rather severely.

Mr. SCHENCK. I disclaim any purpose of that kind. I was not aware that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] would apply my remarks to himself.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw the motion to amend.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, to excuse the gentleman upon the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move to amend so as to excuse unconditionally.

The amendment was rejected.

The motion of Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, was then adopted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that all those members who were not here at all last night be excused unconditionally, and all those who were here until one o'clock be fined ten dollars each.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that that motion is not in order.

JOHN G. SCOTT.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Scott, you have been absent from the session of this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render to the House for your absence?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, several of my friends were in the city yesterday on very important business. They expected to leave to-day, and desired that I should see them last night. I called upon them, and returned to my room at ten o'clock. I received notice at twelve o'clock to-day from the Sergeant-at-Arms. The business upon which my friends came here was very important, and it was necessary that I should see them last night.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be excused upon paying the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

RUFUS P. SPALDING.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Spalding, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I never at any time absent myself willingly from the sessions of this House. I have for some days, perhaps I might say for some weeks, been suffering from a severe cold. I attended the House yesterday from twelve o'clock until the recess at half past four. I really was not able to come during the evening session; but I was impressed with the importance of aiding in the examination of the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, the internal revenue bill, and I did come punctually at seven o'clock. My purpose was to remain during the whole session of the House. I staid here for some six hours, with very much discomfort to myself. I asked the Speaker once whether I could retire, but he said that the rules would not permit it. I stayed until the proceedings under the first call were dispensed with. It was then about one o'clock. The doors were opened. I supposed that then the proceedings of the House were substantially ended. I had no idea but that the House would, within five or ten minutes, adjourn, and as I had to walk from the Capitol to Seventh street, the cars having ceased to run, I went out in advance, as I supposed, of the House, with no intention to condemn the House, but for the purpose of getting as speedily as I could to my lodgings, where I knew I ought to be. If I had remained here during the subsequent sitting of the House, I do not believe that I could have attended here to-day.

I should perhaps have asked permission of the House before leaving; but I did not consider it necessary. It was rather a thoughtless act on my part to go away without asking permission; but I felt the necessity of going; so as soon as the doors were opened I did go.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman a question: whether it was not suggested to him, as he was about to go, that if he would remain for two or three minutes the question would be taken on the business before the House, and that then we could have an adjournment?

Mr. SPALDING. I have no recollection of that; it may have been so.

Mr. KELLEY. I have a very distinct recollection of having made that suggestion.

Mr. SPALDING. If so, I replied that I could not remain longer. I was almost in a condition to sink in my seat.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not suppose that any gentleman knew that the business would be concluded in two or three minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. I gave such notice to the gentleman, and received from him a very angry and indignant answer.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I heard the gentleman from Ohio remark, as he left the Hall, that, unless he left immediately, he did not believe he would be able to come here to-day.

Mr. COX. As my colleague has stated that he was so ill last night that he felt ready to sink in his seat, I think that he should be unconditionally excused, as have been others who were sick.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I know that the gentleman came here last night when he really should have remained away.

Mr. RADFORD. I move that the gentleman be excused on paying a fine of $12 50, in addition to the usual fees.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I desire to ask whether the gentleman from Ohio asked permission to absent himself from the House.

Several MEMBERS. He has said that he did not.

The question recurred on Mr. RADFORD's motion.

Mr. ROSS. I move to amend by making it five dollars.

Mr. COX. I hope that this police court business will stop.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend that he be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion, as amended, was then adopted.

JOHN T. STUART.

The Sergeant-at-Arms stated that Mr. STUART was reported to be absent from the city.

L. D. M. SWEAT.

The SPEAKER. Mr. SWEAT, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. SWEAT. Mr. Speaker, when I left the House yesterday afternoon I was aware there would be an evening session, but it was not my purpose to attend it, neither would it be my purpose to attend this evening if there were to be a session, because for the past week I have been laboring under such a severe cold that it would be not only imprudent but unsafe to have exposed myself. I was not confined to my room. I will add that I received no notification that my presence was desired.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the gentleman be unconditionally excused.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT B. VAN VALKENBURGH.

The SPEAKER. Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH. Mr. Speaker, I have no excuse to offer. I have been unwell for a few days, but was able to be here.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. Was the gentleman sick?

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH. I was able to attend, but did not deem it prudent. When the gentleman has paid his fine I will answer all of his questions.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

EDWIN H. WEBSTER.

The Sergeant-at-Arms stated that Mr. WEBSTER had been present, but had been called to attend Senator Hicks who was lying dangerously ill.

WILLIAM G. STEELE.

The SPEAKER. Mr. STEELE, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I was present last evening until about one o'clock. I had been suffering some two hours prior to that, and as soon as the call was suspended I went home, not believing that there would be another call. I could not have remained longer.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the gentleman be unconditionally excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The call has been concluded. Mr. GARFIELD. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That Hon. E. B. WASHBURN, in leaving the Hall without permission, pending a call of the House, at its session Tuesday evening, February 9, was guilty of disorderly conduct, and deserves the censure of the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not understand that that is a question of privilege; or that going out of the House constitutes disorder.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest, as the gentleman from Illinois is not present, that the resolution be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it is a question of privilege, as a charge is made by one member against another for violating the rules of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Illinois is not present, I move that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed until one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It must be submitted to the House whether it is a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. In a case where the Chair doubts, he has the right to submit it; but here the Chair holds this to be a question of privilege, as a charge is made by one member against another. The Chair expresses no opinion whether the fact is true or not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. If we adjourn what becomes of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. As the House has resolved that there shall be a morning hour every day except Monday, it will come up to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. MORRILL. I think we had better have a vote upon this to-night, and not consume another day with this matter.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at twenty minutes past five o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 11, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. RAMSEY to supply the vacancy on the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate occasioned by the absence of Mr. HARDING.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of State, transmitting, in obedience to law, a report on the commercial relations of the United States with foreign nations for the year ending September 30, 1864.

Mr. MORGAN. It has heretofore been necessary to pass a resolution of the Senate in relation to the number of copies to be printed of this document, but by the fifth section of the act passed at the last session to facilitate and expedite the public printing, the number to be printed is provided for. No motion to print is necessary, therefore. I move that the communication lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating the report of the commission appointed under the joint resolution of Congress, approved June 30, 1864, "to select the most approved site for a navy-yard or naval station on the Mississippi river, or upon one of its tributaries," and recommending an appropriation to cover the expenses of the commission; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior transmitting the estimates of the superintendent of the southern superintendency for feeding the refugee Indians for the first and second quarters of 1865, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, and recommending the appropriation asked for; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. CLARK presented the credentials of Hon. AARON H. CRAIG, chosen by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1865; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. RAMSEY presented the memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of an additional grant of lands to aid in the completion of the several lines of railroad and branches in that State, mentioned in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1857, and for an extension of the time limited therein; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of additional relief to the sufferers from the Sioux Indian war of 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a petition of officers in the military service of the United States, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of Jane Clark, of Washington city, District of Columbia, praying compensation for a house and lot seized and confiscated by the Government under the act of July 17, 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of citizens of the city of New York, praying for the passage of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOWARD presented the memorial of J. W. Sheldon, claim agent in the city of Washington, praying for the payment of bounty to veterans and other recruits belonging to the thirteenth and fourteenth Michigan batteries, promised them by recruiting officers; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HENDERSON presented resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of mustering out volunteers recruited under promise of discharge at the expiration of the term of service of their respective regiments in accordance with such promise; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented five petitions of citizens of Missouri, praying for the establishment of a daily mail route from Macon City, Missouri, to Keosauqua, Iowa; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a memorial of the executive committee of the board of delegates of the American Israelites, who represent that they are a permanent executive committee of conference, representing about forty congregations of Israelites in various parts of the United States, and have been appointed to watch over all occurrences which may interest the Israelites in their social, religious, and political concerns. As such they come forward at this juncture, they say, to protest energetically against the amendments to the preamble of the Constitution of the United States prayed for in the memorial of the Presbytery of Cincinnati, dated December 12, 1864, and signed by A. J. Reynolds, and twenty-one others, and against any changes in the various articles of the Constitution to make them agree with the amendment suggested by a conference of ministers and laymen of various denominations held at Philadelphia on the 29th and 30th of November, 1864, and which, they say, no doubt, have been or will be presented to Congress at this or the next session. They set forth at length in their memorial their objections to any such constitutional amendment, and they invoke the example and spirit of our fathers at the adoption of the Constitution against all religious tests and disabilities. The memorial is signed by Isaac Leaser, the first vice president and acting president, Henry Josephi, chairman of the executive committee, and Myer S. Isaacs, secretary; and it bears the seal of the board of delegates of the American Israelites. As this relates to a proposed amendment of the Constitution, I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The motion was agreed to.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the bill (S. No. 373) to aid in the construction of a telegraphic line from St. Cloud, in Minnesota, to the British possessions, which is now lying on the table, be recommended to the Committee on Public Lands. The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1866, have directed me to report it, with amendments; and I give notice that I hope to get it up for action on Tuesday next.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 139) of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas and the army under his command, reported it without amendment.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George J. Stubblefield, praying payment for chewing tobacco delivered by him to the United States at Atlanta, Georgia, and issued to the army under General Sherman, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 109) authorizing the adjustment of the claim of George J. Stubblefield for chewing tobacco furnished the United States; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Finance, submitted a letter from the Secretary of the Interior to the chairman of the Committee on Finance recommending a reorganization of the clerical force in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a memorial of William Pierce, of San Francisco, California, praying an issue to him of duplicate bonds in place of four Oregon war bonds lost by the burning of the steamer Golden Gate on the 27th day of July, 1862, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 442) for the relief of William Pierce. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 748) providing for a bust of the late Chief Justice Taney, to be placed in the room of the Supreme Court of the United States, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass; and as that is the only object of the bill, I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. I must object to the consideration of the bill now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and it cannot be considered.

CHANGE OF NAME.

Mr. HALE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Dorsey Edwin William Towson for a change of name, to report a bill for his relief. As it is a very simple proposition to change the name of an individual, and relates to nothing else, and there are numerous instances of this jurisdiction being exercised by Congress, I am instructed to ask that the bill be considered now.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 439) to change the name of Dorsey Edwin William Towson to that of Dorsey Edwin William Carter, was read three times, and passed.

Mr. HALE. It has been suggested to me that for the purpose of showing jurisdiction on the face of the bill, the individual should be described in the title as of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia. I therefore move to amend the title by inserting after the word "Towson" the words "of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

TREATMENT OF COLORED REFUGEES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish, for the information of the Senate, the report of Hon. Thomas Hood and Hon. S. W. Bostwick, special commissioners appointed to investigate and report upon the condition and treatment of colored refugees in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama, lately made to the War Department.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 437) to continue in the service of the United States certain troops in the State of Missouri; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 438) relative to the railroad bridge across the Mississippi river, from Rock Island, in the State of Illinois, to Davenport, in the State of Iowa, and to establish and declare the same a post route; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 440) to define the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 441) to enlarge the canals and improve the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers, from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, for military and naval purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 110) creating a Committee on Damages; which was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

MEETINGS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. FOOT. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the compilation of the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States for fixing the time for the meeting or sessions of Congress and of the extra sessions of the Senate, and the practice under the same, from the 4th of March, 1789, to the present time, prepared by the Chief Clerk of the Senate, be printed.

This resolution, under the rule, will go to the Committee on Printing. I will remark, in a word, that this compilation of the provisions of the Constitution and the laws and practice of the Government upon that subject, from the beginning of the Government to the present time, has been performed by the Chief Clerk of the Senate at the request of one or two members of this body, to which he responded with promptness; and that request was made on account of his well-known and acknowledged long experience and intimate acquaintance and familiarity with the laws, practice, and precedents of the Government on that question.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. DIXON. The Senate assigned this day after the morning hour for the consideration of the business of the District of Columbia. As there is an important appropriation bill before the Senate, which it is understood we are to take up at one o'clock, I propose that the Senate devote the morning hour to District business.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not; there is some other business we want to do this morning.

Mr. DIXON. In order to test the sense of the Senate on that subject, I move to postpone all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 393.

The motion was agreed to.

TAXES IN GEORGETOWN.

The Senate accordingly, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 393) to authorize the corporation of Georgetown to levy certain taxes. It proposes to empower the corporation of Georgetown to levy and collect, in the same manner in which other taxes are levied and collected in that town, an annual tax not to exceed, in any year, fifteen hundredths of one per cent. of the assessed value of the taxable property in the town, to be applied to the payment of the interest and the extinction of the principal of the debt recently contracted by the corporation in filling its quota under the several drafts for troops made during the present war. The corporation is also further authorized and empowered to levy and collect, in the same manner, a sum sufficient to pay the town's proportion of the direct tax imposed on the District of Columbia by the act of Congress, approved August 5, 1861, and the cost and expenses of collecting the same.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLUMBIA INSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. DIXON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 421) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb and the blind," approved February 16, 1857. It proposes to repeal so much of the act of February 16, 1857, as requires the teaching of the blind in that institution, and the corporate name and style thereof is hereafter to be "the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the Deaf and Dumb." The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to cause all indigent blind children who are now, or might hereafter become entitled, under the law as it now exists, to instruction in the institution, to be instructed in some institution for the education of the blind in Maryland or some other State, at a cost not greater for each pupil than is, or may be, for the time being, paid by such State, and to cause the same to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. This act is to take effect from and after the 30th of June, 1865.

Mr. DIXON. In the third line of the second section I propose to strike out the word "might" and to insert the word "may."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask the Senate to be good enough to take up the report of the conference committee made yesterday, relative to the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. DIXON. I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that as we are now upon the business of the District of Columbia, we had better proceed with it. I do not think it will take more than ten minutes.

Mr. SUMNER. After this report is acted upon, those bills can be taken up.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to raise a point of order. By an inspection of that report, it appears that the committee of conference, instead of considering the points in dispute between the two Houses, have reported an entirely new bill. I raise the point of order against the reception of the report, if it is not too late. Only a session or two ago when a committee of conference of this body, at the head of which was the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER,] attempted, or did, in fact, incorporate something in their report which was not the subject of disagreement between the two Houses, the Senate by a decisive vote rejected the report because the committee had not the power to consider anything except what had been in dispute or controversy between the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Delaware, that if he raises a point of order it must be decided without debate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I was only stating the point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. And the Chair is of opinion that the objection comes too late, the report having been entertained by the Senate; but the whole question will be before the Senate on the consideration of the report.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. The question is only on taking it up now.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the report being taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to take up the report for consideration.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. All I wish to say is simply this: there has been no printed copy of that report laid upon the tables of Senators. It is true that I this morning got hold of the report and glanced over it; but I have seen no copy of it upon the tables of Senators; and I assign this as a reason why it should not be taken up. It cannot be passed to-day, I presume.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is entirely mistaken. The printed copy was on his table a week ago. It was on the table of every Senator a week ago.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am not aware that the Senator from Massachusetts inspects my table to see what is on it. I have never seen it if it has been there. If he knows the fact, it is more than I do.

Mr. HALE. I wish to make an inquiry. This day was assigned for the consideration of bills relating to the District of Columbia, and there are several such bills that are not acted upon. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, in consideration of the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Finance has an appropriation bill which he wants to press to-day, consented to waive that assignment if he might have the morning hour for the purpose of passing his bills; and I desire to know whether, if this report be taken up, those bills will be postponed, contrary to the assignment of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark that it is in the power of the Senate to make the order of its business.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Connecticut has got through with his bills.

Mr. HALE. No, he has not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the special order will be displaced necessarily by the unfinished business. That is the ordinary order of business; and I am very anxious to have the legislative appropriation bill passed to-day.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he contemplates the consideration of the report at the present time, or whether his object is to assign a time for its consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. I supposed that the Senate would be ready to act upon it. I was not aware that it would be debated. It has been debated in both Houses until I thought each House was tired of it. There is but one single point in this bill that is new, which can be stated in one minute, so that the Senate can be in complete possession of the whole question. I assume that Senators wish to expedite public business, especially when it concerns an important measure.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator is advised already that this bill will not pass without debate. The Senator from Delaware intimates that he shall debate it through the day. Others will debate it also. The Senator from Massachusetts knows very well that this day was set down for the business of the District of Columbia, upon which we are now engaged; and I submit whether it is proper to antagonize this bill under these circumstances with that business.

Mr. SUMNER. If it is more agreeable to the Senate, I will have it made the special order for half past twelve o'clock on Monday.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe there is already an assignment for Monday.

Mr. SUMNER. Not in the morning hour.

Mr. CONNESS. Do not put it in the morning hour.

Mr. SUMNER. Then the Senator postpones it indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the report, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts to assign it for Monday.

Mr. SUMNER. In compliance with the Senator's suggestion, I will have it taken up and made the special order for Monday next at one o'clock.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Willey—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Doolittle, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Hicks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Richardson, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wright—15.

So the motion to take up the report was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is now before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, in deference to the sentiments of Senators, contrary to my own convictions of duty, I may say, I shall move that it be postponed to Monday next, and made the special order for that day at half past twelve o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. Oh, no; I have got a special order for Monday.

Mr. SUMNER. That is at one o'clock. The motion was agreed to, there being, on a division, yeas twenty-seven, nays not counted.

OPENING OF SIXTH STREET WEST.

Mr. DIXON. I now move to take up House bill No. 364.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 364) authorizing and requiring the opening of Sixth street west. It requires the corporate authorities of the city of Washington to open Sixth street west, from the canal to Maine avenue, under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in accordance with the plan approved in May, 1822, by James Monroe, then President of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the bill by adding the following proviso:

Provided, however, That Sixth street, through the public ground known as the Armory square, shall not be opened until after the removal of the Armory hospital from such public ground, or until the consent of the Secretary of War and Surgeon General of the United States Army shall be first had and obtained.

Mr. DIXON. There is no objection, I believe, to that amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to know of the honorable member from Iowa whether he requires the assent of the Surgeon General as well as the Secretary of War?

Mr. GRIMES. I did insert that in the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. It seems to me rather singular.

Mr. GRIMES. I will state, in one word, why I have offered the amendment. I have had no consultation with the Surgeon General on the subject of opening Sixth street since last summer. This bill was then before the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which I was at that time a member; and he objected, and wrote me a letter in opposition to the passage of the bill because it would interfere with the hospital there. I went myself and examined the grounds, and I was satisfied that there would not be a compensating advantage to the Government or to the city in opening the street at this time. My object is simply to save the hospital there.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator misunderstands me. I do not think it should be authorized without the consent of the Secretary of War; but why should not his consent be sufficient? I cannot imagine why you should also require the assent of the Surgeon General.

Mr. MORRILL. It should be properly the Surgeon General alone.

Mr. GRIMES. I am willing to strike out "the Secretary of War," and leave the proviso so as simply to require the assent of the Surgeon General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator so modify his amendment?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; I will modify it by striking out the words "Secretary of War and."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. WADE. I ask the consent of the Senate to make a short report from the committee on the conduct of the war. It is the testimony of Lieutenant General Grant on the subject of an exchange of prisoners. I believe it will save many inquiries on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WADE. I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. As it is very short, being the testimony of General Grant on the subject, I will ask that it be read.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the date of it?

Mr. WADE. It is testimony that we have taken this morning.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Question. It is stated, upon what authority I do not know, that you are charged entirely with the exchange of prisoners.

Answer. That is correct; and what is more, I have effected an arrangement for the exchange of prisoners, man for man, and officer for officer, or his equivalent, according to the old cartel, until one or the other party has exhausted the number they now hold. I get a great many letters daily from friends of prisoners in the South, every one of which I cause to be answered, telling them that this arrangement has been made, and that I suppose exchanges can be made at the rate of about three thousand a week, and just as fast as they can deliver prisoners to us I will receive them and deliver their prisoners to them. And the Salisbury prisoners will be coming right on. I myself saw Colonel Hatch, the assistant commissioner of exchange on the part of the South, and he told me that the Salisbury and Danville prisoners would be coming on at once. He said that he could bring them on at the rate of five or six thousand a week.

Question. There is now no impediment in the way?

Answer. There is no impediment on our side. I could deliver and receive every one of them in a very short time if they will deliver those they hold. We have lost some two weeks lately on account of the ice in the river.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed.

METROPOLITAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. DIXON. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 167.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 167) to incorporate an insurance company in the city of Washington. It proposes to declare William L. Hodge, Samuel Bacon, Augustus E. Perry, Edward Hall, George W. Utermehle, William H. Morrison, Peter F. Bacon, William R. Riley, Benjamin Beall, A. C. Richards, Henry A. Scheets, and John H. McCutchen, and their associates and successors, a body politic and corporate by the name and style of the Metropolitan Insurance Company.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported the bill with various amendments. The first amendment of the committee was in section two, line seven, after the word "for," to insert the words "and within ninety days the further sum of fifteen dollars on each share subscribed for;" in line nine to insert the words "payment of the" before the word "remainder;" and in line fourteen to strike out the word "three" and insert "one;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the persons named in the foregoing section, or a majority of them, are hereby authorized to open a subscription in the city of Washington for raising a capital stock of $500,000 in shares of fifty dollars each; and that each person, on subscribing, shall pay to the persons above mentioned ten dollars on each share subscribed for, and within ninety days the further sum of fifteen dollars on each share subscribed for; and that the payment of the remainder of the said fifty dollars shall be secured by negotiable notes, signed and indorsed to the satisfaction of said persons, or a majority of them; and payment thereof may be demanded at such times and in such proportions as the president and directors hereafter mentioned shall judge advisable, giving one week's notice in two papers printed in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section four, line one, to strike out the word "one" and insert "two;" so that it will read:

That as soon as two thousand shares shall be subscribed the persons hereby authorized to receive subscriptions shall call a meeting of the subscribers, giving one week's notice in two of the papers printed within the District, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section five, line one, after the word "that" to strike out the following words:

The members of the company shall not be liable for any loss, damage, or responsibility arising from any contract of insurance, other than the property they have in the capital or funds of the company to the amount of the shares respectively held by them and any profits arising therefrom not divided: Provided.

So that the section will read:

That the said corporation shall deposit with the Register of the Treasury of the United States, or other officer to be designated by him, bonds or other securities of the United States, in amount equal to one fourth of the capital stock paid in, to be held by said officer to secure and indemnify parties who shall insure with said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert, at the end of the sixth section, the following proviso:

Provided, That no loan shall be made to the stockholders of said company, or any of them.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. I move to strike out the first name on the list of incorporators, that of Mr. William L. Hodge, at his request.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL UNION INSURANCE COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. DIXON, the bill (H. R. No. 517) to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company of Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to empower James Harper, Thomas Patton, C. H. Moody, John W. Magill, John M. Reilly, B. F. Guy, Valentine Blanchard, Thomas J. Fisher, Hudson Taylor, Augustus F. Perry, D. Walker, James Montgomery, Joseph J. May, or any five of them, to receive subscriptions to the capital stock of a company to be denominated the National Union Insurance Company of Washington, who shall open a book for that purpose in the city of Washington, at the time and place to be by them designated, of which they shall give ten days' notice in two or more of the daily papers of the city, and shall keep it open until twenty thousand shares of fifty dollars a share each shall have been subscribed. The usual powers of a corporation are granted. The company is to make insurance against losses by fire on any house, building, tenement, manufactories, mills, or other buildings; on goods, wares, chattels, and effects of all kinds therein, or otherwise; upon grain, produce, and implements, and upon vessels building on the stocks, in port or at moorings; and, generally, upon all and every sort and description of property, of whatever kind soever, on land or water.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SISTERS OF MERCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HALE. The bills for the District of Columbia are all through except one, and we do not want another day for that. I therefore ask the consent of the Senator from Ohio to allow me to move to take up Senate bill No. 368.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be done by unanimous consent, so as not to displace the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken, and the bill (S. No. 368) to incorporate the Association of the Sisters of Mercy in the city of Washington in the District of Columbia will be regarded as before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. I suggest that the bill need not be read, as the amendment of the committee is a substitute for the bill.

The Secretary read the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

That Isabel Atkinson, Elizabeth Medcalf, Teresa Byrne, Ellen Mathews, Mary Duffy, Teresa Moran, and Ellen Wynne, and their successors, hereafter to become Sisters of Mercy, and to be appointed according to the rules and regulations that have been or may hereafter be established by their association, be, and they are hereby, made, declared, and constituted, a corporation or body politic, in law and in fact, to have continuance forever, by the name, style, and title of the "Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia."

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all and singular the lands, houses, tenements, rents, legacies, annuities, rights, property, privileges, goods, and chattels, heretofore given, granted, devised, or bequeathed to the said Sisters of Mercy, in the District of Columbia, or to any individual of the said corporation, or to any person or persons for the use of said corporation, or that have been purchased for or on account of the same, be, and they are hereby, vested in, and confirmed to, the said corporation; and that the said corporation may purchase, take, receive, hold, and apply to the uses and purposes of the same, according to the rules, regulations, and by-laws that they may establish from time to time, for the management of the concerns of the said society or corporation, any lands, tenements, rents, legacies, annuities, rights, property, and privileges, or any goods, chattels, or other effects of what kind or nature soever, which shall or may have been or may hereafter be given, granted, sold, bequeathed, or devised unto the said association or corporation, by any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, capable of making such grant, sale, or bequest, and that the said association or corporation of the Sisters of Mercy, in the District of Columbia, may dispose of and convey the same as they may deem proper: Provided, That the said association or corporation shall not, at any one time, hold, use, possess, and enjoy, within the District of Columbia, either by legal seizure, or trust, for its use and benefit, more than three hundred and twenty acres of land, nor shall the said association or corporation hold, in its own right, or by any other person in trust, or for its benefit, real estate the annual net income of which, after discharging all its expenses, debts, and liabilities, shall exceed the sum of $50,000.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said corporation, by the name of the Sisters of Mercy, in the District of Columbia, be, and shall be hereafter, capable in law and in equity to sue and be sued, within the District of Columbia and elsewhere, in as effectual a manner as other persons or corporations can sue or be sued, and that the said corporation, or a majority of the persons composing the same, shall adopt and use a common seal, and the same to use, alter, or change at pleasure, and from time to time make such by-laws, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress, as they may deem expedient and proper for carrying into effect the objects of the said association or corporation, including the care, control, and education of children; the care, protection, instruction, and employment of destitute females; the care, nursing, and alleviation of the sufferings of sick or wounded persons, and such other objects of literature and charity as may be determined upon by their by-laws, as aforesaid, and which their means and net income may enable them to effect and support.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if, at any time hereafter, any of the persons hereinbefore named, or any of their successors, as Sisters of Mercy, in the District of Columbia, shall cease to belong to the said association or corporation, according to the said by-laws, such persons shall thereafter have no part or control in the proceedings of the said association or corporation under or in pursuance of the provisions of this act.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said association or corporation shall have power to appoint such officers, agents, and persons as may be necessary, and to construct or purchase such buildings or to create such establishments as may be required to effect and carry out the humane and charitable objects of its institution, in accordance with its by-laws and regulations, as aforesaid, under this act.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the schools and all other institutions of instruction, education, or employment, established by the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia, shall at all times be subject to the visitation and inspection of the justices of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or any one of them, or the Committees on the District of Columbia in either House of Congress, or any other committee of Congress that either House may appoint, and the books, records, and proceedings of said Sisters of Mercy shall at all times be subject to the examination and inspection of said justices or any such committee.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That this act may, at any time hereafter, be amended, altered, or repealed, in whole or in part, according to the pleasure of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would ask the honorable member who has the bill in charge if any such provision as is contained in the sixth section is to be found in any other act of incorporation in this District?

Mr. GRIMES. What is in the sixth section?

Mr. JOHNSON. Let the sixth section be read again.

The Secretary read the sixth section of the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Unless that has been done in other cases, I would suggest to the honorable member and to the Senate that it would be rather invidious to make a provision of that sort now for the first time. If there are any classes of people who are engaged in acts of mercy, and whose conduct is worthy of man's honor, and who would seem to be entitled especially to the mercy of Heaven hereafter, it is the very persons whom you are about to incorporate. They are ladies who devote their time exclusively to the charitable object of educating the poor and the helpless, and of nourishing and nursing and consoling the sick and the wounded; and you are about now to throw open their institution by this provision to any committee that Congress may suggest, or to the District judges. I see no necessity for it, for if there shall be any abuse we shall be sure to know it, and under the authority to modify or repeal the charter any abuse can be prevented in the future. I do not know how it may be received by these ladies, but it seems to me if it never has been done before it would be considered by them as exceedingly invidious; and as I do not think it is at all necessary to accomplish any public good, I should hope that such a provision would not be incorporated in this bill. There is no class of the community who have been of more service to us during this war than the very people whom you are now about to subject to this particular examination. They have traveled everywhere, risked life, put themselves to every sort of inconvenience and trouble, subjected themselves to almost every variety of peril, and they have never charged anything or got anything except the reward consequent upon the performance of acts of that description; and I think it would be rather unkind that you should subject them to a supervision to which you have not subjected and do not propose to subject any other institution of learning or any other institution which you have heretofore incorporated.

Mr. HALE. It will be within the recollection of most of the Senators who now hear me that although members of Congress are made by law visitors of all institutions in the District of Columbia, within four years the marshal of this District issued an order forbidding Senators to visit the jail in this District, and the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, in one of his official visits to the jail, was refused admission under that order. Inasmuch as we are the official and legal visitors, it occurred to the committee that it would be well to put this clause in. I am sure that the Senator from Maryland does not appreciate more highly than I do the merits and virtues and self-sacrificing devotion of these Sisters of Mercy and Sisters of Charity to the sick and wounded of the Army. But this is a corporation which is created with powers that may make it a pretty extensive concern. They are authorized by the bill to hold real estate to the amount of three hundred and twenty acres of land, and to have an annual income of $50,000. It is perfectly clear that there ought to be some power of visitation somewhere, and the committee thought that it might well enough be vested in the supreme court of this District and in the committees of each House, that it would not be liable to abuse; that there is no disposition to infringe on any of their privileges or rights, and that the public safety requires that some such provision as this should be made either by a general or special law. I have no feeling on it. These are the motives that governed the committee, and if the Senate see fit to strike out the section I am content; but I think it is well enough as it is.

Mr. MORRILL. This is the ordinary provision for visitation to an institution which is in every essential sense secret in its character. The bill contemplates committing children of tender age, infants so to speak, under the years of discretion, to the care and custody of these females, and they have the absolute control over the persons and over the education of these children. This section is the exercise of the ordinary power of Government to reserve to itself the right of visitation. I do not think there is a charitable institution in this country—

Mr. HALE. Outside of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORRILL. Not one outside of the District of Columbia that undertakes to assert a right to absolute control over the persons of tender years, without the right of visitation on the part of the Government; and with the highest regard for the motives and purposes of these females, and with a disposition to deal with them liberally in every way, I would never consent to grant to any set of persons, male or female, the absolute control of such children as they may take into this institution by the authority we grant, and shut them up from the world with no right in the Government to visit that institution and to inquire after the welfare of those children. It is therefore precisely this case: we authorize these persons to take into this institution such children as they can induce, from various considerations, to enter the institution; we give them absolute control over the person and over the education of those children; that is all right; I do not object to it, and I think every presumption, from the character of these females, is on their side, that this authority will not be improperly used; but it seems to me to be the grant of an authority so absolute, that I doubt if the Government have a right, so to speak, to part with the power to supervise the conduct of others that is implied in this section. I am so very decided upon a question of this kind that I do not think my consent could be obtained on any consideration whatever to an institution of this sort, worthy as I think its object to be, without a provision in it for the visitation by the proper officers, whose duty it should be at all times to be vigilant in inquiry after the children who are themselves absolutely committed to the care and discretion of these persons.

Mr. JOHNSON. The right of visitation which every Government possesses over institutions of this description is one thing; whether it should be exercised in the way proposed in this section is quite a different thing. This section is not only a reservation of a right in Congress at any time to visit the institution, but it reserves the right to visit it to the judges of the superior court here in the District of Columbia, or any one of them, and to the committees of the District of Columbia in either House, or any other committee of Congress, and the books and records of proceedings of these Sisters of Mercy are at all times to be subject "to the examination and inspection of such justices or of any such committee." I can readily imagine that from time to time, from week to week, some one will go up to the justices of the supreme court here and suggest that something is going wrong, and then there is to be a full inspection of the whole establishment!

Congress by reserving to itself the right to repeal the charter can guard against any mischief; or if Congress think proper to preserve the right on visitation over it, they can do so without subjecting this institution to a daily inspection and to all the annoyance certain to be the result of a daily inspection. These Sisters are not nuns; they are not excluded from the world by their religious vows; they mix with the world, as I understand, but have devoted themselves exclusively to these charitable objects.

Now, why is it (provided I am right in saying this is the first time a provision of this sort has found its way into such a bill) that you select these people for this provision? Is it because of their particular religion? I am sure it is not so. It is not because they are Roman Catholics, nor because they think it their duty to appropriate their lives to these purposes. Then it is simply from an apprehension that some wrong may be done to some of the children who may get under their charge. There are plenty of people who will know that that wrong will be done; and the children are not placed entirely by this charter under the control of these corporations; the courts are all open. These children will have just as sure a protection through the courts as any one who goes to any boarding-school is sure of being protected against any misconduct on the part of the teacher by going to the courts. But I repeat, it seems to me rather to be an invidious matter as against these people, whose lives are devoted to these very charitable objects, and who are now, I believe, in charge of four or five of our hospitals, to insert a provision nowhere else to be found. I move to strike out the section.

Mr. MORRILL. I submit that there is little occasion for the criticism which my honorable friend makes on the remarks that I have made. There is no suspicion, I understand, growing out of the peculiar religion of these people; it did not occur to me that that question could possibly arise; but it is the principle of allowing anybody anywhere to have the absolute control over persons without the right of visitation. That is the principle. This bill authorizes these people to take control of children, and during their minority to maintain an absolute control over the persons and over the education of those children, nobody on earth having the right to interfere or the right to inquire. Now, I put the question to my honorable friend whether it is to be regarded as invidious when it is known that the general principle everywhere is the right of visitation? The right of visitation is a principle which almost everywhere obtains in all Governments. Then, sir, why an exception in this case? Why is it supposed that these persons who ask for this particular privilege should be exempt from this general principle? I submit that the inference is not at all favorable to the purposes of this institution. I have gone upon the ground that it is all very laudable, all very charitable, all very well. I wish to maintain good faith toward these parties, but I insist upon it that the general principle which pervades all legislation and which all Governments hold as to the right and the duty of the Government, should be expressed in this bill, and I shall certainly oppose its passage if this section is stricken out of it.

Mr. POMEROY. It occurs to me that this feature of the bill is unobjectionable, and I have never known any provision of this kind to be resisted.

Mr. JOHNSON. It has never been in any other bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know that I have ever seen it specifically in any bill; but when an institution of this kind refuses to allow by legislation the judges of the courts and the committees of Congress to visit it, it creates the impression of a desire to secrete the institution from the public observation. I certainly would not vote to strike out a provision of this kind after it has once been reported, because it looks as if there was some design in striking it out, which I trust there is not. I hope nobody is afraid to organize an institution of this kind and have it inspected by members of Congress and judges of the courts; I certainly shall not give my vote for the thing if it is to have any secrecy about it.

Mr. CONNESS. It seems to me that the criticism of the honorable Senator from Maryland is hardly fair or well-founded. It can hardly be assumed that the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia would needlessly and wantonly go to these institutions every day at the instance of irresponsible parties. I really cannot see anything objectionable in the section, and I shall vote to keep it in.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read, "A bill to incorporate the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia."

EVENING EXECUTIVE SESSIONS.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate meet on the evenings of Tuesday and Wednesday of next week for the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the resolution by adding the word "exclusively."

Mr. WILSON. I accept that amendment. I will simply say that we have before us fourteen or fifteen hundred nominations, and it is very important to act on some of them.

Mr. GRIMES. The resolution does not fix the hour.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to fix it at seven o'clock.

Several SENATORS. Say half past seven.

Mr. WILSON. Well, say half past seven.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate meet on the evenings of Tuesday and Wednesday of next week, at half past seven o'clock, for the consideration of executive business exclusively.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, to strike out in line eight hundred and seventy the word "one" and insert "three," so as to make the clause read:

For traveling expenses of the judge assigned to the tenth circuit, for attending session of the Supreme Court of the United States, $3,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move to amend that clause by striking out "one" and inserting "two," so as to make the allowance $2,000. I think as we have put additional duties on this judge we ought to increase somewhat his allowance for traveling expenses.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to offer the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the first or sole assistant in each of the Executive Departments, whose duty it is to act as the head of the Department, in the absence of that officer, shall hereafter receive an annual salary equal to that now paid to the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; and such an amount as, with existing appropriations, is necessary to pay such salaries until the expiration of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand the Senator to say that that amendment comes from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir; it is an amendment recommended by the Committee on Finance. It is not an amendment of my own; I am instructed to offer it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senate agreed to more than this at the last session, but yielded to the House of Representatives. Now this places the first assistants in all the Departments on an equality so far as their salary is concerned, and I understand it will increase the expenses of the Government about four thousand dollars a year.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Missouri was authorized by a majority of the Committee on Finance to report this amendment. I did not myself vote for it. The law upon the subject probably is familiar to most Senators: two of the Assistant Secretaries now receive $4,000, and the rest of them receive $3,000. At the last session of Congress the Senate, after considerable debate, agreed to place them on a footing of equality, at $3,500, but some controversy occurred about it, and it was finally abandoned by the committee of conference. The Senate then voted $3,500 to all. They reduced the compensation of two and increased the compensation of five, if I recollect aright.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the proposition of the last session was more comprehensive than this.

Mr. SHERMAN. It extended to all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This places upon an equality the first or sole assistants; second assistants are not included.

Mr. SHERMAN. The objection to this is that I fear it will get up jealousy among these Assistant Secretaries. Now, take the Assistant Postmaster General. The First Assistant is undoubtedly the deputy of the Postmaster General, but the Second Assistant performs duties probably as responsible as the First Assistant. The First Assistant is rather a political position; that is, its business is the appointment of officers. The Second Assistant, I believe, gives out all the contracts, and the Third Assistant is an important officer. That is the objection I have to it. I would much prefer to put them all on the same footing, at $3,500, which would reduce two and increase five, and make very little difference in the aggregate compensation.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no feeling or interest in this matter; but I see no reason why there should be a distinction among these Assistant Secretaries, who, in the absence of the head of the Department, are required to perform the duties of that office. I never could see any reason for it; I see none now. I cannot see why the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury should receive more than the first Assistant Secretary of War, or the Assistant Secretary of the Interior. I apprehend that at this particular time when the duties of Government officers are very greatly enlarged, these men are all kept busy; I apprehend that they have all they can possibly do. It is a fact well known to the Senate that whenever the duties become very onerous in one of these Departments, so that the chief and his assistant cannot do the work, they come here and get additional assistants provided for. That has been done in many cases.

I know that if we agree to this proposition we may have some difficulty afterward in regard to some other officers. Some of the second and third assistants may suppose they have an equal right with the first assistant, and perhaps the jealousy spoken of by the Senator from Ohio may exist. But there is certainly great jealousy existing now because of the fact that some of the first assistants are receiving more than others, when they all think they are entitled to as much as those who are now receiving $4,000.

I do not believe that $3,000 is a sufficient salary at present for the responsible position held by these men; and any Senator who knows anything of the expenses of living in this city can very well certify to what I say. These officers have to stay here during the whole year. We can scarcely get along ourselves, and we stay here perhaps on an average only six months during the year, and the rest of the time we are at home. These men have to remain here all the year round, and in the absence of the superior officer they are compelled to discharge his duties. It seems to me the salary proposed is low enough, from what I know of the duties performed by these men and of the expenses of living here. I am utterly indifferent as to the fate of the amendment; I care nothing in regard to it; but I think as a matter of strict justice to these men it ought to be adopted.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Missouri says that he does not see how a person holding one of these offices can get along in the city of Washington for $3,000. I desire to have that Senator or any other Senator tell me, if that be true, how the man in the Army who holds a commission as captain, with a family at home to support, and he taken away from them to fight the battles of the country, can get along for $1,400 or $1,500 a year.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator expects me to say that I think the line officers are sufficiently paid, he is mistaken. I do not think so. I think, however, that very large bounties are now being paid; the soldiers are receiving large bounties, and rations are furnished in the Army, so that they can get along tolerably well; but at the same time I am willing to increase the pay, especially of line officers. But it is exceedingly unfair whenever a question of this sort is presented to throw up the Army. I feel just as desirous of seeing men who are risking their lives day by day and night by night in defense of the country well paid as any others, and I am not going to say that they ought not to be sufficiently paid; but the Senator must very well realize the great expense of living here in this place. We are imposing it on these men, and I think we ought not to be niggardly about the compensation that we pay them. We ought at least to pay them enough to cover their expenses in this city.

Mr. CLARK. I did not mean to be unfair to the Senator from Missouri or any other person when I called his attention to the condition of the line officers of the Army. I was not speaking in regard to the soldiers, but those gentlemen in the Army who go to fight the battles of the country, not with bounty, but without bounty.

Mr. HENDERSON. If two wrongs exist, there is no use of the Senator's urging on me the propriety of continuing both. I think it is entirely proper that we should first rectify one and then the other. I am willing to rectify the pay of the line officers of the Army first, if the Senator desires it; but there is no use of comparing the two, and urging that wrongs exist in regard to both, and that there should be a continuation of this wrong simply because we cannot relieve both at the same time.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Missouri seems to think that I am pushing this matter at him personally.

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK. Certainly I am not. I am only desiring in this way to bring the attention of the Senate to it. I might instance not only the line officers of the Army, but some of the under officers of the Navy, the masters' mates and various other officers. And if I were to go out of the Army and out of the Navy, I might ask these men in Washington who cannot live upon $3,000, how it is that men with families as large as theirs, perhaps holding an equally high social position at home, come here and live as they do upon $1,200. You have men through all your Departments living upon $1,200. I say this not to show that the salaries should not be raised in an individual case, but to show that this difficulty exists not only in regard to the Assistant Secretaries of the Departments and the heads of bureaus, but that it goes everywhere, and that if we begin we should take the whole and rectify the whole, and the first that we should rectify is not these men who have their thousands for a salary, but the men who starve upon hundreds. Begin at the other end. It is where starvation comes or hunger pinches that we should begin, and not by equalizing the man with $3,000 to him with $3,500 or $4,000. We should begin where the necessity exists. And though this may be a small appropriation, and it may appear somewhat invidious to resist it, I will resist all attempts of this kind till we can lay our hands on the whole at the proper time and bring these men who are almost asking our charity up to some proper basis. There ought to be a general scaling of the salaries; especially those which are so very low and which are affected more than those that are higher by the high prices of living, should be brought up to where the man can live decently; and where a man has enough to live already, let him live on till the time comes when we can give him more. But I do not, I cannot, favor a proposition of this kind to increase the higher salaries, and let the lower ones remain where they are; to increase the few and let the many that are toiling for you suffer and live in want.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from New Hampshire will propose to raise the pay of the clerks so that they shall not starve, he shall have my support. I think it is right that it should be done. I have some little knowledge of the necessary expenses which clerks in the Departments were put to before the commencement of the war and the depreciation of the currency, and I thought it was hard work for them to get through the year on $1,200 then if a man had any family to support; and now, when the salary of a $1,200 clerk is really worth to him but $500, I believe it is a shame that provision is not made for it. That is my judgment. It ought to be done. Twelve hundred dollars is not much. Clerks get that in many of the ordinary employments that they are called to in the country. In this city, where it is very expensive to live, and always has been, $1,200, when a dollar was a full dollar, was regarded as a low compensation for a man that was qualified to serve the public in these offices. But what is the effect of it? I am told now by the heads of bureaus that it is driving the best clerks out of the Departments. They are seeking employment elsewhere where they can get better compensation, for the reason that they cannot support and educate their families in this city on $1,200, or $1,400, or $1,600. Do we desire that result? Do we desire to lose the services of the best clerks? It is not for the good of the public service that it should be so.

But what is the force of the Senator's argument? He asks why we shall give to an Assistant Secretary $3,000, and to a clerk but $1,200. Let me ask him why we give to a Secretary $8,000, and to a clerk $1,200? The Senator knows very well that a Secretary has to maintain an establishment here very different in its expense from that required of a clerk; and I do not think that the argument is entitled to much respect, although I have very much respect for the Senator, which says that a Secretary and an Assistant Secretary should only have the compensation that is given to a $1,200 clerk. We expect very different things from a Secretary. We expect much more of an Assistant Secretary than we do of a clerk. In the first place, we want much higher talent. For a Secretary we want a man who, at home, can make some money. We do not want a man for a Secretary or an Assistant Secretary that has to go around begging for an office to make a living out of it. We want talent, and therefore we pay for talent. Talent, the world over, commands money; and we expect to pay for it. We expect to pay a Secretary for his brains. We expect to pay a clerk for his writing, and such brains as the particular office requires. I was astonished to hear the Senator make a comparison between a clerk and a Secretary. He might as well make a comparison now between a messenger and the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of War; the one borne down with weighty responsibilities, and bringing to the position, as it is presumed, the very highest talent.

I do not think $8,000 is too small a salary for a Secretary; but when the Secretaries got $6,000, the Assistant Secretaries and the heads of bureaus got just half as much, $3,000. When the compensation of the Secretaries was raised to $8,000, I think the Assistant Secretaries ought to have had so much as half of that, $4,000. It is not high; it is not an extravagant proposition. The case is this: it is not right to give one Assistant Secretary $4,000 and another Assistant Secretary, discharging the same duties and having the same rank, but $3,000. If the Senate thinks this proposition is right, and that we ought to bring about a correction, let it reduce those who are getting $4,000. Justice is equality in this matter. It was the judgment of the Senate at the last session that this ought to be done, and we finally agreed to a compromise, allowing $3,500 to all, but the other House would not consent to reduce those who were getting $4,000 down to $3,500. This proposition is to let the first assistants have $4,000; it is a fair thing.

Now about the comparison between the officers of the Army in the field and the Assistant Secretaries. I understand that there is a proposition likely to be presented to this body by the Committee on Military Affairs to provide for the officers in the field by commuting their rations at fifty cents instead of thirty cents, and also by relieving them from the Federal income tax. I do not know whether that will be brought before the body, or whether it has already been presented. The chairman of that committee nods to me that that is so. That, then, is to be provided for, and when that proposition comes before this body it shall receive my support. I think it is right. Then I answer the Senator from New Hampshire that a provision is to be made by the Committee on Military Affairs for those men for whom he drops a tear but introduces no measure. If they are not paid enough, why does not that Senator, from his responsible position, provide for them and let them be paid now? We are not so poor that we must make men fight at starving rates. We are not so poor as a country that we must make the clerks in the Departments here serve the public at a compensation that will not support them and educate their children. It ought not to be asked, and I do not think the people of the country require it. As far as I know, they pay their taxes cheerfully. If more taxes are necessary I suppose they will pay them, though I think they are quite as high as the business of the country will allow. The two comparisons I do not think justify the argument of the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. I was not aware that I started any such argument, or any such line of argument, as the Senator from Indiana attributes to me. I did not inquire why we paid a Secretary $8,000, or why we paid an Assistant Secretary $4,000 or $3,000. The tendency of my remarks was, as I intended they should be, to show that if we began to raise salaries we should begin with the men who needed the increase most, among the persons who had the smallest salaries, and who found the greatest difficulty to live, and among those who received the largest sum, and could live upon that sum. I know very well that we pay a large salary to the head of a Department for the amount (if the Senator pleases so to say) of brains he brings to it; but I have sometimes thought that in some minor places of the Departments we gave the most money for the least brains. We do not always graduate our pay according to what we get; and I am not by any means sure that we do not get as much brains in some smaller offices as we get in some that are larger. I, of course, have no reference to anybody in the world. But the pay should be somewhat in proportion to the services rendered as well as to the state maintained. A man can better forego the state and equipage than he can get rid of the gnawings of hunger. I insist that this increase should not be made among the higher salaries, and the lower ones be neglected; that is all I mean to say. I shall vote cheerfully, as the Senator from Indiana, I have no doubt, will do, for the increase of the pay of the smaller officers. I shall vote for the increase of the pay of the officers of the Army when it comes properly before the Senate. The Senator puts to me the question why I have not introduced such a measure. For two or three reasons, and the Senator knows what they are. He well knows that the question answers itself when it is propounded. He knows that measure should come from the Military Committee where it was properly put, and he well knows that I am not upon that committee. I am told that the Military Committee are about to propose something for the increase of the officers' pay. I certainly shall vote for it in any reasonable shape or to any reasonable amount; and I desire, when we take hold of the question of salaries, that we take hold in that direction; and if the objection is that the salaries are unequal—and that seems to bear upon the Senator's mind—I will very much more readily go for the proposition of the last session to bring all these officers to a level at $3,500, rather than to put them all up to $4,000.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not exactly know what connection the subject which is now being debated has with the bill before the Senate; but as it is said that some of the officers of the Army do not get pay enough, I wish to make a suggestion, and that is, whether the Lieutenant General of the armies of the United States does not get too much. I saw him for the first time on the floor of the Senate this morning, and I suggest whether the President has not made a great mistake in appointing him, for this reason: he seems to be a man who does not know how to put on a swell, or to strut. Take the lieutenants and provost marshals whom Mr. Stanton sends down to our State to keep us from voting, and any one of them can outswell General Grant ten to one. It seems to me this is a proper consideration, whether a Lieutenant General who cannot put on the swell and the airs of a lieutenant in the Delaware home guards or some provost marshal that Mr. Stanton sends into States that are peaceable and quiet, is entitled to the compensation which the Lieutenant General now receives.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I am going to vote for the amendment. I believe it is as true of the Government of the United States as it is of any corporation or of private individuals, that if they want good service they must pay for it. They are not sure of getting good service if they do pay for it, but they are pretty sure not to get good service if they do not pay for it. I believe the pay of the officers referred to in this amendment is quite inadequate. I therefore propose to vote for the amendment, because I think its tendency is to make it nearer adequate. I do not think it is a good answer to say that there are other officers in our service who need or deserve an increase of salary more. It is a sufficient reason, in my judgment, to vote for this measure of justice because it is now proposed to us, and it will be a sufficient reason to vote for any other measure of justice when it shall be proposed to us. I do not see the propriety of ignoring a measure the justice of which we all admit out of any mere apprehension that by and by a similar measure may be proposed in reference to another class of officers, and will not be assented to. Let us take these measures as they are proposed to us, and vote upon them as they are proposed to us. I vote for this now because it is now before us.

Mr. POWELL. I shall vote most cheerfully for this amendment. I very fully concur with the Senator from Wisconsin, that you cannot get good service unless you pay for it. I think there is no economy in half paying your officials. If you expect to get the services of competent and faithful men, you must give them a remunerative salary.

Now, sir, what will be the pay of the Assistant Secretaries, who do not now receive $4,000, when it shall be raised to that sum? It will be a good deal less than $2,000, for the greenback money in which they are now paid is not worth fifty cents on the dollar; it is to-day worth between forty and forty-five cents, perhaps; so they will really get less than $2,000 a year. For the ability required of the Assistant Secretary of one of the Departments, that is very poor remuneration. It will not compensate them for their labor, and, moreover, they cannot live and maintain their families properly in this city on that sum.

The Senator from New Hampshire talks about raising the pay of the soldiers and the officers of the Army. I regret very much that that was not done last year. I proposed an amendment to a bill under consideration at that time providing that officers and soldiers of the Army should be paid in gold, or its equivalent when they could not receive gold. That would have raised their pay very much, but I could not get the Senate to adopt the proposition. I am to-day prepared to increase the pay of the officers and soldiers of the Army.

I am in favor of this amendment for another reason. I can see no reason for discriminating between these Assistant Secretaries. Some of them now get $4,000, some $3,500, and some $3,000. It is no answer to tell us that there are other officers who are not paid a sufficient compensation. I will say to Senators that whenever they bring forward a bill to increase the pay of officers and soldiers of the Army, I, for one, am prepared to vote for it. I know that their pay is not sufficient now; but I know, too, that no man can live and support his family in this city in that kind of style which is expected from the Assistant Secretary of a Department for a sum of money less than $2,000 a year. I know that $4,000 sounds like a large sum; but you must remember that it is not paid in money, but in the depreciated paper currency of this Government, so that it is less than $2,000 in gold. From the adjournment of this Congress until the next session it will not average probably more than fifteen or sixteen hundred dollars in gold, and you paid that much money to large numbers of clerks before the depreciation of the currency.

Mr. HALE. The suggestions which have been made by the Senator from Kentucky in regard to the depreciation of the currency and the cost of living apply to every employe of this Government, from the President down to the humblest messenger; and every argument of that sort which can be suggested for raising these salaries will apply to everybody who is paid any salary by the Government of the United States, because all our employes are paid in depreciated currency; and unless we are willing to advance all salaries at least one hundred per cent., it seems to me that argument can be of no weight.

I may possibly be supposed not to speak with great partiality for the Assistant Secretary of the Navy. I thought at the time his office was created that it was unjust to pay him a higher salary than other Assistant Secretaries, and upon my motion I think—at least if I did not make the motion I advocated it—the Senate agreed at the last session to fix the salary of these Assistant Secretaries at $3,500. That was taking off $500 from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and putting $500 on the salaries of the others. Thereupon a howl was made by all those newspapers that are specially devoted to the interests of the actual Secretary of the Navy that Mr. HALE, from selfish and other bad motives, had made an attack upon the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, merely because I wanted to put him on the same footing with the other Assistant Secretaries. I am of the same opinion now. I think the provision which gives the Assistant Secretary of the Navy $4,000 and other Assistant Secretaries $3,000, is unjust and invidious, and it ought not to stand upon the statute-book. I am opposed, however, to raising any of these salaries. I voted against raising the salary of members of Congress, and I have voted and shall vote against raising the pay of any officer except where I think an increase is absolutely necessary. I believe I did vote once to raise the salary of the consul at Halifax because I thought it ought to be raised. But unless we are prepared to enter upon a general increase of all salaries to an extent equivalent to the depreciation of the currency of the Government, we ought not to venture upon an experiment of this kind. I shall vote in favor of reducing the salary of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy to that of the other Assistant Secretaries, not that I am governed by any motives of peculiar hostility to that officer, but I think as a matter of justice to them all this provision ought to be done away with. If it is in order to do so, I will move to amend the amendment by striking it all out after the enacting clause, and providing that from and after the commencement of the next fiscal year the salaries of all the Assistant Secretaries shall be $3,000, or if the Senate prefer to put it at $3,500 I shall be satisfied.

Several SENATORS. Say $3,500.

Mr. HALE. Well, I will say $3,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the amendment proposed by Mr. HENDERSON, and to insert the following:

That from and after the commencement of the next fiscal year, the salaries of all the Assistant Secretaries of the Executive Departments shall be $3,500 per annum.

Mr. COLLAMER. Why should so much pains be taken to pass over the Post Office Department? Why should not the Assistant Postmasters General have the same pay as the Assistant Secretaries?

Mr. CONNESS. This will include them.

Mr. COLLAMER. No, they are not "Assistant Secretaries."

Mr. CONNESS. We can add them.

Mr. HALE. I am willing to include them.

Mr. HENDERSON. The amendment, as I proposed it, included the First Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. COLLAMER. It included the one who has the least to do, but carefully left out the two who have the most to do.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do I understand the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire now to be to allow $3,500 to all Assistant Secretaries?

Mr. HALE. Yes; and the Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. COLLAMER. And "the Assistant Attorney General" ought to be added.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the Assistant Attorney General gets $3,500 now.

Mr. COWAN. No, only $3,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it is the pleasure of the Senate to adopt the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire, I have no objection. I want to see equality among the officers of this grade. The proposition of the Senator from Missouri affects the Treasury just $4,500. If the Senate thinks that is a matter of such consequence as to go away from it and adopt another proposition, very well. I want to see them equalized. The proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire, I understand, will take more money out of the Treasury than that of the Senator from Missouri. I think the First Assistants in the various Departments ought to be provided with a salary equal to half that of the head of the Department.

Now, as to the Second and Third Assistant Postmasters General, they are simply the heads of bureaus. The First Assistant Postmaster General, in the absence of the head of that Department, represents him and has the responsibility of that position. I do not know whether he does more work or less work than the Second and Third Assistants, but the one is over the whole Department, and the others are but bureau officers, corresponding with the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Commissioner of Pensions. I think the proposition of the Senator from Missouri, coming from the Committee on Finance, is the right one, to make all who are the First Assistants, and who represent the head of the Department in his absence, equal at $4,000, just half the pay of the Secretaries; and it will affect the Treasury just $4,500, as I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be now read as it has been modified.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the section proposed by Mr. HENDERSON, and to insert the following:

That from and after the commencement of the next fiscal year the salary of each of the Assistant Secretaries of the Executive Departments, the Assistant Attorney General, and the First Assistant Postmaster General, shall be $3,500 per annum.

Mr. COLLAMER. I object to saying "First Assistant Postmaster General." I want to say "the Assistant Postmasters General."

Mr. HALE. I have not the slightest feeling or judgment on that point. The Senator from Indiana, on whose judgment in these matters I rely with great confidence, though I do not have so much respect for his political opinions generally, thinks it would be unjust to include the other Assistant Postmasters General, because they are mere heads of bureaus. But the honorable chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads makes the suggestion that the three Assistant Postmasters General should be included, and of course I shall not set myself up in opposition to him, but will accept his modification.

The amendment to the amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am opposed to this proposition. If we are to begin this system it seems to me we are beginning at the wrong end, with those who get the large salaries; and I do not know where it is to end. Are we to go on scaling and raising the pay of all the employes of the Government, civil and military, pro rata, if you please? Are we to issue more greenbacks for that purpose?—for there is no other way to pay them. If we do, the increased number of greenbacks they will get will not, in six months more, buy as much as the greenbacks they now get will buy. I do not want to visit them with such a calamity as that.

Mr. STEWART. Let the amendment be read as it now stands.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows: insert as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the commencement of the next fiscal year, the salary of each of the Assistant Secretaries of the Executive Departments, the Assistant Attorney General, and the three Assistant Postmasters General, shall be $3,500 per annum.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall vote for this amendment as now proposed. I see in it, or hope I see in it, a final adjustment of this difficult question. It will be remembered that it occupied our time a great deal during the last session. There is also an apparent injustice in paying the Assistant Secretary of one Department $4,000, while the Assistant Secretary of another Department, certainly equally occupied and with equally important duties and liabilities, is paid but $3,000. If you undertake to equalize these assistants, as suggested by the honorable Senator from Vermont, there is the greatest justice in extending the slight increase that is made to the Second and Third Assistant Postmasters General, who really perform the most important duties in their Department, and, in my opinion, rank among their best public officers. I did not look on this as an increase of salary, but as an adjustment of a question that comes up every session and occupies the time and attention of Congress. I shall therefore vote for the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Doolittle, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Nye, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Stewart, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Willey—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Farwell, Grimes, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlisle, Foot, Harding, Harris, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougal, Richardson, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wright—13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. VAN WINKLE] is detained from his seat by indisposition.

Mr. WILSON. I offer this amendment as additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of March, 1865, and during the continuance of the present rebellion, the commutation price of officers' subsistence shall be fifty cents per ration: Provided, That said increase shall not apply to the commutation price of the rations of any officer above the rank of brevet brigadier general, or of any officer entitled to commutation for fuel or quarters.

And be it further enacted, That hereafter, during the continuance of the present rebellion, there shall be no deductions made from, or income tax levied upon, the salary of any officer in the military or naval service; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

And be it further enacted, That all officers of volunteers, who shall continue in the military service to the close of the war, shall be entitled to receive, upon being mustered out of said service, three months' pay proper: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to officers not on duty, or to officers entitled to commutation of fuel and quarters.

I will simply say that the first section of this amendment provides for increasing the ration from thirty to fifty cents to officers below the rank of brevet brigadier general. It does not apply to brigadier or major generals, and it does not apply to officers who receive commutation for fuel or quarters. It applies to officers in the field.

The second section of the amendment relieves the officers of the Army and Navy from the income tax that we have put upon them since they went into the service, which is a great burden upon them, especially the extra tax of five per cent. imposed by the act of July 4 last.

The third section gives three months' pay proper to volunteer officers who shall continue in the service till the close of the war; not officers who have fuel and quarters at the rear, but officers who are in the field; and not to officers off duty, but to officers at the front doing their duty. I hope this amendment will prevail.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to call the Senator's attention to one point in connection with the last section of his amendment. The provision is that the allowances there made shall not apply to officers not on duty. A man at that time may have been off duty perhaps a week, and he should not be excluded.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that we take the vote separately on the first two sections, and then on the third section.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. HALE. I want to inquire if this amendment comes from a committee.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COLLAMER. Do they recommend that it be put on this bill?

Mr. WILSON. I will say that the bill of which this amendment is a copy was reported by the authority of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I have obtained the assent of a majority of the committee, those who are present to-day, to move it as an amendment to this bill. It is proper, I think, that it should go on this bill. Action ought to be had in the matter, especially for the reason that we ought to give some assurance to the men who are about entering on the spring campaign that we are to do something for their benefit; for I tell you, sir, that the information from all our armies is that the line officers are really suffering for some aid. This amendment applies to the officers in the field who get no commutation for fuel or quarters. That makes a great difference. The difference between the allowances of a captain in the front and a captain on duty in Washington receiving commutation for fuel and quarters is about six hundred dollars a year. This provision does not apply to those who get this commutation, but is for the benefit of the men who are fighting the battles of the country. I think we ought to make this allowance. I think it will be better made in this form, increasing the value of the ration, and will do more justice than we can in any other form. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am disappointed that the Senator from Massachusetts should offer this amendment at this time on this appropriation bill. This bill makes appropriation for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; it does not affect the pay of the Army; there is nothing in the bill about the pay of the Army. Within a week we shall have before us the bill which does make appropriations for the support of the Army. If it be at all proper to put a legislative measure on an appropriation bill, this provision certainly should not be put on this bill. We ought to have some little sense of the propriety of things and the proper place to put our legislation, and it seems to me, therefore, we ought not to put it upon this legislative appropriation bill. I am not prepared to say whether I shall vote for or against this provision at some proper place, but I shall certainly oppose its being put on this bill. There is nothing in this bill in regard to the pay of the Army. It is true we have attached the deficiency bill to this bill, but it was under peculiar circumstances, and it is sufficient to put that on this bill without loading it with measures that will be controverted between the two Houses. I hope the Senator will withdraw this proposition, and I can tell him that early next week we shall probably report the Army appropriation bill, and it will be before the Senate within a week or ten days.

Mr. WILSON. In accordance with the suggestions of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, I withdraw the amendment now, with the understanding that it is to be moved on the Army appropriation bill whenever it comes up.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to make a suggestion in connection with the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, which is now withdrawn. I agree with the object of it, but I hope the Committee on Military Affairs will propose to raise the pay of the officers of the Army in some other way than by taking off the income tax. I prefer that the amount should be added to their pay either pro rata or by a percentage, for I think that if we begin to make exemptions from the income tax we are liable to go a great deal further than we intend to go when we make the provision.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have been charged with some amendments by the Committee on the Library. I move in line one hundred and eighty-nine, on page 9, to strike out "five" and insert "eight," so to make the appropriation for the purchase of books for the Library $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I now move an amendment which I notify gentlemen makes a pretty large appropriation. It is to insert after line one hundred and ninety-two:

For an enlargement of the Library of Congress so as to include in two wings built fire-proof the space at either end of the present Library, measuring about eighty feet in length by thirty feet in width, in accordance with the plan of the architect of the Capitol extension, $160,000.

We have now in the Library proper, that is, in the fire-proof room, about forty thousand volumes, and we have a great deal more than that on the floor, in the passages, and adjoining lobbies exposed to fire, and which we have no shelf-room to put up; and in that condition of the Library it may about as well be abandoned unless we make room to contain the books we have on hand and some little shelf-room for the accumulations. The Librarian has drawn up a statement showing the present condition of the Library, and as his statement gives the facts perhaps more summarily than I could do, I send his communication to the Chair and ask that it be read, I adopting it as part of my remarks on the subject.

The Secretary read the following:

Statement of the necessity and expediency of an enlargement of the Library of Congress.

1. The enlargement is necessary because no more room exists in the Library for the constantly accruing accessions of books.

2. It is necessary because a large portion of the books belonging to Congress are unprovided with shelf-room, and inaccessible except at great expenditure of time and trouble. This especially applies to the set of British Parliamentary Documents, numbering about three thousand volumes in folio, full of invaluable information, which is daily wanted for reference. These are all upon the floor, because no shelves can be provided for them in the present Library.

3. It is necessary in order to secure the invaluable Library built up at great expenditure of care and money from another fire. The books of the Library, from the first purchase of Mr. Jefferson in 1815, until date, have cost somewhat over four hundred thousand dollars. The fire of December, 1851, destroyed all except twenty thousand volumes of the Library. The present Library numbers over eighty-eight thousand volumes, less than half of which (or forty thousand volumes) are contained in the fire-proof portion of the Library. The remainder are stored in the dark corners and passage-ways of the old Capitol, surrounded with wood-work, and liable to accident from the firing of a flue (which was the occasion of the former fire) or other causes.

4. The enlargement is necessary in order to provide some space where the current newspapers and periodicals, both American and foreign, can be filed and consulted by members of Congress and others entitled to the use of the Library. At present there are not ten feet of room anywhere for such purpose, and the very valuable files of political and literary journals taken in the Library are useless to Congress until bound; when they have lost their freshness, and much of their interest.

5. The constant donors, from the State governments and from foreign powers, of works illustrating the history, statistics, politics, and legislation of our own country and of other parts of the world, cannot any longer be accommodated. These donations might be largely increased without expense to the Library fund, and a vast amount of valuable information, useful in the practical legislation of Congress, could be obtained, catalogued, and permanently filed for the use of members. Every State and Territory in the Union should have a set of its public documents in the Capitol constantly accessible to its citizens in Washington. But the officers of the Library have been for years deterred from seeking these additions, because there has been no room to contain them.

6. The appropriation asked is $160,000, and the plan of the architect accompanying the estimate proposes to provide an increase of room equal to nearly double the present fire-proof Library, which cost $92,500, exclusive of the outer walls. The iron-work was then put up to competition, and the lowest of seven bids was accepted. The present estimate is therefore far from extravagant considering the extent of the enlargement secured. And it can be done for the amount notwithstanding the advanced cost of materials, as the patterns from which the ornamental iron-work was cast are still on hand.

7. The present plan for enlargement was originally designed to be carried out in 1852, when the old Library room was rebuilt, but the space in the two wings was then occupied by the officers of Congress, and it was therefore left incomplete. Over twelve years have elapsed, and the great increase of the Library has been such that its number of volumes is quadrupled, while no additional room of a permanent character has been provided.

8. The appropriation asked is not unreasonably high, as may be seen by comparing the cost of similar library accommodations elsewhere.

The new reading-room of the British Museum (constructed entirely within the old edifice) cost £100,000, or $500,000. The Boston Public Library building cost, exclusive of ground, $240,000. The sum of $160,000, although large in itself, is not so in comparison with the great object of providing safe and permanent room for this rich historical collection, which is rapidly increasing, and much of which, if destroyed, could never be replaced.

9. The Library has asked for no appropriations beyond its regular annual one for books since 1852, until last Congress, when $4,000 was appropriated for a marble floor, in lieu of carpets. The Library had got along for eleven years with but one carpet, and no renewal of furniture, exhibiting an economy of expenditure sufficiently rare, if not unequaled in any department of the Government. It is therefore with some confidence that Congress is now asked to provide permanently for the security of the invaluable literary stores which have been accumulated in the Capitol, and to protect which from injury or destruction, no amount of care can be ill bestowed.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not wish to add much to that communication; but I see it has been so read that gentlemen paid very little attention to it. I fancy if Senators, and I presume most of them have, take any occasion to look at the condition of the Library, the condition of the room and the books there, they must be convinced that something should be done, or we might as well abandon it altogether. The situation of the Library is such, exposed as a portion of it is—containing some of the most valuable books—to ruin by fire and everything of that sort, that if we really have any means left, except the business of carrying on the war, if we can do anything else, this is certainly a most imperative demand upon our finances and upon Congress, and I trust that it may receive the attention it deserves. With the exception of making a marble floor, instead of buying new carpets, and I believe they have had one carpet there for fourteen years, nothing has been laid out on the Library since 1852, the time it was burned down. The rooms which are wanted to be taken in are abandoned by the House and by the Senate, and are not needed for our use, and we can take them into the Library. The estimate made by the architect is a very reasonable one, and it ought now to be executed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire the yeas and nays upon the amendment. I wish gentlemen to express their opinions one way or another.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. The chairman of the Committee on the Library has stated everything, I have no doubt, that is necessary for the Senate to know in order to pass understandingly upon this amendment; but I am not sure that there were many members of the Senate who listened to my friend the chairman of the committee. If they had done it, I think they would have been almost unanimous in opinion that the appropriation should be made. We have now books on hand, many of which cannot be procured anywhere; the very rarest and most valuable works. If the Senate could see, as the committee were of course obliged to see, the condition in which the Library is, I am sure they would not hesitate to make this appropriation. The works now on hand are worth a good deal more than the amount of the expenditure, and they are liable to be burned up at any moment; but even if they were not liable to be burned up, they are now really in a condition which renders it, as I think, disgraceful to the country. The most valuable works are on the floor. Whenever they are needed, and they are books of that description that they are often needed, you have to take up a dozen before you get what you want.

Senators ought to know, and of course do know, that the Library is now a place of resort at times of the most learned men of the country, who are anxious to contribute still more to the literature of the country in all its departments, scientific and otherwise. They come here expecting to find in the Congressional Library books that they are unable for the most part to find in other libraries. The Library has been selected with great care; but when they get here it is almost impossible for them to use what is there, which, properly arranged, could be used with very great facility. The arrangement would improve very much the appearance, too, of the building. We have voted millions and millions and millions of dollars for comparatively unimportant interests, as I think; and I should therefore hope that the Senate, under all the circumstances, would see the propriety of concurring in what was the unanimous opinion of the committee, that this appropriation should be made.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I listened to every word that was uttered by the Senator from Vermont, and also to the reading of the paper which was read at the desk, because it was a subject on which I felt a very deep interest; and under any other circumstances than such as surround us, although I make no profession of literary attainment, I would, with the utmost cordiality, support, and, if need be, lend my feeble voice in aid of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, which is to apply $160,000 for the purposes of the Library.

The Senator says that it is necessary for the protection of the books we now have; that the books that are in jeopardy and liable to be destroyed by fire or accident are of greater value than the proposed cost of the rooms to be fitted up for that purpose. I see in the newspapers, and I learn from other sources, that this Government now is indebted to the brave men who are in the field to sustain this Union and this Government to perhaps the amount of one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty million dollars. I learn from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and from others, that for the last six, ten, or twelve months many of the officers of the line have not received a dollar of their pay; that they have actually been obliged to obtain aid through the quartermaster's department, not exactly through a subterfuge, but through an arrangement by which they can actually maintain themselves. I also read in the newspapers that hundreds of these patriotic men, not because they are tired of the service, but as a matter of absolute necessity, to protect themselves and their families, from which they are separated, from starvation, are compelled to resign their commissions unless some aid or assistance shall be extended to them. Nay, I understand that the pockets of their commanding generals are now full of their requests to be permitted to resign as a matter of sheer necessity, that they may go home and maintain their families in some other way. With these facts staring me in the face, and believing that unless we give some additional aid to our Army in the field the Union will be destroyed, I consider that a much more important measure than the protection even of this magnificent Library; and in that point of view, although on the outside, and not having the information which the Committee on Finance have on this subject, I am most reluctantly compelled to say, in advance of any expression on this floor from any other person, that I must hesitate before I can give my vote for this amendment under the existing circumstances.

Mr. JOHNSON. I propose to amend the amendment by striking out the words "the plan of the architect of the Capitol extension," and inserting "a plan to be approved by the Committee on the Library;" so that it will read:

For an enlargement of the Library of Congress, so as to include in two wings, built fire-proof, the space at either end of the present Library, measuring about eighty feet in length by thirty feet in width, in accordance with a plan to be approved by the Committee on the Library, $160,000.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. HALE. I concur fully with the views stated so well by the Senator from New Jersey. I am not willing, while we are raising money by taxing the people for everything they eat, drink, and wear, to vote $160,000 for an addition to this Library. I think it would be unjust to the people who pay taxes, and unjust to the soldiers to whom we owe the money. We have no moral right to vote this sum, which must be taken from what we are actually owing, and owing to-day, to our soldiers; and therefore I shall vote against it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the honorable Senator suppose we have no moral right to take care of our own property? I suppose, if there ever was a right, it would be the right the Government would have to protect its own property, which has cost it more than the amount of this appropriation; and which, if destroyed to-morrow, could not be replaced by twice the amount.

I am a little surprised, too, to find that both the honorable Senators who have spoken on the subject are under the impression that this war must fail or will be seriously endangered if we appropriate $160,000 for the Library. We are coming to a very poor pass indeed; we are in a state of hopeless bankruptcy if we, by appropriating what is necessary to take care of the Library, put it out of our power to carry on this war. What is $160,000 as far as the war is concerned, and the appropriations which you must make in order to carry on the war? Why, it is nothing; it is but a drop in the bucket. But if there was a fire there to-morrow the United States would lose more in money or in money's worth than the whole amount of this appropriation; and yet my friend from New Hampshire says that notwithstanding that, we have no moral right to vote this appropriation.

It is a question therefore of economy, practical economy. Suppose this building was leaking and was going to ruin, and we found out that it could not be arrested except by an expenditure of $200,000, would not the honorable member vote it? And if he would, why would he vote it? Because not to vote it would inflict upon the country a larger pecuniary loss than to vote it. The principle is precisely the same. Here is the Library going to ruin, liable to be destroyed at any moment, and while it exists, if it should not be destroyed, almost practically valueless in relation to a vast variety of publications which are invaluable. It is true that, if the safety of the nation depended upon a refusal to make this appropriation, there could be but one opinion in the Senate, that the Library ought to go, and the nation be saved; but we are reduced to a sad condition if the safety of the nation is endangered by an appropriation necessary to take care of our own property.

Mr. HALE. This argument of the Senator from Maryland would virtually destroy all idea of economy, and we would vote away treasure in an indefinite amount by the question, "What is $160,000? Nothing." Well, sir, double it; and what is $320,000? "Nothing." Let us come to that, and you may go on making appropriations until you are sunk in the vortex of bankruptcy.

Sir, I do not call this a small appropriation; I do not call this one of the small leaks; this is not one of those leaks made by the little foxes that steal into the garden; this is a gigantic appropriation of $160,000, under the pretense that it is to protect the Library. Let me call the attention of the Senate to a fact. Some years ago—I do not remember how long since; I was a member of the Senate, however—the Library was burned. It was then constructed of wood. It was repaired, and repaired on the idea that it was to be made fire-proof, and I believe it is.

Mr. COLLAMER. That part of it is.

Mr. HALE. That is the main part.

Mr. COLLAMER. It does not contain half the books.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that it does; but when Senators spoke of destroying the Library, I thought they meant what I call "the Library;" but it seems that is not the Library; that the Library is where some private books are stored away in some little select corners where literary valetudinarians go for the purpose of amusing themselves at the public expense. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, we have got to begin somewhere and stop making these appropriations while there are such calls made upon us for the expenses of the Army and the Navy. If we do not say that $160,000 is something, what will be the sum which the magnificent Senator from Maryland will consent to say is something? One hundred and sixty thousand dollars! Pooh; that is nothing; a mere flash in the pan, mere pocket money; it is not worthy the consideration of statesmen; it is not worthy of those who regard the Treasury! Would twice that be anything? No, sir; I doubt even that $320,000 would be considered anything. Suppose it was $1,000,000; what is $1,000,000 to a nation that is spending $1,000,000,000 a year? Nothing; nothing.

Sir, let me tell you an anecdote, very illustrative, I think. A very distinguished gentleman, whose name I will not mention, was sick upon his death-bed, and the physician came in and told the daughter, who was with the father, that he could not probably survive many hours. Her countenance sank at once; and her father saw that there had been some communication made to her. Said he, "My dear, what did the doctor say?" "Oh, nothing; nothing." "Well," said the gentleman, "my dear, will you be so kind as to tell me precisely what the doctor says when he says nothing?" [Laughter.] Sir, I should like to know what would be the sum to which the honorable Senator from Maryland would cease to apply the term "nothing, nothing." One hundred and sixty thousand dollars before this war commenced would pay the whole of the expenses of the State of New Hampshire, civil, judicial, military, and naval, for at least three years; and yet it is "nothing!"

I do not want to repeat what I have before said; but I confess I cannot see where we shall commence economy or retrenchment if we are not going to stop here, if we are going to expend this sum on the ornamenting of the Library, for it is nothing else. It will be a little more comfortable, I know. Possibly if this appropriation passes, some gentlemen will lounge away a few hours there that they now have to spend in their rooms; but this is not an appropriation that I think is justified by the present condition of the Treasury.

Mr. SUMNER. I certainly agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that $160,000, at this time, is a considerable appropriation. I do not call it "nothing;" it is much; and ought not to be made, certainly, without good cause, especially when, as the Senator has reminded us, there are soldiers unpaid. But the Senator will pardon me when I say that while I agree with him in recognizing that the sum is considerable, I do not agree with him in his conclusion; and I think his own speech actually showed the necessity for this appropriation. The Senator avowed that he only knew the Library as it was restored some ten or twelve years ago, which he called "the Library." He knew nothing at all of the other rooms attached to it and of the books there. He counted those out. Now, as I understand it, it is for those books and their accommodation that this appropriation is proposed to be made.

Mr. COLLAMER. If the Senator will allow me, we have more volumes, and probably of more value, stored in the lobbies and passages around that Library than there are in the Library—considerably more.

Mr. SUMNER. I think the Senator from Vermont is right, and he speaks of course with full knowledge of the subject. The books that the Senator from New Hampshire takes no notice of, in point of fact are the most valuable part of the Library. They give to it its special, and perhaps I may say its transcendent, value at this moment among the libraries of the country; and the question is, whether those books shall be used, or will you leave them where even the Senator from New Hampshire will not find them? The Senator is not unacquainted with this edifice; and yet he knows nothing of the larger part of the Library which is under its extensive roof.

Sir, it is not creditable to the Government that so large a part of that Library should be left in that condition. If it is worth while to obtain the books, so valuable, as the Senator from Maryland has just said they are, it is certainly of importance that they should be properly taken care of. What is the use of having them if they are not in a condition in which they can be used? They must be made accessible; they must be put upon shelves, be arranged, systematized, and in certain order. If that is not done, you might as well have them packed in the crypts of the Capitol below.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to ask my colleague how long they have been in that condition?

Mr. SUMNER. They have been accumulating now for some years. It was in 1852 that the change was made, and the large room known as the fire-proof room, to which the Senator from New Hampshire has alluded, was built; and those books have been accumulating from that time to this; first piled away in one small room at one side, and then in another on another side; and so room after room has been taken into the circle of the Library, filled up with books, unarranged, so that they are practically inaccessible except to the Librarian himself, and he must find very great difficulty in going to them.

I said, when I was interrupted, that it was not creditable to the Government that so important a collection of books should be left in such a condition. This Library is one of the chief ornaments of the national Capitol. I need not remind you that perhaps in the whole world there is not an edifice more complete in all respects than this very national Capitol, unsurpassed as it is in magnificence, and also in convenience. One of its best treasures is that very Library; but if you leave it in its present neglected condition, with the books unarranged and inaccessible, it will not bring the results which such a treasure ought to bring.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I would not assume the position of undertaking to question the conduct of any former Committee on the Library of this body, or the action of Congress in former years upon this subject; but I cannot fail to entertain the common-sense view of the matter, (at least so it seems to me,) that if this Library is in such an imminent state of peril, it is singular we should have been for the last fourteen years making annual appropriations for the purchase of these very valuable books, (and no one disputes that they are so,) with no suitable place in which to put them but to consign them to passages and alleyways and rooms liable to be destroyed at any day, or any hour of any day. We have been going on now, as it appears, for the last fourteen years, making annual appropriations to the amount of thousands of dollars for the Library, until we have acquired property of this description of more than one hundred and sixty thousand dollars in value, perhaps double that amount; and all this property has been suffered to lie for the last fourteen years in a place which the Senator from Massachusetts has described as being almost like the crypt of the Capitol. There they have remained, inaccessible except to the Librarian and a few other persons, subject to the destruction which might befall them at any moment; and now we have suddenly awakened to the peril in which they are, and we are called upon at this particular moment of extreme national difficulty, so far as the finances are concerned, to appropriate this large sum of money. Certainly, if our conduct to-day in opposing this amendment is indefensible, the action of former committees and of former Congresses is subject to exception and criticism on account of the vast expenditure of money for the procurement of such books, and the exposure of those books in the way which has been described.

Although I think the Senator from New Hampshire has most completely and satisfactorily replied to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, I wish to relieve myself from the sublimely ridiculous position in which the Senator from Maryland would seek to place us by giving a construction to our opposition of this character: that we here declare the condition of the Treasury to be such that an increased expenditure of $160,000 at this hour will produce national bankruptcy, and will deprive us of the power of continuing our armies in the field. I think that was an unfair and unjust construction to be placed upon our opposition to this measure. There is an old Scotch saying that many mickles make a muckle. It is not the $160,000 now asked to be appropriated, but it is the one thousand times $160,000 multiplied that we are called upon to appropriate for this, that, and the other purpose, very few of them commending themselves so highly to the consideration of all thoughtful and reflecting men as this does, that place us in this extreme posture of necessity, and which require us to be cautious at least in making additional appropriations.

Now, I admit that every hour these books remain in this position they are subject to the increased liability of loss; and I have the fact flashing upon my mind by remembering the lighted dome of the Smithsonian Institute. It brings it to my vision and to my consciousness. Yet still I cannot but remember, as I had occasion to say, that we have got gallant armies in the field, and without any impeachment of the patriotism of the men constituting those armies, unless we do set ourselves to work to supply them with the necessary means of keeping life in their bodies, and in the bodies of their wives and children at home, those armies must dwindle as a matter of necessity; and not only the Library, and the valuable books which are stowed in the passage-ways of the Capitol, but this splendid edifice itself, and this Union, may fall beneath the influences of this rebellion, because we have not the resources which are requisite in order to keep all these things in movement.

I may be entirely in error in the view which I take. It may be an entirely too contracted one. I am led to doubt the correctness of my view when gentlemen of so much respectability and sagacity as those I see before me [Mr. COLLAMER and Mr. JOHNSON] recommend a measure of this kind; and yet the stubborn, severe fact stares me in the face that we must keep our armies full; we must supply fighting men who are in the field with the necessary means to sustain life; and if that be in peril at this moment, and in consequence of that the Union may be in peril, I must withhold my vote from the appropriation of these large sums of money to other purposes. I do not believe that the appropriation of $160,000 for this purpose by itself would interfere with the existence of this Government, either to shorten its life or to lengthen it; but I believe that with other appropriations directed to other purposes and not to the vital one, it may end in overtaxing the brains of the men who are now busily at work in endeavoring to find the ways and means to carry on this war, and when their brains fail then the cause I am afraid will also fail.

Mr. GRIMES. I will suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that perhaps this amendment may be the natural result of one we have already adopted from the Committee on the Library. If I am not misinformed, the regular annual amount usually appropriated for the increase of the Library is $5,000; but we have by an amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Committee on the Library, increased that amount from $5,000 to $8,000, and if we are going to continue increasing the Library in a greater proportion in these times than we have been in the habit of increasing it, the enlargement may be the natural result of that increase.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I shall vote for this appropriation with a great deal of pleasure—not because I consider it a small sum; not because, as I hope, I shut my eyes to the condition of the country, and especially to the wants of the Army; but I shall vote for it as a necessity. I believe it to be a necessity in the strict sense, and I believe it is more a necessity now than it ever was before. I believe that if we had had libraries of books like this spread over the country this rebellion would have been prevented. It had its origin in the ignorance of the people. I may perhaps speak unadvisedly in saying it had its origin in the ignorance of the people; it may not have had its origin in their ignorance; it has had its support and its success because of the ignorance of the people. Men, not ignorant, but depraved and ambitious, set the rebellion on foot, and have been enabled, in consequence of the clouds of ignorance which overspread certain parts of our land, to prosecute the rebellion thus far with the success it has attained. Ignorance is the bane of the Republic. We need enlightenment. The public mind once thoroughly enlightened, ignorance dispelled from among us, and a rebellion of the description now raging will be in this country an impossibility.

As regards the debts due to our soldiers, and their necessities, I hope I feel as strongly as any member of this body, and would go as far to pay and relieve them. I think I may be entitled to speak for the soldiers from my own State, and to say that I do not believe there is a native soldier in the Army from the State of Connecticut who would not cheerfully, so far as his pay is concerned, make the deduction that would be his full proportion of that scanty pittance, in order that this appropriation might be made. Sir, I believe that we can do the country, the cause of liberty and humanity, no greater service than to make this appropriation. Let us diffuse light and knowledge among the people.

Mr. COLLAMER. The condition of our Army, the condition of our finances, and the necessities which our circumstances create, furnish at least very grand subjects of declamation. I did not suppose when, pressed by the necessities of our Library, I asked for this appropriation, that I was to be either directly or obliquely accused of trying to take away money necessary to pay the soldiers what we owe them. It is more than intimated that that is the purpose of this amendment; at any rate, that that is to be its effect.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Oh, no.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then why all this declamation about it? If that is not its purpose and object, why drag it in? It amounts to this: we cannot make an appropriation, whatever may be the necessities, however great may be the want of the thing, because we want money entirely for the Army; and then come up beautiful specimens of eloquence, sent home, I take it, for the purpose of satisfying the people that certain persons are peculiarly the patriotic men of the country, who take care of the soldiers, and other men do not mean to take care of them, but to fritter away the money of the Government for other purposes. If that is not directly argued, it is more than intimated. Now, sir, there is no purpose of that kind entertained by anybody, nor is such a consequence necessary from the amendment.

Another argument, if it may be called one, and from the source from which it comes it is entitled to be treated as such, is to blame the committee because they have asked for $8,000 instead of $5,000, the old standing appropriation for procuring books, because, when they get so many more, they will want so much more room to put them in; that the proposition is to increase their wants. I suppose that question should be argued with the gravity with which it is presented. Does not that gentleman, and every other man of common sense, know that $8,000 now will not buy as many books as $5,000 did before the war? Five thousand dollars has been the standing appropriation since 1853. Do we not know that many of these books are brought from Europe, and the rate of exchange is such that we cannot get one half as many as before for the same money? I did not propose to buy any more books; and yet the question is argued as if we were pressing a proposition to increase the amount of books we are buying. It is no such thing. We cannot now buy with $10,000 the books that seven years ago we could have bought for $5,000. It is not a proposition to increase the amount of appropriation for books. It is that we may be enabled to go on with the series of books which are in process of publication in Europe and this country, for which we have become subscribers. The great body of the books are to make up those series; and we cannot make them up and cannot get along unless we increase that appropriation; we cannot obtain the books we have heretofore received. It is no proposition, as is represented here, to increase the amount of our difficulties by increasing our books or anything of that kind. A large part of the books we receive are by way of exchange, and many of them, some of the most valuable we have, are donations. Take the parliamentary documents that are found in one room. I think there are about seven hundred volumes. They are there piled up on the floor, and in dark passages; the most valuable books there are on the face of the earth. That is our condition.

But why has it been so? The honorable Senator from New Jersey seems to think that the Committee on the Library have been too extravagant; that they ought not to get so many books; that they should not have got them at all. That is a new complaint. I can say that after 1853, when the fire-proof Library was reconstructed, we got in there not only what books we had then, but we went on for several years filling that up, from 1853 to 1856, I think. Then we began to be crowded for room. Since that time they have been accumulating in the passage ways, in the side rooms, and in out of the way places, wherever they could find storage room, and upon the floor. We have received books as donations and exchanges from the British Government, and from other Governments; as valuable books as there are to be found in the world. We have not been even buying this amount of books. We have not bought more than about half of them. We have received them in the various manners I have suggested.

Then again complaint is made because we ask the appropriation at this time. Sir, we have been pressed with this thing about the Library for a long time, and we have delayed bringing it forward for four years in consequence of this war, hoping that it would soon come to an end, and we should not have to keep our books exposed much longer. We deferred asking for it until we are so pressed by this condition of things that we think it unsafe any longer to leave the Library in its present condition; and the question is, whether we shall take any measures to secure the property we have. If gentlemen say that cannot be done, there is the end of it; I must submit, of course, to that.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. POWELL (when his name was called) said: I am paired off on this question with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.]

Were I not paired I should vote for the amendment, and the Senator from New Hampshire would vote against it.

The result was then announced—yeas 20, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morrill, Nye, Riddle, Salsbury, Sumner, Trumbull, and Willey—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Dixon, Grimes, Harlan, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson and Wilson—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Van Winkle, and Wright—17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to offer another amendment, to continue the operation of an existing law one year longer. It is to add as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act approved April 29, 1864, increasing the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports be extended to July 1, 1866.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the title of the bill was amended by adding the words "and additional appropriations for the current fiscal year."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following Senate bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 231) for the relief of Alexander J. Atocha.

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 91) appointing General Richard Delafield to be a regent of the Smithsonian Institution.

COLLECTORS AND SURVEYORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senate to postpone all prior orders and take up a bill that ought to be acted upon. It is House bill No. 705, for the relief of collectors and surveyors of the customs in certain cases. I feel very sure it will not give rise to debate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury in all cases in which any collector or surveyor of the customs has paid, or accounted for, or is charged with duties accruing under the "joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April 29, 1864, and in which he shall be satisfied that the collection of the duties was omitted by such collector or surveyor for the reason that he was not informed of the passage of that resolution when the duties accrued, under such rules as he may prescribe, to remit or refund, as the case may require, such duties to such collector or surveyor.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to have the chairman of the Committee on Finance explain this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill explains itself. Congress at the last session increased the duties on imports, and the law took effect on the day of its passage. In two or three remote ports, one of which is Mackinaw, I believe, they had no notice of the fact of the passage of the resolution until the law took effect, and collected the old rates of duties. It is simply to give relief to the collectors in such cases under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to hear what the relief is. I did not hear the bill read.

Mr. SHERMAN. It had better be read over again. If the Senator will hear the bill read, he will find there can be no objection to it.

The Secretary again read the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I do not now understand whether the bill is intended to act retrospectively alone, or generally.

Mr. SHERMAN. Retrospectively alone, and applies only to the increase made by that joint resolution. The joint resolution took effect on the 29th of April, and in some of the remote ports they did not know of the increase of duties.

Mr. HOWE. I understand what the difficult-ties in the past have been, but I was in doubt whether the resolution would not apply to all other cases of the kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; it expressly says that it is confined to the duties paid under that resolution.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. It is of great importance to have an executive session to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. Before the doors are closed, I move to take up the resolution offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] yesterday, proposing an additional committee of the Senate on mines and mining interests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) It may be taken up by unanimous consent before the doors are closed.

Mr. WILSON. I think that had better lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the motion cannot be entertained.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 11, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports of bills of a private nature.

TESTIMONY BY DEPOSITION IN CERTAIN CASES.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for taking testimony by deposition for the defense in criminal cases in the District of Columbia when the witness resides beyond the limits of the District, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has the morning hour commenced?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent during the morning hour.

Mr. DAWES. I will postpone it, then, and especially as I see that some of my colleagues on the committee are not present.

NAVAL DEPOT AT MILWAUKEE.

Mr. ELDRIDGE, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin for a naval depot at the city of Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HABEAS CORPUS, ETC.

Mr. LE BLOND, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to repeal the act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COLLECTION OF CERTAIN DUTIES.

Mr. KASSON. I am requested by one of the officers of the Government to ask that Senate bill No. 424, relating to the revenue, be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the appropriate committee.

No objection being made, the bill (S. No. 424) to facilitate the collection of certain duties due to the United States was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

POST ROUTE IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. RANDALL, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Mount Vernon, Kentucky, to Somerset, Kentucky, and report by bill or otherwise.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication of the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with the acts of August 16, 1842, and August 18, 1856, a report on the commercial relations of the United States with foreign nations; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That four thousand additional copies of the report on the commercial relations of the United States with foreign nations for the year ending September 30, 1864, be printed in usual form for the use of the House; also one thousand copies for the use of the State Department.

NAVY-YARD ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting the report of the commission appointed under the joint resolution of Congress, approved June 30, 1864, to "select the most approved site for a navy-yard or naval station on the Mississippi river," and asking an appropriation therefor; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SOUTHERN SUPERINTENDENCY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the estimates of the southern superintendency for the first and second quarters of 1865, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CRAVENS. I ask leave of absence, for the remainder of the session, for my colleague, Mr. McDOWELL, whose health is very bad.

Leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Two members of the Committee on Commerce, Mr. PERRY and myself, are obliged to leave the city on business connected with that committee. I ask leave of absence for my colleague and myself for ten days.

Leave of absence was granted accordingly.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done during the morning hour except by unanimous consent.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation based upon an article in the New York Evening Post.

Unanimous consent was granted.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask the Clerk to read the article I send him, from the New York Evening Post.

The Clerk read the article, as follows:

A WORD ON PUBLIC MORALS.—Among those who represent the State of Massachusetts at Washington, is Mr. ALEXANDER H. RICE, of Boston. We desire our readers to note well the name of that member—ALEXANDER H. RICE.

Suppose this Mr. RICE were to have a cause in court. Suppose the judge presiding at the trial should be discovered to have a large pecuniary interest in the event of the suit, which induced him to charge the jury in such a manner as to procure a verdict against Mr. RICE. Would there be any expression of condemnation too severe, in Mr. RICE's judgment, for such conduct? Would he not say that here is a magistrate, bound impartially to administer the laws, who has yet so little sense, not merely of integrity, but even of decency, that he sits in judgment on a cause which is virtually his own, and perverts the functions of his high office to his own private ends? Would he not say, here is a clear case for impeachment and an ignominious removal of the offender from the bench?

Or suppose that in the same cause a person who had an interest in the suit adverse to that of Mr. RICE should procure himself to be smuggled into the jury, and should use his utmost powers of persuasion with his fellows to induce them to give a verdict against Mr. RICE, would not this be regarded not merely as most unjust proceeding, but as a piece of knavery deserving of infamy?

We should like to know how Mr. RICE distinguishes these cases in their essential qualities from that of a member of Congress who, bound as he is to support impartially all good measures and oppose all bad ones, with a single eye to the public good, should yet sit in that body to vote money into his own pocket; to support measures which bring him a pecuniary profit; to pervert his office of legislator into an engine for advancing his own sordid interest.

But has Mr. RICE done this? it will be asked. Let the Springfield Republican, a journal published in Mr. RICE's own State, answer. In a recent number of that paper is a well-considered article on the question of the paper duty, which the Senate, it seems, is likely to decide against the people and in favor of the paper-makers. In this article occurs the following passage, referring to the ridiculously small reduction of the paper duty proposed by the Finance Committee in the Senate:

"The victory is with the manufacturers, and not with press or people; and Congress has vindicated itself from the charge that it did not dare withhold what the newspapers demanded, only to expose itself, however, to the supposition of being influenced by a smaller, but richer and more persistent body. The Massachusetts Representatives, indeed, early took pains to show themselves on the manufacturers' side. Under the lead of one of their number, Mr. RICE, himself a paper manufacturer and dealer, whose business has probably been more profitable since the war began than that of all the papers in the State, and of the Representative of this district, which makes more fine paper than all the rest of the country, they voted solidly against the united appeal of the press of their State, and so showed their independence of the 'third estate.'"

How much Mr. RICE is voting into his own pocket by opposing the repeal of the paper duty will be understood by looking at a communication from a Massachusetts correspondent on the first page of this sheet. At Hadley Falls, and in the county of Berkshire, the paper mills have been piling up a profit of from one hundred to two hundred per cent. for two or three years past. Mr. RICE is not willing to give up so princely a revenue, which, perhaps, as poor human nature is constituted, is not much to be wondered at, in his case at least; but we must tell him plainly that it is not the part of an honest man to get himself elected to Congress and then vote for a duty which brings to himself a hundred per cent. on the bad paper he makes, and to the public Treasury nothing at all. We have always maintained, and urged again and again, that men who had such interests to promote, men who had anything to gain or to lose in a pecuniary respect by certain measures which were likely to come before Congress, had no right to be in that body; no more right, in fact, than a man interested in the event of a suit has to be on the jury before which it is tried. We want just and impartial legislators and none other, and a just and impartial legislator in this case Mr. RICE cannot be. When he saw the question coming up before Congress he should have instantly resigned his place. By remaining in it and voting for his dirty hundred or two hundred per cent. profits he exposes himself to censure as severe and as ignominious as the juror would deserve in the case we have supposed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it has been my fortune to be a member of this House during the last five or six years; and I do not deem it necessary that I should rise in my place to vindicate myself in the presence of my associates and colleagues in respect to the manner in which I have discharged either my public or my private duties in this House. I have never heretofore felt called upon to notice any remarks or criticisms that have been made upon my conduct in any quarter whatsoever; and in departing in this case from the rule which has governed me heretofore, I do it as much for the purpose of vindicating the rights of a member upon this floor, and of every member, as I do of vindicating myself against the foul and unjust aspersions cast upon me in the article which has just been read.

I do not propose, sir, to descend into the depths of a personal controversy in respect to any assaults or animadversions of which I may be the subject; but I wish to say a single word or two upon the argument which is embraced in the article which has just been read. That article proceeds upon the assumption that no member of this House who has any interest whatever in any of the great questions which arise here in Congress is entitled to express his opinion or to give his vote upon any of those measures, or even to continue a member of this body unless he is entirely independent of them. Now, sir, I want to ask you and the members of this body how it is possible that a House of Representatives can be organized in a country like this, spreading over a vast extent of territory, North and South, and East and West—territory which is measured, not by miles, but by parallels of latitude and meridians of longitude—embracing every variety of soil, climate, and of production; I ask how it is possible that from the length and breadth of so vast a territory, supporting a people living upon its natural and artificial resources and in the employments furnished by them both; how it is possible that a legislative assembly can be convened to legislate upon the interests of such a people if the members of that assembly be entirely independent of those interests? Sir, it is a perfect absurdity to suggest it. If it were possible to send here men identified with none of the interests of the country, they would not only be destitute probably of the proper information for their duties, but be open to every species of bribery and corruption in regard to the questions coming here for consideration and decision, without concern enough about any of them to make them fit Representatives of American constituencies. The reasoning of this writer would exclude every business man in the country from Congress.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 48.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not deny that I have an interest in one and in many of the questions that arise in this House; and if I had no interest in them I could not represent a constituency of this country. Sir, I feel the stimulus which comes from the interests of my constituents, and of my fellow-countrymen, whether they be in the district, in the State which I in part represent, or wherever they are within the limits of our country. I have felt it to be my first and foremost duty, since I have been a member of this House, to acquaint myself to the utmost of my ability with every one of the great leading interests of this country, in order that I might be prepared, when called upon, to give my vote and my voice in accordance with that which is just to the special interests and at the same time just to the common interests of our country.

Now, the writer of this article arraigns me for my vote and my remarks on the question of reducing the duties on imported paper, and he charges me with being governed in my action in that particular by a pecuniary interest which I have in American paper, and which will be affected by a high or a low tariff on the foreign article. He designates me as a manufacturer and as being in a combination of manufacturers, and acting in behalf of and for their interests, and for my own especially, and acting because my interest lies in the direction of my vote. Well, sir, I claim that I have the same right as any other gentleman to protect my own interests so long as they are not in conflict with the interests of my fellow-countrymen, whether they be in this House or out of it. But, sir, let me ask whether there are not other gentlemen in this House who have interests in the questions which come up here for discussion and decision? Are there no gentlemen here representing the interests of coal, of iron, of wool, of tobacco, and of the multimorph shapes which these articles take in different lines of manufacture? Sir, to come more closely to the subject in question, are there no men here representing the opposite side of this paper question? Are there no proprietors of newspapers in this House? Are there no editors here? Are there no publishers here? And did they or one of them resign his seat or withhold his vote when this question came up? Yet, sir, why does the Evening Post travel out of the line of its own profession, ignoring the fact that there are editors and publishers and proprietors of newspapers here, and that they participated in legislation on this question? Why was it necessary for it to pass over all its side of the interest and to select me from among the large number of gentlemen who spoke and voted in opposition to the reduction of the paper duty?

Sir, I acted on that question, let me say, not in the interests of the manufacturers any more than I did in the interests of the publishers; and I am glad that I stand upon the records of the House on that question as I do stand, because I am perfectly sure that the future will vindicate me by showing that we cannot tamper with any one of the great interests of the country by special and hostile legislation without depriving the people of the country of the advantages that otherwise flow from them. Both publishers and manufacturers will suffer from this legislation respecting paper, in my opinion.

The action I have taken here has been so far in the interests of the manufacturers as to stimulate production, and everybody knows that the amount of production, whether of paper or any other article of manufacture, is the principal regulator of price as well as of supply.

And we come to another point, and that is that this charge against me here as acting from the interest of a manufacturer is utterly and totally false. I have not one single dollar invested in any paper mill upon the face of the earth; nor have I one single dollar invested in the manufacture of paper anywhere; and whoever charges that on me charges that which is utterly and absolutely false.

So much for the charge which has been made against me. Now, sir, I do not speculate upon men's motives. I do not know why the men connected with the Evening Post have selected me as the mark toward which they fling their insinuations and falsehoods. But, sir, there are sometimes indications which give us the line of direction to the motives which influence men in their action; and since I read the article in the Evening Post there has been placed in my hands a copy of the Baltimore American of the 25th ultimo, which I send to the Chair that an extract from it may be read. It fell to my fortune the other day in the discharge of my duty as a member of the House to say something in defense of the Navy Department, and it is barely possible, after reading the extract, that some connection may be discovered between the duty which I then performed and the article which will be read from the Clerk's desk. I ask that the article from the Baltimore American may be read.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Not now.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The Evening Post has enjoyed, in past years, a reputation and influence not wholly unmerited, but there has recently been an obvious change in its tone toward the Navy, and the editors must be careful not to prostitute its former character to personal ends or private malignity, or its influence will be impaired, if not wholly sacrificed. It is well known that the publisher of the Post, who was Navy Agent, was removed by the Navy Department for alleged criminal practices; that he was tried before a United States Commissioner, and held to bail after examination; and that the grand jury have found four bills of indictment against him for fraud and malfeasance, for which he is to be tried in the United States court. Since the removal of the publisher of the Evening Post for these alleged criminal practices the columns of that paper have exhibited marked unfriendliness to the Navy Department, and in many instances to the gallant men of the naval service. If the editors of the Evening Post are permitting themselves to be animated by feelings of revenge, because their associate has been checked in a criminal career; or if they fancy they can influence the court or the Government in his case by robbing our naval officers and crews of their just merit, and are therefore defaming the services of these brave men or attempting to transfer it to others, they commit a fatal mistake."

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but one moment more. I cannot believe that the article in the Evening Post came from the pen of the venerable and respected gentleman in whose name the business of that paper is conducted, and whose writings have so long and so greatly adorned the literature of this country; but from whatever teacher of "public morals" this vile slander came under the head of the Evening Post I hurl it back, in defiance and contempt, to the unclean source from which it emanated.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Let me first ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. Does the gentleman know whether that article came from the reporter of that paper?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I do not think that it did.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the New York Evening Post shall hereafter be allowed no reporter or reporter's table in this House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. How does this resolution get in?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was granted to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BROOKS. I object to that resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. Has the gentleman any suspicion that the reporter had anything to do with this?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know anything about that. I know that that paper has had something to do with it, and that it has no right to a representative upon this floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that he does not think the reporter has had anything to do with it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. The resolution is not before us.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it is. Unanimous consent was granted to the gentleman from Massachusetts to bring in the matter, and that gives the right to consider it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I thought the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RICE] only rose to a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. Yes, based upon an article in the New York Evening Post.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania followed that up with a resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The House did not grant consent to any such proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] that the morning hour had commenced running by a call of committees for reports of bills of a private character. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Rice] then asked unanimous consent to make a personal explanation in regard to an article contained in the New York Evening Post. The Chair asked if there was any objection, and no objection was made. He then made a statement, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as a matter growing out of it, offered a resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I do not object to the resolution for any matter contained in it, although I should oppose its adoption, but because it seems to me to be a departure from the rules of the House, and establishing a dangerous precedent. Other gentlemen, following this example, may introduce resolutions upon matters of a personal nature or explanation admitted before the House, and thus block up the business of the House entirely with a matter which the House did not intend should be introduced when it gave its consent. I now oppose the manner of introducing the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot argue the matter unless he appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that I have no belief whatever that the reporter for the Evening Post in this House is in any way, even the least, directly or indirectly, involved in the article in that paper, and I should very much regret to have such an imputation rest upon him.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not desire to do what would be considered improper by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I do not cast any censure upon the reporter, but I say that papers which contain such libels upon members of this House have no right to a representative here. I say that these papers, and especially those in New York—I do not speak of any except those belonging to our own side of politics, for I know no others—have become so infamous, so libelous, and so calumnious, if we venture to differ from their dogmas, that scarcely a day passes that some one on this floor is not attacked in a most foul manner. But as the gentleman from Massachusetts desires that I shall withdraw my resolution, I will do so.

RAILROAD LINE IN ARIZONA, ETC.

Mr. YEAMAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill providing for the construction of a railroad and telegraph line through the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and Colorado; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The SPEAKER resumed the call of committees for report of bills of a private nature.

Mr. CORB. I ask unanimous consent to present to the House a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin.

Mr. HALE. I object, and call for the regular order.

SERVICES OF A STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House pay, out of the contingent fund, fifty dollars to Theodore F. Andrews, for reporting proceedings and evidence before the Committee of Elections in the matter of the Louisiana delegation.

Mr. DAWES. I would explain that this expense was incurred before the appointment of a reporter to committees to transact such business. It was deemed by the committee a matter of sufficient importance to be reported.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved that the vote by which the resolution was agreed to be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DIGEST OF ELECTION CASES.

Mr. DAWES. I have a report here, but I am not certain whether it is of a private nature or not. The House will recollect that at the last session they appointed the clerk to the Committee of Elections to prepare a digest of all election cases since 1834. That digest has been prepared with great care, and is now ready for the printer. It is necessary that some one should be employed to superintend the printing, and, after that is done, to prepare a proper index.

Upon consultation with the Clerk of the House he has prepared for me a resolution to accomplish that object. It is proposed to have the work printed at the Government Printing Office, and to have the index prepared under the superintendence of the clerk to the Committee of Elections, who shall have the pay of the clerk of the Committee of Elections for the time he is actually employed in doing the work, the Clerk of the House to see that no more time is consumed than necessary.

The SPEAKER. It is clearly business of a private nature.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. Does the gentleman propose to take one of the employes of the Clerk of the House to perform this work, or some one outside? If it is necessary to take some one outside, I have objection to it.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman that it would be difficult for any new clerk to take hold of this matter, and therefore we propose to take the clerk to the committee. This work covers thirty or forty years of the records of this House, and he is familiar with it all.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This matter relates to a subject which has been agitated ever since I have been in Congress. Several attempts have been made to make a digest of all contested-election cases. It has been reported on by several Committees of Elections, but no definite action was ever had. This is a matter of great importance to the House, and of still greater importance to the Committee of Elections. Our election cases, unindexed and undigested, are comparatively valueless. This is a small amount, and I think it fair and just and proper that it should be voted, and that the party who has got up the digest should make the index.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say, in addition, that this work has been prepared with great care and fidelity. Research has been made into the records both of the House and of the Senate, and cases have been brought out that were neither found in the Globe nor upon the Journal of either House, but only in the manuscript records of the House and the Senate. I think that this will be found to be a work of great value, inasmuch as it will place in the possession of Congress and of the country cases that otherwise would never have been seen.

The nature of the case is such that it did seem to the Committee of Elections, upon consultation with the Clerk of the House—and I think the Clerk told me that he had consulted our Journal Clerk, who agreed with him in his opinion—that it is proper, in order to have a correct and useful index, that the clerk of the Committee of Elections should be employed merely at his ordinary pay for the time he is actually employed, to stop when he gets through with his work; and he is to be entirely under the control and superintendence of the Clerk of the House.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I would inquire why one of the regular employes of the Clerk cannot do this work?

Mr. DAWES. I offer the resolution in this shape at the suggestion of the Clerk of the House, because it was thought that he could not employ any of the clerks now in his office to do the work advantageously. I now offer the resolution and call the previous question upon it.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of the House five thousand copies of the Digest of Election Laws, made under the order of the House by the clerk of the Committee of Elections, together with a full index to the same, to be prepared by the said clerk, for which, and for the necessary revision and superintendence connected therewith, he shall be paid by the Clerk of the House a per diem for the days actually employed thereon, not exceeding that paid to clerks of committees during the session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that if the provision for extra copies be left in, the resolution will have to go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAWES. I will strike out "five thousand copies," and insert "the usual number of copies."

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I now move that five thousand extra copies be printed.

The motion was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

ALEXANDER J. ATOTCHA.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 281, for the relief of Alexander J. Atotcha.

The bill directs the Court of Claims to examine into the claim of Alexander J. Atotcha against the Government of Mexico for losses sustained by him by reason of his expulsion from that republic in 1845, and if they shall be of opinion that the claim was a just one against Mexico when the treaty of 1848 was ratified, they shall fix and determine the amount of the loss or damage sustained, which, being adjusted or determined by the court, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; provided, that the amount so to be paid shall in no event exceed the balance of the $3,500,000, provided by the fifteenth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo for the payment of claims of citizens of the United States against the Government of Mexico, which still remains unapplied to that object.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the bill be considered now.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIPHALET BROWN, JR.

Mr. HALE, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, bill of the Senate No. 334, for the relief of Eliphalet Brown, jr., artist in the Japan expedition.

The bill was laid on the table.

HENRY A. BRIGHAM.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the Senate No. 212, for the relief of Henry A. Brigham.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Henry A. Brigham the sum of $2,000, being the amount of his check drawn in favor of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States at New York, on the 7th of November, 1862.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. WILSON and Mr. SPALDING objected. Mr. HALE. I hope the objection will be withdrawn. This is as plain a case as ever came before the House.

Mr. WILSON. Does the gentleman mean to press the bill to its passage without discussion?

Mr. HALE. No, sir; I am willing that it shall be discussed.

Mr. WILSON. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SPALDING. And I withdraw mine with that understanding.

Mr. HALE. In the first place, this claimant is a man of very high character, which I think is an important fact in the case. He has maintained a very lofty character as an upright and honest man. I can appeal to his Representative to sustain me in saying this.

Mr. WILSON. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I do not think that question is involved here at all.

Mr. HALE. It is a fact in the case.

Mr. WILSON. There is nothing to show but what this man is of the best possible character. I admit all that. I do not think it is a question involved in the case.

Mr. HALE. It is a fact in the case which I think has an important bearing, although not conclusive, and which ought to be considered. The claimant, who is a paymaster, went to New York to draw his monthly pay, $38,000. He gave notice the day before to the sub-Treasurer of the amount and the denominations he required. The amount was counted out by a clerk in the sub-Treasurer's office and put on a tray in a drawer in an inner room. The next day, Mr. Brigham called, according to promise. The clerk took out the tray containing, as he said, $38,000, and proceeded to count it in the presence of Mr. Brigham, he being upon one side of the counter and Mr. Brigham upon the other. When he had counted it to his satisfaction he handed it to Mr. Brigham to count. Mr. Brigham took up the parcels of money and found, instead of six parcels of $2,000, only five parcels. The money had not been removed at all; it was in their presence.

When this fact was brought to the attention of the clerk he at once began to search for the missing parcel; he went back into the room which he had brought the money from and looked about, but he could not find it, and finally, when the money could not be found, Mr. Brigham offered to be searched upon the spot to banish any suspicion that he had the money; but the clerk did not insist upon it, and they referred the matter to Mr. Cisco to decide whose the loss should be. They both went to Mr. Cisco, and he decided that the delivery was complete when the clerk put the money on the desk, and that if anything was lost it must be the loss of Mr. Brigham. It is not alleged that Mr. Brigham had received one dollar of the money. I believe that no lawyer will say that if it had been a bank which was paying the money to the paymaster, it would have been a delivery. The bank could have been sued for $2,000, if they had refused to pay it, and made to pay it in any court in the country or anywhere else. Why then should the United States require the paymaster to lose this money when it is not pretended that he got the money?

The inference is that somebody who was about there stole the money. There was a stranger in the neighborhood, a total stranger to the paymaster, a man whom he had never seen before in his life; this man came up and stood in the neighborhood of the money.

Mr. WILSON. I will ask the gentleman whether that feature of the case was not abandoned in the Senate when the bill was under consideration there. Was not the suggestion that the money might have been taken by a stranger who was present entirely withdrawn from the case?

Mr. HALE. I do not know how that is; but I understand this to be one of the incidents of the case.

Mr. WILSON. I will state that that is the case.

Mr. HALE. It is alleged or insinuated by the clerk that the stranger stole the money.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will not the passage of this bill involve the principle that the Government is to become the insurer against all such losses? If we pass this bill, will it not become a precedent?

Mr. HALE. If the money had been delivered to the paymaster, and lost after he had received it and while in his custody, then I agree that the loss should have been his own. But I submit that, in this case there is no evidence to lead any fair-minded man to believe that the money ever went into the hands of the paymaster at all, actually or constructively.

Mr. WILSON. It does appear in this case beyond a doubt that the Government has lost $2,000. The Government has paid out that amount of money, because the testimony in the case is that the account in the Assistant Treasurer's office for that day balanced properly. Now, the $2,000 was taken by somebody.

Mr. HALE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I think there is no evidence of that kind in the case. My own opinion is that the clerk never counted out the $2,000.

Mr. WILSON. There must have been some disposition made of that $2,000, for this reason: the paymaster endeavored to get a $36,500 check for that $38,500. The Assistant Treasurer held vouchers, in the form of checks, for $38,500, given by the paymaster; whereas, in fact, the paymaster received but $36,500. Consequently, the $2,000 must have disappeared somewhere. Otherwise, the account of the Assistant Treasurer would not have balanced for that day.

Mr. HALE. I cannot say how that is; but I believe that the evidence is such as to satisfy any reasonable mind that the money never was delivered in any form whatever to the paymaster.

Mr. WILSON. I think that is the case. I do not believe that this money was delivered to the paymaster.

Mr. HALE. I think that none but the very sharpest kind of a lawyer would maintain that this money was delivered. It being a matter of doubt whether this money was delivered or not, (and that is putting the case in the very best possible form for the Government,) then the question arises, whether it is fair that the Government or the individual should lose the money, the latter being a man of undoubted character. I think that, taking the evidence as presented, we cannot come to any other conclusion than that there was no fault on the part of this man; that the money never came into his hands; that he never had the possession or control of it; and that, to hold him responsible for it would be great injustice.

Mr. GANSON. I agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] that, from the evidence in this case, it is very clear that there were only $36,500 delivered, and that the Government took for that amount a check for $38,500, holding this man responsible for the full amount. Now, I should like to ask, upon what principle of justice would the gentleman charge a man with $2,000, when he is entirely satisfied that the man never had a cent of it? This check, in my view, was retained wrongfully and illegally. The representative of the Government refused to make the amount of the check correspond with the amount actually delivered.

Mr. HALE. He had to take a receipt or get no money. He had to take a receipt under duress.

Mr. WILSON. As I have said already, I do not think that the evidence in this case shows that the $2,000 which has disappeared went into the hands of this paymaster. I do not think that he received it. I think that all the evidence in the case clearly rebuts that presumption. It clearly comes to this, that when the paymaster applied for $38,500 and checked for that amount, and was handed $36,500, he, instead of refusing to take any of the money, which he had the right to do, in order to get money to pay out to the employees of the arsenal, checked for $2,000 more than he had received. I do not think that that is a good business rule to establish by the passage of this bill. It may create a precedent which may lead to difficulty and loss to the Government.

Mr. HALE. I agree that the act of the paymaster in receipting for more money than he received was a foolish one. The matter was referred to Mr. Cisco, and he decided that the paymaster should bear the loss. I do not think that that was just. It was neither right in law nor justice. But the paymaster felt bound to get money, and to do so he had to give the check. He had to have money to pay the employees at the arsenal. Mr. Cisco said that he was liable to pay. The question is whether Mr. Cisco was right or wrong.

Mr. WILSON. I think that Mr. Cisco was wrong.

Mr. HALE. Then pass this bill.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I ask the gentleman whether, when the money was lost by the Government agent, and when the paymaster was forced to give a receipt for $2,000 which he had never received, by the arbitrary demand of the Government agent, it is not a case to be settled by Congress? I beg to assure the gentleman that the paymaster making this claim is as far above suspicion as any man upon this floor.

Mr. WILSON. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. GRISWOLD. There is no dispute in regard to the facts; and I submit that under the same circumstances any gentleman would have done as he did.

Mr. WILSON. If the gentleman puts it upon that ground, it will stand in this position: if the gentleman had two disbursing agents and they should make a mistake of $2,000 in account, he asks us to put this thing in the position in which he would be and lose the $2,000.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If the gentleman concedes that the money was lost by the Government agent then is it fair to make this paymaster responsible?

Mr. WILSON. There was one of the agents in the transaction. There was an affidavit submitted in this case, which I saw in the Globe, by one of the clerks in the office of the Assistant Treasurer in New York, giving an explanation of the transaction; and it occurred to me when I read it that it might be true. Still the clerk might know where the money had gone.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Suppose that he had discovered that the clerk had stolen the money. That clerk was the clerk of the Assistant Treasurer.

Mr. WILSON. I think that it should be settled between the paymaster and the Assistant Treasurer, who received vouchers for $2,000 more than he paid out.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Will the gentleman indicate how it can be settled in that way?

Mr. WILSON. I think that I can, but I do not think that that is involved in this discussion.

Mr. GRISWOLD. There is no relief except by Congress.

Mr. HALE. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over until next Friday.

REMITTANCE OF A FINE.

Mr. WILSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] had a fine imposed upon him by the House for non-attendance. Considering the circumstances in his case, I do not think that the action of the House was just. I think every member of the House will bear me out in saying that no member is more faithful in his attendance upon the sessions of this House than the gentleman from Massachusetts. He can always be found in his seat unless detained from the House by sickness, or some other cause which the rules of the House would recognize as a sufficient excuse for his absence.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is debate in order upon this motion?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman gives his excuse, and the House determines what the penalty, if any, shall be.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman gave his excuse yesterday.

The SPEAKER. This subject is governed by the same rules as governed the original proposition.

Mr. WILSON. I only desired to do justice to the gentleman from Massachusetts, as many who were let off without fine were more culpable than he was. He remained here until about one o'clock a. m., and was, as I am informed, and believe, too unwell to remain longer. I am sure he would not have absented himself without good reason therefor.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin still object to debate?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] gave his excuse yesterday.

Mr. WILSON. I desired to make a statement of the reasons which control my action. Of course if the gentleman from Wisconsin objects, I must yield. I hope the motion will be reconsidered.

The question was put on the motion to reconsider, and it was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] be excused upon the payment of the usual fees and a fine of ten dollars,

Mr. WILSON moved to amend by striking out the ten dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House last evening imposed a penalty upon the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. SPALDING. I ask no favor of that kind.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman was excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reconsider that action.

The motion was not agreed to.

EXCUSE FOR ABSENCE.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. I desire to be excused for non-attendance upon the sittings of the House since last Tuesday on account of illness.

Excuse was granted.

REMITTANCE OF A FINE.

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] being now the only one on whom the House yesterday imposed an extra fine, I move to reconsider the vote by which that extra fine of ten dollars was imposed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurring on the original motion, Mr. BROOMALL. I now move to amend by striking out the extra fine of ten dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask unanimous consent to submit to the House an extract from the testimony of General Grant, given before the committee on the conduct of the war this morning, in reference to the exchange of prisoners.

Mr. COX. What is the object? Does the gentleman propose any resolution or action upon the subject?

Mr. GOOCH. I desire to present it merely for information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the question is brought before the House, unless a motion to print is made, and the previous question called, it will be open to any resolution growing legitimately out of it.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the House take up the Senate resolution upon that subject as soon as this matter is read. That would be a very proper way to have the matter taken up.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask unanimous consent to have it read solely for information.

The SPEAKER. That would be in order, and will cut off all subsequent action.

Unanimous consent was given, and the evidence was read, as follows:

"Question. It is stated, upon what authority I do not know, that you are charged entirely with the exchange of prisoners.

"Answer. That is correct; and what is more, I have effected an arrangement for the exchange of prisoners, man for man, and officer for officer, or his equivalent, according to the old cartel, until one or the other party has exhausted the number they now hold. I get a great number of letters daily from friends of prisoners in the South, every one of which I cause to be answered, telling them that this arrangement has been made, and that I suppose exchanges can be made at the rate of three thousand per week; and just as fast as they can deliver prisoners to us I will receive them and deliver their prisoners to them. And the Salisbury prisoners will be coming right on. I myself saw Colonel Hatch, the assistant commissioner of exchange on the part of the South, and he told me that the Salisbury and Danville prisoners would be coming on at once. He said that he could bring them on at the rate of five or six thousand a week.

"Question. There is now no impediment in the way?

"Answer. There is no impediment on our side. I could deliver and receive every one of them in a very short time, if they will deliver those they hold. We have lost some two weeks lately on account of ice in the river."

Mr. GOOCH. The committee were aware that great anxiety existed upon this question, not only among members of the House, but throughout the whole country, and they desired that this information should be given to the country as soon as possible. I ask that the paper read be printed.

The paper was ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the credentials of M. F. Bonzano, claiming a seat here from the first congressional district of Louisiana, to make a report, accompanied by a resolution; which I ask may be read, laid on the table, and printed.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That M. F. Bonzano is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the first congressional district of Louisiana.

The resolution was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITHERS presented the views of the minority of the committee on the same subject; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. FRANK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that joint resolution of the Senate (No. 91) appointing General Richard Delafield to be a regent of the Smithsonian Institution, be taken from the Speaker's table and passed.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and was passed.

ENROLLMENT BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that bill of the Senate (No. 408) in addition to the several acts for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, be taken up and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the message of the President of the United States, sent to the Senate yesterday, contains a letter from Mr. Seward to Mr. Charles Francis Adams, giving a detailed statement of the recent interview at Fortress Monroe. It did not accompany the message sent here, for the simple reason that the House had not asked for that communication. I desire to move, if it be agreeable to the House, that this communication from Mr. Seward to Mr. Adams be printed with the message of the President.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that twenty thousand extra copies of it be also printed, together with the message.

The motion was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MORRILL. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I call for the regular order of business.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say that the resolution which I offered last night, although I am responsible for it, was not drawn by myself, and it expresses what I desired in stronger terms than I intended; I have therefore modified the resolution so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. E. B. WASHBURN be required to answer at the bar of the House why he should not be held in contempt for leaving the Hall of the House without permission on the evening of February 9, instant, during a call of the House, and that he abide the order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the resolution is not debatable, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] having moved last evening to lay it on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Is an amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. It will be if the gentleman withdraws his motion to lay on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I did not withdraw it for the purpose of enabling the amendment to be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio had a right to modify his resolution under the rule.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. As I understand that there are one or two gentlemen who desire to be heard upon the resolution, and as I wish to make a few remarks upon it myself, I will withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is entitled to the floor upon his resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. He was not taken from the floor at all. He offered his resolution and then took his seat. How could I make the motion to lay the resolution on the table while the gentleman from Ohio was on the floor?

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Speaker will allow me I will state that I only yielded the floor after the statement was made that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] was absent. I was willing, in view of that fact, that the resolution should be postponed; and I myself made the motion that it should be postponed until to-day, after the morning hour.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That motion was not made until after I had moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the condition of the resolution to be as follows: the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] offered the resolution; it being suggested that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] was not in his seat, he said that he would ask to have it postponed; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] then rose and moved that it be laid on the table.

VISIT OF LIEUTENANT GENERAL GRANT.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the House take a recess of five minutes, to enable members to pay their respects to General Grant, who is present in the Hall.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly took a recess for five minutes.

When the House was again called to order, Mr. SCHENCK said: In order that the Representatives of the people and all loyal persons present may have a better opportunity of making the acquaintance, at least by sight, of the Lieutenant General, I move that he be invited for a moment to the stand.

No objection was made.

Lieutenant General Grant was conducted to the Speaker's desk, amid general applause, and took his stand on the left of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I have the honor of introducing to you this day our heroic defender in the field, the Lieutenant General of the armies of the United States, Ulysses S. Grant. [Great applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The Lieutenant General bowed to the House, and then withdrew from the Speaker's stand, and took a seat on the floor of the House.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is the question of privilege. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] having offered his resolution last evening as a question of privilege, desired to have it postponed. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] moved to lay the resolution on the table. The House then adjourned; and the question came up this morning after the expiration of the morning hour. This morning the gentleman from Ohio modified his resolution. The Chair then stated to him that the motion to lay on the table would prevent his debating it. On examination, reflection, and consultation, the Chair is convinced that the gentleman from Ohio, having virtually withdrawn the resolution by its modification, and having offered another, the motion to lay on the table did not apply to it; and that therefore the gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor on his resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MORRILL. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to yield the floor to me.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL. I am very anxious that we shall go on with the internal revenue bill; and I foresee that if this question be brought before the House it will inevitably consume much time. I therefore appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his resolution entirely.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have already made an explanation of the resolution as first drawn, in justice to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] and in justice to myself, and have stated that it was not my intention that it should express as much as it did. I made a modification of it this morning so that it should as near as possible relate the circumstances of the case involved. But the fact that the gentleman from Vermont requires time for the tax bill, which is so important to the country, and the further fact—the temper of the House—shown in its action toward members who were fined yesterday, indicate to me that it is the general desire that the resolution should be withdrawn; and I therefore withdraw it.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 8, 1864.

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate be appointed by that body to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by that House to wait on Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, and to notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th day of March, 1865; and also to notify Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, that he has been duly elected Vice President of the United States for four years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865.

Ordered, That Mr. TRUMBULL be of the said committee on the part of the Senate.

The resolution was concurred in.

TAX BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that all general debate on the tax bill be closed in one minute after its consideration shall be resumed in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair), and resumed, as a special order, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by inserting, after line one hundred and ninety-five, the following:

That section sixty-one be amended by striking out after the words "and all," the words "refined coal oil and naphtha," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "distilled or refined coal oil, distilled benzine or benzole;" also, by inserting after the word "warehouse" and before the words "and no drawback" the words "and the same fees shall be allowed for exports as are allowed to exporters for like services in the custom-houses;" also, by inserting after the word "redistilled," the words "or canned;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 61. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits and all distilled or refined coal oil, distilled benzine or benzole upon which an excise duty is imposed by law, may, after being inspected, gauged, proved, and marked by the inspector according to the provisions of this act, be removed, without payment of the duty, under such rules and regulations, and upon the execution of such transportation bonds or other security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The said spirits, oil, or naphtha so removed shall be transferred directly from the distillery or refinery to a bonded warehouse, established in conformity with law and Treasury regulations, and may be transported from such warehouse to any one other bonded warehouse used for the storage of distilled spirits, coal oil, or naphtha. And after the arrival of such distilled spirits, coal oil, or naphtha, at the bonded warehouse within the district of the assessor to which it has been transferred, it shall be again inspected, and the duty shall be assessed and paid on any deficiency or reduction of the number of proof gallons, beyond such allowance for leakage as may be established by the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, received at the warehouse, from the number of proof gallons as stated in the bond given at the place of shipment. And any distilled spirits, coal oil, or naphtha in the public warehouses shall be subject to the same rules and regulations, and be chargeable with the same costs and expenses in all respects to which imported goods deposited in public store or bonded warehouse may be subject; and shall be in charge of a proper officer, to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, who, with the owner and proprietor of the warehouse, shall have the joint custody of all the distilled spirits, oil, or naphtha so stored in said warehouse, which shall be at the risk of the owner of the said spirits, oil, or naphtha. And all labor on the same shall be performed by the owner or proprietor of the warehouse, under the supervision of the officer in charge of the same, and at the expense of said owner or proprietor of the warehouse. And the same fees shall be allowed for exports as are allowed to exporters for like services in the custom-houses. And no drawback shall in any case be allowed on any distilled spirits, coal oil, or naphtha, upon which an excise duty shall have been paid, either before or after it shall have been placed in a bonded warehouse: Provided, That any distilled spirits, coal oil, or naphtha may be withdrawn from the bonded warehouse after payment to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which the warehouse is situated of the duty imposed by law, or may be removed without payment of the duty for the purpose of being exported, or for the purpose of being redistilled or canned for export, after the quantity and proof of the spirits, oil, or naphtha to be removed has been ascertained and inspected according to the provisions of law, under such rules and regulations and the execution of such bond or other security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. And any spirits, oil, or naphtha so removed for distillation shall be returned to the warehouse and shall be again inspected, and the duty shall be paid to the said collector on any deficiency or reduction beyond the allowance for loss by redistillation established by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in the number of proof gallons received at the warehouse for the purpose of being exported, as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend, in line one hundred and ninety-eight, by striking out the words "and fifty cents."

Mr. KASSON. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he will reach his object more simply by moving to strike out lines one hundred and ninety-six, one hundred and ninety-seven, and one hundred and ninety-eight.

Mr. HOLMAN. I accept the modification. I move to amend by striking out the following clause:

That section sixty-four be amended by striking out "one dollar," wherever it occurs, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "one dollar and fifty cents."

The section proposed to be amended is as follows:

Sec. 64. And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid on all beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors, by whatever name such liquors may be called, a duty of one dollar for each and every barrel containing not more than thirty-one gallons, and at a like rate for any other quantity, or for fractional parts of a barrel, which shall be brewed or manufactured and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, within the United States or the Territories thereof, or within the District of Columbia; which duty shall be paid by the owner, agent, or superintendent of the brewery or premises in which such fermented liquors shall be made, and shall be paid at the time of rendering the accounts of such fermented liquors so chargeable with duty as hereinafter required: Provided, That fractional parts of a barrel shall be halves, thirds, quarters, sixths, eighths, and sixteenths; and any fractional part containing less than one sixteenth shall be accounted one sixteenth; more than one sixteenth, and not more than one eighth, shall be accounted one eighth; more than one eighth, and not more than one sixth, shall be accounted one sixth; more than one sixth, and not more than one quarter, shall be accounted one quarter; more than one quarter, and not more than one third, shall be accounted one third; more than one third, and not more than one half, shall be accounted one half; more than one half shall be accounted one barrel: Provided further, That beer, lager beer, ale, porter, and other fermented liquors in bottles, shall be assessed, according to the quantity contained therein, at the rate of one dollar for thirty-one gallons, when the duty has not been previously paid on the liquors contained therein.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the present duty of a dollar per barrel was deemed enormous at the time it was adopted. The judgment of business men was that sixty cents per gallon was as much as it could bear. Put that duty up to $1 50, and you make it at least three times as high as in any other country. I believe there is no country where it pays more than from forty-three to forty-seven cents per barrel of thirty-two gallons. Beer is an article of general consumption, and is much healthier than spirituous liquors. Especially is this oppressive where a very cheap article of beer is manufactured—what is called common beer—which is required under existing laws to pay as high a tax as the more expensive and valuable species of malt liquors. Looking at this as a question of revenue alone, I trust that the revenues of the country will not be oppressed, and the people themselves will not be oppressed, by this unnecessary increase of taxation.

Mr. SPALDING. I propose to vote for this amendment; and I shall do so in obedience to the wishes of a very large class of my constituents.

Mr. MORRILL. I raise the point of order that the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING], as he does not rise to oppose the amendment, is not entitled to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SPALDING. I have said all that I proposed to say.

Mr. MORRILL. As I understand the matter we have more than quadrupled the duty upon spirits since the time when we first levied fifty or sixty cents a barrel upon beer. It is only recently that ale and beer have been brought into competition with spirits which have paid two dollars per gallon. Now, the price of ale and beer, it must be admitted, has advanced very largely from what it was formerly. The price of ale or beer per barrel was formerly from four to six dollars; the price at the present time is from ten to twelve dollars. The retailers make the largest profit on this article. At five cents a glass, the usual rate near the place of its production, it yields to the retailers a profit of one hundred per cent.; that is, a barrel when retailed will bring twenty dollars.

Now, the tax is not going to increase the price; it is the demand of the retailers that has this effect. They ask in many cases from ten to fifteen cents a glass for it, giving them a most extravagant profit. I suppose that if we increase the tax to $1 50 we shall not do more than place it upon a relative competition with spirits. I think that with this increase the profits of the retailers will be as large as they ought to be.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move, as an amendment to the amendment, to strike out "fifty" and insert "twenty-five," so that it will read "$1 25."

I offer this amendment pro forma, for the purpose of saying that it is my deliberate opinion that, as a revenue measure, the increase of tax upon this article will operate against the revenue. I desire to remind the committee of the fact that the article proposed to be taxed differs from spirituous liquors in this, it has but one purpose, that of consumption as a beverage. Hence the people are not compelled to use it as they are spirituous liquors, which are employed for various manufacturing purposes relating to colors, chemicals, and the like.

Now, what has been the effect of the increased taxation upon spirituous liquors? This increased taxation has in my section of the country entirely suspended the manufacture of those articles. In my own county there were one year ago more than a dozen distilleries in operation, paying a very heavy revenue (I have not ascertained how much) to the Government. Not one of those distilleries is operating to-day. They are all standing idle, and must stand idle as long as the tax upon spirituous liquors remains at its present rate; and this, notwithstanding the fact that spirituous liquors are required for other purposes than for use as a beverage.

It may be the fact, as the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] states, (for I am not informed on this question, and I know that he takes pains to acquaint himself with any subject upon which he speaks,) that beer produces, when sold at retail, one hundred per cent. more than the wholesale price of the manufacturer. But this is not all profit. There are large deductions to be made. Most of these articles are manufactured in the winter season and are kept until summer for consumption. Large quantities sometimes spoil upon the hands of the holder from not being kept in proper vaults. If improperly stored away or handled, they are very likely to become unfit for use. It is true that the price has gone up with the price of all other things. The cost of manufacture and the cost of the material used, the cost of everything, has been enhanced. And I know from conversation I have had with gentlemen largely engaged in this business, some from my own district, who send their manufacture to the city of New York, that if we impose this additional tax of fifty cents we will so embarrass them that they will have to abandon the business altogether. There is nothing which induces this manufacture but the use of this article as a beverage, and it will be dispensed with as a beverage if this tax be imposed upon it. If the tax is put upon moral grounds I have no argument to make. I think that the imposition of such a tax upon moral grounds is improper, and that as a revenue measure it will certainly fail to meet the object which the committee have in view in increasing this tax.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, when this proposition was before the House last year, a proposition was made to increase the tax to the point proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, and I then opposed it upon the ground that while it could undoubtedly bear the tax of one dollar a barrel, I thought at that time it could bear no more without inflicting a serious injury to the production of the article. This article is peculiar, and essentially distinct from the article of spirits which we have taxed at this high rate. While the manufacturer of beer, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is obliged to sell within a limited time, the manufacturer of spirits may store it and wait for a market for years, and the spirits will improve while he waits. Again, the manufacturer of beer is obliged to keep a large amount of money invested in barrels, for in the course of trade, when he sells beer the barrels are returned. Here is a large sum invested, amounting to many thousand dollars.

A large portion of the community, the Germans particularly, when provisions are high, find in this article a substitute for tea, coffee, and ardent spirits, even mixing it with water and taking it morning, noon, and night as the regular support of the family; and I trust that we will not put this additional burden on it when the articles out of which it is produced have largely enhanced in price, thus necessarily enhancing the value of the article. I say that it cannot bear the added tax of fifty cents, or even of twenty-five cents as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and I trust, therefore, that the motion of the gentleman from Indiana will be adopted, so that we may leave the tax where it is.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I renew the amendment. I wish to make a few remarks in addition to what has been said, and I wish to call attention to another aspect of the case. I know that there are various members of the House who look upon a tax upon everything of this kind as tending toward temperance. I have discovered in my experience that beer supplies the place of stronger drink, and is used by those who before were in the habit of taking the worst and poorest sort of spirits. In the city where I live drinking is more general than in any other city, and from what I have observed I do not think that there is a city in New England where drunkenness is so rare and where drunken men are so seldom seen. I believe that those who before took the poorer and cheaper spirits, which were intoxicating, now take malt liquors with which there is scarcely a chance of disturbing the brains. And beyond that, with a large class of our population it becomes the means of social enjoyment. We must recollect that we have taxed the poorer classes of our people almost out of the power of social enjoyment. The food they eat, the clothes they wear, the houses they live in are, and I do not know but after this session of Congress the very light they see by and the air they breathe will be, the subject of taxation. I think some little consideration should be paid to that class of persons who, gathering around the social board, take these lighter liquors which never intoxicate, but are conducive rather to health. I therefore hope that the original proposition to strike out this increased tax will prevail. I withdraw my amendment.

The question recurring on the amendment offered by Mr. HOLMAN,

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MORRILL and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I propose to offer an amendment, to come in after line one hundred and eighty-three, page 8.

Mr. MORRILL. That is going back on the bill, and I object to it now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. When shall I have an opportunity?

Mr. MORRILL. By and by.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will propose it now to line one hundred and ninety-eight of the next section.

The CHAIRMAN. That whole clause has been stricken out, so that there is nothing left to amend.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I will move it to the next section.

The CHAIRMAN. That has not yet been reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk then proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have agreed to submit to the Committee of Ways and Means for their action, between this and to-morrow, the amendment which I intended to propose. I propose now another amendment, to come in after line two hundred and twenty-two, by way of a proviso, as follows:

Provided, That no license shall be issued to any person, firm, or corporation who distills or manufactures spirits for sale, who shall distill or manufacture less than two hundred gallons per day.

The object of this amendment is to protect the legitimate manufacturer of high wines who manufactures and pays a duty upon it of two dollars a gallon.

Mr. ASHLEY. I hope my friend will call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] to that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will call, not only his attention, but the attention of the whole House, and especially of the Committee of Ways and Means, to it. Under the law as it now stands licenses for manufacturing high wines, no matter to what extent it is carried on, can be had for fifty dollars a year. If they manufacture less than a specified quantity, they may have a license for twenty-five dollars. Now, I have knowledge of the fact that in my own town alone not less than thirty stills for manufacturing high wines have been made and sold to parties who have or can obtain licenses, and who have manufactured with them two or three barrels a day. They pay the license, and if they are detected in this illegitimate manufacture of whisky, under the law as it now stands they simply forfeit the still, and there is no personal penalty attached to a violation of the law. The consequence is that in the cities of Chicago, St. Louis, and Peoria, stills of a sufficient capacity to manufacture one, two, or three barrels a day have been sold to parties who obtain licenses to manufacture spirits, but who carry on the business of producing contraband whisky, on which they pay no tax whatever.

Now, if the law provided that no license should be granted to any person, firm, or corporation that should manufacture less than two hundred gallons a day, you would cut off all this contraband manufacture, and you would derive from the legitimate manufacture the tax of two dollars a gallon, which is lost, if this thing is allowed to go on, to the Treasury.

Now, if there is any particular locality which should be excepted, as perhaps some districts in Kentucky, Pennsylvania, and Tennessee, where there may be small manufacturers of whisky of a superior quality, out of peaches or rye, they may be, so far as I am concerned, excepted. But if we desire to protect the Treasury and procure the greatest amount of money possible, no person ought to be permitted to carry on a distillery unless he manufactures two hundred gallons a day. No establishment that carries on the business in any of the States north of the Ohio river, so far as I know, runs less than from three to five hundred, and often two thousand bushels a day, making from twenty-five to two hundred barrels of whisky of first proof. By this amendment I propose to protect the Government, and to protect those men who pay a tax of two dollars per gallon, against the contraband manufacturer of whisky and high wines, who pay no tax on the article, and only avail themselves of their license to defraud the Government. I hope that for that reason my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. Where does the gentleman propose to have his amendment come in?

Mr. INGERSOLL. After line two hundred and twenty-two. I will say that there are no distillers in the northern or western States that run less than two hundred gallons a day. There may, however, be some such in Kentucky.

Mr. MALLORY. I must object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. I cannot see what good purpose it is to effect. The sort of distillation which the gentleman speaks of—on a small scale—is, in my estimation, as legitimate a business as that done on a large scale. The distiller, in each case, pays his license, and in each case the product of the distillery is taxed by the Government. Why should we discriminate, therefore, in favor of the large producers and against the small ones? It is true that, in my State, there are a good many persons who have small establishments where they produce grape and peach brandy, and occasionally distill corn into whisky, good old Bourbon whisky, sir, which is not made in such quantities as is the stuff which the constituents of the gentleman from Illinois make, and which he calls whisky. Why he should aim to deprive the people of the right to make these beverages when they pay a license, and pay a tax on the article produced, is more than I can say. I did not give full attention to what he said, as I did not know on what subject he was speaking till he had got pretty well under way. But I understood him to say that the permission to distill in small quantities furnishes facilities for frauds and for evading the payment of the revenue. I cannot see how that is.

I will tell the gentleman, however, that the high tax which we impose on whisky at this time, by which its price is brought up to $2 50, $3, and even $4 a gallon, will beget that sort of illicit distillation that is practiced so extensively in Ireland and England, where a man puts up a small still in his cellar, completely concealed from the public view, and runs perhaps five or six gallons of whisky a day, making an immense profit by it, paying no license and no tax on the article produced. He buys a bushel of corn at twenty-five or thirty cents, and makes six or eight gallons of whisky a day, which he can sell for three or four dollars a gallon. His business is much more profitable than any other in which a mere laborer can engage. Thousands will be induced to resort to this thing everywhere. You may try to prevent it by the vigilance of your revenue officers. You can do it in that way, but in no other. You certainly cannot do it by discriminating against the small producers and in favor of the large ones. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will not be adopted.

Mr. ODELL. I move to amend the amendment by reducing the limit to a hundred gallons a day.

Mr. HOOPER. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say, that if this amendment is to be adopted, this is not the proper place for it to come in. It should come in as an amendment to the seventy-ninth section. And if the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his amendment now, I will call his attention to the subject when that section is under consideration.

Mr. ODELL. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the amendment might as well be submitted to the committee now, and be acted on.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no desire whatever to discriminate against any honest man or any legitimate traffic.

Mr. MALLORY. I so understand.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would be perfectly willing to make it twenty-five gallons a day instead of two hundred. Perhaps the limit of one hundred gallons would answer the purpose. The object I have in view is simply this: that a man shall be required to carry on this business so extensively as to notify the world around him what business he is carrying on. For instance, as the gentleman from Kentucky says, a man may, without license, take a little still into his cellar or into his garret, and distill his ten gallons a day, which, under the present tax, will net him a profit of twenty dollars. He might possibly run one barrel, of forty gallons, at a profit of eighty dollars a day. I know that, as the law exists now, there is no adequate protection to the Treasury, and to the legitimate manufacturers of high wines. Under our law a license may be procured for fifty dollars, which the illegitimate manufacture of twenty-five gallons of whisky will reimburse. Yet he may select some place to carry on the business of manufacturing high wines under his license, which cannot be discovered, and if discovered the only penalty is the forfeiture of the apparatus used in the manufacture. I am willing, if the Committee of Ways and Means recommend it, to except Kentucky; but I would prefer that all the States should be affected by the provision, if it will not inflict any hardship on honest men. The legitimate manufacture of whisky, if protected, will yield an annual duty of $80,000,000; although there is not perhaps a single manufactory running to-day. It is supposed by those who are most familiar with the subject that it is the illegal and contraband manufacture that is supplying the market. We must protect the legitimate manufacture or else we will derive no revenue from the business. I desire that the business, when carried on at all, shall be carried on to such an extent as that it shall be notorious, because a man cannot manufacture a hundred gallons a day without sufficient machinery and apparatus so that his neighbors may know what he is about. I hope my amendment may pass—either at a hundred or two hundred gallons.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting one hundred and ninety gallons. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, of the honesty of purpose of the gentleman from Illinois. My objection to his resolution is, that I do not think it will secure the object which he evidently aims at. The only objection that I have to the present heavy tax imposed on whisky is that it will beget a fraudulent production of the article, which will go on increasing from year to year until the Government will come to the conclusion that, instead of raising revenue by this enormous taxation on whisky, there will be actually less revenue gained from it than if the duty imposed were smaller. I believe that when this tax of two dollars a gallon goes into operation hundreds of men throughout the country—in the gentleman's State as well as in mine—will be induced to resort to the business of secret distillation. I am sorry to say that men do regard acts of this sort as not so morally offensive as they really are. This business of illicit distillation will go on increasing until the tax on whisky is reduced. I believe that the Government will be brought to that before the expiration of two years.

That is one of the reasons, Mr. Chairman, why I, in the Committee of Ways and Means and here on this floor, have always opposed this large tax on whisky. I am disposed to regard whisky—as many other gentlemen do—as a legitimate source of taxation, as an article out of which as large a revenue as possible should be raised. But the question is, whether we can raise more revenue by a small duty or a large one. I contend that a large tax begets illicit distillation; and the result must necessarily be a diminution of revenue. If you render this distillation on a small scale illegal, you will increase the disposition on the part of small producers to engage in this business secretly. As it is now, not one out of twenty of them would attempt to evade the law. Men are willing to pay the tax provided they can make a profit on their business after the payment of the tax. And they will continue to do so.

Many of these distilleries of which the gentleman speaks do not produce more than a barrel or two of properly distilled peach or apple brandy or whisky per day. Such is the case in Kentucky, where old Bourbon, the best whisky that is produced, is manufactured in these limited quantities in copper stills. I do not want to see this business rendered illegitimate. I do not see why the man who wants to make that sort of whisky in small quantities shall not have a license to do it. I do not see why we should declare by our legislation that, if a man is determined to carry on that kind of business, he must do it in violation of law, must do it in some secret place, in some cavern of a mountain, or in the cellar of his house. I wish him to be allowed to pursue this business, and to be required to pay the tax on it. I desire that the tax-gatherer shall be instructed to hunt him out and collect the tax. I want the tax reduced, but whatever it is I want it paid.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, I listened with some attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL:] yet, in consequence, I suppose, of my own dullness, I have failed to see any reason why his amendment should prevail. It strikes me that one effect of the adoption of that proposition would be to give to the large capitalists the control of one of the most important branches of industry in the United States. It would tend to make of this business a monopoly, favoring the rich man and discriminating against the poor man. So far as my own district is concerned I do not believe that there can be found in it more than one distillery that makes two hundred gallons of high wines per day, while there are a great number of small manufacturers, making from five to twenty-five gallons per day. The liquors that are made by the small manufacturers are much superior in quality to those made by the large manufacturers. The small manufacturers—I speak from my personal observation in my own section of country—are as respectable and honest men as those who manufacture in large quantities. If, then, the character of the article produced by the small manufacturer is superior, and if the Government gets the same amount of revenue from the small manufacturer as from the large, I cannot understand why his legitimate business should be broken up for the benefit of the capitalist, the large manufacturer. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would make an unjust discrimination against labor and against the poor men of the country, although I know that the gentleman had no such intention.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word here? As he has already disclaimed for me any intention to legislate unjustly against the poor man, I desire to state that in the great Northwest—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and all those States—not a single distiller can be found in all that country who manufactures less than five hundred gallons a day.

Mr. WEBSTER. Then, Mr. Chairman, if this amendment will not affect all the gentleman's constituents and the people of the great Northwest, it strikes me as very unjust for him to ask that it shall be imposed upon my people, discriminating against the interest of my section of the country; for, as I have remarked, the manufacturers in my section are small manufacturers. In thus striking a blow at one of the interests of my people, while favoring unduly the interests of his people, the amendment appears still more unjust. Such sectional legislation should not be countenanced.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman will understand me as meaning the legitimate manufacturers, those who regularly pay the internal revenue tax.

Mr. WEBSTER. It is the business of the assistant assessors of internal revenue in every county of the United States to make proper inquiries and investigations; and if they discharge their duties, they can discover any effort to evade the law; they can ascertain where all these small manufacturers carry on their business. I maintain that it is unjust to punish, by an enactment of this kind, the small manufacturers, because there are in the country dishonest men who endeavor to evade the law.

I hope, therefore, that this House will adopt no such proposition as that now offered, whether the quantity be fixed at two hundred, one hundred, fifty, or twenty-five gallons. Let every man have his just chance in the manufacture of this article.

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CLAY. I renew the amendment. I hope that no such proposition will pass this House, making a discrimination against small distillers. It appears to me that it would be legislation in favor of capital against labor—the rich against the poor. In my district spirits are distilled in small quantities by the farmers, who, in many places where they have no good roads, convert their crops into spirits. I think it unjust, therefore, to prevent our citizens from following their legitimate business. If men cannot distill spirits on a small scale without cheating the Government, I do not see why the Government will not be cheated when spirits are distilled upon a large scale. But, sir, there is nothing in that argument. You cannot distill spirits without using a great deal of wood. The grain is required to be ground, and for that purpose it must be taken to the mill. It seems to me impossible to distill even in cellars or out-houses without it being discovered. You cannot carry on a distillery without the whole neighborhood knowing it.

I hope, sir, that no discrimination will be made in favor of large distilleries and men of capital at the expense of the farming interest. It is a legitimate business in my district, and the best spirits are made by those who only distill in small quantities. I hope that the amendment will not pass.

Mr. A. MYERS. I presume that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is misunderstood. I think that the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Maryland have misunderstood it. The gentleman from Illinois means that all distilleries making less than five hundred gallons shall go on without paying any license at all, and in that view of the case I think it will suit the gentlemen.

Mr. MALLORY. The law provides that no man shall distill who does not procure and pay for a license.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois proposes to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will withdraw my amendment, proposing to offer it at another place in a modified form, so as to suit the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to add the following:

Provided further, That no person between the ages of twenty and forty-five, who is not enrolled for military duty, or regularly exempted from enrollment, shall be entitled to a license as a peddler.

Mr. Chairman, I will explain in one word what is the object sought to be accomplished by that amendment. Now, in the midst of this war, a great number of persons, and especially foreigners not liable to the performance of military duty, who take care not to be naturalized by making a declaration of intention to become citizens so as to subject them to the laws requiring military duty, go through the country as peddlers. While I would permit the women and the aged who were not liable to enrollment, persons who by sex or age are exempted from the performance of military duty or enrollment for that purpose to carry on the business, I desire to declare by law that all foreigners and others between the ages of twenty and forty-five shall not hawk any goods throughout the country unless they can show that they are regularly enrolled, or have been regularly exempted.

Mr. MORRILL. I see no objection to that amendment.

Mr. GANSON. This is a revenue bill, and will it not diminish the revenue?

Mr. SCHENCK. I think not. It allows the women and the aged to take up the business.

Mr. GANSON. It ought to be in a military bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is in the right place here. It does not prevent any person availing himself of this as a means of livelihood who has been regularly enrolled and who is waiting for a draft, or who has been regularly exempted.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by inserting in line two hundred and thirty-four, page 10, after the word "commission," the following:

And no one shall be licensed to distill spirits unless the assessor is satisfied that the person applying for the license has the necessary apparatus for distilling not less than fifty gallons daily.

By this amendment I believe I have avoided the objections made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] and by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WEBSTER.] The parties are not required by this proposed amendment to manufacture fifty gallons a day, or even one gallon; but the assessor shall not issue them a license unless they have an establishment or apparatus by which they could make fifty gallons a day, though they need not manufacture that amount unless they choose.

Mr. GANSON. What is the object?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is it the object of this amendment to require that a party desiring to distill spirits shall have an apparatus that is unsuitable to the quantity he is able to distill?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; that is not the object. I imagine that there is no one who desires to manufacture whisky or high wines in any of these forms who does not, if he intends to carry on a legitimate business, require an apparatus by which he could manufacture fifty gallons a day. My object is to protect the legitimate manufacture against a contraband article; and to that end I propose that a man who desires to manufacture so small a quantity as fifty gallons a day shall have an apparatus which shall necessarily be patent to the inspector; so large that the inspector cannot fail to know that he carries on the business. If this amendment is not adopted, any person may take out a license allowing him to manufacture, without limiting the capacity of the establishment by which the business is to be carried on, and he may hide his apparatus in a cellar or a garret, and there secretly manufacture a half barrel or a barrel a day. He can do so secretly that his place of manufacture is not known and cannot be known by the inspector or the assessor; and although such party may pay the small license of fifty dollars to the Government, he will pay no duty on the article manufactured.

Now, the object of the amendment is to require that parties shall have an apparatus that shall be capable of manufacturing fifty gallons a day at least, so that it may be open and notorious to the officers of the Government. In short, it is to protect the legitimate manufacture against contraband competition.

Mr. MORRILL. I have listened attentively to the gentleman from Illinois, being desirous to ascertain whether his proposition would really be of any benefit to the Government, and I certainly have not been able to see that it would give any additional security, but think it would rather withdraw that security which we already have. How it is the gentleman proposes to collect any more tax from a party engaged in this illicit manufacture, by withholding from him a license, I cannot see. The very fact that he has a license enables the officers of the Government to know that he is carrying on that kind of business, and that he must be watched. I think the gentleman's amendment rather tends to withdraw the security we have now.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois by inserting "sixty" in the place of "fifty." I move the amendment merely that I may make a remark. If I understand the amendment of the gentleman it is to confine the issuing of licenses to parties who manufacture at least fifty gallons a day. They must show to the inspector that their apparatus is capable of doing that amount of work. The gentleman argues that if you confine the issuing of licenses to distilleries of that capacity, they will have to be so large that they cannot be hid in garrets and cellars, but will be open to the view of the inspectors. If you adopt the amendment of the gentleman see what a strait you reduce men to. If a man wants to manufacture less than fifty gallons a day, he will get out a license, if he is permitted to do so and he is an honest man. Why not let him do it? The gentleman says that if the party happens to be a rogue he would conceal his apparatus, and therefore no man should have the privilege allowed him of manufacturing a smaller amount than fifty gallons daily. Why, you tempt honest men to become dishonest. If you do not allow men to have a license, you tempt them to get machinery and manufacture secretly. You bring this temptation to bear upon that class of men in the country who, perhaps more than anybody else, need the profits of distilling this article; men who have not the capital to engage in the business largely, even to the extent of fifty gallons a day. And let me tell the gentleman that the apparatus that would be suitable to produce fifty gallons a day would not be required, perhaps, to produce the eight, ten, or twenty gallons that one of these manufacturers might desire to produce in a day. It seems to me that the whole effect of the gentleman's proposition is to encourage and promote frauds, to promote the non-payment of revenue to the Government of the United States, to promote dishonesty; and for that reason I hope it will not prevail. I now withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew the amendment to the amendment in order that I may say that this appears to be an attempt to legislate in favor of the capitalists and heavy distillers as against the men of small means and capital engaged in this business. I suppose the idea comes from the British system of restrictions upon little distilleries hid away among the hills to escape the excise duty, and as far as that is its object, there seems to be reason in the amendment; but that reason is, I think, overborne by the objection that in this country, where every man, great or small, is struggling to get on in the world, we put the restriction on men of small means for the benefit of large distillers, like the distillers of Peoria county, Illinois, or of Montgomery county, Ohio, in which I live; for I believe that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] and myself have the distinction, good or bad as it may be, of representing about as much of this business as any gentleman on this floor.

A MEMBER. And of using the product, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not speak of that; but since the gentleman speaks of using the article, it reminds me of another argument; this is a discrimination against good whisky, for the best of whisky is made in these copper stills by distillers of small means up in the mountains of Pennsylvania and elsewhere, and it is proposed to legislate against them and throw the whole business into the hands of those who in the gentleman's district and mine make this liquid upon a large scale but of inferior quality. It only suggests, to me, therefore, another reason for opposing this amendment. If we must have liquor let it be good, for I believe, bad as drinking may be, that more persons are injured by the bad quality of the liquor than they are by the quantity. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. INGERSOLL's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. COLE, of California. I move to amend the clause by adding to it the following proviso:

Provided, That when the amount distilled by any one person or firm shall be less than five hundred gallons per annum no license shall be required.

Mr. Chairman, all the vintners in the country are in the habit of manufacturing small quantities of brandy out of the lees and sediment that result from the fermentation of the grapes. The quantity they manufacture is but small, and is generally used for the purpose of perfecting the wine afterwards. They run the still only for a few days in each year, or perhaps for a week or two, and do it only for the purpose of working up this refuse matter. But if there is a license required, they will of course be unable to use up this substance, and it will be so much loss.

It is for the purpose of meeting such cases that I have introduced this amendment. Some of my constituents have written to me upon the subject, and have presented very forcible reasons why the amendment should be adopted. I believe that it would result advantageously to the revenue, because the brandy so manufactured will pay the twenty-five cents a gallon already provided for by law, whereas if the amendment is not adopted there will be so much absolute loss, both to the persons who make the wine and brandy and to the revenue.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the amendment will not prevail. The provisions of the present law are very favorable to these manufacturers of grape brandy and peach brandy and apple brandy. Only twenty-five cents a gallon is imposed on it; and if the amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means be adopted, the duty will be but fifty cents a gallon. The amount of profit on a single barrel will pay for the license.

Mr. COLE, of California. The gentleman misunderstands me; I do not propose to take off the excise duty, but only the license for making brandy.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting five hundred and one gallons instead of five hundred. I do so for the purpose of giving my support to the gentleman from California in the motion he has made. I think it evidently a just one. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] suggested that the producer of peach and apple brandy is now protected by having the product taxed less than whisky is taxed.

Mr. MORRILL. I alluded to the duty imposed on foreign brandy, not to anything else.

Mr. MALLORY. The business proposed to be protected by the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. COLE] is a limited one. Whisky is not produced to a large extent or by many persons in quantities less than five hundred gallons a year, but apple, peach, and grape brandy is. Farmers who have a surplus crop of peaches and apples, convert them into brandy, which is very much esteemed in some regions of the country. If this fruit were not converted into brandy it would be wasted and lost. It may be asked why it should be taxed less than whisky. For the reason that the slop produced from corn and rye used in distillation yields a large profit to the distiller; but the residue from peaches and apples used in distillation is good for nothing, is a dead loss. The difference between the profit made by the manufacturer of whisky and the manufacturer of peach and apple brandy is greater than the difference of duty proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means. I propose, at the proper time, to offer an amendment reducing the duty on peach and apple brandy. I am reminded that the time is past; that that clause was acted upon while I was unfortunately absent. But on some occasion, before the bill is reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I will ask the committee to go back to that section and act upon it. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from California will prevail. I see no reason in the world why it should not. The tax imposed on the product of this distillation will be permitted to stand; and all that the gentleman proposes is to relieve these manufacturers from the necessity of taking out a license. I think that to that extent they ought to be relieved.

Mr. MORRILL. I trust the amendment of the gentleman from California and the amendment to it offered by the gentleman from Kentucky will be voted down. If we intend to have any control at all of these distillers I think it very important to require all of them to take out a license. It will be utterly impossible to keep track of these men unless they are compelled to take out a license. If we do not we will allow small distilleries to spring up all over the country. Any man who will manufacture less than a certain amount would be permitted to have a distillery without paying license. I am sure that that is a condition of things which we ought by all means to avoid.

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw my amendment, and move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from California by inserting five hundred and two gallons. I do this for the purpose of suggesting to the gentleman from California, in order to meet the objection of the gentleman from Vermont to his proposition, to reduce the license required of those who will make not exceeding five hundred gallons a year to fifty cents. That will insure the safety proposed to be secured by the gentleman from Vermont in requiring every distiller to take out a license; while it will relieve the small producer from paying a large license which is burdensome to him.

Mr. COLE, of California. I rise to offer an amendment to the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to the amendment already pending. No other amendment is in order.

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from California allow me to suggest that the annoyance of taking out a license, where a farmer manufactures currant wine, or where, as in California, he manufactures wine from grapes, is even greater than the amount to be paid; and I hope that the gentleman will insist upon his amendment as he offered it.

Mr. COLE, of California. I was going to propose that, in order to obviate the objection raised by the gentleman representing the Committee of Ways and Means, we specify brandies made from grapes, apples, peaches, currants, &c.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from California to the fact that, under the present law, persons who distill less than three hundred barrels a year pay only one half of the regular license. Those who distill apples, grapes, and peaches are required to pay a license of only $12 50. This is the provision of the existing law. I do not see the necessity for any amendment in that respect. I trust, therefore, that either the gentleman will withdraw his amendment or that it will be voted down.

Mr. COLE, of California. As has been well said by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BROWN,] the annoyance and trouble of procuring a license is a matter of more consideration than the cost of it. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to call the attention of the committee to the phraseology of the amendment adopted a short time ago with respect to peddlers. I find, on examination, that it will bear the construction which was objected to by some members at the time when it was offered; in other words, it would exclude women from the pursuit of the business of peddling. I move to amend that portion of the bill by substituting "man" for "person," and by inserting, after "draft," the words "for physical disability." The clause will then read thus:

That no man between the ages of twenty and forty-five, who is not enrolled for military duty or regularly exempted from enrollment or draft for physical disability, shall be entitled to a license as a peddler.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRUYN. I observe, Mr. Chairman, that it is proposed in this bill to amend the law of last year so as to provide that "miners shall pay for each and every license the sum of ten dollars." I move to strike out the words "ten dollars," in order that I may present to this committee some general considerations which, in my view, should govern them in their action on this bill.

Taking the bill as a whole, it proposes to increase the taxation of the country very considerably. Now, sir, in view of the very heavy municipal and State taxes which are pressing upon every portion of the country, I think that the taxes to be paid under the legislation of Congress should not be increased, unless such increase be imperatively necessary in reference to some well-established financial system of the country.

Now, the great element in a public debt—that which makes it command the confidence of the country and the world—is the fact that full, sufficient, and certain means, pointed out by law, are resorted to for the purpose of securing a fund for the punctual payment of the interest on that debt. What is our position in this respect? I had intended, when a suitable occasion should occur, to elaborate this subject more fully than I can do now. At the present time I can only call the attention of the committee to the very important consideration which lies at the bottom of the legislation which is now proposed.

The present expenditures of our Government for ordinary purposes are about one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five million dollars a year. They were formerly seventy or eighty million. The amount of interest paid last year on the public debt was something over seventy million dollars. During the coming year it may perhaps be one hundred and twenty-five million. Now, make these two allowances, which are both very large and very liberal, and you have an aggregate of about two hundred and fifty million dollars; it probably will not quite equal that. Now, as I understand it, our gross income is about four hundred million per year. In other words, we are not only raising enough to carry on the Government and to pay the whole interest on the public debt, but, in the present position of our public affairs, when the bounty system and other systems are bearing so heavily upon the country, we propose to raise from one hundred to two hundred million dollars per year—perhaps fully two hundred million, if this bill fulfills the expectations of its authors—toward the payment of the principal of that debt.

Well, now, if heavy taxes in municipalities and States were removed, this might be very well. But we have a debt upon us which we have to look in the face as a debt which is to exist for generations; and the object we should now have in view is to systematize that debt, to place it in a position in which the world will have confidence in it. And so long as we legislate to raise money to pay the interest on that debt, which will be certain, which will be secure, as much so as legislation can make it, we give that debt the very highest character we can give to it. Will we go beyond that at this time? Will we ask the country to add still more to these burdens until we get to a condition in which the debts of municipalities and States will press less heavily than now?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRUYN. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not in order, under the order of the House.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRUYN.] That gentleman is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I have been surprised ever since the commencement of the session at what I understand to be the views of the Committee of Ways and Means upon taxation and currency. I have been surprised at their reluctance to bring in a bill which should tax the people of the country as I believe, and as I think I know, they want to be taxed.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. ALLEY. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. How has the gentleman ascertained that the Committee of Ways and Means have been reluctant to bring in a bill which shall tax the people for the necessities of the country?

Mr. ALLEY. I have the evidence from conversation with members of the committee, and from what is generally understood to be their views, that they have been unwilling to meet what we believe to be the views of the country. I have had letters from correspondents in various parts of the country.

Mr. STEVENS. What are the views of the country? How much does the country wish to be taxed at present? What is the amount that they wish to be taxed?

Mr. ALLEY. I do not know that they have any definite idea about the particular amount, but there is an opinion in the country that there is a great holding back on the part of Congress; and I heard a distinguished gentleman largely interested in protecting the interests of the Government remark the other day, there seemed to be a determination on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means to hold back on this question, and there was a determination also on the part of Congress to hold back, but not so great as on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means, and no disposition, so far as he had discovered, on the part of either to meet fully the wishes and desires of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is my opinion of the sentiment of the country: I believe that if there is anything the people desire more than another, it is that our taxes should be increased to such a degree that the credit of the country should be preserved and protected. It is the only way in which it can effectually be done. The people of the country feel that, and they feel it intensely. Letters are pouring into me, and I know also to many other members of Congress, in both Houses, begging and praying us to impose such additional taxes as will place the credit of the Government beyond question. And I have yet to see such a disposition on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means, or of Congress either, to do it to the extent which the people of the country desire.

I was much surprised to hear the gentleman from New York assert that it was exceedingly desirable and even indispensably necessary to provide for the interest on this great debt, but not to go beyond this point in the imposition of heavy taxes. He talked against raising these additional taxes to pay off the debt. Who ever dreamed of our paying any portion of it during the existence of this war? Are we not and must we not be getting unavoidably in debt, with the most stringent taxation, several hundred millions annually? [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment I made, and move to insert "five." I was about to say when the hammer fell before, with regard to taxation in the State of New York, that I believe I may venture to say this in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts: that if the whole real estate of the State of New York at this time—except, perhaps, the farms occupied by the owners, and I do not know that I might not include them—I say at this time, and I believe it is based upon sound data, I believe the whole income of the State of New York will not pay the charges and taxes upon it.

Now, sir, this may be a startling assertion. I have not time to go into details, but if any gentleman will sit down with me at any time, I will show him the facts and figures which lead me to this conclusion.

In regard to the Committee of Ways and Means, I am placed in that situation toward them that I may venture to say that which otherwise it would not perhaps be quite proper for me to state. I was placed on that committee in the early part of this session, but I was called away on one or two occasions, so that I have not been with them quite as much as I hoped to be. But I can bear this testimony to their labors, and especially the labors of the sub-committee (of which I was not a member) who prepared this bill: that they have been most earnest, zealous, and industrious. Without prejudice to the claim put forth yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCIENCK], who claimed that he had been the most industrious man in this House, I think I could point to three members of the Committee of Ways and Means, and perhaps to more, who can say even more than that gentleman could, or rather the same thing, and with more justice; because the Committee of Ways and Means have been in session, I believe, every day of this session, while the committee of which the gentleman from Ohio is chairman has only held daily sessions for two or three weeks.

Now, sir, that committee has brought forward this bill at as early a day as they could bring it forward with the views and spirit which animated them; and with the intention of imposing a tax on the country which should meet the expectations of those whose opinions were expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY.] But I want the House and the country to understand what the principle is which lies at the bottom of this bill, and have them determine whether, under the circumstances, we should go on and raise more than the annual expenses of the Government, and apply two or three hundred millions to sinking the national debt.

There are other general views which I would like to present to the committee in relation to our public debt and the system on which it should be managed. But the present time is not, perhaps, the time to do it; and at any rate, the five-minute rule would prohibit me from going into that subject. But I hope the House—and that was my principal object in rising—in passing upon the increase of taxation proposed in this bill, will bear in view the general considerations I have mentioned. I am not familiar enough with details to know whether these propositions are adjusted as they should be; but if they are not, adjust them as they should be. The object of increasing the taxation as indicated in the bill is, in my opinion, to a very great extent not needed in the present condition of the country, and is not justified under the circumstances in which we are placed with reference to the great debts of our municipalities and States.

Mr. STEVENS. I am opposed to the motion to strike out. I am somewhat astonished at the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEY.] The object of his remarks, or at least the tendency of them is, to bring the Committee of Ways and Means into odium with the House and the country. Now, sir, I claim nothing for myself particularly eminent upon the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ALLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEY. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania understood me as casting any imputation upon the integrity or the industry of the Committee of Ways and Means, he greatly misapprehended the scope and purposes of my remarks. I concur fully with the remarks of the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] upon that point. I know that their labors have been very arduous, and that they have exerted themselves to the utmost in preparing this and other measures which have emanated from that committee. I believe, with the gentleman from New York, that no committee of this House does as much work as the Committee of Ways and Means; and I did not intend to apply my remarks to any member of that committee.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not suppose the gentleman intended anything in particular, when he made his statement; but his remarks tended toward bringing the Committee of Ways and Means into disrespect with the House and the country.

Now, sir, he misstated when he said the committee were believed to be reluctant to raise by taxation sufficient to meet the exigencies of the Government. Who made that statement I know not. I do not believe the man exists who talked with a member of the committee and received a reply to that effect. The committee have tried to raise as much money as the exigencies of the country required, and in the best way they could. This committee seemed to think that we are too exacting, and have just struck out three millions of proposed revenue by refusing to increase the tax on beer half a dollar a barrel.

As to the industry of the Committee of Ways and Means I have little to say. I may say, however, that every day since the session commenced that committee has been in session from ten or half past ten o'clock in the morning until the House met. And not only that, but it has been in session on exempt days. On Saturdays when this House has adjourned over, we have uniformly met and worked. It may be, sir, I know that we are slow workers and cannot do what we are attempting to do. Of course the gentleman's impeachment of us is only an impeachment of our capacity, about which I say nothing. So far as I am concerned I feel humbled in the presence of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, [laughter,] which committee no doubt meets once or twice a month and does its business well.

Sir, what is expected of the Committee of Ways and Means? What burdens does the gentleman from Massachusetts expect it to put on the people? I contend that if we provide for the ways and means to liquidate the interest on the public debt fully, leaving the principal for a future time, we establish public confidence; for all that the bondholders want is their interest. If the bill before us shall be executed as it ought to be, it will produce more than four times the interest of our present debt. Gentlemen have not looked into it, I fear. They know less about it than we do. No one except the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEY] has examined it; but I assure you, sir, that the avails of this bill will pay the interest on the present public debt and will leave $300,000,000 to be applied to our current expenses, if the law be properly executed. That is a sufficient portion of the expenses of the war for the people to bear now. I have found nobody who did not consider himself sufficiently taxed except the gentleman from Massachusetts. I know that a good many of our manufacturers, in order to evade the tax which they pay at home, have latterly built establishments and had tanneries in Canada, and in that way lightened their taxes. A large quantity of leather is thus manufactured in Canada, and finds its way here under the reciprocity treaty. When we come to the income tax, I propose to increase the present rate on all incomes above $2,000 to fifty per cent. [Laughter.] Will that gratify the gentleman from Massachusetts? Will the country demand more than that? If it does, I, for one, cannot stand it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRUYN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend the forty-ninth paragraph by striking out the word "minerals" and inserting the word "metals," so that it will read, that "every person, firm, or company who shall employ others in the business of mining for coal, or for gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, zinc, spelter, or other metals, shall be regarded as a miner." I doubt very much the expediency of adopting the paragraph as it now stands. I think it will be found very difficult to execute it. To the miners of iron in my region of country the payment of ten dollars for a license is nothing at all. They have large blast furnaces, and many of them have a capital of nearly half a million dollars, employing perhaps two or three hundred men. Under this paragraph they will only have to pay ten dollars. But there is another class of men to be affected by it—men who have only a little iron mine, and who may, perhaps, have an assistant to help them in their little work. They will have to pay the same license fee for the privilege as these miners on a larger scale.

There are three classes of mining interests in my district, of which I intend to speak more particularly. Coal mining there is of the same character. Some of the coal-mining companies have their half million dollars invested. What is a license of ten dollars to them? So, too, with the zinc mining. The business is of the same class. But if we let this paragraph stand as it now is, and leave it to be construed by the assessor, there will be found a difficulty in its construction; for, in point of fact, limestone is a mineral, and that is mined by every farmer in the country. It may not be mined by his own hand. He may employ, and he does generally employ, somebody to assist him in it. He would, therefore, be required to pay ten dollars for his license. I do not think that it is the intention of this committee to require a man who mines limestone, and who burns it on his farm for the purpose of manure, to pay ten dollars for a license. And yet, not straining the construction of this section, it would require him to do so. But by striking out the word "minerals" and inserting in lieu of it the word "metals," we leave it as I think the committee intend it should be left—a license on those who mine coal and metals; and we relieve the section from any danger of an improper construction as to the mining of limestone and other materials of that character.

Mr. McBRIDE. If I correctly understand this section, I have no objection to it. We have imposed a license upon almost every trade and business which employs capital in the country, and I therefore do not think that this should be made an exception. A fair distribution of the burdens of taxation is all that we ask, and the tax imposed by this section seems to me reasonable and fair. It does not apply to the laborer in the mines, but to the employer only, who, being a man of capital, engages in mining as a speculation for his capital; and as it is thus withdrawn from other business and trade, it is but just that it should be subjected to this equal and fair tax. Many of my constituents are engaged in mining for a product, to increase which it is alike the interest of the nation and the producer; still they do not, as has been freely and often charged upon them from this floor, seek to shun their fair share of the burdens of taxation. They will accept it willingly and submit to it without a murmur.

The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I do not care about pressing my amendment, if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is opposed to it.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the effect of the gentleman's amendment would be more extensive than he thinks. Take, for instance, the State of Maine: there they are very largely engaged in working limestone; and the gentleman's amendment would exempt all of those who are thus engaged.

The question was taken on Mr. JOHNSON's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend the forty-ninth paragraph by striking out the word "every" and inserting the words "of such;" so that it will read, "only such person, firm, or company as shall employ others in the business of mining," &c. It seems to me that the construction which would be naturally given to this section as it now stands, without the amendment which I propose, would be that all persons operating in mining should pay a license of ten dollars each. I desire that the section shall be amended so that no such construction can be given to it, so that no license duty shall be imposed upon operatives who work by the day, or who work for a compensation, or upon a man who is prospecting. I wish to exempt all such from the payment of license.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is at all necessary. The language here is plain and explicit. The definition of a miner is that he must be a person who employs others. Can there be anything more explicit than that? If a man only works with his own hands he is, of course, exempt. No one is to be taxed or licensed unless he employs others. There can be no difficulty about that.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COBB. I move to amend the forty-ninth paragraph by inserting between the word "others" and the word "in" the words "two or more," so that it will read:

49. Miners shall pay for each and every license the sum of ten dollars. Every person, firm, or company, who shall employ others, two or more, in the business of mining for coal, or for gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, zinc, spelter, or other minerals, not having taken out a license as a manufacturer, shall be regarded as a miner under this act.

I offer this amendment for the purpose of curing what seems to me to be an uncertainty and ambiguity in the meaning of the section. If it is proposed to tax those persons who engage in the business of mining by means of hired help I have no objection to it. In the district which I have the honor to represent lead mining is carried on extensively.

Mr. SHANNON. My colleague [Mr. HIGBY] has prepared an amendment which I think will accomplish the desired object and obviate all objection.

Mr. COBB. I shall be glad to hear the amendment.

Mr. HIGBY. I desire to offer an amendment which I think will not interfere with any object sought to be accomplished by the Committee of Ways and Means. I propose to strike out the words "miners shall pay for each and every license the sum of ten dollars," and to add after the word "act," in the two hundred and forty-second line the words, "and every such person, firm, or company, shall take out a license and pay the sum of ten dollars therefor." The section will then read thus:

Every person, firm, or company, who shall employ others in the business of mining for coal, or for gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, zinc, spelter, or other minerals, not having taken out a license as a manufacturer, shall be regarded as a miner under this act; and every such person, firm, or company, shall take out a license and pay the sum of ten dollars therefor.

This amendment, I think, will obviate all difficulty as to the construction of the language.

Mr. COBB. With all due deference to the gentleman, I must say that I do not think it will. In the lead-mining business, where it is carried on upon a small scale, it is generally the case that not more than two persons work together. Frequently a man has a very small mine, and cannot afford to hire more than one person to assist him. This assistant is called a windlassman, being employed to draw the dirt and mineral away. A person carrying on this kind of business with one assistant ought not to be required to pay a license any more than the farmer.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman will allow me to call his attention to the fact that a party must employ at least two persons in order to come within the provisions of this section. The language is plural. It reads "every person, firm, or company, who shall employ others."

Mr. COBB. If that is the intention, I think that my amendment will obviate a possible ambiguity.

Mr. McBRIDE. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen who have been criticising the language of this section to the fact that, according to the uniform method in which the bill is drawn, the class is first designated, with the amount of license, and then immediately following is a description of the persons included in that particular class. In this view of the matter I think the section should be adopted in its present form.

The amendment of Mr. COBB was rejected.

Mr. HIGBY. I now move the amendment which I have already indicated—to strike out the words, "miners shall pay for each and every license the sum of ten dollars," and to add after the word "act" in the two hundred and forty-seventh line, the words "and every such person, firm, or company, shall take a license, and pay the sum of ten dollars therefor."

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think that the adoption of this amendment would violate that uniformity of language which is desirable in our legislation. It will be observed that throughout these various sections the first sentence contains a statement of what the rule of law shall be, and the latter part describes the persons to whom the law shall apply. There has been one uniform interpretation of this language in the Department and in the courts, and I think that the safest course is not to depart from it unnecessarily.

Mr. HIGBY. As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is better acquainted with this subject than I am, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BENNET. I wish to say that the latter part of this section includes a class of persons who are not defined to be miners. The first part of the section refers to miners—a class of individuals who are known and recognized as persons who delve in mines. The second clause of the section includes a class of persons who do not delve in mines, but who employ others to do so. It brings in a different class from the first class. I believe that the construction of this section will be that it not only includes all persons delving in mines, but that it includes and designates as miners those who employ others to delve in mines. It taxes not only those who delve in the mines but the employer also. I think that the amendment of my friend from Illinois on my left is necessary and proper to cover the difficulty in this case.

Mr. HIGBY. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I renew the amendment of the gentleman from California for the purpose of making a remark in reply to the observations of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS:] not to the line of his argument, but to the mean insinuations he made against me personally in reference to my action in this House concerning these revenue bills.

In the first place he spoke of my being influenced by my interests in relation to the tax upon leather and other materials in which I was supposed to be interested. I think if there is any gentleman upon this floor who is free from that charge, completely and entirely, it is myself; and I think that the gentleman's associate on that committee who has immediate charge of this bill will bear me witness that I have always in every instance advocated the largest tax on every article which I manufactured, or in which I have the slightest interest.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania also remarked that the people in Canada would like to have heavy taxes because they were interested in protecting manufacturing there, and because they were interested in the manufacture of leather, &c. If there was any point in that remark, he must have referred to me as being interested in manufacturing in Canada, and the House so understood him. I will state to that gentleman and to the House that I have no manufacturing interest in Canada. I have no interest in any property there, directly or indirectly, of any kind. I suppose that that is a sufficient answer to that baseless insinuation.

The gentleman asked me whether I would like to have the income tax raised fifty per cent. I have only to say that there has never been any income tax proposed in the House that I have not invariably voted for, (even for the largest amount,) from the very beginning. And I think that that is a sufficient answer to the gentleman's inquiry upon that point.

I made no unworthy imputation upon the gentleman's committee. I merely meant to say that the Committee of Ways and Means differ, I believe, from this House, and in a much greater degree with the country, in their judgment as to the best mode of protecting and preserving the credit of the Government. And this difference, in my opinion, was a serious calamity to the country.

Mr. SHANNON. As there seems to be some difference of opinion in reference to the construction of this paragraph, I move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is pending.

Mr. ALLEY. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SHANNON. I move, in line forty-two, before the word "shall," to insert the words "and no others," so that it will read:

49. Miners shall pay for each and every license the sum of ten dollars. Every person, firm, or company, who shall employ others in the business of mining for coal, or for gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, zinc, spelter, or other minerals, not having taken out a license as a manufacturer, and no others, shall be regarded as a miner under this act.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to the amendment, but I do not think that it is necessary. There are none who are required to pay a license unless they come within the specific prescription. All others are exempted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I propose now, if the gentleman from Vermont will give me his attention, to strike out these words, "miners shall pay for each and every license the sum of ten dollars," and also the words "who shall," and inserting in lieu of them "whose business it shall be," so that it will read, "every person, firm, or company whose business it shall be, &c., shall pay for each and every license the sum of ten dollars."

The paragraph as it is now makes every miner pay a license of ten dollars, as well as those who employ miners.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think that the paragraph can be more explicit than it is.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. UPSON. I move to strike out the following:

26. Conveyancers shall pay ten dollars for each license. Every person, other than one holding a license as a lawyer or claim agent, whose business it is to draw deeds, bonds, mortgages, wills, writs, or other legal papers, or to examine titles to real estate, shall be regarded a conveyancer under this act.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Conveyancers shall pay ten dollars for each license. Every person, other than one holding a license as a lawyer or claim agent, who shall draw deeds, bonds, mortgages, wills, writs, or other legal papers for others, or whose business it is to examine titles to real estate, shall be regarded as conveyancers under this act.

I move this amendment for the reason that in many parts of the country the provision of the law as it now stands is held as not applicable to a large class of persons who, as magistrates, justices of the peace, and notaries public, draw deeds for others without charge and without taking out a license, but who, after drawing them, take their acknowledgments by virtue of their respective offices, and receive the fees allowed by law for such services. Such I know to be the practice in some parts of the West, and yet they are not held to be conveyancers under the act. I therefore call the attention of the committee to the subject, that they may make the law effectual for the accomplishment of the end in view, namely, the obtaining of revenue from the class of men who do this kind of business for others. I will say that this amendment would allow a man to draw deeds for himself of his own property.

Mr. FRANK. I would have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan if it applied to those who draw deeds for a compensation. But if I understand the amendment, it would compel a man who draws simply one deed for another without compensation, to take out a license and pay ten dollars for the same. There are little towns all over the country where there are no lawyers to draw deeds and conveyances at all. If this amendment could be modified so as to include only those who draw deeds for a compensation, I would not object to it. I move to amend by inserting the words "for a compensation."

Mr. UPSON. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York does away with the whole object of the original amendment. Those individuals who do the business of conveyancing claim that they do not charge for drawing the instrument, but only for taking the acknowledgment, and that therefore they do not come within the provision of the law which requires them to take out a license. They draw the papers simply as a preliminary to taking the acknowledgment for which they charge the legal fee. They claim that they do not come within the purview of the act. It is to meet that particular class of cases that I drew up this amendment, and also to meet the decision of the assessors in different parts of the country, that where men do this work without pay they are not required to take out a license.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I propose to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon that.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Then I move to amend it by striking out the last line, in order to allow me to make the remarks I desire. I believe the law is well enough as it is. The proposition of the gentleman from Michigan is to require every man who writes a deed for another to take out a license, or to make every man who writes a deed for another a notary public, and then require the notary to take out a license, which is the same thing in another form. Now, if I sell a piece of land to another and write a deed for it, I write a deed for another, though the object is to convey my own title. So, if I should be in extremis, and should write my last will and testament, I make it for the benefit of others; and then I might have the assessor after me for ten dollars just as I was taking my exit from the world. [Laughter.] So it seems to me that the distinction implied in the words "those who shall do it for others," amounts to nothing. It certainly would be a very strict construction of the law to say that no man should write the will of another unless he took out a license as a notary public. It is not always convenient to get a notary to write a man's will.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, in relation to this matter there may be some difficulty like that complained of by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. Urson,] but the Committee of Ways and Means have heard more complaint in another direction, and that is, that in towns where there are no lawyers, and no one licensed under the act to draw these papers, the town clerk, who does a small amount of business, is frequently called upon to do this work, and he is required to take out a license, when perhaps he draws but one or two deeds in the course of a year. Under the circumstances I think the law as it is as well as it can be made, and therefore I hope it will not be amended at all.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. We have no town clerks with us. If we have a town clerk he is only a pound-keeper. Suppose a man should be injured on the road and is likely to die, are we to have no one to draw his will? Sir, the old definition of a notary is a man who follows the business of writing these things, and he ought to pay a license; but the man who writes here and there a single deed or will ought not to be required to pay a license. Let the old definition of a notary public stand.

Mr. FRANK. I am perfectly willing that the law shall remain as it is without amendment, and I moved the amendment to the amendment for that purpose.

Mr. Urson's amendment was rejected.

Mr. FINCK. I move to add to the clause the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to persons who mine coal solely for their own consumption.

Mr. Chairman, I do not suppose that it was the purpose of the Committee of Ways and Means to tax the class of persons that I propose to exempt. There are persons who own coal lands, situate at some distance from market, who mine coal exclusively for their own use, and it would be unjust to tax them. I trust, therefore, that my amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman from Ohio will see that his amendment is objectionable in this respect, that it would exempt from license tax persons whose business it is to mine coal which they themselves consume in some branch of manufacturing which they carry on. A person who mines coal merely for ordinary domestic uses will be exempt under the article as proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, upon principles which have been recognized in the Office of Internal Revenue from the beginning, such as this: peddlers are subject to a license tax; but a farmer who peddles his own produce has from the beginning been exempted, on the ground that it is not his business to peddle, but that that is an incident to his business of farming. So the mining of coal for domestic use is not under the law a business, but an incident to the domestic necessities of the household. But a person who mines coal for the purpose of manufacturing iron, for example, or manufacturing salt, should be subject to a license duty as a producer under this section, and therefore the law is well enough, in my judgment, in the language proposed by the committee.

Mr. FINCK. I will modify my amendment by inserting before the word "consumption" the word "domestic."

Mr. BOUTWELL. The amendment is unnecessary. It is exempt already.

Mr. FINCK's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to strike out the word "ten," in line two hundred and forty-three, and to insert "twenty" in lieu thereof; so that the clause will read:

50. A license of twenty dollars shall be required of every person, firm, or company, engaged in the carrying or delivery of money, valuable papers, or any articles for pay, or doing an express business, whose gross receipts therefrom exceed the sum of $600 per annum.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope that amendment will not prevail. We tax express men, as we do manufacturers and various others, on their gross receipts in addition to this ten dollars for a license. Ten dollars is sufficient. Many of these expresses are small concerns running, perhaps, only from a depot to an adjoining town, and their receipts are, perhaps, not more than a few hundred dollars.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Those whose receipts do not come up to $600 are not included in the section; only those whose receipts exceed $600 have to pay a license. There are few express companies in the country districts whose receipts exceed $600, but the receipts of the large companies come up to $100,000, and perhaps some of them $500,000. It seems to me that twenty dollars is a small sum to pay for a license, and we need the money. As the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means says we have lost $3,000,000 by refusing to increase the tax on beer, let us make it up by something else.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania because the amount he proposes is too small. Ten or twenty dollars to an express company seems to me to be a mere trifle. I think the Committee of Ways and Means have not levied this tax properly; it ought to be upon each office of an express company. Take, for instance, the Adams Express Company; they have offices in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and throughout the whole United States, doing a business of more than a million dollars, making great wealth and charging enormous prices. They charged me five cents a pound for carrying my trunk from this city to my home, almost the fare of a passenger. They charged me nearly as much for taking my trunk as I had to pay for myself, although I weigh almost twice as much as the trunk. [Laughter.] It seems to me that these express companies ought to be taxed for every office they keep.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania propose an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. No, sir. I do not see how I could do it very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman's remarks are out of order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I make the suggestion. I do not suppose the amendment would carry if I did propose it.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] by striking out twenty dollars and inserting fifteen dollars. I merely desire to say that the licenses provided for in the act are not mainly for the purpose of revenue. We tax these express companies now three per cent. on their gross receipts. That is intended to be the real tax on their business. But, having been accidentally omitted in the last tax bill, they are put in here. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. It is very little consolation to me, when an express company robs me of eight or ten dollars, to know that the Government has got two cents of it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from Vermont answer me one question? Where ten dollars license is paid by an express company, does that permit it to have an office in every city of the United States without the payment of any additional license?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know how that may be construed. I suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] can inform us. The question was taken on Mr. INGERSOLL's motion, and it was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I propose to amend the fiftieth paragraph by adding the words, "and where the gross receipts exceed $5,000 shall pay $100 for a license;" so that it will read:

50. A license of ten dollars shall be required of every person, firm, or company, engaged in the carrying or delivery of money, valuable papers, or any articles for pay, or doing an express business, whose gross receipts therefrom exceed the sum of $600; and where the gross receipts exceed $5,000 shall pay $100 for a license.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend the fifty-first paragraph by striking out "$100" and inserting "$500;" so that it will read:

51. Substitute brokers shall pay $500 for each and every license. Every person who shall furnish, or offer to furnish, for pay, fee, or reward, volunteers, representative recruits, or substitutes for men drafted, or liable to be drafted, for the military or naval service of the United States, shall be deemed a substitute broker under this act.

Mr. TRACY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$500" and inserting "$2,500," and by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That any person having been licensed as aforesaid, who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any greater sum than ten dollars for each and every substitute by him furnished, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $300, or imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense.

I have some doubts, Mr. Chairman, as to the propriety of dignifying this substitute business by licensing it; yet, as the proposition has been presented by the Committee of Ways and Means, it seems to me that the substitute business should be regulated. Congress has deemed it wise to regulate the business of persons engaged in procuring pensions for others. If that is wise, it seems to me that there is a greater necessity for regulating the business of substitute brokers, who are now allowed to go on and swindle the men engaged in the military service of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, in regard to this paragraph the question is reduced to a very small compass. The Committee of Ways and Means has deemed it proper, finding an existing business, to provide for a responsibility in that business, and for such revenue as may come from it. Touching the propriety of continuing the business, the Committee of Ways and Means has deemed it proper to leave all such questions to the proper committee of the House—perhaps the Military Committee—which may report a bill to prohibit it altogether. If members intend that the business shall continue, let the terms on which the license will be given be such as are consistent with its continuance. If they wish to prohibit it, the whole section should be stricken out, and the Committee on Military Affairs should report a bill prohibiting it entirely. I am satisfied that the opinion of the committee is that this tax is probably all that is consistent with the continuance of the business as such. Finding it existing as a business in the community, they have proposed the highest tax consistent with its continuance. If it is to be abolished, let an amendment striking out the section be adopted, with the understanding that the business shall be prohibited by law, a suitable bill for that purpose emanating from the proper committee. That, I understand, will meet the views of the Committee of Ways and Means.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer, pro forma, an amendment to the amendment, to make the amount of license $150.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that we have already had sufficient experience in the imposition of licenses as fines. In the case of lottery tickets, this system resulted in yielding no revenue. It is well known to all of us that the business of substitute brokerage is carried on in all parts of the country, and is extremely profitable. We propose to obtain from that business all the revenue that we think possible. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVIS] has shown to me an amendment which he intends to offer at some subsequent period, and which proposes to obtain a certain revenue upon every recruit that may be offered by a substitute broker. It would, perhaps, be proper to adopt such an amendment. But so far as the license is concerned, I believe that $100 is all that we can reasonably expect. I hope the amount will not be increased.

I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I believe that this House is ready to cooperate with the members of the Committee on Military Affairs in the passage of a measure which will sweep away almost entirely this business of substitute brokerage. I may mention that that committee have already introduced a bill on this subject, which, I believe, is next in order after the reconstruction bill. It provides that all substitutes shall be credited to the town or district in which they reside. The adoption of such a provision would, I believe, break up the business of the substitute brokers.

I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be voted down, and that I may have an opportunity to offer an amendment to strike out the whole clause; for I dislike to see upon our statute-books anything that seems to give a kind of countenance to so nefarious a business.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend by adding after the word "license," in the two hundred and forty-ninth line, the following words:

And in addition thereto, ten dollars for each substitute procured by him and actually mustered into the military service of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend the original text in line two hundred and fifty-two, after the word "drafted," to insert the words "or desiring representative recruits;" so that it will read:

51. Substitute brokers shall pay $100 for each and every license. Every person who shall furnish, or offer to furnish, for pay, fee, or reward, volunteers, representative recruits, or substitutes for men drafted, or liable to be drafted, or desiring representative recruits for the military or naval service of the United States, shall be deemed a substitute broker under this act.

Mr. Chairman, in explanation I will only say that representative recruits are not furnished by men drafted, or liable to be drafted, but by persons not liable to be drafted at all.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. NELSON. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That persons appointed in any State, county, city, and town, or the officers thereof, to procure the enlistment of volunteers or substitutes for the quota of such State, county, city, or town, for the military service of the United States, shall not be considered substitute brokers.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will include the word "district."

Mr. NELSON. I modify my amendment so as to provide for districts and townships.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say I think that the committee would act with too much haste to strike out the entire section in anticipation of the action of the Military or other Committee, and for this reason: as long as the military law allows the procurement of substitutes for personal military service, it is a great convenience to people in a corporate as well as individual capacity to permit some intermediate to make the proper negotiations for them. It concentrates the business and facilitates its transaction. As long as it is allowed to be done—the furnishing of substitutes—it is of some importance, that it should be put under proper regulations. If you strike out this provision entirely, and fail to provide for the proper military regulation of substitute brokers, you are without revenue as well as without improvement of the evils known to exist.

I ask whether it is not best that the committee should pass this clause as it now stands, and await the action of the Military Committee and the action of the House on the report of that committee as to whether the business should be entirely abolished, or regulated by proper military law covering the military aspect of the case. My own opinion is that we should allow the continuance of the business, and leave the Military Committee to regulate that business, protect the Government of the United States, the rights of substitutes, and the rights of citizens equally touching this entire subject. I think that we ought not to strike the paragraph out until we know what is the conclusion of the other committee on the subject. I think it safer to pass it as it is, and send it to the Senate, and in the mean time we will get a report from the Military Committee in reference to the proper law on the whole subject of substitute brokers.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] was adopted under a mistake, and I move, by unanimous consent, that it be stricken out.

Mr. BROOMALL. I consent to that.

There was no objection, and the amendment was stricken out.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to add the following:

And provided further, That such person or agent shall receive no compensation except such as is given by such State, county, district, city, or town.

Mr. STILES moved that the committee rise.

Mr. MORRILL. Let us get through another paragraph.

Mr. STILES. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. COBB. I move to amend by adding at the end of the fifty-first clause, line three hundred and fifty-four, the following:

Provided, That every substitute broker shall, upon conviction thereof, be confined at hard labor at the Dry Tortugas, or Rip Raps, for three years or during the war.

Mr. MORRILL. I raise a point of order upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is out of order.

The question was put upon the motion of Mr. GARFIELD to strike out; and it was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and the House received a message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, one of their clerks, announcing that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 705) for the relief of collectors and surveyors of customs in certain cases; and An act (H. R. No. 517) to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company, of Washington.

Also that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 364) entitled "An act authorizing and requiring the opening of Sixth street west," with an amendment in which they requested the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which they requested the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 167) to incorporate an insurance company in the city of Washington;

An act (S. No. 368) to incorporate the Sisters of Mercy in the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 393) to authorize the corporation of Georgetown to levy certain taxes;

An act (S. No. 421) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbia Institution for the instruction of the deaf and dumb and the blind," approved February 16, 1857; and

An act (S. No. 439) to change the name of Dorsey Edwin William Towson, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to that of Dorsey Edwin William Carter.

TAX BILL—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session; and the Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and continued it to the three hundred and sixty-fifth line, when—

Mr. MORRILL moved that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PENSION BILL.

Mr. WHALEY. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions a bill supplemental to the several acts relating to pensions, that the same may be printed and recommended to the committee, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to giving the committee any authority to report back the bill at any time.

Mr. WHALEY. This session is drawing rapidly to a close, and it is important that the pension law should be amended. I only ask that it may be reported, printed, and recommended, with the privilege to the committee to report it back at any time, so that it may become a law before the session expires.

Mr. SCHENCK. My objection goes only to the leave to report the bill back at any time. That would be equivalent to making it a special order, and I know no reason why one committee should have that privilege over another.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that this is partly a private and partly a public bill. Would there be objection to allowing it to be printed and recommended, with the privilege of reporting it back on the next private bill day?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest that it be printed and recommended.

No objection being made, the bill was received, ordered to be printed, and recommended to the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the vote by which the bill was recommended be reconsidered.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order pending a motion to adjourn. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill for the relief of the heirs of Almon D. Fisk, deceased; when the Speaker signed the same.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to.

The House accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 13, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday was dispensed with.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the report of the National Academy of Sciences for the year 1864, which was ordered to be printed; and a motion of Mr. WILSON to print five hundred additional copies for the use of the Academy was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of merchants, mechanics, and manufacturers of Baltimore, remonstrating against the passage of the bankrupt bill; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of William H. Watkins, late captain company K, Purnell legion, Maryland volunteers, asking for pay due him as such from October 25, 1864, to January 5, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of Andrew J. Wilcox, praying for certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States with a view to the settlement of our unhappy difficulties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented the memorial of the Boston Board of Trade, praying for the passage of the bill for the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented the petition of Mary Howard Schoolcraft, praying payment for services rendered by her husband in superintending the collection and publication of statistics of Indian tribes; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of indemnifying the citizens of that State who suffered loss by reason of Sterling Price's raid in that State in October, 1864, and for damages sustained by acts of our own Army; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the petition of J. W. Gordon, late major eleventh United States infantry, praying that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury may be authorized to credit him for payments of bounty to enlisted men; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented a petition of citizens of Indiana and Illinois, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Newport, Vermillion county, Indiana, to Ridge Farm, Vermillion county, Illinois; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. DIXON presented a petition of colored persons in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, praying for a charter under the name of the Colored Benevolent Association of Washington city; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of booksellers and newspaper publishers of Buffalo, New York, praying for the repeal of the import duty on chemicals, feltings, wire-cloths, and other articles used in the manufacture of paper, and also the abolition of the excise tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of merchants and citizens of the city of New York, praying for the passage of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GRIMES presented a petition of officers in the Navy praying compensation for clothing lost on board of vessels destroyed, of which they were part of the ship's complement; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HARLAN presented resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Nebraska in favor of the payment of the Nebraska militia while actually employed in the service of the Government in repelling hostile Indians and guarding the United States mail and Pacific telegraph, and protecting the border settlers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a memorial from the Boston Board of Trade, signed by their president and secretary, in which they say that they have heard with great satisfaction of the passage by the House of Representatives of a bill for the construction of a ship-canal around the falls of Niagara, and they earnestly hope the Senate will concur with the House in sanctioning and providing for this public work. I understand that bill has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I move that this memorial be referred to the same committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest, as that does not seem to be a military matter, whether it should go to that committee.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator understands there is a bill on the subject which is before the Committee on Military Affairs, and I move that this memorial be referred to the same committee.

The motion was agreed to.

STEAMSHIP LINE TO CHINA.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to postpone all prior orders and to take up the bill (S. No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China.

The motion was agreed to.

It proposes to authorize the Postmaster General to invite proposals by public advertisement, for the period of sixty days, in one or more newspapers published in the cities of Washington, New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and San Francisco, respectively, for mail steamship service between the port of San Francisco, in the United States, and some port or ports in the Chinese empire, touching at Honolulu, in the Sandwich Islands, and one or more ports in Japan, by means of a monthly line of first-class American sea-going steamships, to be of not less than two thousand tons burden each, and of sufficient number to perform twelve round trips per annum, and to contract with the lowest responsible bidder for the service for a term of not more than ten years, to commence from the day the first steamship of the proposed line shall depart from the port of San Francisco with the mails for China. No bid is to be considered which shall amount to more than $500,000 for the twelve round trips per annum, nor unless it is from a citizen or citizens of the United States, and accompanied by an offer of good and sufficient sureties (also citizens of the United States) for the faithful performance of the contract.

The second section provides that any contract which the Postmaster General may execute, under the authority of the act, shall go into effect on or before the 1st day of September, 1866, and shall, in addition to the usual stipulations of ocean mail steamship contracts, provide that the steamships accepted for the service shall be constructed of the best material and after approved models, with all the modern improvements adapted to sea-going steamships of the first class, and shall be subject to inspection and survey by an experienced naval constructor, to be detailed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Navy, whose report shall be made to the Postmaster General. The Government of the United States is to be entitled to have transported, free of expense, on each and every steamer, a mail agent, to take charge of and arrange the mail matter, to whom suitable accommodation for that purpose shall be assigned. In case of failure from any cause to perform any of the regular monthly voyages stipulated for in the contract, a pro rata deduction is to be made from the compensation on account of such omitted voyage or voyages; and suitable fines and penalties may be imposed for delays and irregularities in the performance of the service, and the Postmaster General is to determine the contract at any time in case of its being underlet or assigned to any other party.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported two amendments to the bill. The first amendment was in line twelve, section one, to strike out "two" and insert "three," so as to read, "steamships, to be of not less than three thousand tons burden."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line four of section two, to strike out "September, 1866," and insert "January, 1867," so as to read, "shall go into effect on or before the 1st day of January, 1867."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. HALE. Will somebody be so good as to state what the annual expense of this line will be?

Mr. COLLAMER. The provision of the bill is that it shall not exceed $500,000.

Mr. HALE. How much do the committee expect will be realized from postages on this line?

Mr. COLLAMER. They do not expect any very large sum at present. The contract is not to go into effect until 1867 at any rate; so that there is no present outlay. The bill merely invites proposals to set up a line of steamers of not less than three thousand tons burden, and it will take till 1867 to do it; the parties will have to build the steamers in the mean time. The amendment of the committee requires the ships to be at least three thousand tons burden, and I will state the reason for that. That is not as large as the steamers the Pacific Mail Steamship Company now have on that ocean. If small steamers are used, they will just about carry their own fuel, and their commercial capacity will amount to but a trifle, and the moment the subsidy of the Government runs out they will fall, whereas if large steamers are used so that they can carry some fifteen hundred tons of commercial burden beside their fuel, the line may, when the subsidy expires, at the end of ten years, be able to sustain itself.

A bill for this purpose was passed by the Senate three years ago by a very strong vote. It was at that time moved by Senator Latham, of California, and sustained by a very decisive vote in this body. This is a renewal of the same proposition, but on a less expensive scale. There is one part of the world which British enterprise has not yet covered with subsidized mail steamship lines, and that is the trade across the Pacific ocean. They have a line down the west coast of South America, but they have none across the ocean commanding the commerce between the continents. It is, I believe, almost the only track that is left in this world of which we can avail ourselves without competition, and unless we attend to this at once they will soon, in all probability, possess themselves of this, and American enterprise and American commerce must entirely succumb. I cannot occupy at present the attention of the Senate with the tables I have before me, showing the present commerce on the Pacific, but if gentlemen will look at them they will find them very interesting; and this commerce will be very much increased if we get our railroad made to the Pacific, and in the mean time secure some measure of communication across the Pacific ocean between the two continents, making that trade subsidiary to our enterprise and our interest. The door is now open to effect it. If we do not do it soon, we lose it forever. I do not think it worth while to take up the time of the Senate by saying anything more on the subject now.

Mr. HALE. As I read this bill, the Senator from Vermont is mistaken in saying that it does not go into immediate operation and effect. The second section, as I read it, is that any contract which the Postmaster General may execute under the authority of this act, shall go into effect on or before the 1st day of September, 1866.

Mr. COLLAMER. The contract is to take effect, but the pay is not to commence until the steamers are actually built and running on the ocean. They have got to build them, and it will take two years to build them.

Mr. HALE. Where is that provision? They may be bought and put in operation to-morrow.

Mr. COLLAMER. There are not any in America to buy. They have no other resource but to build them. There are no ocean steamers of three thousand tons burden in the country, except those of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, that run from Panama up to California.

Mr. HALE. I hate to oppose this measure, particularly as it comes from California.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator allow me, in a single word, to give him some information on the point he is now discussing?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. The object in seeking to pass this bill now is that capitalists may engage in the enterprise, and lay the keels of ships of a certain magnitude and tonnage, vessels that will carry at least from fifteen hundred to two thousand tons of freight as merchandise, and at the same time be able to carry sufficient fuel to last during the entire voyage. There are no vessels afloat at the present time able to do that. Even the great ships that are owned and run between Panama and San Francisco, a distance of thirty-two hundred and fifty miles or more, by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, could not perform the service. The purpose of putting the tonnage at the rate inserted in this bill is to exclude from the service all inferior vessels now used as transport ships and chartered vessels by the Government, and to secure, in all respects, a first-class line of steamships. If this encouragement is offered, capitalists stand ready to engage in building the finest ships that were ever yet put afloat by our country, to enter upon this service. It is not expected that they will be able to enter upon the execution of the contract the Postmaster General is authorized by this bill to advertise for before the time stated, the 1st of January, 1867.

I make this explanation and suggestion to the Senator that he may understand the magnitude of the enterprise, and what is earnestly desired and contemplated by the merchants who are prepared to enter upon this service. I can add nothing to what the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has briefly stated, and what he is further authorized and prepared to state from the data in his possession, without consuming unnecessarily the time of the Senate, but to say that it is of the first consequence to our country, to its commerce, to its nationality if you please, to its dignity, to its power, and to its best interests, that we at once enable our people to grasp this great commerce and to connect it with the contemplated and now building Pacific railroad. The schedule of time now required between London and China is some sixty-two days. It is proposed to make the time by this route, not only between our country and China, but between China and London, by this route over our country, at the outside fifty days, and thus give us an advantage that they never can reach, nor be able to cope with us.

I hope the Senator will see in this, not simply a demand upon the Treasury, for it is very moderate in that respect, but a proposition having a scope as wide as our country, and contemplating an interest as deep as any connected with it at the present time.

Mr. HALE. I am sorry to feel obliged to say a single word against this measure, and particularly as it comes from California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is obliged to interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire to call up the special order of the day at this hour, being the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to agree to let that lie over for a few moments. I suppose we shall soon be able to get a vote on this bill.

Mr. HALE. I will not speak three minutes.

Mr. SUMNER. I will let it lie over informally for a short time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken, if there be no objection.

Mr. HALE. I was about to say that I was sorry that I feel compelled to vote against this measure, particularly as it comes from California, as it has been intimated that I do not vote liberal appropriations for that portion of the country. Sir, I do not know any part of this country for which I would vote appropriations sooner than I would for any other portion, and certainly no portion of the country could appeal to my feelings with more power than California; but I have the same objection to this bill that compelled me to vote against the "little nothing" of $160,000 for the Library, which was opposed by me on Saturday. The objection applies with equal force to this other "little nothing" of $500,000. If we go on and make these appropriations of $160,000 and $500,000, and God only knows what, the question will then be, not have we any commerce, but have we a country? I think the first we should consider is the war and the debts of the war, and we should not go launching out in any of these schemes. I think favorably of this scheme. I appreciate with great force the suggestions made by the Senator from California; and when the war is over I should be willing to engage in this thing, and I should be willing to pass the bill with an amendment that the contract should not be entered upon as long as there was anything due to our soldiers. I will not occupy time, but simply ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was struck with the fact, in the remarks of the Senators who were advocating the passage of this bill, that neither the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, nor the gentleman from California who called it up, has said one word in his advocacy of the bill about the object for which it is brought before the Senate, namely, to establish mail steamship service between the United States and China for the purpose of carrying the mails. Not a word was said by them about carrying the mails. It is manifestly a bill to build up a steamship company; and it is placed upon the ground which was assumed by the Senator from Vermont, and which had the approbation of the Senate and of Congress, I believe, at the last session, and I suppose will have the approbation of both Houses at this session, that because Great Britain has thought proper to establish certain lines of ocean steamships therefore the United States must do it.

Now, sir, if it were a new question I should like to know by what authority this is proposed to be done. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] the other day submitted a proposition in some shape that the Government of the United States should go into the manufacturing business, and should manufacture the cloth that was needed for the Army; and now, under the idea of carrying the mails between this country and Japan, or some islands in the eastern Archipelago, we are to build vessels of large tonnage. I suppose it would take large vessels to carry the mails between the two countries! There are large seas to be traversed, and I presume it would take vessels of large capacity to carry the correspondence that takes place between the semi-barbarous people inhabiting the eastern countries and the people of the United States!

Everything is being thrown into this vortex; the Federal Government is about to do everything. During these times of war, I know (and I regret that it is so) that the Federal Government has had to assume vast powers, drawing to itself all the powers ever exercised by any Government; and we are setting the example, not only in regard to military matters, but, under the name, or under the pretense, of carrying the mails between some far-off country and this country, the funds and the moneys of the people are to be taken to build vessels. That is what this measure is for; and yet not one word is said, in arguing the necessity for the establishment of this line, as to the amount of correspondence that takes place between these countries. It is simply an undertaking of the Government of the United States to establish steamship lines for commercial purposes. I am sorry to see such bills introduced and passed. I should be very glad to see a line of ocean steamers between San Francisco and China or Japan; but I do not know what authority the Government of the United States has to establish that line of steamers, any more than it has to tax the people of the country and appropriate money for sailing-vessels between the same ports, or between any other ports. If we embark in this species of legislation, and undertake to manufacture goods in order to compete with Great Britain, lest she should manufacture more cheaply than we can; or, as the Senator from Vermont will have it, we shall be driven from the ocean if we do not as a nation appropriate money to keep our vessels afloat, we have to run a race in this respect with the other nations of the world. I do not think such was the intention in the establishment of this Government; and although I believe it right and proper, and that we have ample authority to appropriate money to carry the mails, wherever there is any correspondence to be carried, I have never believed in the authority of Congress, under a pretense of carrying the mails, to build vessels and establish lines of steamers costing the Government millions and millions of dollars, many more times what it would cost to hire somebody to carry the mails.

I shall vote against this measure; and I am glad that the yeas and nays have been called upon it. I voted against a similar proposition at the last session of Congress. I have never voted for the establishment of one of these ocean lines of steamers. We tried it some years ago with what was known as the Collins line. We kept up that line at a vast expense for several years, and finally abandoned it, I believe to the satisfaction of Congress, and the great satisfaction of the people of the country.

Mr. COLLAMER rose.

Mr. SUMNER. If this debate is to go on; I must call for the special order. I gave way.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not suppose it will go on more than a moment longer. I shall have nothing further to say on the subject. I leave the explanation to be made in a few words by the chairman of the committee, and then we can come to a vote on the subject.

Mr. COLLAMER. Perhaps we might as well let the vote be taken without saying anything further.

Mr. CONNESS. I am perfectly willing to let the vote be taken, and leave the measure to be decided by the Senate on its merits.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the passage of the bill the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nessmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Hendricks, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Ten Eyck, and Trumbull—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Canine, Harding, Hicks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright—15.

So the bill was passed.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, the bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of W. H. & C. S. Duncan was recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order for half past twelve o'clock, which was laid aside informally, is the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 51) entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendment to the said bill, and the committee agree to the following as a substitute:

An Act to establish a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby established at the seat of Government of the United States a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, whose object shall be the good of the freedmen and the administration of lands and other property falling to the national Government in the rebel States not heretofore appropriated to other uses. And this Department shall be under the care of a Commissioner, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with an annual salary of $1,000.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands shall appoint a chief clerk, with an annual salary of $2,000, who shall act as disbursing officer, and who in all cases during the necessary absence of the Commissioner, or when the principal office shall become vacant, shall perform the duties of Commissioner; and also such number of clerks, not exceeding two of each class, as shall be necessary. And the Commissioner and all persons appointed under this act shall, before entering upon their duties, take the oath of office prescribed in an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862. And the Commissioner and the chief clerk shall, before entering upon their duties, give bonds to the Treasurer of the United States, the former in the sum of $100,000 and the latter in the sum of $10,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties respectively, with securities to be approved as sufficient by the Attorney General; which bonds shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, to be by him put in suit for the benefit of any injured party upon any breach of the conditions thereof.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, create districts of freedmen and abandoned lands within the rebel States, not to exceed two in each State, so far as the same may be brought under the military power of the United States; and each district shall be under the supervision of an assistant commissioner, with an annual salary of $2,500, under bond as required for the chief clerk, to be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and with authority to appoint local superintendents and clerks, so far as the same may be needed, not, however, more than four in each district, each of whom shall have an annual compensation not exceeding $1,500.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall have the general superintendence of all freedmen throughout the several districts, and he shall watch over the execution of all laws, proclamations, and military orders of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen; and he shall establish regulations from time to time, and cause the same to be enforced for their needful and judicious treatment, protecting them in the enjoyment of their rights, promoting their welfare, and securing to them and their posterity the blessings of liberty. And every such freedman shall be treated in all respects as a freeman, with all proper remedies in courts of justice, and no power or control shall be exercised with regard to him except in conformity with law.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners, under the direction of the Commissioner and within their respective districts, shall take possession of all abandoned real estate belonging to disloyal persons, and all real estate to which the United States have title, or of which the United States have possession, and not already appropriated to Government uses, and all property found on and belonging to such estate, and shall rent or lease such real estate or any portion thereof to freedmen, or permit the same to be cultivated, used, or occupied by them on such terms and under such regulations as the assistant commissioner and such freedmen may agree; and if the lands with the property aforesaid shall not be required for the freedmen, then they shall rent or lease the same to other persons on such terms and under such regulations as shall be mutually agreed upon, and no freedman shall be employed on any estate above mentioned otherwise than according to voluntary contract reduced to writing and certified by the assistant commissioner or local superintendent: Provided, That no lease, permission to occupy, or contract, shall be for a longer period than one year, and all papers required or authorized by this act shall remain valid and effectual although no revenue stamp is attached thereto. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the due execution of process against the real estate or property above named issued in due course of law from any court of competent jurisdiction; but the possession of such real estate or property by any purchaser thereof at a judicial sale shall be postponed until the termination of any outstanding contract duly made and executed under the provisions of this act.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the assistant commissioners and local superintendents shall, as advisory guardians, aid the freedmen in the adjustment of their wages, or in the application of their labor; that they shall take care that the freedmen do not suffer from ill-treatment or any failure of contract on the part of others; that they shall do what they can as arbitrators to reconcile and settle any differences in which freedmen may be involved with each other or with other persons; and, in case such differences are carried before any tribunal, civil or military, they shall appear as next friends of the freedmen, so far as to see that the case is fairly stated and heard. And in all such proceedings there shall be no disability or exclusion on account of color.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That leases heretofore made by the supervising special agents of the Treasury Department, under the authority of the General Order, three hundred and thirty-one, of the Secretary of War, dated October 9, 1863, and in accordance with the regulations of the Treasury Department, shall have the same effect as if made by assistant commissioners under this act; but such lease shall not continue beyond the period of one year from its date; and immediately upon the organization of any district of freedmen and abandoned lands such agents shall cease to execute their functions within such district, and shall deliver over to the assistant commissioner thereof all property and papers held by them as agents. But all expenses necessarily incurred by such agents in any district prior to its organization under this act shall be defrayed by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any moneys in his hands arising from the leases made by such agents.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall apply the proceeds accruing under this act to defray the expenses of this Department, so that the same may become at an early day self-supporting; and any proceeds over and above such expenses shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever the Commissioner cannot otherwise employ any of the freedmen who may come under his care, he shall so far as practicable make provision for them with humane and suitable persons, at a just compensation for their services.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is charged with furnishing the military and other support needful to carry this act into effect, and any military officer may be appointed under this act without increase of salary.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, before the commencement of each regular session of Congress, make full report of his proceedings, with exhibits of the state of his accounts, to the President, who shall communicate the same to Congress, and shall also make special reports whenever required to do so by the President or either House of Congress. And the assistant commissioners shall make quarterly reports of their proceedings to the Commissioner, and also such other special reports as from time to time may be required. And it shall be the duty of all officers, civil and military, charged with the execution of any law, proclamation, or military order of emancipation, or in any way concerning freedmen not mustered into or regularly engaged in the military service, to make return to the Commissioner of all their proceedings in execution thereof, under such regulations as shall from time to time be prescribed.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That all assistant commissioners, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as supervising special agents, shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts-martial or military commissions, to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department within which they act as such assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, or supervising special agents. And for all offenses amounting to a felony; for any act of embezzlement or willful misappropriation of public or private property; for any willful act of oppression of any freedman, or of any loyal inhabitant; for any act of taking or receiving, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value on account of any act done or omitted by them in their official capacity, or for being in any manner interested in any purchase of cotton, tobacco, sugar, or any other article produced upon any lands leased or worked under the provisions of this act, or for any other willful violation of their official duties, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to punishment by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment at hard labor for a period not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the last clause of a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

THOMAS D. ELIOT,
WILLIAM D. KELLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.
CHARLES SUMNER,
J. M. HOWARD,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state several objections that I have to the adoption of this report. The first is to the reception of the report itself. It begins in these words:

That the Senate recede from their amendment to the said bill, and the committee agree to the following as a substitute.

According to parliamentary law and the rules of this House, I think the proposition is true that a committee of conference cannot decide any questions whatever except those that are in issue between the two Houses and upon which they have disagreed. This question was made formally some two years ago, and the Senate then solemnly adjudged in favor of the proposition which I have laid down, if I remember right. I had hoped that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whose name is signed to this report [Mr. SUMNER] would have explained to the Senate the points and matters outside of the issues between the two Houses that are introduced into this bill. I should like the honorable Senator to make that explanation before I proceed further in my remarks, if it is agreeable to him.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well, I can do so now. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] raises a question of form, or rather of order. He suggests that the committee have erred in reporting a new bill. The Senator is mistaken. This was done in the case of the difference between the two Houses on the confiscation bills, and also in another difference on a tariff bill. I have in my hand the Journal of the Senate for August 2, 1861, where may be found the report of a conference committee, which was followed by the committee on the present occasion. A new tariff bill, from beginning to end, was reported as a substitute, and the report was adopted. This is all that I think it necessary to say on the question of form.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to ask him if there was any objection made to that report in 1861.

Mr. SUMNER. It does not appear that there was any objection.

Mr. POWELL. That was the reason it was passed in that way.

Mr. SUMNER. I think if the Senator reflects he will see that there could be no objection. There was no objection, I think, certainly none that was sustained, to the report of the conference committee on the confiscation bill. I trust that there will be no opposition to this most important, and, as I solemnly believe, most beneficent measure. But I shall be happy to make any explanation with regard to it.

Senators have not forgotten the bill to create a Bureau of Freedmen, which, after careful debate for several days, was passed by the Senate at the close of the last session as a substitute for a House bill on the same subject. For some time the difference between the two Houses has been under the consideration of a conference committee, whose report is now before you. This report embodies substantially the Senate bill, including various propositions moved by different Senators; among others the proposition relating to the forfeiture of estates, moved by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRAUMBULL]; that relating to the care of freedmen unemployed on the lands, moved by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY]; and that relating to trials by courts-martial, moved by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE]. All of the Senate bill, in substance, and generally in language, is preserved, with one single exception. By the Senate bill a bureau was created in the Treasury. The committee of the two Houses unite in recommending a separate Department, holding directly under the President, and therefore free from the control of either the Treasury or the War.

In point of fact, the only substantial difference between the two Houses was on the place where the bureau should be. Each was for a bureau; but one was for it in the Treasury and the other was for it in the Department of War; and there were strong arguments in favor of each. There were also strong feelings expressed against each. Sometimes it was compendiously said that the freedmen could not be trusted to "the harpies of the Treasury," and then again it was said, with equal point, that they could not be trusted to "the blood-hounds of the War." These were the exaggerations of opposite opinions; but they serve to disclose the irreconcilable discord on the subject. In attempting to avoid Scylla we were carried to Charybdis.

If the freedmen could have been provided for without reference to the lands, the question would have been relieved from much of its embarrassment. But it was the conviction of the committee, in which they were sustained by all most familiar with the matter, that the care of the freedmen and the care of the abandoned lands ought to be in the same hands, and that they could not be separated without exposing the freedmen to all the mischiefs of two conflicting jurisdictions. But the War Office was not adapted to manage the lands, as many insisted that the Treasury was not adapted to manage the freedmen.

There was another consideration which was not without influence. It was felt that each of these great Departments of the Government was already so severely burdened, so weighed down with manifold duties, that it was hardly in condition to assume a new trust, so grave and onerous as that now under consideration.

For such reasons, sir, and yielding to such influences, the committee, after most careful and conscientious deliberation, determined to recommend a new Department, not unlike that of agriculture, which should not be subject either to the Treasury or to the War. It was felt that in doing this they were doing the best for the cause, and they were not insensible also to the consideration that in this way they should be able to secure a high order of talent and of character for this branch of public service. Men fitted for Treasury agents, or fitted for War, might not always be the best for the care of freedmen. The man for this humane service should be humane by nature, and should sympathize especially with that race which has so long been neglected and outraged. They must be versed, if I may so express myself, in the humanities of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order for one o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope I may be allowed to go on, at least to finish this statement. I can go on informally.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am informed by the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that he will require to-day to pass one of his bills from the Committee on Finance; and I am also informed that the Senate will not be in session to-morrow, because of the announcement of the death of Mr. Hicks. I gave notice that I will not antagonize the House bill No. 307, which is the special order for this hour, against any bill from the Committee on Finance. I therefore move that it be made the special order for Wednesday at one o'clock, instead of to-day. The motion was agreed to.

Subsequently, the order relative to the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States, was changed so as to make that bill the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, Mr. CHANDLER stating that he understood the announcement of Mr. Hicks's death would not be made till Wednesday.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the honorable Senator, I move to take up the resolution fixing the duty on paper, and then I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts to finish his statement.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection now to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts to conclude his statement.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, in confirmation of the views of the committee, I ask attention to a letter which I have recently received from Captain Wilder, who is superintendent of negro affairs at Fortress Monroe. He writes me under date of 6th February, as follows:

"I am glad to learn that Congress is considering the expediency of establishing an independent Department of negro affairs, &c."

"If it is the purpose of its friends by this to throw additional safeguards around the colored people, and between them and their enemies and speculators, and to secure to them the reforming and elevating influences of education and the gospel of the Son of God, which I do not doubt, I would respectfully suggest that one great obstacle to our success in this work has been the want of some general policy, at once practical and operative, securing protection, removing obstacles, and affording to them opportunity and encouragements to make their accustomed labor available, not only for their own support and elevation, but a source of power and wealth to the country."

"If this can be so arranged as to prevent a perpetual conflict of control and rights between the military and Treasury or civil agents, with the use of rebel and abandoned lands, at least for a time, we shall be out of the woods and on a fair field to test every other mooted question, and save to the Government very large and continued expenditures."

"Without this, or its equivalent, freedom will be to them a doubtful boon, and the Government will become, by neglect at least, an abettor of degradation."

The views so strongly enforced by military experience at Fortress Monroe are enforced with equal strength by military experience at New Orleans. I hold in my hand an elaborate letter from Major General Hurlbut, commander of the Department of the Gulf, under date of January 21, relating to the treatment of freedmen, from which I will read an important passage:

"A central bureau, then, of selected men of character, courage, and knowledge of the subject, at Washington is desirable. Subordinate bureaus still more carefully selected in the several States possessed by our arms will be established, who shall loyally enforce regulations."

"It possible to be obtained, these should be constituted of men having knowledge already of the peculiarities of negro character in its several distinct races, truthful and of undeniable integrity, who will render justice to the poor, and resist blandishments and bribes."

"The burden of this important affair should as speedily as possible be taken from the military authorities, and permanently and systematically vested elsewhere. Military commanders are often changed, and the system fluctuates with each change."

It may be easy to find fault with the proposed measure, to criticise it in its details, or to object to the creation of a separate Department. But the question has arrived at such a stage that you must take this or nothing. I err. There is another system which will continue, if you reject this. By the act of Congress, passed at the close of the late session, relative to abandoned property, it is provided that the agent of the Treasury "shall take charge of and lease for periods not exceeding twelve months the abandoned lands, houses, and tenements within the districts therein named, and shall also provide in such cases or otherwise for the employment and general welfare of all persons within the lines of national military occupation within said insurrectionary States formerly held as slaves, who are or shall become free." (Sec. 2.) Under this statute the Treasury Department has proceeded to establish regulations, of which the first is as follows:

"The regulations relative to the employment and general welfare of freedmen will be carried into effect by the same agents and under the same supervision as are provided under the regulations concerning commercial intercourse."

Such is the system which now exists, under which the freedman is the mere accident of the Treasury. Sir, this is not worthy of the Republic at this great period of our history.

Already the President, by irrevocable proclamation, has declared all slaves to be free. An amendment to the Constitution will, in the course of a few weeks, place their freedom under the sanction of constitutional law. But this is not enough. The debt of justice will not be paid if we do not take them by the hand in their passage from the house of bondage to the house of freedom; and this is what is proposed by the present measure. The temporary care of the freedman is the complement of emancipation; but the general welfare is involved in the performance of this duty. Without it emancipation may for a while seem to fail, and the general welfare will surely suffer.

Mr. GRIMES. Before the Senator closes I should like to have him explain—

Mr. SHERMAN. It would be better to let the report go over.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish an explanation of the ninth section in connection with the Senator's remarks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better go on with the paper-duty bill. The Senator desired to make his explanation; he has made it, and the subject goes over.

Mr. SUMNER. I am perfectly ready to go on and take the vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call up the pending business.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask that this be made a special order for half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. POWELL. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. It comes up as unfinished business in the morning hour.

Mr. POWELL. There is a motion to reconsider a bill of mine which I want disposed of.

Mr. SUMNER. If this report comes up as unfinished business in the morning hour, very well.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to make a single inquiry in regard to this bill: is it open to amendment?

Mr. SUMNER. It is not.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. It is not open to amendment. The report is an entirety.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then it cannot have three readings, nor can it be amended.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. The question is simply on the acceptance of the report. It will now go over till to-morrow morning.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) authorizing a contract with William H. Powell for a picture for the Capitol, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the resolution to appoint a joint committee to notify the President and Vice President-elect for the ensuing term of their election, and had appointed Messrs. J. F. WILSON of Iowa, and J. L. DAWSON of Pennsylvania, the committee on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

A bill (H. R. No. 517) to incorporate the National Union Insurance Company of Washington.

A bill (S. No. 281) for the relief of Alexander J. Atocha;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 91) appointing General Richard Delafield to be a Regent of the Smithsonian Institution; and

A bill (H. R. No. 705) for the relief of collectors and surveyors of the customs in certain cases.

DUTY ON PRINTING PAPER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 141) reducing the duty on printing paper, unsized, used for books and newspapers exclusively, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out "three per cent." and insert "fifteen per cent." as the rate of duty.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the amendment is adopted I desire to submit a statement of the reasons that induced the Committee on Finance to report it. The present rate of duty on printing paper is twenty per cent. The proposition of the House of Representatives is to reduce the rate of duty to three per cent. The leading objection of the Committee on Finance to the proposed rate of duty was that it is less than the rate of duty levied on the home manufacture. The duty now levied on printing paper made in the United States is equivalent to eight to ten per cent., and is assessed in various forms. We levy a direct tax on the manufacture of three per cent. We levy on the income derived from it from five to ten per cent. We levy a tax on the coal, lime, and many of the materials entering into the composition of paper; soda ash, bleaching powder, alum, sulphuric acid, and other articles indispensable to its manufacture must pay a large import duty, or, if manufactured in the United States, must pay an excise duty. I have a statement which approximates the duty paid by the home manufacturer on one ton of paper. It is as follows:

In producing one ton of paper from wood, straw, flax, or hemp tow there are used 12½ bushels of lime, at 43 cents per bushel, $5 37½; excise on which is 3 per cent. $0 16
1,230 lbs. soda ash, import duty 1½ per cent. per lb., $6 10 in gold, or, in currency, with gold at 225. 13 72½
813 lbs. bleaching powders, import duty 30 cents per 100 lbs., $2 44 in gold, or, in currency, with gold at 225. 5 49
57 lbs. alum, import duty 60 cents per 100 lbs., 34 cents in gold, or, in currency, with gold at 225. 76½
41 lbs. sulphuric acid, import duty 1 cent per 100 lbs., 41 cents in gold, or, in currency, with gold at 225. 92½
Wood feltings, duty 20 cents per lb., and 35 per cent. ad valorem additional. 1 20
Wire-cloth, excise 3 per cent. 20
3½ tons of coal, for boiling and drying. 17½

Making in duties and excise on materials, a total of The value of one ton of printing paper, 22½ cents per lb., (the present market rates,) is $4 30; excise tax 3 per cent. 13 50
Estimated profit on one ton $45, or 10 per cent.; of which is paid in income and war taxes, 10 per cent. 4 50

Showing that Government receives on each ton of paper as above made in the United States. 40 63½
When printing paper is made entirely of rags, the consumption of lime, chemicals, coal, &c., is much less; but estimates made in same manner as above, in detail show that Government receives from one ton of printing paper, made from rags alone, a revenue of. 21 24

It is thus shown that the amount of revenue received from a ton of paper made here is forty dollars, and cannot be less than twenty dollars. If the House resolution passes, what revenue will be derived from a ton of imported paper? Let us see. Paper abroad is $160 a ton; three per cent. will yield $4 80 in coin, or in paper, at present rates, about ten dollars. Thus the resolution of the House would reduce the revenue from ten to thirty dollars on every ton of paper imported. Are we prepared to thus reduce the revenue?

But this is not the worst effect of the proposed duty. It is an actual discrimination against home manufacture and in favor of foreign manufacture of about seven per cent. The Canada mills across our boundary line may manufacture paper and sell it in our markets, paying less tax than the home manufacturer. I venture to assert that no such discrimination has ever been made in any tariff or revenue law of the United States. If we must admit paper duty free or at a nominal rate we should at least reduce our internal duties to the same rate. When we are searching through all branches of industry for subjects of taxation we are not disposed to reduce the present revenue from any articles. Cheap paper is demanded by the press, by the people, and by the House of Representatives; but in yielding to that demand we must not, at one blow, destroy seven hundred paper mills, giving employment to fifty thousand persons and $70,000,000 of capital. It is idle to say that they could continue their operations when we not only invite competition with the labor of Europe, but actually discriminate against them to an amount equal to interest on their investments. This is an injustice so manifest as, when stated, to meet at once the dissent of every just man.

But it is said that the duty on the imported article is paid in gold. That is true. Three per cent. in gold is equivalent to six per cent. in paper money on the same valuation; but it must be remembered that the three per cent. in gold is levied upon the foreign valuation and not upon the home valuation, and that makes all the difference in the world. The foreign valuation of printing paper is $160 a ton, instead of $400 a ton, the home valuation. The price of paper in Belgium is about eight cents a pound, according to the statement furnished us from the Treasury Department, or $160 a ton, according to the foreign valuation, and the rate of duty on imported goods is levied on the foreign valuation. Consequently the three per cent. on $170 a ton—I compute it at $170 to cover commissions—is $5 10 in coin, or, at the present rate, equal to about $10 20 in paper money; so that if the House resolution should pass we would by our internal taxation levy a duty of $40 63 on a ton of paper manufactured at home and only $10 20 in paper money upon a ton of paper imported into this country. Such a discrimination as this would be manifestly unjust and improper.

A great deal has been said in the newspapers about this paper duty; a great deal of complaint has been made on the subject; but it is very certain that the editors and proprietors of those papers can scarcely expect us by our legislation to impose a lighter duty on the imported article than on the home manufactured article. That would not be just, and would soon leave them to the mercy of foreign paper-makers.

It is said that the high price of paper is caused by the high rate of duty on imported paper. This is strange when we consider that the present rate of duty is lower than it has been for forty years. Under the tariff of 1846, it was thirty per cent.; under the free-trade tariff of 1857, it was twenty-four per cent.; under that of August 5, 1861, it was thirty per cent.; under that of July 14, 1862, it was thirty-five per cent.; under the present tariff, it is twenty per cent. The true reason for the high price of paper is to be found in the condition of the country, the same causes that produce the advance in gold, iron, and all the materials and commodities of industry and manufacture. Paper has steadily advanced or fallen with the price of gold. In counteracting so far as we can this inevitable effect of paper money, we must take care not to destroy our home industry. If we yield to one interest to-day, we may be compelled to yield to another to-morrow. We cannot make cheap prices by legislation while we are compelled to levy enormous taxes.

For the reasons I have stated the Committee on Finance were unanimously of the opinion that the proposed reduction to three per cent. was unwise, unjust, injurious to the revenue, and destructive to an important branch of home industry. The question then arose whether any reduction of the duty was expedient. My own opinion then is that a duty of ten per cent. would be sufficient to equalize taxation between the home and foreign manufacture and yet leave a healthy competition between them that would reduce the price of paper to the lowest rate consistent with the largest revenue. Printing paper is one of those articles of indispensable necessity that enters into the expenditure of every family in the community. Books are no longer printed for the rich alone, but are of universal use; and any legislation that would materially increase their cost or restrict their use is unwise. The daily and weekly newspaper, spreading to the remotest hamlet not only the news of the day but also popular information upon questions of legislation, religion, war, finance, have become the schoolmasters of the people; not always good teachers, it is true, but still as indispensable as any of the numerous wants of modern civilization. Most families would rather restrict their table comforts than do without their newspaper. Again, sir, school books are the foundation of our common schools, and the number of volumes now published annually is greater than the aggregate of all the public libraries in the United States. Tract and various religious and charitable societies consume a vast amount of paper. The Government of the United States is itself a vast consumer of paper. The printing establishment in this city, under the charge of Mr. Defrees, conducts a printing business far greater than any publishing house on this continent; and in the printing of revenue blanks, stamps, dies, &c., in the Currency Bureau, the United States becomes the great purchaser of paper, exhausting the market supply, and thus largely contributing to the high price of paper. Under these circumstances the paper mills that formerly could supply the demand for printing paper have not always been able to do so, and it would seem to be the part of wisdom to invite a healthy competition from foreign labor. But in doing so we dare not yield to an interested clamor and surrender any portion of our revenue, or destroy a branch of American industry.

These views have convinced me that the best rate of duty is ten per cent., a rate about equivalent to the aggregate of internal taxes. The manufacturer of printing paper needs no protection. His product is heavy, and expensive to transport. This is an advantage you cannot deprive him of when competing with foreigners. The present rate of duty is shown, by experience, to be prohibitive. No printing paper has been imported during the last year. The effect of the reduction will probably induce some competition, but, in my opinion, the home producer will be able to sell all he can make at a fair, remunerative rate; and in case the supply is deficient, the duty will not be so high as to give him a monopoly.

It is urged in favor of retaining the present duty that all changes in the tariff laws destroy confidence; that our citizens engaged in business have a right to demand stability in legislation affecting their business interests; and it is urged that if lower duties are yielded to the printers they will be yielded to other interests, and thus destroy our revenue system and impair faith in the payment of the public debt. This argument loses its force when it is shown that the proposed change does not reduce the revenue, and does not materially affect any interest, but only tends to supply the demand for an article the consumption of which is enormously increased by the war.

I can say for the Committee on Finance that it has fully considered all the arguments urged upon us. We have heard delegations from both the paper makers and the publishers, and as the result of a compromise between the opposing views I have mentioned, we have recommended fifteen per cent. as a proper rate of duty. I shall feel at liberty to vote for the lower rate of ten, but a less rate will, I am sure, result in a loss of revenue and a serious injury to the paper makers. We must remember that while the newspaper press may appeal to us daily, that their interest must no more be considered than the seven hundred paper mills and the very large capital employed in them. The interests of both must be held subordinate to the paramount interest of the Government, and that is that paper makers and printers and readers must all contribute their fair share in the support of the Government.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have some doubts on my mind which perhaps the Senator from Ohio can relieve. I am aware that pretty much all that has been said on this subject has been through the newspapers. The printers and publishers of newspapers have papers to talk through; the manufacturers of paper have no newspapers to talk through. Now, the first thing that strikes my mind is, that while it is proposed to reduce the duty on imported paper, the existing duty is left on all the imported articles which enter into the manufacture of paper in this country. The Senator has stated to us the materials and elements that enter into the manufacture of paper in this country. The chemicals, the wire-cloth, the felt, are all matters of foreign importation. The wire-cloth is not made in this country. That is the screen on which the paper is dipped, and it makes fine paper according to the fineness of the screen, or otherwise. It is the screen which covers the wheel where paper is made by machinery, through which the water oozes and on which the pulp collects. The wire-cloth is imported from abroad. Now, it is proposed to reduce the duty on imported paper and still leave the duties on all these articles which enter into the manufacture of paper here.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me I will state to him that in the statement furnished to me by the paper manufacturers, and which I have verified at the Treasury Department, the duty on the acids and other articles is reduced to paper money at the market rate of gold, so that the whole aggregate in paper money is what I have stated. It includes the felting, the wire-cloth, the alum, the sulphuric acid, bleaching powders, soda ash, coal, and the whole amount to $40 63 in currency per ton.

Mr. COLLAMER. The duties on all the imported articles which the manufacturer must have are left unredacted, so that our manufacturers must buy these articles to carry on their work, pay all the duties levied on them, and then the paper which is brought in to compete with the paper they manufacture is to come in with a reduction of duty. I believe that the persons actually engaged at present in the manufacture of paper amount to about fifty thousand; and I have understood that the amount of capital invested in the business was considerably larger than the gentleman has stated.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is between eighty and one hundred million dollars, I think.

Mr. COLLAMER. One reason given for the reduction of the duty on printing paper is that it has become an article of necessity. Grant it. Is not the cloth for a man's coat a necessity too? I should think it was. You say poor people want to use it. Does not the poor man want a coat? You now impose a tax of five per cent. on all manufactures of every description of cloth in this country, however necessary the articles may be to life. Our condition requires it; we need the money, and we must have it. Then the fact that a thing is a necessary of life constitutes no reason for letting in the foreign manufacture and destroying the American production, when by destroying the American production we fail to get the duty and raise the money we otherwise should get.

I am not satisfied as yet that this duty ought to be reduced in any degree. Last year, or the year before that, as a compromise, the duty on the importation of paper was reduced from thirty to twenty per cent., and it stands at twenty per cent. now. That was the result of a compromise then understood to be in some degree satisfactory and permanent, but now it is to be disturbed again. I do not mean to say that it is so disturbed by the committees of either House, for they have not disturbed it as I understand. It seems to me that having settled it at twenty per cent., and settled it as a matter of compromise and arrangement with the other arrangements in the general bill, we ought not now to disturb it. The mere fact that American paper has grown dear is the only ground for it. Why is that? Is it true that the American manufactured paper has increased in price any more than other articles of American manufacture, or that it has increased any more than the materials out of which it is made have increased? Not at all. The Senator from Ohio says it fluctuates with the rise and fall of gold. Undoubtedly that is true of paper as of everything else. It goes up or down according to the variations in the depreciation of our currency. That is not peculiar to the article of paper, nor, as I before remarked, can the fact that paper is a necessary justify this movement.

Again, it is said the duty ought to be reduced because the Government is a large consumer and user of paper. Is it not also a large consumer of clothes and of all materials for the Army service? and yet we keep our duty on those articles.

My idea is, that by adopting this measure and doing nothing for the relief of our manufacturers of paper, the effect will be to wind up the business, to close the mills, to leave our manufacturers to pay the same duties as before on the materials which they import, and which go into the manufacture of paper, while reducing the duty on the imported article even to fifteen per cent. will almost entirely cripple them.

I think upon the whole, and in the long run, we shall do better to let this manufacture stand, like all other manufactures of the country, and pay duties on their home production, by having such duties on imported articles as will enable them to compete with the foreign producer; otherwise, they never can pay us much internal revenue.

Again, the Senator from Ohio said that there are about seven hundred paper mills scattered all over the country. I think he is about right as to the number. You have them out in Iowa and Illinois, and all through the country. Mills are now being established in the far-off States for the purpose of using straw, wood, husks of corn, and other materials for making paper, using comparatively a small proportion of rags. I think we had better promote that, increase it, improve it, encourage it. If we adopt the system now proposed, that will be ended; no more will be built, no more investments will be made, no more improvements in that direction will be instituted. On the whole, I am not satisfied that there should be any reduction at all.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, on this subject of the reduction of the duty on printing paper, my colleague and myself are instructed by the Legislature of Ohio to vote for the reduction, and if it were not for that instruction I should probably give a silent vote on this measure. On almost any question about which I entertain the least doubt, my respect for the Legislature of Ohio would cause me to solve that doubt in favor of the opinions which they have expressed. I have never believed that the Legislatures of our States have a right to instruct Senators so that we are bound, under all circumstances, to obey those instructions; but, on the other hand, there is no question but that the opinion of the Legislature is entitled to the gravest consideration, and should not be departed from, unless where one is fully persuaded that the instructions that he has received are not in accordance with the best interests of the country. That, I must say, is my position now. Since receiving these instructions I have taken some pains to look into this question, and my colleague has explained the facts just as I find them to be, and I therefore need not repeat what he has said. I was unable, however, in this case, to find anything which particularly affects this article of paper that should induce us to discriminate between it and a great many other articles that are protected by a higher duty than that imposed on paper.

I know very well, as has been said, that almost every commodity we make use of has increased very much in price, and seems to fluctuate with the rate of gold from day to day. It is so with paper, just as it is with everything else; and I see no reason why, if we vote now for the reduction of the duty on paper, we should not, on the same principle, be compelled to vote for the reduction of the duty on almost every article that I know anything about. It is an article in the production of which in this country a great deal of capital is invested. It is an article which can be manufactured as well in this country as anywhere else. We have all or nearly all the materials necessary for the manufacture. There are some of the elements that enter into it of foreign production which it is not proposed to disturb in regard to their protection, for they are left precisely as they were. But these things are not of such consequence perhaps as to confine our action to this one article. This of itself would not make any very great difference to the country; but it is an important question in view of the proper provision to be made for the vast accumulated debt of this nation. That is a subject on which I have reflected a great deal, and which has troubled me much more than the war which is on our hands, because I have always believed that the war could only be determined in one way sooner or later.

I have always felt assured that when the immense power and resources of the free States in war were brought in collision with the seceded States, notwithstanding all our blunders, if we make any, notwithstanding all the bad policy we may adopt, if we adopt any, we cannot so err but that in the end we must overcome our comparatively feeble enemy. But this vast debt that we are accumulating is a thing of paramount consideration, and we cannot begin to look it straight in the face too early. According to my philosophy, if we are to successfully grapple with this great burden of debt, we must provide for paying it off by the labor of man. There is nothing else that I know of which is of any value for the purpose. I know of nothing that we esteem valuable which is not the product of human labor; and if we are to pay off this debt we have got to work it out, and it must be worked out by our own people, and not by foreigners. Our people have to earn the money. The people of the United States by their own labor, and by their wise application of that labor, are to grapple with and discharge the debt, and I agree that they are perfectly able to do it. The debt does not perplex me provided we make a wise disposition of the vast resources we have in hand, for if we shape our policy so that whatever commodities are necessary for our people shall be the product of our own labor, we overcome any debt you can conceive of.

Why, sir, look at the results of labor and compare them with the debt. I believe, according to the census of 1860, it was shown that the products of manufactures in the United States at that time were about two thousand million dollars per year. Reflect upon that, sir. One year's work of all those engaged in manufactures, if it could be all applied to the payment of your debt, would sweep it out and pay it off. What is that compared with the products of labor applied in other departments, in agriculture, in your mines, in all the various branches of labor? I do not know the figures, for I have not summed them up, but I suppose the products of the labor of the people of the United States now cannot fall much short of five thousand million dollars per annum.

It is vast, it is almost inconceivable; and if we shape our policy so as to perform our own labor, no man need be frightened at the amount of debt we have to meet; but if we so shape our policy that we are to go abroad for our labor, and undertake to pay for it by depriving our own people of the right to do this labor and to perform this necessary service, we shall fail. I know that in that event we shall fail. I am not going to enter into the argument of the tariff question; but just at the threshold, when for the first time it is proposed that with all this burden upon our back we shall put it into the hands of foreigners to do our labor, I think it becomes every statesman to pause and consider. How are we to pay this debt if we deprive our own people of the right to do our labor, as will be the case if you discriminate in favor of foreigners?

Nay, sir, I go further. When we consider the vast capital and means in the hands of foreign manufacturers to underbid us in the market and to overcome our manufacturers and thereby destroy our labor, it seems to me to be a wise and a necessary policy to protect our own labor, and to see that the nation so shapes its policy that its own necessities shall be supplied by the labor of its own people. I am told that we shall destroy the labor of our own people to the amount of a hundred million dollars by reducing the duty on imported paper as now proposed. Open that branch of business to foreign competition and foreigners will do the work, but you have got to pay them for it; and you have got to pay them in the proceeds of your mines, for they will not take your paper. You have to send abroad the products of the mines of California and Nevada to pay for this labor that ought to be done by our own people. I am opposed to it. I regret that the Legislature of Ohio was so easily led into the adoption of the instructions to which I have referred. I have endeavored to find what arguments were made use of to induce the conclusion at which they arrived, but I have seen nothing of them. I fear that it was the result of but very little reflection; I fear they did not take into consideration the present condition of this great nation, and reflect that the only means on God's earth by which we can meet the burdens now upon us is by so shaping our policy as to support and encourage our own labor in every department of industry. If we do that, I fear not the debt; it will vanish before the advancing interests of the nation like the frost before the sun.

With a population doubling as ours does, almost, from decade to decade, with the products of our labor increasing in a ratio infinitely greater than the population, any debt which we may have will be but a light burden on us, and that but for a short time, if we adopt a wise policy; but if, on the other hand, we adopt a policy that compels us to go abroad for the products of foreign labor, if we discourage the employment of labor in our own country, we must be a poor, insignificant nation. I know that abroad there is a great deal of talk aimed at this country about free trade. Great Britain will pay millions to authors who write about free trade, and to papers that preach free trade, and to orators who go forth on the stump and proclaim the glories of free trade. But look at their own practice; take up their tariff, see the vast amount they have collected from customs, and compare it with ours. We are branded with being protectionists, with imposing restrictions upon trade, and yet, if you look at the customs you will find that the British Government collects from customs three times more in the year than we do, although they prate so much of free trade. Whether free trade is wise or not depends on the relation that one nation bears to another. What nation ever protected their commerce and their labor with higher restrictions than has Great Britain since up to within a very recent period? No nation in the world, until they had built up their manufacturing interest, their commerce, and became the manufacturers of the world by reason of their restrictions in favor of their own labor. All England is a perfect beehive of industry. Why? Because the statesmen of England have always had a realizing sense of the necessity of encouraging their labor, until they have built up such wealth and so perfected themselves in all branches of manufacture that there is hardly a nation in the world, and no young nation commencing its career, that can compete with them for an hour. Then they say, "Throw down the bars; now we are powerful enough to put down all competition; our wealth is such that we may by any kind of sacrifice undersell you, break down your manufactures, and we can very soon, after that is done, indemnify ourselves again." Yes, sir, when they have broken down your competition, undersold you until they have destroyed your ability to compete with them, they will turn around, and you will have to pay dearly for all that they threw off in order to attain to that position.

But, sir, I do not wish to enlarge. I say now, and I warn the Senate, and I warn the people of this Union, that with this vast accumulated debt upon our shoulders we must encourage our own labor. If we fail here we fail throughout, and your bonds are comparatively worthless. I proclaim it upon this floor, if the American people make a mistake here, as I fear they will, in my judgment your vast accumulated debt is good for nothing; you are a bankrupt nation; you throw away that predominance that the Almighty has given to the American people over every other portion of the world. It is in our power to be the great predominant nation of the earth, and this burden of debt upon us is nothing if we only trust our own laborers to work it out. But, sir, if we fail here, I fear that we shall fail throughout, and we shall bring down this nation from the height to which it ought to aspire to be secondary, and merely a dependence upon the European nations.

Mr. HALE. I was struck by the remark made by the Senator from Vermont, and it is certainly true, that so far as the newspapers are concerned, they have an advocate in every paper. A great deal has been said about this subject, but I take this simple view of it: I have looked at these papers, and have thought upon the subject somewhat, and according to the best information I can get the duty which these manufacturers pay upon the articles that enter into the composition of their paper is now over thirty per cent. It is difficult to get it accurately, but I apprehend by the best average it will be found, and I understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance agrees to that, to be thirty per cent. Then, sir, if you leave that so, every reduction of the duty on paper is unjust to our manufacturers, and, as has been well argued by the Senator from Ohio, for the benefit of the foreign manufacturer.

As there seems to be no agreement or unity of sentiment among those who want this duty altered, some having named three per cent., some five, the chairman of the Committee on Finance ten, and I understand the Committee on Finance fifteen, I desire to test the sense of the Senate upon the subject, and I think we might as well do it now as at any time. If we indefinitely postpone this bill it will leave the duty twenty per cent.; and while we leave the tax upon the articles entering into the manufacture of paper as it now is, considerably more than thirty per cent., I think the wisest way would be to leave the duty just exactly where it is; and with that view I move that the further consideration of this resolution be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I was very glad to hear the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] say that notwithstanding the instructions of his Legislature, for which he had high respect, he should vote against any reduction of the duty on paper. I was prepared to expect it from his known independence of character. I concur with him most fully in believing that he will better represent the people of his State, as well as promote the best interests of the country, in voting to have the duty remain as it is rather than in voting to reduce it. Why, sir, in his own State of Ohio, although not considered a manufacturing but an agricultural State, there was produced during the past year paper to the amount in value of $1,808,966, and the manufacturers of that paper paid as duties to the Government on the mere manufacture $54,269. No doubt more than $2,000,000 worth of paper was manufactured in the State, and so of course more than $54,269 of tax ought to have been paid by the manufacturers on the product; I do not suppose that the manufacturers of Ohio have evaded taxation more than those of other States; but in the commencement of a system of internal taxation the amounts assessed and the taxes paid are always less than the real amount which should be assessed and paid. Two million dollars is no doubt less than the amount in value of the paper manufactured in his own State of Ohio. Great as the State of Ohio is, and great as are its resources, it is certainly not statesmanlike to strike a blow at an interest so important as this paper interest, producing, unquestionably, more than $2,000,000 in value of paper a year. It is a great interest, great even for the State of Ohio, and it is a growing interest in that State and in most of the States.

Sir, whether we consider this question in the light of the high price of paper, or as a revenue measure, or as part of a great system involving the general principle and policy of manufacturing our own paper instead of importing it from abroad, we come to the same certain result, that any reduction of the duty is inexpedient, unjust, and dangerous.

As it regards the high price of paper, it is relatively no higher than all manufactured commodities; and when we speak of its high price what do we mean? Printing paper is now from twenty-two to twenty-four cents per pound in the great markets. Before the war it was about ten cents per pound. Between the price ten cents, and twenty-two or twenty-four cents, there is certainly a very considerable rise, more than double; but has paper risen? Has it doubled in price to the purchaser within four years? No, sir. Compared with the same standard of value by which the purchaser in 1860 procured paper at ten cents per pound, there has been but little rise in paper. That standard, as we all know, in 1860, was gold. The present standard is not gold, but a paper currency, a depreciated paper currency. It takes from twenty-two to twenty-four cents of the paper currency to buy a pound of paper, which, when gold was the standard, could be bought for ten cents; but take gold as the standard now and paper has risen but very little. The highest price that paper has touched in the great markets of the country during the past year was, I believe, twenty-eight cents per pound; and the highest price to which it would have risen, taking gold as the standard of value, would have been twenty-eight and a half cents per pound. So that, instead of a rise, if we take gold as the standard, and take the highest price of gold and the highest price of paper, paper has not risen in value at all, but is now lower than it was before we adopted paper as our currency and had gold as the standard. If we take the average rate at which gold has been selling during the past year, and take paper at ten cents per pound as the standard price, and let paper rise proportionately as gold rises, and compare the average, there has not been a rise in the price of paper during the past year; it has no more than maintained the average with the rise of gold.

Under these circumstances there is certainly no reason for our legislating to reduce the duty on paper to bring down the price. It has risen because the standard of value has changed; it has not risen if we adopt the same standard of value which existed in the country previous to the war.

Again, sir, as has been suggested, all the commodities which go into the manufacture of paper have risen as much, and I think more—certainly many of them much more—than paper has risen. Why, sir, rags, which until within a few years were almost the only commodity out of which paper was manufactured, have risen from two hundred to three hundred per cent. Straw, an article from which a good deal of paper is now made, has risen from two hundred and twenty to two hundred and seventy-five per cent. Soda ash has risen from two hundred and fifty to three hundred per cent. Bleaching powder has risen from three hundred to six hundred and fifty per cent.; sulphuric acid and alum from two hundred to three hundred and twenty per cent.; whale oil, which is used to some extent in the manufacture, has risen from two hundred and fifty to three hundred; rosin, for sizing, more than anything else, has risen from twelve hundred to seventeen hundred per cent.; coal from three hundred to four hundred per cent.; gum belting from two hundred to two hundred and fifty per cent.; wire-cloth from two hundred to two hundred and twenty-five per cent.; feltings from four hundred and fifty to six hundred per cent.; paper machinery at least two hundred and fifty per cent.; bar iron two hundred and fifty per cent.; white pine lumber over three hundred per cent.; bricks from two hundred to two hundred and fifty per cent. Paper has not risen during this time more, and I say not as much, as these several articles which either go into the manufacture of paper and are used in its manufacture, or which go into the construction of the machinery and mills; so that we are unreasonable if we expect that paper shall maintain the same price that it did formerly, when all the articles out of which it is manufactured have risen at this rate. Compare the price of paper, too, with the necessities of life—with meat and breadstuffs. Wheat has risen more than two hundred per cent.; Indian corn even more; beef and pork from two hundred to two hundred and fifty per cent.; sugar from two hundred and fifty to three hundred per cent.; and coffee over three hundred per cent. Under these circumstances, if paper has doubled in price, ought we to find fault with the manufacturers? Has not the whole increase of price been a necessity, an inevitable necessity?

The present rate of duty, as the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance has suggested, is as low as it has been for forty years. By the tariff of 1846, which was adjusted on what was supposed to be an approach toward free-trade principles, the duty on paper was fixed at thirty per cent. By the tariff of 1857 it was reduced to twenty-four per cent; but connected with that reduction, the duties on chemicals were reduced as much and even more than the duty on paper; so that the twenty-four per cent. duty under the tariff of 1857 was a better protection to the manufacturer than the thirty per cent. duty of the tariff of 1846. It continued at twenty-four per cent. until 1861, when the duty on paper was again raised to thirty per cent. In 1862 it was raised to thirty-five per cent.; and in 1863 it was reduced to twenty per cent., where it now stands.

While in 1862 the duty was raised to thirty-five per cent., the duties on chemicals were then raised so as to be adjusted to a duty on paper of thirty-five per cent., raising the duties on chemicals, which previously had been very low, some of them merely nominal, to a very high rate, and at that high rate they now stand. By the tariff of 1857 the duty on soda ash, bleaching powders, and sulphuric acid was four per cent., a merely nominal duty, scarcely enough to pay the cost of collecting; and the duty on alum was fifteen per cent. The duty on soda ash is now fifty cents on every one hundred pounds; on bleaching powders thirty cents on every one hundred pounds; on alum sixty cents on every one hundred pounds; and on sulphuric acid one cent per pound. These duties are perfectly enormous. They remain as they are, fixed to a duty on paper of thirty-five per cent.; and now, with paper at twenty per cent., it is proposed to reduce it, and still leave the duties on these commodities where they now are, adjusted, as I have stated, to a duty on paper of thirty-five per cent.

As the honorable Senator from Vermont suggests, articles of clothing have all increased quite as much in price as paper has increased. Those surely are quite as much necessities of life as paper; and however much we may regard paper as among the necessities, and however much we may say this is a tax on knowledge, a man who had no clothes to wear would pursue knowledge under difficulties, at least in this climate. We tax his clothes to such an extent that the duty on paper is greatly below the duty on his clothing.

There is, then, Mr. President, no reason on earth for reducing the duty on paper because of its high price. It is no higher than by the laws of trade under our currency it must be as a necessity.

Then as a revenue measure—and I agree that as a revenue question we should regard it, perhaps, rather than in any other light; for revenue is the vital question to the Government and to the country at this time. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has given us some statistics on this subject, and has shown, perhaps sufficiently, that, so far as this is a revenue measure, a reduction of the duty to three per cent. would be exceedingly absurd, to say no more. The honorable Senator stated the amount which is now paid to the Government on a ton of paper manufactured here within our own country. He has stated it, I believe, at $40 63. That is correct as to paper manufactured out of certain commodities, but it is not correct in regard to paper manufactured out of certain other commodities. Where paper is manufactured from wood or straw, flax or hemp-tow, the consumption of chemicals is very large; and, under those circumstances, a ton of printing paper pays to the Government on these several articles which go into its manufacture, together with the excise on lime, coal, feltings, war, and income-taxes, the sum named by that Senator. But where a ton of paper is manufactured from rags, the consumption of chemicals, which pay high duties, and of articles subject to tax, is much less; there is less labor in the manufacture, and therefore the manufacture of a ton of paper from rags does not produce to the Treasury of the country the amount of forty dollars, and but little more than half of it. A ton of paper manufactured from rags pays to the Government but $21 24, instead of the larger sum of $40 63 which it pays when it is manufactured from the other substances to which I have alluded.

As the honorable Senator showed to the Senate, a duty of three per cent. on a ton of paper imported from abroad at the price at which it can now be bought, $160 per ton, is $4 80, and that sum, reduced to the standard of our currency, makes the sum of $10 80, reckoning gold at 225. So much is paid in duty on a ton of paper imported from abroad; and a ton of paper manufactured in the way I first stated pays to the Government $40 63, showing a loss to the Government, between a ton so manufactured and one imported, of the round sum of $29 83, and if it be made from rags the loss is $10 44. In either event, therefore, whether the paper be manufactured from wood, straw, &c., or from rags, there is a great loss to the Treasury of the country. Without saying one word about the policy of having this work done at home rather than to have it done abroad, regarding it simply as a revenue measure, the loss is ruinous to the country.

But the honorable Senator from Ohio, from the Committee on Finance, proposes to raise the duty in the bill as it comes from the House from three to fifteen per cent.; and the question now is, or was when the motion was made to postpone indefinitely, upon the amendment making it fifteen per cent. If the duty be fifteen per cent. on the same rate of $160 per ton, the Government would receive $24 per ton duty in gold, and that reduced to currency, with gold at 225, would be $64, which the Government would receive on a ton of paper imported at fifteen per cent. That, I agree, is a larger sum than is paid to the Government from the manufacture of a ton of paper here, and so there would seem to be a gain to the Government. But let us see whether there would be. Of course, if we fix the duty at fifteen per cent., and mean to act honestly and fairly, we must give the manufacturer the benefit of fifteen per cent. upon his manufacture; otherwise our law is a delusion and a snare. In order that he may have the benefit of this fifteen per cent. protection, the several articles which he now imports from abroad to make his paper, and on which he pays a heavy duty, ought to come free; and he ought to make his paper out of free materials as it is made abroad, he being called upon to enter into competition with paper manufactured abroad.

Now, sir, during the year ending June 30, 1864, the amount of these several commodities imported into the country was as follows: we imported 75,879,706 pounds of soda ash, which was worth $1,303,805. We imported of bleaching powders 14,932,688 pounds, worth $309,904; and of alum we imported 1,503,088 pounds, worth $26,015. We received for duties on these several articles at the custom-house $433,214; nearly half a million of dollars duties on these chemicals which go into the manufacture of paper. I agree that these chemicals are used for other purposes besides the manufacture of paper; but if they are to be admitted duty free, this is the amount of duty which is lost to the custom-house, and which, as I stated, amounted last year to $433,214.

Mr. FARWELL. In gold.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir, in gold. I thank the honorable Senator for the suggestion. In currency it would be $974,731, with gold at 225. We received last year from the three per cent. tax on paper manufactured $895,528; and this sum, with the duties on the chemicals last named, in gold, make up the amount of $1,328,742—two items only of the amount to be made up by duties on imported paper.

Then the value of the paper and manufactures of paper produced in this country during the last fiscal year, to wit, the year ending June 30, 1864, was $29,850,933, as shown by returns at the Treasury. The profits on that business are said to be enormous; but I propose to take a very moderate figure; no more than what even those who attack the paper manufacturers agree is a fair profit; take ten per cent.; and that, on this amount of paper manufactured, shows a profit of $2,985,093, and on that profit the five per cent. income tax is $149,254 65. That, added to the former sums, makes, in three items, $1,577,996; and that is very much below the amount which the Treasury now receives from the manufacture of paper with the duty as it now stands. Between two and three million dollars unquestionably now come into the Treasury from the paper made in the country; perhaps more than the larger sum.

I propose to take these figures, and if we stop the manufacture here at home, we have got of course to provide by an importation from abroad such an amount as will raise this sum in revenue, or else the Treasury will be a loser. Now, to raise this sum of $1,577,996, which we now receive, we must import 29,222 tons of paper at fifteen per cent. in order to make up the sum, which I have shown to be less than the amount which the Government now receives. That number of tons costs $4,675,520; so that to import paper enough, with the duty at fifteen per cent., to raise the amount which we now receive, we must export $4,675,520 in gold. We should, it is true, get back about $700,000 of that in duties at the custom-house; and taking those two transactions together, we should send away nearly $5,000,000 in gold for the sake of getting back $700,000; not a very wise speculation.

Mr. President, with the country in the condition it now is, with our exchanges as they now are, with gold at the price it now is, can we with safety send abroad $5,000,000 in gold to buy our paper? Would not the picture which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] suggested of national bankruptcy be staring us in the face, and that speedily? Why, sir, it would be utterly impossible for the country to maintain its credit any considerable length of time if we follow such a course of policy as that.

The whole amount of our domestic products exported last year was $320,394,796, and of foreign products $20,373,409, making an aggregate of $340,768,205; and our imports the same year were $328,514,559. We exported in gold the past year $105,228,375. Of that the domestic production was $100,228,375, and of foreign coin and bullion $4,905,685. We imported $13,155,706; and the excess of our exports of gold over the imports was $92,072,669. We see what the condition of our country is as it regards the price of gold and our foreign exchanges, with an export of gold in excess of imports the past year of this sum of $92,072,669.

If we add to that the amount which would be necessary to buy barely paper enough to bring to the Treasury at fifteen per cent. the same amount which is now brought to it by the manufactures of the country, it would not only cause gold to rise in price very considerably, but, as I say, it would go far toward shaking the credit of the country. Gold has risen in this country about as high as it is safe for us to have it rise; and while I do not suppose that we by legislation can regulate its price, although the votes of Congress on certain occasions would seem to indicate that we could, or at least thought we could, yet we can legislate so as to prevent our workshops from being in Belgium or France or England; we can legislate so that the people of our country shall be profitably employed at home, and that we shall manufacture those articles which can be manufactured as cheaply and made as well here as they can be made elsewhere. If we adopt the policy that is here suggested by a reduction of this duty on paper, instead of raising the credit of the country we should impair it if we did not destroy it.

Why, sir, the export of four or five millions more of gold, if it affected the gold market but for a week to raise it five to ten per cent., causing, as it would, the same rise of every commodity in the country for that space of time, would make ten times the loss to the country which could be gained by anything in the way of reduction of the price of paper for years. There is and can be no doubt but that any increase in the export of gold would affect public credit and cause the price to rise, and of course the price of everything else to rise; and that all for the purpose of getting paper a few cents in the pound cheaper! It would be a most ruinous experiment.

Sir, until our country is in a condition again to export rice, cotton, tobacco, and naval stores, we cannot hope greatly to increase the present amount of our exports. There is no reason, there are no grounds, for such an expectation. Whatever we buy, then, from abroad more than we now buy, we have got to pay for, not in the products of our country, but in gold, and that would be a downward, dangerous, ruinous policy.

It is said we must import to some extent in order to get gold to pay the interest on our gold-bearing bonds. Sir, if we manufactured all the commodities at home which we now purchase from abroad, and stopped this ruinous exportation of gold, how long would it be before our paper currency would be at par with gold? Let it once be understood that we produce here at home what we are now purchasing abroad, let us buy no more from abroad than we pay for in the products of our own industry, and keep the precious metals at home, and I say the day would be very near when the difference between our paper currency and the gold standard of the world would not be worth calculating.

There is then, Mr. President, no need of any legislation on the subject of the duty on paper, either as it regards its price, or as a question of revenue, or as a question of public policy. As a question of public policy it is interwoven with the great system of home industry, and there is no reason why the manufacturer of paper should be taken out of the catalogue of other great manufacturers and brought at once to a duty that shall be ruinous to the home production and cause our paper to be manufactured abroad.

The same policy, as the honorable Senator from Vermont suggests, should be applied, certainly, to all the necessities of life. Clothing, all cotton and woolen fabrics, every species of manufacture that is now protected in this country and made in this country, would, by this system, be made abroad, and we should be a nation of idlers paying for the articles we consumed, not in the products of our own labor, not producing the articles necessary for our consumption, whether these articles were articles of luxury and elegance or articles of common convenience and necessity. Everything would be purchased abroad and paid for in raw materials, or the precious metals. The career of such a nation would be exceedingly short to national bankruptcy. Surely that would be the epitaph of this country at an early day if such a policy shall be adopted.

I know it is said that it is necessary to have a healthy competition, and that we must reduce the duty in order that our manufacturers should be brought in healthy competition with the manufacturers of paper abroad. Is this principle applied to any other article of domestic manufacture? Are not the duties on all these articles to which allusion has been made as nearly prohibitory at the present time as the duty on paper? The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] said there had been imported not a pound for years. He is slightly mistaken. It is true the importation is small—the importation of printing paper last year amounted to something less than ten thousand dollars—a small sum, I agree; but still there was some importation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of foreign paper?

Mr. FOSTER. Of foreign printing paper.

Mr. SHERMAN. When I said not a dollar, I meant that practically there were no importations.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought the Senator meant so. I agree this sum is no substantial correction.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have you got the number of tons?

Mr. FOSTER. I had the memorandum before me a moment since.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amount manufactured was $107,000,000, and the amount imported, I think, ten or twelve thousand dollars; and therefore I said there had not been a dollar's worth imported.

Mr. FOSTER. In 1863-64 the amount was twenty-eight hundred and thirty reams of printing paper, valued at $7,962; of writing paper, $116,463; other manufactures of paper, $272,638; making a total of $389,101. That was the importation during the fiscal year 1863-64.

Now, Mr. President, I say the application of the principle of competition should be made in all other branches of manufacture as well as in this, and for the same reason; and I do not believe that we can at this time go into that competition without shutting up our mills. That there is any monopoly in the price of paper in this country by a combination among manufacturers I look upon as one of the idle fancies of the hour. Why, sir, there are between seven and eight hundred mills in the country, owned by as many men, scattered all over the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The idea that these persons are to combine and fix the price of paper above its real value and compel the people to buy it, is simply ridiculous. There is no such thing, and there can be no such thing. If paper making is a profitable business, the capitalists of this country are shrewd, discerning men, and they will go into the manufacture of paper; and if the price is too high it will be brought down, and brought down to a reasonable rate; and there is no danger and no possibility of a monopoly of a manufacture of this description.

In order to make an article cheap, there must be a competition in the sale; and that is just what these various paper manufacturers are doing. They are going about the country and competing with each other in the sale of their product; and that is what always makes an article cheap—competition in sale. If this policy should be inaugurated of reducing the duty on paper to three per cent., imposing in effect a penalty on the manufacture of paper here, our manufacturers could go abroad and manufacture cheaper than they could here. The effect of that policy would be to diminish all competition as regards sales, and make a competition only in the matter of purchase; and that is what raises the price of an article—competition in the purchase. Competition in the sale is what makes it cheap. Why do we not hear of a combination among the cotton manufacturers, or the woolen manufacturers, the iron manufacturers, or any other manufacturers, as well as a combination among the paper manufacturers?

Mr. JOHNSON. They were charged with it originally when the factories first started, but it was soon found to be unfounded.

Mr. FOSTER. So I apprehend will it be found in regard to this, for it is impossible in the nature of things that it should continue. The amount manufactured at different points and in different States is too wide-spread, the interests of the people who are engaged in the manufacture are too diverse to enable them thus to unite and monopolize an article of this sort. I have already stated that the amount produced in the country during the last year was almost thirty million dollars; and it is scattered over every State. I have returns from twenty-three States now before me, that paid taxes to this Government on the paper manufactured within them the last year. The idea that the manufacturers extended over twenty-three States are going to combine to make a monopoly is, as I have said, perfectly ridiculous. This is a great interest, and it is not to be struck at with impunity. I do not mean with impunity as regards the power of the manufacturers; they are in our hands no doubt; but I mean with regard to the interests of the country. We shall strike a blow at public prosperity when we strike a blow at so important a branch of industry as this.

I have spoken of the amount produced in the State of Ohio. The little State of Delaware produced last year the amount of $675,033. The great State of New York produced $8,014,900; the State of Massachusetts $7,555,933; the State of Connecticut, a small State, contributed her quota in the sum of $2,792,066.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have you Maryland there? Mr. FOSTER. No, sir, I have not; at least I do not put my eye upon it now. I say that these interests are too important and too large to be trifled with, and that any attempt to reduce the present duty is a blow at their prosperity.

Mr. President, I am quite free to avow myself a disciple in the school of Henry Clay of glorious memory in regard to the protection of domestic industry. I know that that doctrine found strong opposers and was jeered at and derided by the southern and southwestern States during all the life, or most of the life, of that great man; but unless I am greatly mistaken the experience of the last four years has taught the southern and southwestern States the wisdom and the sagacity of the policy taught and advocated by that ardent Kentuckian, but more ardent American, Henry Clay. The States in rebellion, if they had but adopted the system advocated so strongly by him, would have been in a condition to make a vastly better fight against us than they have done; and if the northern States had not to a considerable extent adopted that policy, we should have been beaten and driven ignominiously from the field long ago. Our Government would have been overthrown—prostrated. Unless I am greatly mistaken the day is not distant when our country, united again as it was, again having all the States represented here, no star fallen, the policy of domestic industry which was advocated as I have said by our great departed statesman, will have its strongest advocates and friends from the South and Southwest. The stern school of necessity, experience, has made converts in that region that reason and argument failed to make. This will be a tribute to the wisdom of the policy all the more valuable because it will come from most reluctant sources.

Mr. President, in order to raise the great amounts of money which we are now called upon to raise, we must develop our internal resources and cherish our home industry. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] is entirely right. We must open our mines (and they are inexhaustible) of coal and iron and lead and copper and silver and gold, not forgetting the ever-flowing fountains of oil. We must put into tillage and under cultivation our broad fields and vast prairies until they wave with golden grain, and echo with the song of the reaper. Then, sir, as the Senator from Ohio says, our debt, mighty as it is now in name, will never be felt as a burden. Our country will be united, happy, prosperous, glorious, and free, the joy of the whole earth. But if we adopt the contrary policy, if instead of employing our people at home and manufacturing the articles which we need as well as the articles of luxury and elegance which we now import from abroad, we purchase everything abroad because we can there buy cheaper, the course of the country will be rapidly downward; between us and national bankruptcy, repudiation, and ruin, there will be but a few steps. I hope we shall not take the initial one-to-day by repealing this duty on paper, or indeed by meddling with it at all. Sound policy and wise statesmanship require us to leave it where it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] to postpone the further consideration of this bill indefinitely.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senate will not postpone this matter, but meet it fairly by vote. There has been a great deal of discussion in the public prints and through the country and in the State Legislatures on the subject of the duty on paper, and I much prefer to decide it than to postpone it. In my own State the feeling is almost universally in favor of a reduction of the duty on paper. So strong was the feeling that when the subject was presented to the Ohio Legislature, the resolutions referred to by my colleague were passed by an almost unanimous vote, perhaps without a division. Occupying the position I did as chairman of the Committee on Finance, and not agreeing entirely with the opinion of the Legislature, I reexamined the whole question with the sincere desire to comply with their request. I do not regard their resolutions as controlling my vote, but only as an opinion entitled to great weight and conclusive on questions about which I have doubts. The preamble and resolution is as follows:

"Whereas the duty on imported paper amounts to prohibition, and produces no revenue, but costs the Government an amount estimated at $500,000 per annum; and whereas said duty is an unprofitable tax upon the people, and a needless limitation upon the freedom of the press: Therefore,

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives are hereby requested to exert their influence for the removal or diminution of said duty."

We are requested to remove or diminish the duty on paper. To remove the duty entirely, without removing the excise on domestic paper, could not have been contemplated by the Legislature, as its gross injustice is apparent. I am willing to diminish it, but not to the extent desired. If the question was presented to the members of the Legislature, for whom I have high respect, as it has been to me, I do not believe five members of either branch would vote in favor of a reduction of the duty to the rate of three per cent. They desired no doubt to see a reduction in the price of paper, because under the operation of the high price of paper many of the local country papers have been driven out of existence. I have received letters from editors and publishers in different parts of my State demanding and urging the repeal of the duty on paper. They say to me that the local papers are being driven out of existence, but this is by competition with the large papers in the cities of Cleveland, Columbus, and Cincinnati, and with the papers in New York, and not by the high price of paper. Without looking to the cause of this increased price, they naturally suppose that it is caused by the tariff laws.

When I came to examine this question in the first instance, I supposed that the duty on paper did in fact, to some extent, operate on the price of the paper; but on an examination of the laws I found that the rate of duty now is less than ever before. If the present rate of twenty per cent. would make the high price, what would the former rate of thirty-five per cent., and at one time forty per cent., make it? When I came to examine the price as compared with other commodities, I found that it has risen no more than anything else, and not as much as the necessities of life. The price of paper at the highest was about twenty-eight cents, and now it is about twenty cents, per pound. When coin was the standard, it was ten cents to ten and a half cents; so that it is not now more than double the former price, while iron, nails, cloth, and every commodity used by all classes of citizens are more than doubled in price. The complaint made by the consumers of paper, therefore, is the same complaint that might be made by the consumer of every commodity: owing to the inflation of paper money and the withdrawal of large numbers of laborers from the ordinary branches of industry, the price of every commodity has risen from two to three hundred per cent.

I observed also further, by a comparison of the price of paper and gold, that it only followed that invariable standard of value. At the commencement of the war, paper was ten cents per pound. When gold advanced to 280, it was twenty-eight cents; when it fell to 200 it was twenty cents per pound, and so on, governed by the invariable standard. I was satisfied under these circumstances, that the duty on imported paper did not create this large price. It was the price of gold; it was the price of the commodities that enter into the manufacture of paper; it was the price of labor; it was the price of iron and all the materials which enter into and formed a part of the expenses of the laboring man of the country. All these had advanced in proportion, and the duty had but little to do with it. When reduced from thirty-five to twenty per cent. paper still advanced with gold.

Then, again, when I came to examine the fact that we levied upon our own manufacturers ten per cent., and this could be demonstrated in figures so plain that every school-boy could see it, the proposition to levy only three per cent. on the foreign manufacturer was abhorrent to my sense of justice. The Legislature of Ohio has not, and would not, if here, vote for that proposition; a proposition to make a discrimination in favor of the Canada manufacturers, on the opposite side of our lakes, of at least seven per cent.; a proposition to make a discrimination in favor of the manufacturers in Belgium, where labor is cheap, of seven per cent. It was not only a departure from the principles advocated by the great body of the Legislative Assembly of Ohio, but it was a departure from any principle ever advocated by the free-trade men.

Mr. FOSTER. Except imposing a penalty for making paper in this country.

Mr. SHERMAN. What was the principle of the free-trade men of the country? All of them said that American industry ought to be placed on the same footing and with the same competition with foreign industry, so that if any occupation of life proved to be unprofitable by fair competition the people might go to some other employment. But, sir, the proposed tax of three per cent. on foreign paper was absolute discrimination against the home manufacturer.

I will take a case put by the figures. We manufacture now $80,000,000 worth of paper as shown by the statistics. The amount now paid to the Government as internal revenue and as customs on that is about $7,000,000; I mean including the duties on chemicals. There is, first, three per cent. on all manufactured paper. Then there is the duty of five per cent. for the income tax. Then there are all these chemicals, all the materials that enter into the manufacture. Taking these together, it is proven very plainly that on the average the duty is ten per cent. on the aggregate value of the paper; so that in one form or another, the internal duty on paper in its various forms—books, newspapers, &c.—is at least $8,000,000. If we were to import that amount of paper into the country, instead of manufacturing it in our own country, what would be the effect? We would get three per cent. on $40,000,000 in gold. Reduced to the foreign valuation that $80,000,000 would be about $40,000,000 in gold, and a duty of three per cent. on $40,000,000 would be $1,200,000 in gold, or, reduced to our standard of value, would be $2,400,000 in the place of $8,000,000; so that by this proposition, passed by the House of Representatives without much debate, the Government of the United States would lose in revenue five or six million dollars.

Who would be benefited by it? Would the newspapers be benefited? Not at all. They would destroy home competition, because under this discrimination against home industry no paper manufactory could be carried on here. They would destroy our mills at home, and then we would be at the mercy of the paper manufacturers abroad; and not only that, we would have to export $40,000,000 in gold to pay for that which formerly was made at home, giving employment to our own people. Such a proposition as that, if submitted to the Legislature of Ohio, after full discussion, I venture to say would not have been approved by three members of that body.

And, sir, my own position on this subject has been misrepresented at home. All the newspapers in Ohio are naturally in favor of the largest possible reduction. There is scarcely a paper in the State but what has, without examining the question critically, demanded a repeal of all duty on paper. Since this subject has been called up, in opening one of my letters, I find this extract inclosed to me by a friend:

"Senator SHERMAN does not deserve the thanks of the people of Ohio for his motion in the Senate the other day to amend the House resolution reducing the duty on paper, by striking out three and inserting fifteen. We hope the Senate will not sanction any such measure, even though backed up by the Finance Committee."

I have no doubt that this is a friendly criticism; and I have not the slightest doubt that the editor of that paper, whom I know personally, if he was here this day, and called upon to vote, as I am, would vote against the proposition to reduce the duty to three per cent.

In the first place, this extract misrepresents my position. I have never been in favor of a duty of fifteen per cent., because I think that is higher than is necessary. As the organ of the Committee on Finance, I reported it as an amendment. My position from the beginning has been that a duty of ten per cent. was ample for all the purposes of creating a healthy competition between the manufacturers abroad and the manufacturers at home. The article itself does not need any protection. I have no doubt the writer of this paper thought that a duty of three per cent. on the imported article would be ample protection and would yield us as much revenue, when it can be demonstrated by the plainest figures that it would be a surrender of at least $5,000,000 of revenue and a discrimination against our own industry; that it would tend to destroy all the manufactories of paper in this country, and thus eventually lead to an increase of the price. I do not believe that either the Legislative Assembly or the newspaper editors of Ohio would favor such a result.

It is now manifest, Mr. President, that Congress must hereafter act upon new principles in framing revenue laws. No longer will we have controversies about protecting domestic industry. Our debt and the necessities of taxation will be ample protection. During war the inflation of paper money and the withdrawal into the Army of a vast number of operatives will leave ample and profitable employment for all others. We now need labor, and it wants no protection. It can protect itself. Everywhere it is profitably employed. But we want money. Our laws hereafter will be revenue laws. The only principle upon which they will be hereafter based will be to produce the largest revenue from sources least burdensome to the people. All interests must pay their fair share. I do not agree with my colleague that protection is now necessary, for the taxation indispensably necessary is protection enough. We may hereafter with many commodities wish to invite foreign competition, as we do now with printing paper. Whenever the tendency in any manufacture is to monopoly or an unreasonable advance of prices, it may be politic to induce some competition; but this should never be done by discriminating against home producers, and never by levying a higher tax on our manufacture than we do on the foreign one.

The principle to be adopted now, while we are so much in debt, is to levy that rate of duty which will yield the largest revenue. The great want of the Government now is revenue. Whether that revenue comes to us in the form of duty on imported goods, or whether it is yielded to us in the form of internal revenue, it equally sustains the public credit. There is no basis of public credit, there is no mode by which we can sustain the public credit, there is no mode by which we can pay the national debt, except by heavy taxes; I do not like any class of men to seek to evade their portion of the duty. Whoever they may be, they are the common enemies of the country. Those who during the last year evaded the income tax all over this country, those who seek in any way to evade their portion of the taxes, are the common enemies of the country.

I therefore am in favor of such a system, not only of tariff but of our revenue laws, as will yield the largest sum of money possible that can be collected from the people. It can be collected now better than at any other time. It can be collected now in the form of currency, which will answer our purpose; but if it be delayed two or three years longer it will have to be paid in gold. Therefore every proposition which reduces the revenue, I do not care by whom demanded, I am opposed to; and every proposition that is reasonable in itself, that will increase the revenue, either in the form of gold or paper money, that I am in favor of. Our people must be prepared, and they are willing, to meet these large taxes; and no class of the community can evade them, however powerful they may be. I trust, therefore, sir, that the Senate will not postpone this bill, but will let us have a fair vote on the different propositions. I am informed by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] that he desires to submit to the Senate a proposition to make the duty ten per cent. I was instructed by the Committee on Finance to submit an amendment making it fifteen per cent. I trust that we may have a vote and decide these questions, so that we shall close the matter to-night.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COLLAMER. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall vote against the motion to postpone indefinitely, because I think it is much more advisable to take a vote upon each one of these propositions. I am in favor of retaining the duty of twenty per cent. just as it is, but, as I have stated, I shall vote against the indefinite postponement of this bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harris, Morrill, Nye, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wade—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Conness, Davis, Farwell, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Willey, and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cardile, Chandler, Harding, Harlan, McDougall, Morgan, Sausbury, Stewart, Wilkinson, and Wright—11.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out the word "fifteen" in the fifth line, and inserting the word "ten," so as to make the duty ten per cent.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Should this amendment prevail, the whole cotton interest of this country will have reason for complaint. The causes that have operated to enhance the price of paper are the legitimate consequences of this war. Previous to the war, the cotton interest of this country consumed perhaps nine hundred thousand bales per annum. The paper interest, consuming the refuse of this cotton, used nearly twenty per cent. of that amount. To-day the cotton manufacturing of the country is reduced to twenty-five per cent. of its former value. This interest pays large sums into the Treasury; five per cent. of the gross amount of its product directly, and indirectly double this amount. My belief is that this interest has not accumulated a dollar of profit in the aggregate since the commencement of this war. Its only accumulation has been derived from the enhanced value of stock on hand. Newspaper interests may present as favorable a condition in this respect. The value of paper has been enhanced by the withdrawal from consumption of the cotton-waste of these manufactures. By this amendment, you virtually deprive this cotton interest of what remains of this source of their revenue, and thus advance the price of all commodities produced from cotton. It will be seen that if foreign manufactures are employed in the production of this paper—and such will be the legitimate result of the proposed amendment—this twenty per cent. of cotton, now sold to our paper manufacturers, will have no market, and cotton manufacturers must compensate themselves for this loss of revenue by increasing the price of other products.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one other phase of this question. This matter, upon its introduction, was first referred to the proper committee of the House of Representatives; but before they had opportunity to listen to the remonstrances of the manufacturers, or to consider the facts bearing upon this question, the subject was hurried before the House, and, without discussion, presented to the Senate. Whatever may be the result of the vote upon this question, I shall rejoice that the subject has received proper consideration from this body; for, sir, in the operations of any interest, in the prosecution of any business, let the fear once become instilled that legislation unnecessarily interrupts the ordinary prosecution of business, and it will destroy confidence in trade. When the people begin to understand that they cannot depend upon the stability and justice of legislation, there is then no confidence, and no reward for labor. It has seemed to me that the cause for this legislation is synonymous with that of the king in the parable, who, not because he feared God or regarded man, listened to his petitioners. "Yet because this woman troubleth me I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me," said he. There is no interest in this country that has not as good claim to a hearing before the Senate as the newspaper or printing interest, which so strongly urges the adoption of this measure. It was because they were troubled and wearied by the newspaper press throughout the country that this measure received the assent of the other House, and it is now proposed to give to it the sanction of the Senate. The interest of the paper manufacturer, the laborer, and the Treasury, cannot be heard. They cannot say to their legislators, "Unless you defend and protect our interest we shall deny our aid when you feel the necessity for our favor."

Sir, this measure affects every interest in the country. The income to the Treasury is affected unfavorably by its adoption, as is the income derived from the prosecution of this business by the capitalist and employes. The men engaged in this manufacture pay heavy taxes to the Government; the operatives pay taxes upon everything necessary to their subsistence; and the farmer is furnished with a market for his produce proportionate to the number engaged in the development and prosecution of this interest. Now, it is proposed to introduce into this country, in competition with this interest, a foreign commodity, free from all Government taxes, and from all the burdens incident to this great war. Sir, this is no time for legislation unfavorable to the interests of the laborer, the interests that sustain the Government and support the war.

I do not believe that the newspaper interest of this country will derive the smallest advantage from the adoption of this measure to reduce the tariff. I have given my opinion as to one of the causes of the increased price of paper—the enhanced value of cotton-waste, increased by the small quantity necessarily produced. The cost of every other material that enters into its production, from the increased demand and Government imposts, has also advanced. When this clamor respecting the duty on paper was first raised cotton was at $1 90 per pound. Now it is eighty cents, and the price of paper proportionately affected. It is not legislation that is needed to decrease the price of paper.

But, sir, the honorable Senator from Ohio has suggested the dangers arising from a monopoly. There is no doubt that at times there are temporary evils to be feared from monopoly; but the energy, the ingenuity, the enterprise, and the public spirit of the American people will never tolerate, for any length of time, such a system. It may not be known to Senators, but it is a fact, that previous to this war the products of manufactures that had had time to perfect themselves in this country could be produced here and were furnished to the people of this country nearly as cheap as were similar articles to the people of England and France, where their manufacture had been brought to the highest state of perfection. At that time our rate of duty was twenty-four per cent. So, in this case, we shall achieve the same result in the manufacture of paper, if we do not discourage and destroy our own manufactures by introducing as competitors with their products foreign products that are exempt from the duties and taxation imposed upon our own. I have before asserted that I did not think the newspaper interest would derive the least advantage from the proposed legislation; but this blow, aimed at the paper interest, strikes at the foundation of our strength. It strikes at our resources, and at the laboring and producing interests of the country. It is for these reasons I complain of it and resist it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, there are three theories on the subject of impost duties advocated by their respective believers. One is the system of free trade, which is wholly inap-plicable to the present condition of the finances and debt of this country, and which, I think, would be impolitic even if we had no debt, in a time of peace. There is another theory, that we should tax for the purpose of revenue; and still a third theory, that we should tax to protect the American article. Let us test this matter of the paper tax in reference to the last two theories.

First, then, it is an admitted fact that as a revenue measure the twenty per cent. fails; it does not produce any revenue, because there are no foreign importations; in other words, the tax of twenty per cent. is a prohibition and not protection. So far forth as it may be necessary to raise revenue and pay the debts of the country, the whole argument has failed. Then how far should we protect, and what is the measure of protection? Surely not twenty per cent., because that is prohibition, and there is no competition with the foreign article at all; and I have introduced this amendment proposing ten per cent. supposing it would give ample protection and retain the market in the hands of our manufacturers, and at the same time lessen the price of paper to the paper consumer.

The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] sets out with the proposition that there should be stability in our legislation. Doubtless stability is a good thing, but why do we tax at all? For the purpose of raising revenue to pay our debts. And what is the measure of that tax? Simply the necessities of the Government; and what it may be necessary to tax one day we may be compelled to increase the next, and the whole theory of taxation in a time of war, when debts are rapidly accumulating, implies change and instability, and nothing else, and manufacturers and all others must operate with a view to that continuing and shifting change in the debt of the country, for taxes are only necessary to pay the debt.

There is another position of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island which I think answers itself. He says he does not believe the newspaper men will be benefited one cent by this reduction of the duty on paper. If not, why not? Because they will have to pay precisely as much for the paper then as they do now. Then if the manufacturer sells at the same price, he is not injured to the amount of a single cent. If the paper buyer pays the same price the manufacturer cannot be injured, for he gets the same price; and it seems to me that that argument thoroughly answers itself.

We have been told by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that a tax of ten per cent. will in his opinion be ample and afford sufficient protection to our manufacturers, but a tax of three per cent. would not be enough, because our paper manufacturers on the materials they use pay about seven per cent., and would enter the market that much worse than the foreign producers; but it seems to me that ten per cent. would retain the sale of the paper and the manufacture of the paper at home, and at the same time reduce precisely to that extent the price to the consumers, the paper buyers.

Gentlemen talk of protecting American labor. Here are fifty thousand people employed in manufacturing paper, while there are six or eight million, perhaps, habitually buying paper; and for the purpose of protecting the smaller number you enable that smaller number to extort from the larger, for it is nothing else. Whenever a tariff becomes prohibitory, whenever it excludes the foreign article, to that extent the home manufacturers are enabled to charge precisely, in an ordinary state of market, that much more to the consumer. I propose now to reduce to the consumer at the rate of ten per cent. upon paper, and at the same time give ample protection to the paper manufacturer, and with no view to leave unprotected American capital and American labor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter into statistics in relation to this article of manufacture, but merely to state in a very few words the conclusions to which I have come. The proposition that the increased price paid by the American consumer who uses paper is to be attributed to the tax is, as I think, wholly unfounded. That increase is to be attributed, as is the increase upon every article, whether of necessity or of luxury, to the state of the currency. Gold itself is worth no more now than it was before the war commenced. A dollar is yet but a dollar; and although a dollar in gold is equal now in point of value for all purposes to some two dollars or more in currency, it is not because its intrinsic value is any more than it was at first, but is owing to the fact that we have an inflated currency, and to the further fact that a great part of that inflated currency is made a legal tender.

The tax of twenty per cent. on the foreign manufacture has been in existence some time, and the effect of it has been to induce the domestic enterprise of our citizens to an extent which has led them to invest some eighty or ninety million dollars in paper factories, and they are producing now an annual product of about one hundred and seven million dollars. The honorable member from Indiana says that there are two things to be accomplished by means of a tariff. The first is to raise revenue, and the other is to protect domestic industry. He thinks that this tax of twenty per cent. is not a tax which can be supposed to be one to raise revenue, because the effect of the tax has been to exclude altogether the foreign article. That is true. We are not raising revenue, to be sure, by an impost upon the foreign article; but if the effect of the impost upon the foreign article has been to encourage the creation of the domestic article, and to such an extent that the taxes which we have imposed upon the domestic article amount to a sum much larger than would be the duty upon the foreign article, then the effect of the duty in its result is to raise revenue. If, for example, you were to reduce the duty, and the foreign article was imported, and the impost upon the foreign article would only be, as the chairman of the committee says, some two or three million dollars, and by doing so you prostrate the domestic article, the duty upon which is eight or ten million dollars, you are just a loser in revenue of the amount of the difference, and you must make that up in some other way.

Now, whatever doubt there may have existed originally, and particularly with those gentlemen at the South, and some at the North, who have contested the authority of Congress to protect directly the domestic manufacture by imposing a tax, yet I suppose it never has been doubted by anybody that you can so appropriate the taxes among the foreign articles as to operate indirectly to encourage the production of domestic articles; and the whole question is, to what extent will you go in that indirect encouragement? I do not doubt now, I never did doubt, that under the authority to levy imposts you might exclude the foreign article altogether. The debates in the Convention, the writings of Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton contemporaneously with it, the passage of the first tariff bill by the First Congress which was organized under the Constitution, and which upon its face professed to be a bill for the encouragement of manufactures, all in my judgment warrant the opinion that under the power to lay such taxes you may exclude altogether the foreign article.

But that is not the question here. The question here is, we being in a state of war, is it not better to keep the taxes as they are, the domestic tax as it is, and the foreign tax as it is, provided the result of the two is that we get a larger amount through the taxing power than we should do if we repealed the foreign tax?

But there is another consideration. If by your legislation you encourage the industry and enterprise of the country to appropriate its means to any particular article of manufacture, and by force of that encouragement millions and millions of dollars have been invested, it seems to me to be unjust, after men have made the investment, while they are in the course of realizing what they expected to realize by reason of the investment, and after they made the investment at your instance, under the protection of your legislation, that you should strike at once a blow that will render it either altogether or comparatively valueless.

If the object of those who are in favor of a reduction of this tax either to three per cent. or to ten per cent. is to produce what they call a fair competition between the domestic manufacturer and the foreign manufacturer, the way to do that is to reduce the duty upon every article which enters into the manufacture of paper. Do that and we shall start fair, and starting fair I have no doubt that the skill and industry of the American artificer and manufacturer will be equal to compete successfully with the foreign manufacturer, although the price of labor is dearer here than it is abroad; but such a bill as this is to discriminate against the domestic manufacture; it is to encourage the foreign and to prohibit the domestic.

Mr. President, we can very readily imagine, or at least I think I can, why it is that the popular judgment, the judgment of the House of Representatives and the judgment of politicians generally, has been brought to doubt whether the complaint of these newspaper editors is not well founded. They seem to speak the public voice; they have got the exclusive possession of the public ear; and they are the men who in relation to this particular tax are now acting together. They are monopolizing the public judgment. They are very clever men; but how have they suffered? The daily papers have not suffered; they have raised the prices of their subscriptions and of their advertisements in an amount equal to the increased expense to which they have been subjected by the condition of the currency. The weekly papers suffer, but why do they suffer? A great many of them have gone out of existence a little sooner, perhaps, than they would otherwise have done; but it is to be remembered that we are in a state of war; every man desires to know in the morning in what condition is the country, what battles have been fought, what is the state of the market, what is going on in Washington; and he does not take a weekly paper, for that does not inform him; he takes the papers that come out every day, consults the telegraph, and has no occasion for a weekly paper. It falls not so much because it is unable to compete on account of the difference in the price of paper, but because it is unequal to compete with the daily papers in that kind of information which everybody wants to receive from day to day and hour to hour. A man wants to consult the telegraph, and that goes for those who can pay for it; the weekly papers cannot afford to pay for it.

Now, Mr. President, if we have established a system of manufacture in relation to this article and other articles so that they can compete now with like manufactures all over the world, let us preserve them in that condition. We ought to be able to compete with the world. We ought to encourage (if it can be done without loss of trade) every enterprise in which our citizens may engage. Our people having engaged in this business to the extent of eighty or ninety or a hundred million dollars, and making now just as much paper as is wanted, nobody complains that there is not paper enough in the country to answer the wants of the country; the whole objection is as to its price. Why interfere in this way? If you reduce the price by removing the tax upon the foreign article, and by so doing you destroy the domestic article altogether, put an end to the seven hundred mills which are in operation, how long do you think the price will be less than it is now? Never, except for a few months. Although it is true as a general thing that the tax which you impose upon the foreign article is added to the price which is charged for it to the consumer, we all know that the foreign manufacturer, the moment he gets a chance, if he sees that he can strike a blow upon the domestic manufacturer, will send the material in, and sell it at a loss, and he can afford to sell it at a loss for a year or two, if by so doing he can break down the domestic manufacturer, and himself afterward monopolize the market of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. COWAN. I beg Senators to remember that if they vote for this amendment they vote to reduce the revenue. A ton of paper with gold at 225 now yields to the Government $40 63. Reduce the duty ten per cent., admit the foreign article, and then upon every ton of imported paper we shall get, with gold at 225, but thirty-six dollars; so that this proposition is fatal, even according to the argument of its own friends. The honorable Senator from Ohio states that he will treat as the enemy of the country him who endeavors to duce the amount of revenue. I am not prepared to say that I will do that. If that be the true rule, this amendment ought not to prevail, because it will unquestionably reduce the revenue just to the amount I have stated, $4 63 on every ton of paper when gold is at 225.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not understand that we are in such great straits for revenue as the Senator from Pennsylvania seems to imagine. Since we convened this morning we have passed a bill appropriating $500,000 a year, I believe, for a steamship line, with the approbation, I think, of every member of the Committee on Finance except the chairman.

Mr. COWAN. I ask the honorable Senator from Iowa whether I did not vote with him on that bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I thought otherwise.

Mr. COWAN. If the Senator is of opinion that we are in such straits, I ought also to have credit for being of the same opinion.

Mr. GRIMES. All I have to say is that of the gentlemen who are going to treat all those who are willing to reduce any particular tax as enemies of the country—the Committee on Finance—five out of seven voted for the proposition.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator from Iowa would except one more member of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think a majority of the Committee on Finance voted against that bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, and Trumbull—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Harris, Johnson, Morrill, Nye, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Chandler, Hale, Harding, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Stewart, and Wright—10.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of the Committee on Finance,

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Trumbull, and Wilkinson—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Hale, Harding, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, and Wright—7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer the following amendment as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of April next the duties on the following articles imported into the United States shall be as follows:

On teas of all kinds twelve and a half cents per pound.
On all sugars not above No. 12, Dutch standard in color, one and a half cent per pound.

On all sugars above No. 12, and not above No. 15, Dutch standard in color, two cents per pound.

On all refined sugar in the form of loaf, lump, crushed, powdered, and pulverized granulated, and all stove-dried, and other sugar above No. 20, Dutch standard in color, two and a half cents per pound.

On molasses from sugar-cane, four cents per gallon.
On syrup of sugar-cane juice, melado, concentrated melado, or concentrated molasses, one and three fourth cents per pound.

The present rates of duty on all imported coffees shall be reduced one half of their amounts respectively.

I ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment. The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Hendricks, Nesmith, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, and Wilkinson—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Carlile, Grimes, Harding, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Richardson, and Wright—9.

So the amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed, and the resolution be read the third time.

The resolution was read the third time, and the question being on its passage,

Mr. WADE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Farwell, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nye, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Wiley, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harris, Johnson, Morrill, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilkinson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Carlile, Harding, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, and Wright—10.

So the joint resolution was passed.

The question recurs on the passage of the resolution, which will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, in endeavoring to ascertain the disposition of the insurgents in arms against the authority of the Federal Government, with a view to negotiations for peace and a restoration of the Union, is entitled to the gratitude of a suffering and distracted country; and that with a similar view he be respectfully requested to omit no honorable exertions which may lead to the desired object, to wit: peace and union.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his resolution for the present, and allow me to offer one?

Mr. COX. I withdraw it temporarily.

PICTURE FOR THE CAPITOL.

PEACE CONFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox], which was temporarily laid aside this morning for the introduction of the joint resolution just disposed of. On this resolution the previous question has been moved.

Mr. COX. As we had a very satisfactory vote on this question the other day, I will not press the resolution further. I withdraw it.

DESTITUTION AMONG COLORED PEOPLE.

Mr. ASHLEY. I offer the following preamble and resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Whereas it is reported that in consequence of the rebellion and since the proclamation of emancipation, a large number of women and children of the freedmen have, as a military necessity, been brought out of the States of Virginia, Maryland, and other States, and left in and around the national capital; and whereas it is reported that already many of such persons have died for want of food, clothing, and fuel; and whereas it is reported that many of the husbands of said women and the fathers of said children are now in the service of the United States and fighting in defense of the Government: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the truth of such reports, and that said committee report what action, if any, is proper for this House to take in the premises; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the preamble and resolution were agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution and preamble were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Would it be in order to move that the spring elections be held in this Hall? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It would not.

The previous question was seconded; there being, on a division—ayes sixty-three, noes not counted.

The main question was ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

An act (S. No. 281) for the relief of Alexander J. Atocha.

RESTORATION OF THE UNION.

Mr. DAWSON submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas the American people have now been engaged in a civil war of gigantic dimensions for nearly four years, which has resulted in frightful destruction of life, property, and treasure, creating an enormous public debt, imposing the most oppressive taxes, covering the land with affliction, corrupting the general morals, and putting in peril the liberties of the nation; and whereas on the part of the United States and the people of the States which adhere to this Government this is, and ought to be, a war solely to vindicate the Constitution and restore the laws to their just supremacy, and to that we are bound by our oaths and by our solemn pledges made in the face of the world when the war commenced: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to use all honorable and just means to bring about a lasting peace and the reestablishment of fraternal relations among all the people by a restoration of the Union upon the simple and just basis of the Constitution and laws, with every proper guarantee to the southern States that they shall be protected in the full enjoyment of their rights, and that undisturbed control of their own local affairs which the Federal Constitution was intended to secure to them and to us.

White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—65.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

PEACE.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, 1. That there is no power under the Constitution, in any branch of this Government, to treat with the States confederated in rebellion against it, either for the severance of this Union or for the abrogation of any article of its fundamental law.

Resolved, 2. That inasmuch as the said confederated States have taken up arms against the Government of the United States without any just provocation, and for the avowed purpose of asserting and establishing their independence thereof, and still persist in maintaining that position by armed resistance to its authority: and inasmuch also as the public authorities of this nation have not only declared, as was their duty, that they can accept no terms and entertain no propositions for anything short of absolute and unconditional submission to its laws, and with a clemency and magnanimity almost without example in history have proclaimed a general amnesty, without limits as to time, to such of the malefactors as shall return to their duty, with the exception only of the chief conspirators:

It is hereby declared to be the sense of this House that this Government has already exhausted all the resources of a just and wise statesmanship—except so far as regards the further earnest and vigorous prosecution of the war for the enforcement of the laws—in the effort to restore peace to this nation, and has, to this end, done all that a proper regard for its own interests can allow, and all that a decent respect for the opinions of the world could demand of it; and that therefore any further overtures through embassies, public or private, official or unofficial, looking to treaty or compromise with the usurpers at Richmond, would be not only unprofitable, as they would be inconsistent with the rights and dignity of this nation, but are to be deprecated as absolutely mischievous, in giving encouragement to the insurgents and protracting their resistance, by exposing us to misconception, and giving color to the delusion that we mistrust our ability to subdue them to obedience, and are ready to accept something short of the restoration of the Union and the unconditional submission of those who have rebelled against it.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. HOLMAN asked that the resolution be divided.

Mr. MORRILL. As I consider this a resolution we ought to consider, and in order that we may see it in print, I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. The main question has been ordered and must now be put.

Mr. ASHLEY moved to reconsider the vote, by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. ARNOLD. If I get an opportunity I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that the resolution be laid on the table; and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 52, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Al-Jey, Aines, Ancona, Anderson, Bailey, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanier, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Dumont, Eckley, Edgerton, Eldridge, Eliot, Finck, Frank, Gooch, Grider, Hale, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Miller, Morrill, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Pendleton, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Alexander H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Ross, Spalding, William G. Steele, Stiles, Townsend, Wadsworth, Webster, and Joseph W. White—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, Daniel Morris, Morehead, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blow, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Denning, Eden, English, Farnsworth, Ganson, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Harrington, Hotchkiss, Jenckes, Kerian, King, Knapp, Littlejohn, Marey, McAllister, McBride, McDowell, Samuel F. Steele, Stevens, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Voorhies, Ward, Elihu F. Washburne, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—58.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that the vote by which the resolution introduced by Mr. Dawson was laid on the table be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING objected.

ENROLLED BILLS.

The resolution was referred, under the rules, to the Committee on Printing.

TAX BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the tax bill.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The following clause was read:

That section ninety be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That any person, firm, company, or corporation, now or hereafter engaged in the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, or cigars of any description whatsoever, shall be, and hereby is, required to make out and deliver to the assistant assessor of the assessment district a true statement or inventory of the quantity of each of the different kinds of tobacco, snuff, flour, snuff, cigars, tin-foil, licorice, and stems held or owned by him or them on the day this act takes effect or at the time of commencing business under this act, setting forth what portion of said goods was manufactured or produced by him or them, and what was purchased from others, whether chewing, smoking, fine-cut, shorts, pressed plug, snuff flour or prepared snuff, or cigars, which statement or inventory shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of such person or persons, and be in manner and form as prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and the said person, firm, company, or corporation, engaged as aforesaid, on the 1st day of January in every year hereafter shall make out and deliver to the said assistant assessor a true statement or inventory, in manner and form as aforesaid, and verified as aforesaid, of all such articles aforesaid then held or owned by him or them, setting forth all and singular what is required to be set forth in the statement or inventory first aforesaid; and every such person, company, or corporation shall keep in a book, in such manner and form as said Commissioner may prescribe, an accurate account of all the articles aforesaid thereafter purchased by him or them, the quantity of tobacco, snuff, snuff-flour, or cigars, of whatever description, sold, consumed, or removed for consumption or sale, or removed from the place of manufacture; and he or they shall, on or before the 10th day of each month, furnish to the assistant assessor of the district a true and accurate copy of the entries in said book during the preceding month, which copy shall be verified by oath or affirmation, on the receipt whereof an assessment of the duties due by said person, company, or corporation, shall be immediately made and transmitted to the collector of the district, to whom said duties shall be paid within five days thereafter; and in case the duties shall not be paid within the said five days, the said collector may, on one day's notice, distrain for the same, with ten per cent. additional on the amount thereof, subject to all the provisions of law relating to licenses, returns, assessments, payments of taxes, liens, fines, penalties, and forfeitures, not inconsistent herewith in the case of other manufacturers; and such duty shall be paid by the manufacturer or the person for whom the goods are manufactured, as the assessor may deem best for the collection of the revenue: Provided, That it shall be the duty of any manufacturer or vendor of tin-foil used in covering manufactured tobacco, on demand of any officer of internal revenue, to render to such officer a correct statement, verified by oath or affirmation, of the quantity and amount of tin-foil sold or delivered to any person or persons named in such demand; and in case of refusal or neglect to render such statement, or of cause to believe such statement to be incorrect or fraudulent, the assessor of the district may cause an examination of persons, books, and papers to be made in the same manner as provided in the fourteenth section of this act: Provided, That manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, whether of domestic manufacture or imported, may be transferred, without payment of the duty, to a bonded warehouse, established in conformity with law and Treasury regulations, under such rules and regulations and upon the execution of such transportation bonds or other security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, said bonds or other security to be taken by the collector of the district from which such removal is made; and may be transported from such warehouse to a bonded warehouse used for the storage of merchandise at any port of entry, and may be withdrawn from bonded warehouse for consumption on payment of the duty, or removed for export to a foreign country without payment of duty in conformity with the provisions of law relating to the removal of distilled spirits, all the rules, regulations, and conditions of which, so far as applicable, shall apply to tobacco, snuff, or cigars, in bonded warehouse. And no drawback shall in any case be allowed upon any manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, upon which any excise duty has been paid, either before or after it has been placed in bonded warehouse.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend that clause by striking out in line two hundred and ninety-nine the words "the day this act takes effect," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the 1st day of January in each year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out the following words:

And the said person, firm, company, or corporation, engaged as aforesaid, on the 1st day of January in every year hereafter, shall make out and deliver to the said assistant assessor a true statement or inventory, in manner and form as aforesaid, and verified as aforesaid, of all such articles aforesaid then held or owned by him or them, setting forth all and singular what is required to be set forth in the statement or inventory first aforesaid.

Those words are not now necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by inserting the word "further" after the word "provided," in line three hundred and fifty-one. It is merely a verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by inserting after the words "tin-foil," wherever they occur, the words "or other materials."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by inserting on page 17, in line three hundred and ninety-seven, after the word "inspector" the words "unless otherwise provided;" so that the clause will read:

And any manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars, whether of domestic manufacture or imported, which shall be sold or pass out of the hands of the manufacturer or importer, except into a bonded warehouse, without the inspection marks or stamps affixed by the inspector, unless otherwise provided, shall be forfeited, and may be seized wherever found, and shall be sold, one half of the proceeds of such sale to be paid to the informer, and the other moiety to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I believe there is an omission in the same section to provide a penalty for the unauthorized use of inspection marks. I ask leave of the committee to reserve an amendment in that particular if, on further examination, it shall appear necessary.

No objection was made.

Mr. NELSON. On page 19, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "conclusive," in line four hundred and forty-six, the following:

By inserting after the words "on molasses produced from the sugar-cane" the words "and on maple molasses;" and by inserting after the words "when removed from the plantation" the words "on maple sirup;" and by inserting after the words "other than those produced by the refiner" the words "and on maple sugar;" and by striking out the words "produced directly from the sugar-cane, and not," in the paragraph relating to refined sugars, and inserting in the place thereof the words "and not produced;" and also in the second paragraph, relating to refined sugars, by striking out the words "produced directly from the sugar-cane, and not," and inserting in the place thereof the words "and not produced."

I offer this amendment for the purpose of imposing taxation upon an article that seems to have been entirely forgotten, and that is, maple sugar, which is produced to the extent of upward of nine million pounds in the State of Vermont, and throughout the country, according to the census of 1860, to the extent of 38,863,568 pounds. That was the production of maple sugar in the United States at that time. I think it is the only article that entirely escapes from taxation under this bill.

I find further by looking at the census of 1860, that of maple molasses there was produced in the United States, in 1860, 1,944,299 gallons, upon which there is no tax whatever.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Where does the gentleman propose to insert his amendment?

Mr. NELSON. If the gentleman will look at page 51 of the internal revenue act, he will see.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In what line of this bill?

Mr. NELSON. After the word "conclusive" in line four hundred and forty-six, on page 19.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suggest to the gentleman that his amendment, in order to follow the course of the existing law, should come in on the four hundred and thirty-second line, after the word "ten."

Mr. NELSON. I will move, then, to insert it at that point. If the gentleman will look at page 51 of the internal revenue bill, under the marginal note of "molasses," he will see that I propose to impose a duty of five cents a gallon upon maple molasses. After the words "molasses produced from the sugar-cane" I propose to insert "and maple sugar." And then, in the next paragraph, I propose to impose a tax of one cent and a quarter per gallon on sirups made from maple sugar. And in the next paragraph, where the marginal note is "brown sugar," I propose to insert "maple sugar," so that it shall pay a tax of two cents a pound. I propose also to amend the next paragraph by striking out the words "produced directly from the sugar-cane and not," and inserting in lieu thereof "not produced," so that it will include maple sugar when refined. I looked through the bill and found that nowhere in it was this production of nearly thirty-nine million pounds required to pay one cent into the Treasury, or this other production of nearly two million gallons. While everything else in that line is taxed, this article produced in some of the States seems, by an oversight, to have escaped the attention of the committee entirely.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose that the gentleman from New York has accomplished his purpose by merely introducing his amendment. He evidently intended to be a little sweet upon me. [A laugh.]

Now, the State of Vermont is not any more interested in this question than many other States. The State of New York produces a much larger quantity of maple sugar than we do in Vermont. The State of New Hampshire produces nearly as much, and a little more maple molasses; and the same thing is true of Ohio, and of other western and northern States.

There is no desire to relieve New England from any proper taxation. I think we should regard the cultivation of sugar in any direction as an important matter. So far as I am concerned, I never have been in favor of taxing even southern sugar. It is an article of prime necessity to the poor man as well as to the rich. The average consumption of our country is much above thirty pounds for every man, woman, and child.

I think that we ought to encourage its production by all proper means. I am told that in California and some of the western States beet sugar can be profitably cultivated. But, in the bill as it now stands, it never was the intention to collect any tax upon sorghum, or upon maple sugar, or upon the beet; and none has been levied. I presume it is not the purpose of this committee to change the policy of Congress in relation to this article.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to make an inquiry in reference to the produce from sorghum. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it is subject to no tax as a manufacture?

Mr. MORRILL. It is not, in the opinion of the committee, subject to any tax; but to prevent all doubt on this point, the bill now before the House proposes an amendment distinctly to exempt it. I understand that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has ruled that it is subject to tax as a manufacture. To exclude, beyond all peradventure, such a construction, the committee recommend an amendment to the present law.

Mr. KASSON. I move, pro forma, to strike out the second clause of the amendment.

I am not certain that I understand fully the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. NELSON.] If I do it proposes to tax the molasses made from sorghum or imphee. Am I correct?

Mr. NELSON. No, sir; my amendment leaves the present law stand just as it is in that respect.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman to state just what he proposes to tax.

Mr. NELSON. I propose to tax maple sugar and maple molasses.

Mr. KASSON. Then I leave the debate to other gentlemen.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, when the present bill was framed the committee very distinctly decided that they would not tax the product of sorghum, a growing interest which the committee decided it was essential to have cultivated. Just so with regard to maple sugar, the production of which costs more labor than even the production of sugar or molasses from sorghum. The present law provides as follows:

"On sirup of molasses or sugar-cane juice, when removed from the plantation, concentrated molasses or melado, and cistern bottoms, of sugar produced from the sugar-cane and not made from sorghum or imphee, a duty of one cent and one fourth of one cent per pound."

We supposed that that language made it very plain that no duty was to be levied upon the product of sorghum. But the learned head of the Internal Revenue department has decided that, under that provision imphee is subject to taxation, and he has accordingly required tax to be paid. In the amendments which we now propose we hope to make ourselves better understood, and we have declared that sorghum shall be among the things exempted. Nobody ever supposed that maple sugar should be taxed. I wonder, however, that has not been reckoned by the Commissioner among manufactures. We have in this bill taken great pains to exempt the product of sorghum, because it is an important growing interest, which in our view ought to be encouraged instead of being checked.

I have always been for taxing sugar; my colleague on the committee has not. I have been for taxing it while we are, as Jefferson Davis maintains, two nations. When we shall have become, by general agreement one nation, perhaps I shall be for exempting sugar, as we always did before the war. But so long as the southern rebellion continues, I am for taxing the sugar made outside of our lines, whether outside of our nation or not. But, as a substitute, I am in favor of encouraging the manufacture of sorghum and maple sugar and molasses.

I presume that the gentleman from New York does not know how troublesome it is to make sugar from maple. If he would go out on a cold morning and tap the trees and then carry the sap by a yoke upon his shoulder, a bucket full of sap at each end of it, and then if he would set about boiling this sap, he would come to the conclusion that maple sugar is sufficiently taxed.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I see by the census of 1860 that New York produced upward of ten million pounds of maple sugar. Will the gentleman tell me what was the price of maple sugar in 1860, and what is its price in the market to-day? I also desire the gentleman to state whether maple sugar is not an article in general use, to be found in the markets, and bought and sold not by small quantities; but by bulk, and whether the producers have not increased the price in proportion to the increased price of everything else.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what it cost in 1860, but I dare say that it has gone up with everything else. As to this being made and brought to market, I think that it is not so: I find that it is considered as a special delicacy, and perhaps the boys in the cars may bring it about and sell it. I think that the House will agree with me that it ought not to be taxed.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. I renew it. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this article will be passed over by the House. It seems to me that the gentleman from New York [Mr. NELSON] is using microscopic powers to find out what ought to be taxed in this bill. Of all the articles produced in the United States I think that this is one which claims exemption from taxation.

I live in a State where a good deal of maple sugar is produced. It is not produced for sale, for it is scarcely ever sold at all; and I doubt whether what is produced in Vermont is for the purpose of being sold, for consumption out of the State, at all events. They transfer it from one to another in that State as they do in Kentucky. It is not raised as an article of sale at all. The women of our country, the little boys and girls, those in ordinary circumstances, from the 1st of February up to the middle of March, pack as they call it, the sugar water upon their heads in buckets from the troughs under the trees to the places where it is evaporated. They do it to eke out a subsistence in my State. It is done by persons in Kentucky—and I have no doubt all over the United States where the maple tree grows—by persons who are unable to procure or purchase other sugar. It is made for home consumption. It is a little article, and I hope that it will escape taxation, which seems to be visited upon almost everything. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New York will not be adopted.

Mr. COX. I wish simply to call the attention of my friend to the fact that by the present law all articles like maple sugar, made for home consumption and not for sale, are not taxed. There is a general provision in the tax law which excludes all such articles.

Mr. MALLORY. My friend mistakes me. I said that it was made for use in the State, and it is used there in considerable quantities.

Mr. COX. I suppose that the great bulk of maple sugar made in Kentucky is for the consumption of those who make it. Only some three hundred and eighty-one thousand pounds are made in that State.

Mr. MALLORY. I will say that it is used in this way: in Kentucky they take it to the store and exchange it for other articles, such as a little coffee, tea, tobacco, or whatever they may need. Therefore, under the provisions of the bill, it will be taxed.

Mr. COX. I do not want that to be taxed.

Mr. MALLORY. The same may be the case in the gentleman's State, although it may not be so in the part where he resides.

Mr. COX. In the State of Ohio we make three million three hundred and twenty-three thousand four hundred and ninety-two pounds. We have five times the population in the State of Ohio that there is in Vermont; and yet in the State of Vermont there are made some nine million pounds. Now the price is thirty cents a pound, and it used to be only eight cents a pound. I think that the great bulk of maple sugar made in Vermont is for the purpose of merchandise, and not to be used by those who make it. It seems to be a business in the State of the gentleman from the Committee of Ways and Means; and it does look as if the gentleman from Vermont was vigilant indeed as to the interests of his own State. I do not blame him. All I want is that the House may know what are the interests of the various States, and what is the paramount interest of the State of Vermont; and if we are to tax articles made in Ohio in superabundance, such as whisky, why not tax an article of such large manufacture in Vermont?

Mr. MALLORY, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by inserting after "maple" the words "or sorghum." If this amendment pass it is obviously just to include all descriptions of sugar.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] had not discussed this amendment we certainly should have missed on this subject his usual amount of wit.

Now, in relation to this matter—to treat the subject seriously—in my opinion it is no more just to tax maple sugar as a production than it would be to tax butter, or cheese, or wool. We have in all cases endeavored to avoid taxation upon the products of the farm. It is only upon manufactures, as such, that we have endeavored to levy a tax.

Now, in relation to the point made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] about large quantities of this article being made, and particularly in Vermont. For a small State there is a large amount made; and our people are industrious. But to say that it is a profitable manufacture, no one who knows anything about the business will pretend. Some seasons are good and some bad, so that profits are always uncertain. It is made at a season of the year when the farmers in the North can do nothing else; when the hills are covered with snow and they cannot engage in cultivating the ground as they can do in the more genial climate of Ohio and Kentucky. With us it is the practice of almost every man, owning land or not, who has a family, to make a small quantity of maple sugar; because otherwise he might be unable to purchase and use it in his family. If he owns no sugar orchard he takes a certain number of trees of some neighbor who has and carries on the business on shares; and if it should be taxed it will be a tax bearing heavily upon the poor man.

But a very small quantity of this article is manufactured for the market. In country towns there may be a few individuals, perhaps, who will go to the expense of purchasing tin buckets, pans, &c., and thus make a superior article; and if they do, they send off a barrel or two to some city where they can obtain an extravagant price for an early-made superior article. As a general thing, even those who make it do not use it in their tea and coffee, but only for certain purposes of cooking, where it is as good and perhaps better than any cane sugars.

As to its being a marketable article, you may go into the various towns of the North, wherever it is made, and you will perhaps find at the village stores that two or three barrels have accumulated in the spring of the year, and which is sold at less price than the foreign article. And that is about the extent of the market. It is sold mostly as a lower-priced article, or, when made early, it is sold, as candy and confectionery are sold, as a luxury.

I think it will not be the purpose of this committee to reverse our whole action in reference to taxing the products of the soil. I think it will be the purpose of the committee to exempt from taxation all the products of the sorghum, the maple, and the beet.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I am not generally in favor of taxing every species of article we can lay our hands upon, but I must enter my protest against the discrimination attempted to be made in relieving from taxation an article of so extensive production as maple sugar. I cannot for the life of me see why a similar article, the product of a plant grown and cultivated by labor, should be taxed, while an article of this character, which is merely collected from the forests, and collected in great quantities, too, at great profit, but to the destruction many times of timber not belonging to the parties collecting it, is relieved from taxation.

The gentleman from Vermont tells us it is only used for confectionery purposes. But what of that? When gentlemen get hold of ale and porter, which are used only as beverages, do they not tax them? And ale and porter are produced by great labor, while the production of maple sugar yields largely in profits to those who collect the material. It seems to me the discrimination is very unjust, because in some portions of the country we raise grain, and maple trees do not abound. Gentlemen are anxious to tax every article of product. In this bill it is proposed to tax petroleum six cents per gallon, and when we get to that article the gentleman from Vermont will not tell us it is an article of luxury, because it enters into the necessary consumption of all classes. He will tell us it is produced easily out of the earth, and with very little labor. So is maple sugar. Gentlemen may suppose that because they have seen maple sugar used in candy shops, and sold in small quantities in the country, that it is not used to a very large extent. But that is not so, and especially since the price of sugar has become so great and the production of sugar from the cane has been so completely destroyed by the rebellion.

Sir, if I had my way about it, I would release sorghum from taxation and tax maple sugar; I would relieve sugar made from the cane from taxation and tax the other, for the reason that I would encourage the production of those articles at this time.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman wishes to enlarge the scope of taxation, I want to ask him if he is willing to include buckwheat and clover seed, which are produced very extensively, I believe, in Pennsylvania, to an extent greater than elsewhere, and better?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Well, I do not know that I am particular about those things. When the gentleman proposes to tax buckwheat, I will tell him. I can tell the gentleman that there is scarcely any buckwheat raised in the country I come from. His remarks about sugar-candy and sugar-plums must have taken his mind back to the time when he was a boy at school, and now he is thinking of buckwheat cakes and slap-jacks. [Laughter.] But it does seem to me that gentlemen are disposed in this matter to discriminate in favor of their particular localities, and as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] has forgotten that his State produces this article so vastly; and even my venerable colleague [Mr. Stevens] seems to remember the State where he sucked his sugar in early life. [Laughter.] Now, I am opposed to discriminating against the productions of labor and in favor of those articles that produce largely and most profitably without labor at all.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRILL's amendment, and no quorum voted.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. MORRILL and HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. NELSON's amendment; and being put, the amendment was disagreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee at this point rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

TAX BILL.

The committee then resumed its session.

Mr. WHALEY. I move to add, at the end of line four hundred and fifty-three, the following:

That section ninety-four of said act shall be further amended by adding after the word "parties," where it occurs in the clause imposing a tax on mineral coals, as follows:

And provided further, That no tax shall be imposed on mineral coal mined and used by manufacturers of salt in such manufacture.

Mr. Chairman, I desire only to state to the committee that the manufacturers of salt now pay a license tax and a tax on barrels as well as a tax on the salt, and that the manufacturers of salt in many places, who use wood for fuel, instead of coal, pay no such tax as this. The manufacturers who use coal are compelled to pay a tax of five cents a ton upon the coal mined by them for the manufacture of salt. It has already put the price of salt in many places so high as to place the article beyond the reach of the poor. I was informed by an honorable gentleman upon this floor yesterday that salt is thirty-six dollars a barrel in Missouri, and it is impossible for the salt manufacturers who use coal to compete with those who use wood, which is not taxed. Now, salt is a necessary article, and one which the humblest families are compelled to use, and this tax which I propose to repeal really puts salt beyond the reach of the humblest classes in the Northwest.

Mr. MORRILL. All I have to say in relation to this amendment is that it is utterly impossible to discriminate in relation to this matter, even if it were just. I am not certain that it would be just. We now tax the coal by which iron is made, and I do not see why we should not tax that by which salt is made.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. On the part of the Committee of Ways and Means I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line four hundred and twenty-one, insert the following:

By inserting after the word "naphtha," in the paragraph relating to coal illuminating oil, the word "distillate;" by inserting after the words "returns, assessments," the words "removing to and withdrawing from the warehouses."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I offer the following amendment:

After the word "party," at the end of line four hundred and twenty-one, insert the following:

By inserting, in the last proviso in the paragraph on gas, after the words "coal-tar," where they first occur, the words "and ammoniacal liquor."

The present law provides:

"That coal-tar produced in the manufacture of illuminating gas, and the products of the redistillation of coal-tar thus produced, shall be exempt from duty."

Ammoniacal liquor needs to be exempt as much as coal-tar, in order to encourage and assist those who are now trying to make some new products in the manufacture of illuminating gas.

Mr. MORRILL. This is a matter about which the gentleman from New York [Mr. Kalbfleisch] feels some interest. I confess that I am not particularly informed on the subject, but I am inclined to think that the amendment is proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move to amend by inserting after the word "that," in line four hundred and thirty-seven, the words "Bibles and books printed exclusively as educational books." I offer this amendment to carry out what I suppose to be the principle adopted by the committee and to remove a doubtful construction to which I think the clause in its present form is liable. The section now provides that—

Arithmetics, spelling-books, geographies, grammars, and primary books of the kinds usually taught in common and primary schools, and all books printed by religious societies exclusively for the use of Sunday-schools, shall be exempt from any duty or tax.

To carry out that principle and place it beyond peradventure, I propose that we shall exempt from taxation Bibles and all educational books, whether used in primary schools, common schools, or academies. My object is to exempt from taxation, as far as possible, that which develops and improves the human mind.

Mr. KASSON. This question was considered by the Committee of Ways and Means, and we found that it would be entirely impracticable, if we used any such general language, to accomplish the object desired by the gentleman from Ohio without accomplishing a great deal more. So far as concerns Bibles, the provision can be made specific, and we have no objection to such a provision. The phrase "educational books" is, however, too broad. There is scarcely any book which in a certain sense may not be construed to be an educational book. Books used in theological schools, law schools, universities, &c., as well as those adapted for the gentleman's library, might be included under this designation. Such is the breadth of the term that it might include a very large portion, perhaps the largest portion, of the books published in this country or abroad.

Mr. COX. I am glad to have the support of the gentleman in favor of the idea which I have attempted mainly to express. I will include the words "class books or elementary books," or I will leave it to the construction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who has power to construe the section. His idea is to save from taxation all books used for educational purposes. When we use that expression we know what it is. We do not mean books for libraries; we mean only books which are intended for schools, academies, or colleges. I will use the phrase "class books" or any other the gentleman may suggest.

Mr. HALE. I suggest that the gentleman from Ohio insert the words "educational or devotional books."

Mr. COX. I have no objection to that, and I will accept that as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that any enlargement of the definition it is evident will carry us into difficulty. Take devotional books, for example. There is hardly a religious book, or a book on a religious subject, that would not be included under that denomination. Many of them are elegantly bound, and are sold exclusively for gifts at Christmas and other occasions. While the committee desire, with other gentlemen of the House, to exempt those books which are really necessary as a part of the general education of the country, they do not think it safe to extend it beyond the common schools of the country.

I am willing to accept so much of the gentleman's amendment as refers to Bibles. I agree with him on that. I congratulate him on his desire to facilitate the reading of that Book. I trust that with that exception the amendment will be rejected, as it would lead us into extreme difficulty.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am glad that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HALE] has been accepted by the gentleman from Ohio. In regard to what the gentleman on the Committee of Ways and Means says, that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio would include an extensive number of books, I will reply that these books include but a small proportion of the aggregate number of books that are published. I think that the language of the bill is indefinite. It speaks of grammars, geographies, and spelling-books. We all know that there are various elementary books.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman move an amendment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was going to move to strike out the last word, but I have said all that I desire to say.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I propose to amend by inserting after "grammars" as follows:

Copy-books and school-books of the kinds commonly used in common and primary schools; and all books printed exclusively for the use of Sunday-schools.

I move it as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COX. I do not think that the gentleman from Massachusetts has improved the original amendment. There are a number of books upon astronomy, botany, and kindred subjects, which are not included in the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. My amendment covers all books used in common and primary schools.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman's expression of common or primary schools include academies or colleges?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I suppose not.

Mr. COX. Then suppose you insert academies and colleges.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman let me make a suggestion?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. When the subject was up in committee we understood that the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio would really include from three fourths to four fifths of the trade carried on in the country. We do not think it safe to make so broad an exception.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I adopt the principle of the committee, and I want it to be carried out, and that is to save education from taxation, whether in the common school, academy, or college. The suggestion of the committee here is to limit, not to exempt, these most valuable publications in respect to academies and colleges. And I think the House ought to come up and sustain that view of it. They exempt other articles of manufacture. They exempted to-day nine million pounds of maple sugar in one State, because it was a home manufacture. Now this thing is far more important in every sense of the word than your maple sugar—to the young mind. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Iowa accepts my amendment as to Bibles. I would like to know why the committee do not report on Bibles.

Mr. KASSON. We expected opposition on that point. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I want to make Bibles cheap in the State of Iowa, and I want an educational system established throughout the whole land so that the Bible may be appreciated; and if the committee will assist me we will make it so broad and extensive there will be no tax upon education. I think the great difficulty in this country is a lack of education.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to amend the substitute by inserting "all other books used in all other places." In my anxiety to promote the cause of education I wish to be esteemed more catholic than the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] I go for sweeping away all obstruction. I am induced to do this almost by the possibility of the difficulty which the executors of the law will find in carrying out the provisions of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Who is to decide what books are educational, what would be used in colleges, and what in academies?

Mr. COX. I will answer the gentleman: the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. MALLORY. You put into office in every district of the United States a man who has a very limited education, and who, in some instances, knows hardly how to read and write, and set him up as a censor of the books of this country, and empower him to decide what are properly educational books, and what are not. Now, I object to that policy. That is the very point in the case to which I object. What is to prevent the authors and publishers of books, if they understand that such books are to be exempt from taxation, from printing upon the title-page of any work, "This book is intended for the use of schools and academies?" They may do it with histories, with works of poetry, or with any work of literature; and yet the gentleman from Ohio says that these assessors, appointed by the President in the various districts, are to pass upon these books and say whether the author understands the purpose for which he wrote the book, or whether he himself does.

Mr. COX. The gentleman utterly misrepresents my view. My answer to him was that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and not the assessor, decided; I never argued that these various assessors should decide upon books because the title-page is printed so and so. When a question arises as to what class a book belongs, whether or not educational in the ordinary sense of the term, it is left for decision to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I stand by the committee.

Mr. MALLORY. I am not responsible for what the committee does. I am moving my amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The learned gentleman at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means stands responsible for the action of the committee, and I have no doubt the chairman will support the proposition of my friend from Ohio if he finds that the very learned and able man at the head of the Revenue Bureau is to decide in all cases, as censor of the press, what books are adapted for literary purposes, what for educational purposes, and what the character of every book is.

Mr. MORRILL. Upon the part of the committee, I will say that I propose to move to strike out all that.

Mr. MALLORY. Let me put in what I have indicated, and that will strike it all out. I insist upon my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman again indicate what his amendment is?

Mr. MALLORY. I want to include all other books used in all other places. I do not want to include books used in certain cases and not include others.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is an amendment to the original amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move then to amend the original amendment by inserting after the word "books" the words "and all other printed books and magazines, the production of American authors." I desire to call the especial attention of this committee and of the Committee of Ways and Means to one branch of the publishing business in the United States, and that is the publication of magazines. And I desire this Committee of the Whole to determine whether the Government, by this system of taxation, receives sufficient revenue to compensate for the burdens imposed upon publishers and the evils inflicted on authors.

Mr. MALLORY. It does not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I say it does not. Well said by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Now, let me give the committee some facts in regard to this business. In 1863 and a portion of 1864 the leading magazines of the country were circulating to the extent of nearly five hundred thousand copies; but since the adoption of this system of taxation, which makes the publishers of magazines manufacturers, and imposes a tax of five per cent. upon their earnings, the reduction in the number of copies of magazines published for distribution in this country is nearly two hundred thousand. Why? Because the publishers have had to advance the price of the magazines to news dealers and news agents and subscribers, by reason of the advanced price of paper; by reason of the three per cent. tax on paper; and the tax on stereotypes and engravings; by reason of the income tax; and last and worst of all these taxes, by classifying them as manufacturers and taxing them as such.

One leading magazine in this country has had its subscription list cut down thirty-five thousand since the 1st day of January; and if this system of taxation goes on against the publishers of magazines and against American authors, it will not be long before we shall have no magazines worthy of being read by an American public. The tax of five per cent. upon the gross receipts of the publishers of magazines in this country did not amount in 1863 to more than sixty-five thousand dollars; yet the infliction of that tax, in addition to other taxes, has run the business down until many of the magazines are now struggling for existence; and I feel that it is unjust to thus burden a business which has done so much in promoting the best interests of the country. I am proud of American authors, and I wish to do all that I can, and to have this House do all that it can, to maintain the superiority of American genius, and of American contributors to American literature.

There is one class of contributors to our magazines which every man in Congress should be proud of, and those are our American women. Some of the most elegant, cultivated, and refined women of the country, who are not blessed with wealth, but who are blessed with that which is better than wealth, genius, have contributed to our magazines until they have placed them side by side with the best productions of England. Let us maintain that position, and recognize in these American women the matrons of our American literature, and in our American authors of both sexes a class of authors possessing genius, intelligence, and cultivation, whose productions are calculated to elevate and refine the American people. I would like to see those magazines and those books which are the productions of American authors free from taxation, and to place our American authors, male and female, upon the highest pinnacle of literary fame to which their genius entitles them. The permanency of our republican form of Government depends mainly upon the intelligence of the people. To be intelligent, they must be educated; and the best and cheapest way to educate them is to encourage the printing of books and magazines, and removing all obstacles in the way of a general circulation. In my opinion, had the great mass of the southern people possessed the same amount of intelligence, and their education been equal to the northern people, this rebellion would never have been inaugurated, and our common country would have been spared the ravages and desolations of war.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PRUYN. Is debate exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, if the gentleman wishes to oppose the amendment.

Mr. PRUYN. No, sir; I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope every other gentleman is.

Mr. KASSON. Before the vote is taken, I want to understand distinctly from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] if this is, in point of fact, a proposition to levy no tax on any kind of books whatever produced in this country?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir; so far as American authors are concerned.

Mr. KASSON. Well, sir, I want that the vote shall be given understandingly on this subject.

Mr. INGERSOLL. So do I.

Mr. KASSON. There are books selling as high as from ten to forty dollars apiece, cultivating the luxurious habits of the country, appealing to the luxury of the country, and as capable of taxation as the article of tobacco or whisky. For my part, I am disposed to favor legitimately American literature, although I have not been inspired from the same admirable source as the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I regret that you have not been.

Mr. KASSON. Still, I am bound to object to this proposition from the fact that it is altogether too sweeping, and would exempt a great deal of the wealth and luxury of the country from its legitimate share of taxation. I trust that the subject will be passed over now, and considered at some other portion of the bill.

Mr. COX. Before the gentleman from Iowa is through, I desire to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the subject is utterly exhausted.

Mr. MALLORY. I should think so.

Mr. PRUYN. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will strike out of his amendment the words "printed books," and let it apply to magazines alone.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Oh, no.

The question was taken on Mr. INGERSOLL's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by inserting "Bibles, Testaments, or volumes consisting only of parts of either." What calls my attention particularly to this is the fact that there is a society in the city of New York which for the last seven or eight years has been carrying on the work of translating the books of the Old and New Testaments, and publishing a volume at a time, till there are now some forty or fifty publications, some consisting of one book of the Old Testament, some of two or more books, and some of the whole of the New Testament.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to that. I accept the modification.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any reason why we should distinguish between any particular class of publications. There are books, not printed by Sunday-school or Bible societies, that are full of religious sentiments and religious ideas. I hold that this tax on literature is unworthy of the age. If honorable gentlemen would direct their attention to the appropriation bills that are passed without discussion they would find that it costs us three times more every year to take the parallax of Mars, to triangulate the Pleiades, and calculate the stars for 1880, than the amount of the revenue which we get from this tax on books. I hope that this whole tax on knowledge will be struck out. We are unwilling to impose the tax on maple sugar, a luxury which everybody can do without, on sorghum or molasses, which everybody can do without; and yet we propose to hold on to a tax on books, a tax on intelligence, and to throw ourselves in the face and eyes of all the literature of the country. I have not the courage to face the denunciation which, in my judgment, will come down on us from all the writers, all the litterateurs, if, after all this, we persist in the enforcement of this tax.

I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that the distinction taken between religious and other books is not a proper distinction. The exemption of the publications of certain religious societies is not a reasonable exemption. There are books just as religious, and doing as much or more good, that are printed by ordinary publishing houses, and that are not proposed to be exempted. I hope that the committee will not insist upon this tax which it is the policy of the people of all countries—of Germany, of England, and France—to do away with as much as possible. I hope we will strike out of the bill this tax on books and magazines, and impose it on other articles on which the people are more willing to pay it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RICE.]

Mr. COX. Is debate exhausted on that?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

The question was taken, and Mr. MALLORY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Is it in order for me to withdraw my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I withdraw it.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by striking out the words "arithmetics, spelling-books, geographies, grammars, and primary books of the kinds usually taught in common and primary schools, and all books printed by religious societies exclusively for the use of Sunday-schools," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "books and magazines," so that it will read:

Provided, That books and magazines shall be exempt from any duty or tax, &c.

Mr. COX. Is that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, unless offered in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. ARNOLD. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, if I cannot procure the adoption of this substitute. My proposition is to repeal all taxes upon books and magazines, not only Bibles and school books, but all others. We get very little revenue from that source. I understand that the amount of the tax derived from books and magazines is less than fifty thousand dollars. I submit that the entire tax upon books and magazines should be repealed, and that they should be entirely free. That is what I propose by my amendment.

Mr. COX. I am opposed to the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois, as I was to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky. The effect of both is to break down the amendment which I offer. I propose to exempt from taxation these necessities in education, while the gentleman proposes to exempt what I consider the luxuries of literature, for which we ought to pay. That is the distinction which I make. I hope that the House will vote down all these other propositions, and will adopt my amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. In order to say a few words on this subject, I move, pro forma, to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio by striking out the last word.

I favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. I believe that in a country where the basis of our Government is the intelligence of the people we ought not to tax knowledge. The various States are encouraging the formation of libraries in each school district; our people in various localities are uniting for the purpose of forming circulating libraries. We are taxing the people of the United States to-day for the publication of congressional documents, together with Patent Office reports, agricultural reports, &c. Our only justification for appropriating the public moneys in this way is that we thus promote the dissemination of knowledge. Yet, while with the one hand we take money from the public Treasury for the purpose of printing and circulating these books, we with the other are taxing, and thus repressing, private enterprise in the same direction. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that no species of knowledge should be taxed. Our object should be to encourage by our legislation everything that conduces to the intelligence of the people.

I hope that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Illinois will be adopted. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. For the purpose of terminating debate on this paragraph, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration as a special order the tax bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that when the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumes the consideration of the tax bill, all debate upon the paragraph under consideration be terminated in one half minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the special order, the tax bill.

The question being upon the substitute of Mr. ARNOLD for the amendment of Mr. Cox, it was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes twenty-two, noes not counted.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to amend the amendment by adding "and magazines."

The amendment was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes twenty-three, noes not counted.

The question recurred on Mr. Cox's amendment.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend, as follows:

Strike out all after "that," in line four hundred and thirty-seven to "shall" in line four hundred and forty-one and insert, "and all books intended for educational or devotional purposes."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ARNOLD moved to insert the words "prayer-books, hymn-books, and psalm-books."

Mr. COX. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPALDING moved to add "and all materials used in the manufacture of printing paper."

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. ROSS. I move to add, "and all Democratic papers." [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I have no objection to have the Democratic party connected with the Bible at any time.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. COX. My amendment as it has been modified is as follows:

In line four hundred and thirty-seven, after the word "that," insert, "Bibles and Testaments, or volumes consisting only of parts of either; prayer-books, hymn-books, and psalm-books, and other books printed exclusively as educational books."

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add the words, "the price of which may not be more than two dollars per volume."

Mr. ANCONA. Put it a little higher.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say three dollars per volume, then.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out the words, "and other books printed exclusively as educational books."

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 44, noes 13; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. HOOPER and COX.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 31.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. Cox's amendment as amended, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move the following amendment:

Strike out the words, "and in any case of doubt or dispute as to what shall be exempt from duty under this act, the decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be final and conclusive."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that that part of the paragraph which reads, "by striking from the paragraph relating to photographs the words 'being copies of engravings or works of art, or,'" shall be reserved for the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means. The language is thought to be too broad.

There was no objection, and it was agreed to accordingly.

Mr. A. MYERS. I move the following:

On coal illuminating oil, refined, and naphtha, benzine, and benzole produced by the distillation of coal, asphaltum, shale, peat, petroleum, or rock-oil, and all other bituminous substances used for like purposes, a duty of ten cents per gallon: Provided, That such oil, refined and produced by the distillation of coal, asphaltum, or shale, exclusively, shall be subject to pay a duty of five cents per gallon, anything to the contrary notwithstanding: And provided further, That distillers of coal-oil or naphtha, benzine, or benzole, shall be subject to all the provisions of law applicable to distillers of spirits, with regard to licenses, bonds, returns, assessments, liens, penalties, drawbacks, and all other provisions designed for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity distilled, and securing the payment of duties, so far as the same may, in the judgment of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and under regulations prescribed by him, be deemed necessary for that purpose: And provided also, That naphtha of specific gravity exceeding eighty degrees, according to Baume's hydrometer, and of the kind usually known as gasoline, shall be subject to a tax of five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. A. MYERS. Is debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend by inserting the words "Bibles, prayer-books;" so that it will read:

Provided, That Bibles, prayer-books, arithmetics, spelling-books, geographies, grammars, and primary books of the kinds usually taught in common and primary schools, and all books printed by religious societies exclusively for the use of Sunday-schools, shall be exempt from any duty or tax, anything to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. KASSON. That has been done.

Mr. THAYER. It was voted down.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman to modify his amendment so as to read "Bibles or Testaments, or parts of either."

Mr. THAYER. I cannot accept that.

Mr. COX. I move to insert after "primary schools" the words "academies and colleges."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. THAYER. I modify my amendment so as to insert after "Bibles" the word "Testaments."

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] by inserting after the word "Testaments" the words "or volumes consisting of only parts thereof."

The question being put, and no quorum voting—

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. GARFIELD, and STEELE of New Jersey.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes sixty-seven, noes not counted.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurring upon the amendment as amended, and no quorum voting—

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. THAYER and HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 22; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. Rather than break up the committee, I withdraw the demand for a division. So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out of line four hundred and thirty-nine the words "usually taught" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "used;" so that the clause shall read, "and primary books of the kinds used in common and primary schools."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the same clause by striking out the word "primary" where it first occurs and inserting in lieu thereof the word "school."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by inserting after the sentence "shall be exempt from any duty or tax, anything to the contrary notwithstanding," the following proviso:

Provided further, That this exemption shall not apply to any volume which is valued at more than two dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX. I now move to amend by inserting in line four hundred and thirty-nine, after the words "in common and primary schools," the words "academies and colleges."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In order to carry out the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] in the last sentence amended on his motion by striking out the word "primary" before "books," I move to amend by striking out the words "and primary" before "schools;" so as to make the sentence read, "and school books used in common schools."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Line four hundred and fifty-four is as follows:

On wrought iron, railroad chairs, and railroad and boat spikes, five dollars per ton.

I move to amend the same by striking out the words "wrought iron" and inserting after the word "spikes" the words "made of wrought iron," and by striking out the comma after the word "chairs."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend on page 22 by inserting after line five hundred and thirteen the words:

By striking out, in the paragraph relating to diamonds, precious stones, and imitations thereof, and all other jewelry the word "ten," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "five."

The clause of the tax bill thus proposed to be amended is as follows:

On all diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, and imitations thereof, and all other jewelry, a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem, &c.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the effect of that will be to reduce the amount of duties.

Mr. MORRILL. Nominally; but, in the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means, it will actually increase the duties.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is an actual reduction of one half.

Mr. MORRILL. From the manner in which the law is now administered, there is a diversity of opinion as to what the tax really applies to, and there is as much fraud as in the manufacture of cigars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Lines five hundred and fourteen to five hundred and seventeen, inclusive, read as follows:

By striking out of said section the several paragraphs from the words "on cavendish, plug, twist," down to the words "exclusive of the tax," inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That relates to several sections of the original bill relating to the tax on tobacco, cigars, &c. In order that it may include a further portion of the bill, I move to amend the clause by striking out the words "down to the words 'exclusive of the tax,' inclusive," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "down to and including the words 'and the other to the United States.'" The first amendment did not include as much of the bill as was intended to be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. In the bill to which these amendments are being made there is the following clause:

On steam engines, including locomotive and marine engines, a duty of three per cent. ad valorem.

This bill, in lines four hundred and sixty-one and four hundred and sixty-two, proposes to amend that by inserting after the words "steam engines" the words "exclusive of the boiler, in case a duty has been paid thereon." I move to amend that so that the clause in the tax bill shall read as follows:

On steam engines, including locomotive and marine engines, with their boilers, a duty of three per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. Chairman, under the present law steam engines are charged three per cent., but their boilers, not being included, are charged five per cent. I understand that the Committee of Ways and Means are willing to accept this amendment, which allows the whole to go at three per cent. I understood the committee to concur with me that this amendment ought to be made.

Mr. MORRILL. I am not sure about that. The subject has not been acted on by the Committee of Ways and Means, and I think that this amendment changes the law so as to reduce the tax. There is no objection to relieving the article from a double tax, but the object of this bill is mainly to increase the revenue.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I think that if the House will give me one moment's attention not a single member will vote against my amendment. The present law provides that steam engines, including locomotives and marine engines, shall pay a duty of three per cent. ad valorem. Nothing is said there about boilers. The manufacturer of a locomotive, including, of course, a boiler, has to take it apart to ascertain the weight of the boiler, that it may be taxed separately, being included among "other manufactures." The Committee of Ways and Means tell me that they considered the boiler an essential part of the locomotive, and had no idea that the law would be so construed as to impose a separate tax upon it; but the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has seen fit to make that construction, and now the manufacturers ask that the boiler and locomotive shall be put upon a par, and that a higher tax shall not be demanded on the boiler than is imposed on the engine, which is a much more highly finished article than the boiler.

Mr. GANSON. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has published a decision the result of which is to impose a double tax upon boilers. That is unjust and ought to be remedied, and I have no doubt that the Committee of Ways and Means will concur in the amendment on examination.

Mr. MALLORY. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. A. W. CLARK] that he should raise the tax on engines to five per cent.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. My object is to have the tax on engines and boilers equal.

Mr. MALLORY. Well, do it in that way; increase the tax on engines.

Mr. MORRILL. The bill as proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means will avoid the very double tax of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] complains. We do not propose to levy a tax upon a boiler that has been once taxed. It has been done heretofore, under a construction given to the law by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I cannot see that the amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means at all obviates the difficulty. Under the construction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of the present law, the manufacturer is put to great trouble and expense, after his machinery is completed, to ascertain the exact value of the boiler. He has to take the whole thing to pieces and weigh it, and then he has to pay five per cent. on the boilers while he only pays three per cent. on the engine.

Mr. STEVENS. My only objection to this amendment is that the tax ought to be five per cent. instead of three. We are raising duties now.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. If the Committee of Ways and Means propose an increase, I am willing that the boilers shall pay the same amount as the locomotive.

Mr. STEVENS. Your amendment reduces it to three per cent.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. It reduces it to the same amount that is paid on engines.

Mr. HOOPER. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that he change his amendment so as to move to insert after "steam engines" the words "and steam boilers." I think that will reach his object.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I accept that as a modification of my amendment. The main difficulty is that boilers are not now inserted among the articles manufactured, but are included by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue among other manufactured articles and taxed five per cent. What we propose is that the boiler shall pay the same duty as the locomotive does.

Mr. HOOPER. The amendment which I propose is to strike out the words "exclusive of the boiler, in case a duty has been paid thereon," and insert in lieu thereof the words "steam boilers."

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I accept the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to amend by making the duty of three per cent. five per cent.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if that increases the duty on steam engines.

Mr. STEVENS. On all manufactures.

Mr. A. W. CLARK. I have no objection to that. My object was that boilers and steam engines should pay the same duty.

Mr. STEVENS. The object was right. The construction of the Commissioner was not such as the Committee of Ways and Means supposed it would be.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, with the approval of my colleagues of the Committee of Ways and Means, I suggest that the few lines relating to iron and to steam engines be passed over until to-morrow, that the Committee of Ways and Means may adjust the matter.

There being no objection, the paragraph was passed over informally.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration, as a special order, the tax bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

MAIL SERVICE TO CHINA.

Mr. COLE, of California. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the act (S. No. 407) to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China.

Mr. WILSON. I object; and move that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

EVENING SESSION DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to dispense with the evening session this evening, and that after to-morrow the House shall meet at eleven o'clock and adjourn at half past five.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, I hope not. The Committee of Ways and Means would have no time to transact its business.

Mr. MALLORY. I suggest that the House would do more business between those hours than it would by having a recess and an evening session.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky must know that the Committee of Ways and Means meets every morning, and that it cannot possibly get along with its business if the House meets at eleven o'clock.

Mr. MALLORY. I am aware that the Committee of Ways and Means does meet in the morning, but it can meet at nine o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS. I am afraid that if it did the gentleman from Kentucky would be a little behind time occasionally. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. Not at all. I will be there at half past eight.

The SPEAKER. The question must be first on the motion to dispense with the evening session.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative; there being, on a division—ayes 75, noes 25.

Mr. MALLORY. I now ask unanimous consent to move that, after to-morrow, the House shall meet at eleven o'clock and adjourn at half past five.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. WILSON. I move to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Michigan to withdraw that motion, that I may submit a resolution, and let it lie over.

Mr. STEVENS. I think we had better adjourn now.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act for the relief of the heirs of Almon D. Fiske, deceased; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn; and for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty-five minutes past four, p. m.) the House adjourned.

ARMY RATION.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate if any increase in the quantity of the Army ration is required for the comfort of the men or the efficiency of the service.

It will be remembered that at the last session of Congress we made a change of the ration, and there has been from some parts of the country complaint in regard to it. Some suggestions have been made that modifications are necessary. In order to know whether any change is really necessary, and if so, what, I desire to get a report from the Commissary General of Subsistence, and then we can have something official on which to act.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

STATE AND POLITICAL PRISONERS.

Mr. POWELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether or not he has furnished the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and of the District of Columbia, a list of the names of the persons held as "State or political prisoners, or otherwise than as prisoners of war, as required by the second section of the act entitled 'An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases,'" approved March 3, 1863.

Mr. POMEROY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire if the peculiar facilities afforded to officers of the Army to procure spirituous and intoxicating liquors does not tend to the increase of intemperance in the Army, and create insubordination and demoralization incompatible with the wholesome discipline of the soldier and detrimental to the public service, and report by bill or otherwise.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 50.

MINE EXPLOSION AT PETERSBURG.

Mr. HARRIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish to the Senate a copy of the report of the committee of inquiry ordered by him in respect to the explosion of the mine in front of Petersburg.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to call up a resolution which I offered several days ago, to amend the 34th standing rule by adding to the committees authorized by it a Committee on Mines.

Mr. SUMNER. I must ask the Senate now to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday, being the report of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses with regard to the bill establishing a Bureau of Freedmen.

Mr. STEWART. I think that report is the special order for half past twelve o'clock, and my resolution can be disposed of by that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand the report referred to to be a special order for half past twelve o'clock; but the motion to take it up is a privileged question, and it has precedence of the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall not oppose the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, for the matter that he wishes to take up has been under discussion for a day or two; but I desire to give notice to him and to other Senators that I hope they will allow me on Thursday, in the morning hour, to take up some Indian bills that will consume but little time, but which it is necessary should be acted upon as early as that day. On Thursday morning, with the leave of the Senate, I shall hope to be able to take up some Indian bills and have them disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, at the last session the House of Representatives passed a bill "to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs." That bill was reported to the Senate, and the Senate passed what it denominated a substitute for the House bill. Although called a substitute, it was, in substance, simply an amendment. The main idea of the House bill was to establish a separate and distinct bureau on the subject of the freedmen and abandoned lands; the bill of the Senate called a substitute accepted almost literally that idea of the House bill, which is the pith and the substance of both bills.

The question, then, arises, to what extent is the bill of the Senate, although it is called a substitute, an amendment for the bill of the House? I think this proposition is true, logically, and according to parliamentary law, that where either House has passed a bill or joint resolution, and it is sent to the other House for its action, so far as the other House does not dissent from the bill or joint resolution that is sent to it, the measure is adopted by it. Upon that principle, then, the Freedmen's Bureau being the principal subject of the House bill, being its leading idea, and that being accepted by the Senate's amendment, which is called a substitute, there was no question of disagreement between the two Houses in relation to that leading idea of a separate Freedmen's Bureau, no amendment to that provision of the House bill establishing the Freedmen's Bureau.

Then this question arises: was the idea and the provision of the House bill establishing a Freedmen's Bureau accepted and agreed to by the Senate or not? If it was agreed to by the Senate, then the question of this bureau was closed by the accordance, although there might be other provisions of the House bill to which the Senate had offered antagonizing provisions, or from which it had otherwise dissented in its amendment. These latter matters being embodied in the amendment would be the pending questions between the two Houses, but not the question of establishing the bureau, because both Houses had agreed to that. It is only points of disagreement between the two Houses that are or can be referred to committees of conference. The matter, then, of the creation of this bureau was not referred to or before the committee of conference. That committee had no power to withdraw the bureau from the bill, to recommend to the two Houses its withdrawal, and to substitute a Department for it. It would have been as competent for the committee to have thus retired the bureau and to have recommended a court in its stead.

I read from the report of the committee:

"The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 51) entitled 'An act to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs,' having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

"That the Senate recede from their amendment to the said bill."

It was simply an amendment, although it was on its face called a substitute—

"and the committee agree to the following as a substitute."

I will now read from the first section of the House bill and the Senate's amendment, both of the last session, for the purpose of showing that upon the matter of establishing a separate bureau for freedmen there was no dissent between the two Houses; that the provision in the House bill establishing the bureau was accepted by the Senate taking no negative action upon it, and passing an amendment which contained in substance the same provision to establish that bureau. Here is the first section of the House bill:

"That an office is hereby created in the War Department, to be called the Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to nominate, and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, a Commissioner of Freedmen's Affairs, with an annual salary of $4,000, to whom shall be referred the adjustment and determination, under the direction of the Secretary of War, of all questions arising under this act, or under any laws now existing or hereafter to be enacted, concerning persons of African descent."

In the Senate's amendment, which in this report is truly termed an amendment, there is this provision in the first section:

"That an office is hereby created in the Treasury Department, to be called the Bureau of Freedmen, meaning thereby such persons as have become free since the beginning of the present war, under the care of a Commissioner, with an annual salary of $4,000, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and there shall be a chief clerk, acting also as disbursing officer."

And then it goes on to create an authority to the Commissioner of this bureau precisely parallel and equivalent to that which was instituted by the first section of the House bill.

The position which I now state is this: that the House bill having established a separate and distinct bureau, not a Department, for freedmen, and that being the main idea and object of the bill, and the Senate substituted an amendment having accepted the same, and having agreed to the establishment of this bureau, there is no dissent between the two Houses, and consequently both sections of the two bills establish the same bureau. Either House may adopt a bill or joint resolution passed by the other, in whole or part; and, although its agreement was not in the same words, if it were in substance, there could be a conference between them for no other purpose than to make their language harmonize. The substance, sense, and meaning of their action being already in accordance, as to that there would be nothing to harmonize. The only substantial point in which the Senate's amendment differed from the House bill is that the latter created the bureau as of the War Department, the former as of the Treasury Department. Upon this point the action of the Senate was an amendment offered to the House bill; but as to the establishment it was no amendment—it was the same thing in different words.

The two Houses agreeing substantially in their action to establish the Freedmen's Bureau, and no conference being asked to harmonize the differing language by which they had severally done it, the question of the bureau was not before the committee of conference for any purpose whatever; certainly not for its repudiation. In recommending the establishment of a separate and independent Department for it, the committee acted on a matter coram non judice, and the Senate repudiated that action and the committee's report of it.

In support of this position I will read the first joint rule of the two Houses:

"In every case of an amendment of a bill agreed to in one House, and dissented to in the other, if either House shall request a conference, and appoint a committee for that purpose, and the other House shall also appoint a committee to confer, such committees shall, at a convenient hour, to be agreed upon by their chairmen, meet in the conference chamber, and state to each other, verbally or in writing, as either shall choose, the reasons of their respective Houses for and against the amendment, and confer freely thereon."

Now, sir, according to this rule, what matter comes before a committee of conference? It is only the matter of the amendment which has been proposed in one House to a bill or joint resolution passed by the other. The rule is express, that upon this amendment the conference shall take place; and that amendment, so far as relates to the main and essential object and provision of the measure, I have attempted to analyze.

Now, sir, I will read the first clause of the report of the committee of conference:

That the Senate recede from their amendment to the said bill, and the committee agree to the following as a substitute:

An act to establish a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby established at the seat of Government of the United States a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands, whose object shall be the good of the freedmen, and the administration of lands and other property falling to the national Government in the rebel States not heretofore appropriated to other uses. And this Department shall be under the care of a Commissioner, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with an annual salary of $4,000.

It is thus shown that the committee transcended their authority by repudiating the bureau upon which the two Houses had accorded; and recommended in lieu of it a Department of which no mention had been made either in the bill passed by the House or in the Senate's amendment.

If the main subject of a bill can thus be shuffled out, a new, different, and more important one slipped in by the report of a committee of conference, and that report cannot be referred to a committee or divided like other propositions when the two Houses vote on its adoption, does it not change the essential forms of legislation as established by the Constitution and the rules of the two Houses? If this report should be adopted by the two Houses, I ask Senators if a bill to establish another Department of the Government, "a Department of Freedmen and Abandoned Lands," has ever been introduced into either House of Congress, referred to one of its standing committees, read three several times, passed, and then reported to the other House and there referred to one of its standing committees, read three several times, and passed? Who can tell the mischief that would result from such a radical change in the forms of legislation?

So much, sir, upon that branch of the subject. Now I will proceed to an analysis and examination of the bill under consideration, and as I deem the twelfth section of most importance, I will first make my objections to it. That section is in these words:

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all assistant commissioners, local superintendents, and clerks, as well as supervising special agents, shall be so far deemed to be in the military service of the United States as to be liable to trial by courts martial or military commissions, to be ordered by the commanding general of the military department within which they act as such assistant commissioners, local superintendents, clerks, or supervising special agents. And for all offenses amounting to a felony; for any act of embezzlement, or willful misappropriation of public or private property; for any willful act of oppression of any freedman, or of any loyal inhabitant; for any act of taking or receiving, directly or indirectly, any money or thing of value on account of any act done or omitted by them in their official capacity; or for being in any manner interested in any purchase of cotton, tobacco, sugar, or any other article produced upon any lands leased or worked under the provisions of this act; or for any other willful violation of their official duties, upon conviction thereof, shall be subject to punishment by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment at hard labor for a period not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

That is a clause in the substitute bill; it is highly penal in its character; it creates a large class of offenses that are not military offenses, that are not cases arising in the land or naval forces of the United States, but that are civil offenses, to be perpetrated not by the soldiers or seamen of the United States in the military or naval service, but by civilians; and those offenses, with all of the severe punishments which are denounced against them, are not to be tried by the appropriate constitutional tribunals, the civil courts, according to the municipal laws, but by this section of the bill are handed over to the jurisdiction of military tribunals appointed by the commanding officer. Is it competent for Congress to pass a bill with such a provision in it? The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] a few days ago brought up this question before the Senate, and with a power and force of argument far beyond anything that I can command, so far won its reason and judgment as that it voted by a decided majority to strike out a similar provision in another; and in lieu of it gave to the civil courts the trial of such offenders.

What has the Senate to do in order to reject this bill, with such a provision in it, but to follow up its action and the encouraging precedent which it set on that occasion? The learned Senator's reasoning and constitutional objections are more pointed and cogent in their application to the bill now under consideration than they were to the section which was assaulted with so much vigor and success by him. But, sir, I propose to examine this question a little myself. My honorable and early friend near me, [Mr. HOWARD,] whose ability as a lawyer, logician, and statesman, it is my pleasure to concede, and whose purity and patriotism of purpose I am far from questioning, differs so essentially from me in relation to what I conceive to be the most fundamental and vital principles of the Constitution—without which, or which practically overruled and disregarded, I would not give a farthing for the Constitution itself—that I feel it incumbent upon me to examine at some length these principles, and the provisions of the Constitution which bear upon this section of the bill.

Sir, the Senate is often engaged in the consideration of great questions, questions of permanent and immeasurable interest to the American people, to the present generation and to all posterity. In my humble judgment it never was engaged in the consideration of one of more essential and inappreciable importance than that now before it. Where had this important provision of the Constitution its paternity? What people devoted to constitutional liberty and jealous of their rights, and especially of the absorbing and domineering tendencies of military courts, suggested the first provision of the fifth amendment to the Constitution? It originated in the State of Massachusetts. It was prominent among the constitutional amendments which that great State, I will say in that early day of our history that enlightened and patriotic State, but now how deplorably fallen, presented for the adoption of all the States as an amendment to the Constitution, and is in these words:

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces," &c.

Now, sir, let us examine this provision. My honorable friend from Michigan attempted a definition of the term "case" used in it a few days since. That is one of the essential words in this clause, the meaning of which ought to be clearly ascertained if practicable. Then the other important phrase "forces," a correct understanding of which is equally necessary to a proper construction of this important provision of the Constitution. What are cases arising in the land or naval forces? What is a case? All lawyers understand what a case in court is. I admit that the term "case" here has a larger significance than the term "case" as it is applied to proceedings in court, but still "cases" here means "questions relating to persons or things." That is the import, the meaning of the term, as it is used in this section of the Constitution. That is Johnson's definition of the term "case." That of Webster is "a state of facts involving a question for discussion or decision." Now, sir, I do not know how, with my limited knowledge of language, I could give a more precise and correct definition of the term "case" than is expressed in these two definitions. I should adopt the latter. It is a state of facts involving a question for discussion or decision. It seems to me that that was the sense in which the framers of the Constitution used the term, and I take it for true that that is sense. Now, with that definition of a "case," there were and necessarily would arise in the operations of the country and of the Government two great classes of cases, one civil and the other military. I hold that it was the purpose of our wise and watchful fathers who made this fundamental law of government to draw a clear distinction between the two classes of cases, and to provide a radically different treatment of the two classes of cases. In their distrust of and aversion to the tyranny of military power they chose to adopt this important principle, which in the language of Mr. John Quincy Adams, in my judgment "will abide the test of time, of talents, and of human scrutiny," that a mere civilian, at no time, upon no charge, under no state of case, should ever be put upon trial, for a capital or otherwise infamous offense, before a military court, where the law is the mere will of the court itself, or of the commanding officer who convenes it, where there is an utter, reckless abnegation of constitutional and of all the provisions of civil law, where, in the language of Wellington, "martial law is only the will of the commander-in-chief, and its effect is to overthrow all other law—to make the will of the commander-in-chief the supreme, unquestionable, unappealable law of the case."

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must now interrupt the Senator and call up the special order, being the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (S. No. 392) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads."

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator from Kentucky may have the privilege of finishing his remarks to-day on this matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is a special order for to-day at one o'clock, House bill No. 307, regulating commerce among the several States, which I hope will be taken up. The report which has been under discussion this morning will evidently lead to a long debate, pro and con., and I desire to have this bill considered to-day. It has already gone over several times, and I am anxious to have it disposed of. I move that all other orders be laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which was made the special order for to-day.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the unfinished business will not be postponed. It is a matter of very great importance to have that bill passed. It is pending here on a motion to reconsider, and unless it be passed very soon there will not be time to get it through the House of Representatives. I hope it will not be postponed but will be acted upon. I do not think it will lead to much debate. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] will make a speech in favor of the motion to reconsider, and I propose to speak not over ten or fifteen minutes in reply, and then I am willing to submit the question to the vote of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill which was made the special order for to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 307.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope that motion will not be agreed to. The measure referred to by the Senator from Kentucky need not occupy much of the time of the Senate. It is very important that that bill shall be passed at this session, so that the railroads interested in the important work which it provides for may be enabled to progress with the work during the coming summer. It is of prime importance to our States that it should be considered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am in favor of that bill, but I hope that the Senators will not antagonize it with the measure in my charge, which has been laid aside for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Finance. Now, it is the special order for to-day, and I hope it will be proceeded with.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to suggest to my honorable friend from Michigan that the bill referred to by the Senator from Kentucky passed the Senate, and I made a motion to reconsider in order to allow the Senator from Pennsylvania to be heard. I understand that when he has been heard, and the Senator from Kentucky shall have replied, that subject will at once come to a vote, and then we can take up the bill which the Senator from Michigan desires to consider, and go on with it. I think that course will expedite business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw my motion, with the understanding that the bill to which I have referred shall be taken up next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. No. 392) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads."

Mr. COWAN. This bill, Mr. President, provides for the construction of a bridge across the Ohio river at Louisville. It provides that its height shall not be less than fifty-six feet above low-water mark; that it shall be constructed with three draws sufficient to pass the largest boats navigating the Ohio river, one over the Indiana chute, one over the middle chute, and one over the canal. The spans of the bridge are not to be less than two hundred and forty feet, except over the Indiana and middle chutes, and the canal. The bridge is to be constructed with draws of one hundred and fifty feet wide on each side of the pivot-pier over the Indiana and middle chutes, and ninety feet wide over the canal.

It is not necessary that I should remind the Senate of the importance of the Ohio river as a highway to the commerce of the great valley of the Mississippi. A thousand miles in length, carrying upon its current more in a single day than all the railroads of the country can carry in a month, it becomes of the greatest importance that that navigation should be free and unobstructed. Senators will remember that in 1862 this question came before the Senate upon a proposal to construct a railroad bridge across the Ohio river at Steubenville. It was very much investigated at that time, and a very considerable amount of testimony was adduced before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in order to ascertain in what way such a bridge might be constructed without injury to the navigation. The bill which passed on that occasion, and which was approved on the 14th of July, 1862, authorizing the Steubenville bridge, provided that it should be at least three hundred feet wide, and I think it was shown pretty conclusively before the committee that any other construction than that there would be an impediment to the navigation of the river.

That bridge was constructed there, nine hundred miles above the mouth of the Ohio river, with spans of three hundred feet and an elevation of ninety feet above the water. It was supposed at that time to be a final settlement of the question, so far as it could come before this Legislature. Here, however, we find a bill now which proposes to throttle this river, to narrow its capacity, some five hundred miles below, and the effect of which will be to compel the whole navigation of the river above to accommodate itself to the narrow passage under this proposed bridge.

The place where this bridge is proposed to be located is one of great importance. It will be observed by Senators that it is to be located at the head of the falls of the Ohio river, the most difficult and dangerous piece of navigation upon the whole river. It is to be located at a place where it requires great care and circumspection to achieve the channel at all, a place where it is impossible at certain stages of the water to land heavy floats in order to prepare them for a passage through the draws which are to be constructed in this bridge; and I have no hesitation in saying that, if this bridge be erected, it will operate to cripple the navigation of the whole river above, and that for most obvious reasons. The ordinary boats on the river require a space of eighty-five or ninety feet high in order to enable them to pass under it—that is to say, a first-class boat, with its chimney, is from eighty to ninety feet high. It is not pretended that such boats can pass under this bridge; and, as a matter of course, they will be obliged to pass through the draw, and this draw—wide enough, perhaps, to allow them to pass—is to be opened and shut, and these boats have to detain themselves until that is done, and to detain themselves upon the very brink of the falls, the very place where it would be most difficult of all others to stop, and wait the adjustment of the draw; and if they are coming up the falls I cannot see how it would be possible that they could stop on such a place as that for such a purpose. I believe there are Senators who know something about a bridge that was built across the Mississippi river at Rock Island, and know something about the accidents which occurred there from the very causes to which I am now referring. At that bridge a very large amount of property was destroyed; and I believe it was considered by the country so much of a nuisance as required that it should be finally abated.

So far as the draws are concerned in this bridge at the falls, one hundred and fifty feet in width would do if it were possible and not dangerous to open and shut a draw of such length. If the Senate will suppose an arm of one hundred and fifty feet long to be stretched each side of a central pier, they will have an idea of the time that will be necessary to swing that draw, to open it, to turn those arms in the direction of the current, and then close them across the stream afterward. I suppose the larger boats, the passenger-carrying boats of the river, might stop to await this opening and shutting of the draw, and I suppose there is enough space so that they could get through; but the objection comes more particularly from a large number of people who are engaged in a different kind of carrying trade, coal and lumber. The passage that will be open to them at the widest—and that is not in the channel because the draws occupy the channel—the spans over other parts of the river where they will be obliged to run through are limited here and cut down to two hundred and forty feet. It will be utterly impossible to conduct the navigation and trade of that river upon the same principle which is now adopted if you narrow these spans to two hundred and forty feet. The tows themselves are often wider than that; and they range from one hundred and eighty to two hundred and twenty feet. One not conversant with this kind of navigation might suppose it would be very easy to run a boat two hundred feet wide between a pair of piers that were two hundred and forty feet wide; but Senators must remember that the pilot who undertakes to achieve this task must begin a mile away from the passage, and then he must begin with the enormous weight of tows, some three or four hundred feet long and some two hundred feet wide, carrying the heaviest of all commodities, bituminous stone coal. These barges are one hundred feet long, six or seven feet draught, and twenty feet wide, all tied to a small tug-boat calculated simply to give the whole mass weight or momentum enough for the ordinary navigation of the river, but utterly unable to turn it readily and quickly so as to correct any error that the pilot might make in his calculation at that distance. I venture to say that nine out of every ten of the pilots upon that river, unless it is those who are constantly engaged in running it—I mean the ordinary pilots who run it in times of freshets when alone these heavy cargoes can go down the river—cannot strike that passage, or know whether they are going to strike it until they are close to it. Even if you get the bow or fore part of this tow within that narrow strait, if you come into it askant, before your boats get through, your sideways with the whole tow will be against the pier.

We have had some experience with regard to the Steubenville bridge where the spans are three hundred feet wide, and where the river is comparatively smooth and unobstructed, and without any very rapid current, and the consequence there is that it requires the greatest skill and the greatest care to avoid accidents even with less cargoes than those that I have described.

Mr. President, I think it would be exceedingly unjust to the people inhabiting the States of Ohio, West Virginia, and the upper part of Pennsylvania, that this obstruction should be put here, particularly when you come to ascertain how very easy it would be to avoid all this difficulty.

The other day we authorized the construction of a bridge across the Ohio river at Cincinnati. That was a suspension bridge with a span of a thousand feet, and instead of being ninety feet above the water, as the Steubenville bridge is, it was one hundred feet. Nobody complained of it. Why not build this bridge in that way? Where is the necessity of narrowing the span upon this bridge to two hundred and forty feet, when it is obvious, and a matter of actual experiment, that the span can be made a thousand feet? Where is the necessity of putting it down to fifty-six feet above low-water mark when that at Cincinnati is built one hundred feet above low-water mark? I know the answer to these questions; but what does it amount to? Simply this, that such a bridge would cost $200,000 more. I have no doubt that the trade of the Ohio river, with one mill upon its tonnage for a single year, would pay for that difference; and yet the whole trade and travel upon that river is to be obstructed and impeded, for the sake of what? To save that which, compared with the whole trade, is the merest mote in the sunbeam.

The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] tells me that the length of this bridge is to be four thousand seven hundred feet. If that be so, it is only another argument in favor of the ease with which it can be made one hundred feet high. It is said that the banks of the Ohio river are so low at this point that the bridge cannot be built more than fifty-six feet above the level of the water. Why, sir, is there any difficulty about trestling up at the ends or embanking at the ends? In order to preserve such an immense interest at stake as the people of the three or four States I have named have in the free navigation of the Ohio river, an embankment of a mile on either side of the river, in order to attain the necessary elevation, would be the merest bagatelle in the world compared with the effect that this bridge will have upon all the navigation of that river. I have not a doubt about it in the world; and I speak, to some extent, knowingly upon this subject. I know the difficulties of the navigation of this river, and I know how immensely they would be increased by a wall across it, such as is proposed here. I know, too, what will be the feelings of the free citizen when he comes to an obstruction of that kind, which is utterly and totally unnecessary. It may be very convenient to the railroad company that builds it; it may save them two or three hundred thousand dollars, but it will save them that at a loss of millions upon millions on the trade of that river, and in all time, as long as it lasts. It is not to be a mere temporary obstruction; it is not to remain there for a month or a year, but it is to remain there for all time. This privilege, this right, which we are about to give away to private corporations and take from the whole people, is to endure and remain forever.

We may sit here and take no interest in this subject; we may suppose that it is a trifle; but if we remember the thousands and thousands of people with their property upon that river for more than six months in the year, and the stake they have in that property, oftentimes their all embarked in a single boat or tow, then it becomes another question, and it becomes us to protect them. They have a right unquestionably to the free navigation of the river. It is public property. It belongs to the whole people. It belongs to you and me and all of us; and are we to give it away? To whom? To give it away to private corporations to our own detriment. There might be some argument for it if it was absolutely necessary; but it is proposed to give it away to them to our own detriment, in order that they may be able to cross it by means of a cheap structure.

Now, I ask Senators what is to prevent them making a bridge of three hundred feet span just as well as they made such a bridge at Steubenville? What is to prevent these companies from constructing a bridge, that will meet with no opposition from anybody, of a thousand feet span and ninety feet above the water? Nobody has shown and nobody can show that such a thing is impossible.

It is said the banks of the river are low. I do not care how low they may be. This bridge now, it seems, can be fifty-six feet above the water. What you want, then, is to elevate it forty-four feet higher, to make it according to the Steubenville standard. What distance will you require in order to attain that elevation upon an easy grade of railroad? Ninety feet to the mile is not a very heavy grade on a railroad. This river itself is over four thousand feet wide, four fifths of a mile, and even upon the bridge itself, by elevating it in the center, you might attain, perhaps, almost the elevation you require. But that is not necessary. It is not necessary that your railroad shall run at a dead level until you come to the bank of the river. You may commence half a mile back, if you please, and trestle up until you get to the proper elevation.

I take it that this Senate would be recreant to its duty here if it allowed any company to put a bridge across there that would obstruct the navigation when it is possible to put one there that would protect the navigation. I think that is not a question that Senators should be in doubt about at all. They should not come here and ask that a general right may be set aside to subserve a private interest, however much that private interest may connect itself with the public; but they ought to come with such evidence as would leave to every member of this Senate no doubt but that the great public right would be preserved.

Suppose these companies were to begin half a mile from the river bank on each side, in order to raise an embankment to get forty-four feet of elevation, what would that cost? By embankment itself it would not cost $200,000; and by trestle-work it would not cost near so much; and shall you impede or impair or even threaten the navigation of this great highway for such a consideration as that? I hope not, sir. I should be exceedingly sorry to believe that such a thing would be agreed to by Senators who have had an opportunity of knowing these things, particularly when they have once been investigated here at great length, as the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] will testify when his memory is refreshed by the provisions of the law of July 14, 1862, in relation to the Steubenville bridge, when it was absolutely shown that nothing short of a span of three hundred feet would satisfy the requirements of the navigation of that river; and since that time, as I have before stated, there is the most conclusive evidence in the world that a bridge can be built there that will be unexceptionable to everybody. I hope, therefore, that this bill will be reconsidered.

Mr. COLLAMER. Do you want to amend it? Mr. COWAN. I wish to make it precisely the same as the bill for the bridge across the Ohio river at Steubenville. It is manifest to everybody that all the people navigating this river must accommodate themselves to its narrowest passages. If you make the passage only one hundred feet wide, then they must cut down their floats to one hundred feet. There is no use in having a three hundred feet span at Steubenville if you have a two hundred and forty feet span below in one part of the river. There is no use of having a bridge with ninety feet elevation at Steubenville and one hundred feet at Wheeling and one hundred feet at Cincinnati, if at Louisville there is to be a bridge with but fifty-six feet elevation.

I propose to read the action of the Pittsburgh Coal Exchange upon this subject; and this is the opinion of men who are engaged in this trade, and who understand this subject much better than men not engaged in it might be supposed to understand it:

"Whereas there is a bill now before Congress to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge across the Ohio river at the falls, near Louisville, on a plan which, in our opinion, would be ruinous to the navigation of the river, more particularly to those engaged in towing coal: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we respectfully but earnestly protest against the erection of said bridge on the plan mentioned in said bill, for the following reasons, namely:

"First. It does not specify at what point they intend to cross the falls."

I might remark that that very omission is fatal in this bill for a reason that they give below.

"This is a serious matter, as there are points where the erection of a bridge would stop navigation, while there are other points where it might be possible to place piers without interfering much with the navigation."

There are points where the erection of a bridge would not only hinder and impede the navigation but absolutely stop it entirely. If the bridge was located at a particular point on the falls where the river runs with almost lightning rapidity, it would be utterly impossible to stop a boat if the draw was not open, and if a railroad train was just passing, it would be impossible to open the draw in order to let the boat through, and then you would have the same accidents which have characterized the bridge at Rock Island across the Mississippi.

"Second. The height proposed is too low; there is no low-water mark on the falls."

Which may seem to be a paradox, but the water runs away so rapidly over the falls that the rise there, however much it may be above and below, amounts to nothing. It is very much like pouring molasses out of a pitcher; the stream may be as thick as your wrist at the spout, and yet by its accelerated velocity in falling, when it gets near the floor it is almost as thin as a hair from going so much more rapidly.

"The river rises sometimes thirty feet; and when it is safe for heavy boats to run over the falls it would not give forty feet above water, which would not let a steamer under without chimneys."

It would not let the boats on the Ohio river through even if they were to take off their chimneys entirely, and the chimneys themselves are from forty to fifty feet above the hurricane deck of the boats.

"Third. The proposed width of piers at the scutes of one hundred and fifty feet is entirely too little. Our tow-boats with their barges frequently require a width of two hundred feet, and seldom less than one hundred and twenty."

All this may seem strange to Senators, and yet it is nevertheless true, and sometimes they not only reach two hundred feet, but they have even gone down with a width of two hundred and seventy feet. There will be, perhaps, twenty or twenty-five of these barges all tied together, presenting a front of ten, twelve, and fourteen barges, and in the inside of them a tug-boat with an engine, driving that immense mass down the river, and when it has taken them down it returns and another set of barges are taken down in the same way. Can it be supposed that a boatman on one of these floats in a dark night, if you please, in a fog, in a storm, or in any of the thousand contingencies which assail the boatman in his perilous way, can hit with a boat two hundred feet wide a passage two hundred and forty feet wide? If he did hit it with an ordinary boat he would not be doing a bad business; but certainly he could not do it with the old broad-horn, the old flat-boat. He might do it if he was out upon the land, if he was in a forest where he had plenty of landmarks, but when you throw him out in the midst of a river over four thousand feet wide, with nothing but the current, nothing but the smooth glassy surface of water to guide him, he may be two hundred and forty feet out of his way and he may be five hundred out of it, and he cannot know it until he is almost upon the obstruction.

It is not only the case with the piers in the river, but it is the case with islands in the river. Go down the river at any time you please, and at the head of these islands you will find wreck after wreck of boats; and why? Were they only two hundred and forty feet wide? The pier will be only twenty-five or thirty feet. But it is impossible to avoid these islands, presenting as they do for a long distance this immense front, and the boats run upon them; and yet here you suppose that men can safely narrow themselves down to a two hundred and forty feet channel in a river of this width. Sir, it is impossible; it is not in the nature of things. You may get up to it, because you come up very slowly, and if you do not happen to come up right, you can go back on the falls as fast as you want to do; but if you are coming down you cannot stop; you cannot change your direction; you are at the mercy of this enormous mass of floating matter, while your boat has not power enough and you cannot give it momentum enough to enable you to guide it or to turn it.

"Now the danger of running the falls without any artificial obstruction is very great; and we are satisfied that with piers placed as proposed, it would be nearly impossible to run with any safety. We have come to this conclusion, from our experience in running the piers of the Steubenville bridge, which are three hundred feet apart; and this over a part of the river which does not run so wild as it does at the falls."

"Resolved, That we do not wish to say or do anything that would tend to hinder the erection of a railroad bridge at a proper place over or near the falls; but for the foregoing reasons we earnestly request our Representatives in Congress to use all their interest and powers to stop the passage of said bill until the party asking for the privilege shall locate it in such a place as those who are interested in the navigation of the river shall consider it safe."

Now, Mr. President, one word more. What is this question? What is the length and breadth of it measured in a pecuniary point of view? It is the carrying trade and travel of the Ohio river on the one side, and the cost of raising this bridge forty-four feet more on the other side. Compare the two—a mountain to a molehill, or rather a mountain to that which vanishes away into nothingness by the comparison. What would be $200,000 or $300,000 or $500,000, if you please, invested by these companies to raise the bridge above the water one hundred feet, as it is at Cincinnati, with a span of a thousand feet, compared with the navigation of this great highway? What right have they to claim it? As I said before, I have no doubt that in a single day that river, when it is in freshet, would carry and does carry more tonnage than all the railroads of the West in a month. Then there is the lumber trade, too, from western Pennsylvania; the rafts which go down the Ohio are more than one hundred and fifty and sometimes two hundred feet wide, and sometimes containing acres with houses, horses, and almost all the materials of civilized life on these great rafts. They are frequently compelled to go down the river in the night, because they cannot land; there are times when it is utterly impossible for them to land; when the shore is unsuited to them; when the wind is high; and they must go on, no matter whether it is in the fog or darkness or what may be the surrounding circumstances, and you propose to build a wall across it for the purpose of their running through two hundred and forty feet of space! Why, Mr. President, if this bill shall pass you might just as well say that six hundred miles of that river is to be cut off from the people above this bridge or else they must all go to work and adapt themselves to its restriction; they must wear its strait-jacket in order to accommodate themselves to it for the simple purpose of saving to these railroad companies perhaps two or three hundred thousand dollars which would enable them to put a bridge there which nobody would complain of, and one that would affect no public right.

I hope, therefore, that the bill will be reconsidered; and if it is reconsidered I shall move, as I was obliged to do in the case of the Steubenville bridge, as I had not notice of it, to recommit it to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, when we can have an opportunity to show, as we did show when that bill was smuggled through the Senate, that it was a violation of the rights of the people, and have it so altered as to preserve those rights.

Mr. POWELL. I fully concur with the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania as to the great advantage and importance of the Ohio river being free and unobstructed, but I am very confident that the construction of this bridge in the manner indicated will not in any manner whatever affect or obstruct the navigation of the river. If I believed that it would I would not be the advocate of the bridge and the plan of construction proposed.

I live two hundred and twenty miles below the falls of the Ohio, on the banks of that river. I have been familiar with its navigation from my earliest boyhood. I have inquired of a large number of the oldest and most intelligent steamboat men concerning this bridge, and they all tell me that a bridge constructed in the mode prescribed in this bill will not obstruct the navigation of the river. The importance of the navigation of the river being kept unobstructed is a matter that must be well known to every Senator. I suppose there is not a Senator in this Chamber who would be for passing any law authorizing a bridge to be built across that stream that he thought would obstruct its navigation; but being entirely confident that the bridge will not obstruct the navigation of the river, I trust the Senate will refuse to reconsider it, and will let the bill go to the House for their consideration.

It is a matter of the very greatest importance to the public interest that this railway bridge be constructed across the falls of the Ohio river. It is at that point that the roads from the Northwest and the roads from Kentucky running south meet. I have no doubt that every year since this war commenced this Government has lost over a million dollars in consequence of the obstruction of transportation of freight and munitions of war at that point. The two depots, the one of the Jeffersonville railroad and the other of the Louisville and Nashville railroad, are distant some half a mile or a mile from the river. The vast amount of provisions and other Army supplies that pass by rail to the Army south goes over the Louisville and Nashville railroad and reaches that point. Then you have to employ wagons to carry them to the river, and then they have to be ferried over the river, and from thence to be carried to the depot of the Louisville and Nashville road for transportation south. There have been as many as a thousand wagons employed at one time in hauling the Government trains across that river. The impediment, the delay, and the cost is immense. That is known to every gentleman who lives upon that border. The Senate will bear in mind that there is no railway having connection with the South, Nashville for instance, that connects with the Northwest, other than the Louisville and Nashville railroad, and all the Government supplies, all the freights, and all the passengers that pass there, other than those connected with the Government that go by rail, have to pass over the river at this point. Hence it is a matter of very great importance and of great public interest that a bridge be built there, and built speedily.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is of the opinion that it will obstruct the navigation of the river. He is of the opinion too that the bridge is located in the wrong place; that the currents are swift there, and consequently the navigation will be more impeded by such a bridge there than it would be if built elsewhere. Allow me to tell the Senator that in that matter he is very greatly mistaken. I have investigated this matter in every aspect in which it could be presented. I have taken the opinions of the most sensible men who have been engaged in the navigation of the river; and since this motion to reconsider has been entered I have talked with some of the steamboat men who have been for thirty years engaged in the navigation of the Ohio. I have called their attention to the plan of this bridge, and they all tell me that it will not interfere with the navigation.

The Senate must bear in mind that there is a very small portion of the year when the navigation over the falls is open for boats ascending or descending. Much the larger portion of the year, in consequence of the obstruction created by the falls, there is no navigation of any kind there at all except through the canal.

So far as the rapidity of the current there is concerned, allow me to tell the Senator that whenever the river is of sufficient height to allow boats to ascend and descend the river at the falls, there is no more current there, or very little more, than at other places. When the river is seven feet high at the head of the falls, then it is some fifteen or sixteen feet high below the falls. When the river is ten or twelve feet high at the head of the falls, then there is no greater current in consequence of the falls, because at that height the current is level. The falls of the Ohio are about two and a half miles in length. At that distance the fall is some twenty-six feet; but in consequence of the rapidity of the water passing over the falls at low tide, when the river rises, and in consequence of the narrows in the Ohio river, just below the falls where the river passes through tortuous rocky-bound hills, the river rises something over two feet below the falls, while it rises one foot at the head of the falls; and consequently a rise of ten or twelve feet obliterates entirely the increased current in consequence of the falls, because twelve feet at the head of the falls is over twenty-six feet below the falls.

I hold in my hand a petition accompanied by affidavits and statements upon that subject. The petition is signed by Mr. Guthrie, the president of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and by Mr. Ricketts, president of the Jeffersonville Railroad Company, two very intelligent gentlemen, both of whom have lived for many years at that very point. It is accompanied by the affidavit of Mr. Enoch Lockhart, a gentleman of the strictest integrity, and a man of ability in his line, who has been a falls pilot on that river for thirty-three years. This Lockhart examined this petition, as he states in his affidavit, and examined the plan of the bridge that was before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and he swears that that structure will not obstruct the navigation at the falls. I will read one or two brief extracts from this paper on that subject.

Before doing so, however, I will state to the Senate why it is not practicable to construct this bridge at a greater height at that point. That fact is set forth in the memorial and in the evidence which was before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. The banks of the river are low at that point. If you would arrange the bridge to the height indicated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, the grades would be such that it would be utterly useless as a railway bridge. This bridge will be nearly five thousand feet long; and it would be useless attempting to raise it to the height indicated by the Senator, in consequence of the grades. The Senator wishes to know why this bridge cannot be constructed with as much span as that across the river at Cincinnati. He tells you that there the span is a thousand feet. Allow me to tell the Senator that that is not a railroad bridge, and I do not believe it would be practicable to construct a railroad bridge with any security, with that immense span. That is a suspension bridge, and was not constructed for railway purposes.

The Senator wishes to know, again, why we do not put it at the height of the Steubenville bridge. The reason is stated. The reason was considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. It is in consequence of the formation of the banks of the river at that point. A bridge built in that way, such would be the heavy grades, would be almost useless. There is a difference in this bridge from the one at Steubenville. This bridge is to be constructed with draws, which is not the case with the Steubenville bridge. This bridge is to have four draws across the Ohio river, of one hundred and fifty feet each—two across the Indiana chute, and two across what is called the middle chute, at the falls. Those draws have to be not less than one hundred and fifty feet from the pivot pier, and that will give you four draws across this river one hundred and fifty feet wide. Then there is another draw across the canal of ninety feet. The draw across the canal is of the very same width as the other draws over that canal; and consequently there is, and can be, no objection to the width of the draw over the canal.

The Senator says that the steamboats will not be able to get down that river with their chimneys on if this bridge should be constructed in this way. Why, sir, cannot the steamboats go through these draws? There are four of them, each one hundred and fifty feet wide. The company will have to keep those draws always open at such times as to give free access to ascending and descending boats. Instead of the high chimneys, of which the Senator speaks, touching the bridge in any way whatever, he can make them high enough to kiss the very clouds, if he desires, and there would be no obstruction; for everybody knows that a draw of one hundred and fifty feet is large enough to admit any boat that ever navigated the river.

But the Senator rather concedes that it will be no objection to the river being navigated by steamboats. The objection, he states, rests upon these floats and coal barges. I have a good deal of acquaintance with that river, and with a great many of the floats and a great many of the steamboats with the coal barges in tow, of which the Senator has spoken, and so far as I am advised, and indeed I know the fact to be so, there is never one of them below the falls of the width indicated by the Senator. I brought that matter especially to the notice of our oldest and most experienced steamboat men, and they tell me that these spans will admit any barges bearing coal or any floats to pass down the river without obstruction to the navigation.

The Senator says the boats which carry coal and lumber are very unwieldy, and that they cannot be landed. They are all towed by steamers commonly called tugs. It is not like a barge; it is not a boat not propelled by steam, and there will be no difficulty whatever in those boats passing through the spans.

Now, sir, I will read a few brief extracts from this document. The length of the bridge as proposed by the companies, in the first place, would be about fifty-two hundred feet. The bridge, according to the bill, is not to be quite that length, but some forty-seven hundred feet, with a rocky foundation for the abutments of both sides and for all the piers. The fall is twenty-six feet in extreme low water, from the head to the foot of the falls, in a distance of about two miles and a half. The memorial, speaking of the currents there, says:

"The river is diminished in width to Leavenworth, Indiana, a distance of sixty miles below the falls; and for a distance of about twenty miles further it passes through a narrow gorge with projecting highlands on both sides; in consequence of which a rise of one foot at the head of the falls makes a rise of over two feet at the foot, until the rise at the foot of the falls overcomes the descent. This takes place when the rise at the foot is from twenty-six to thirty feet; and when there is twelve feet water at the head of the falls there is always over twenty-six feet at the foot; and the current is not greater at the falls than in any other part of the river.

"When there is seven feet or less at the head of the falls in the Indiana chute but few steamboats pass up the falls; and when there is less than two and a half feet few or none descend except through the canal. In high stages the river or the canal is used, according to the draught of the vessel and the discretion of the navigator.

"The Indiana chute, near the north side, is very narrow in low water, and steamboats cannot descend when there is less than two feet in that channel, which is but fifty feet wide for a distance of some three hundred feet. When there is seven feet in that channel there is only about three feet in what is termed the middle chute, and to the Kentucky shore, except in the canal. From seven feet to twelve feet at the head of the falls, there is no channel for ascending or descending boats but the Indiana chute, the middle chute, and the canal."

The Indiana chute for three hundred feet is but fifty feet wide. At this point this bridge is to have draws at each place of one hundred and fifty feet. How, then, can the navigation be interrupted when the water is that height? When the water is higher than that, there is no current more than there is at other points of the river. The draws are to be a hundred feet wider than the Indiana chute at the time when water is at anything like the low stage, so that boats can go through there except at these three points, the Indiana and the middle chutes, and the canal, unless the water is from ten to twelve feet high, and then they will have to pass just where the draws are, and the draws being wider than the Indiana or the middle chute, of course when they are raised there can be no obstruction to the navigation. The memorial says:

"When the rise in the river reaches sixteen feet at the head of the falls, a bridge fifty-six feet above low-water mark will give a space of forty feet between the lower chords and the water in the river."

And again:

"It will be seen, by reference to the register, that a bridge fifty-six feet above low water would be forty feet above the stage of water in the river, on the average, during each month of those years, and that it would have been less than forty feet but for twenty-one days in the three years."

This paper is accompanied by a register kept by Mr. Lockhart of the exact depth of the water there for three successive years, and it is clear from that register that there were only twenty-one days in three years when there was not forty feet from the water to the lower portions of this bridge. Is not that height enough? And is not two hundred and forty feet space enough for these boats to go through? Mr. Lockhart states in this paper that he has been a pilot there for thirty-three years:

"He states that he has seen and read the petition of the two railroad companies to Congress for authority to build a bridge at the head of the falls, fifty-six feet above low-water mark, with the spans and draws as stated in the petition, and concurs in the facts stated in it, and thinks such a bridge would be a great public convenience, and does not believe it would injure the navigation of the falls."

There is the sworn testimony of a man who has a larger experience on the subject than perhaps any man that now lives; a man of the highest integrity and intelligence.

"The river at the falls is about one mile wide, and so continues to near the foot of the falls, a distance of two and one half miles."

Mr. Lockhart further says:

"The Indiana chute on the north side, at the head of the falls, is not more than fifty feet wide at low water, and extends down the river the same width some three hundred feet, and when there is seven feet of water in that chute there is not more than three feet in what is called the middle chute, there being a depression in the rocky bed of the river to the north side.

"From the time ascending and descending steamboats can pass the falls there will be no impediment or delay in having to take the chutes where the proposed draws are to be, while boats without high chimneys can pass under the bridge and between the spans anywhere.

"The bridge would be a great public convenience by lessening the cost and delays of passage and transportation between the north and south side of the river, which has greatly increased within a few years, with a prospect of still greater increase in the future."

From that showing I do not think this bridge, if constructed, will at all interfere with the navigation of the Ohio; but there is a special provision in the bill that it shall be so constructed as not to interfere with navigation. It is expressly provided "that said bridge and draws shall be so construed as not to interrupt the navigation of the Ohio river." It is a matter of very great importance to the public interest that this bridge be speedily constructed. Every person who has traveled in that region must know the obstruction, expense, and delay occasioned by the railroad communication being broken at the head of the falls. I do not believe this bridge will obstruct the navigation of the river in any particular.

The Senator from Pennsylvania talks a great deal about floats and rafts. I know that some rafts go down the river of very great size; from my earliest boyhood I have seen them; but I have confidence that rafts of the size which pass below the falls of the Ohio can go through these spans. The largest sized rafts do not pass over the falls; they stop above; but I have never seen one upon the Ohio river that could not get through a space of two hundred and forty feet; and as to the coal barges towed by tugs, there are no boats I know of that cannot go between a space of two hundred and forty feet. The Senator tells you that these boats are very unwieldy. I know that sometimes in dark fogs steamboats with nothing in tow run up against the bank; but whenever it is safe to take a boat over the falls it will be very easy for it to strike between these spans.

But, Mr. President, there is one fact which should be remembered in regard to the transportation of lumber on the Ohio river. The Senator well knows that it is now being carried in barges and steamboats. The taking of it in rafts has greatly diminished within the last few years, and I have no doubt will soon be superseded entirely by beam navigation. It is now put on barges and towed by steamboats, and it is sometimes put on steamboats themselves. One raft does not float down the river now where ten or twenty used to float seven or eight years ago.

I am as deeply interested in keeping the navigation of the Ohio unobstructed as the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have made the most strict and minute inquiry of men of the greatest intelligence and practical knowledge on this subject, and I am firmly of opinion that this bridge will not in any particular interrupt the navigation of the river. While I believe that, I know it to be a matter of the greatest importance to the public generally that the railroads of Indiana and the Northwest should be connected with those in Kentucky going south. I know the construction of the bridge will save to this Government every year an amount of money sufficient to build it. I therefore think this bill should be passed here speedily, so that, if it has the concurrence of the other House, it may be passed there at this session, and then the railroad companies will go on at once to build the bridge. I am told that they can have it constructed by next summer, for they have the means and intend to put a strong force on it at once. If, however, the bill is delayed here, the result probably will be that it will be defeated in the House of Representatives for want of time. I hope, therefore, the motion to reconsider will be voted down.

Mr. COWAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. I merely wish to say that inasmuch as the Senator from Pennsylvania wishes a reconsideration of this, I shall sustain the motion to reconsider to give him an opportunity to offer amendments which he may desire to present, without considering that in voting for the reconsideration I commit myself in any way to vote against the bill.

Mr. COWAN. I can merely say that I make the motion to reconsider so that I may have an opportunity to amend the bill, the bill having been passed when I was absent. I wish to amend it as to the width of the spans.

Mr. ANTHONY. If that is the object of the reconsideration, I think the call for the yeas and nays may as well be withdrawn and there will be no objection to the reconsideration.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Willey, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Davis, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Doolittle, Harding, Harris, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Salsbury, Sherman, Stewart, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—15.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COWAN. I move now to amend the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that another vote must be reconsidered before it will be in order to amend the bill—the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. COWAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed. The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now open to amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to postpone this bill for the purpose of proceeding with the bill which was fixed as the special order for one o'clock.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Senator will allow us to dispose of this bill. We shall vote on the amendments without discussion.

Mr. COWAN. It will not take long.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. COWAN. In the sixteenth line of the first section I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "two hundred and forty" and inserting "three hundred," so as to make the spans the same width with those of the Steubenville bridge above, so that the spans may be uniform and of the same width. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Ramsey, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Harlan, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, and Van Winkle—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Doolittle, Harding, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Salsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wright—16.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to take up the special order for one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that it comes up as a matter of course, the unfinished business of yesterday having been disposed of. That bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, being House bill No. 307, to regulate commerce among the several States.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the question before us concerns the public convenience to a remarkable degree. But it concerns also the unity of this Republic. Look at it in its simplest form, and you will confess its importance. Look at it in its political aspect, and you will recognize how vital it is to the integrity of the Union itself. On one side we encounter a formidable Usurpation with all the pretensions of State rights, hardly less flagrant or pernicious than those which have ripened in bloody rebellion. On the other side are the simple and legitimate claims of the Union under the Constitution of the United States.

Thus stands the question at the outset. Public convenience and the Union itself in its beneficent powers on the one side. Public inconvenience and all the discord of intolerable State pretensions on the other side.

The proposition on its face is applicable to all the States throughout the Union, and in its vital principle it concerns every lover of his country. But it cannot be disguised that the interest which it has excited in the other House, and also in the Senate, must be referred to its bearing on the railroads of New Jersey. Out of this circumstance springs the ardor of opposition; perhaps, also, something of the ardor of support. Therefore pardon me if I glance for one moment at the geographical position of this State, and its railroad Usurpation in the name of State rights.

Look on the map, or better still, consult your own personal experience in the journey from Washington to New York, and you will find that New Jersey lies on the great line of travel between the two capitals of the country, political and commercial. There it is, directly in the path. It cannot be avoided except by a circuitous journey. On this single line commerce, passengers, mails, troops—all must move. In the chain of communication by which capital is bound to capital—nay, more, by which the Union itself is bound together, there is no single link of equal importance. Strike it out, and where are you? Your capitals will be separated and the Union itself will be loosened. But the evil sure to follow, if this link were struck out, must follow also in proportionate extent from every interference with that perfect freedom of transit through New Jersey which I now ask in behalf of commerce, passengers, mails, and troops.

Such is the geographical position of New Jersey. And it is here on this highway of travel that pernicious pretensions have been set up which can be overthrown only by the power of Congress. The case is plain.

New Jersey, in the exercise of pretended State rights, has undertaken to invest the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company with unprecedented prerogatives. These are the words of the Legislature: "It shall not be lawful, at any time during the said railroad charter, to construct any other railroads in this State without the consent of the said companies, which shall be intended or used for the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, or to compete in business with the railroad authorized by the act to which this supplement is relative." (New Jersey Session Laws for 1854, page 387.) Here, in barefaced terms, is the grant of a monopoly in all railroad transportation, whether of commerce, passengers, mails, or troops, between New York, a city outside of New Jersey, and Philadelphia, another city outside of New Jersey. Or, looking at this grant of monopoly again, we shall find that while it leaves the local transportation of New Jersey untouched, it undertakes to regulate and appropriate the transportation between two great cities outside of New Jersey, constituting, from geographical position, the gates through which the whole mighty movement, north and south, must pass.

If this monopoly is offensive on its face, it becomes still more offensive when we consider the motive in which it had its origin. By the confession of its supporters, it was granted in order to raise a revenue for the State out of men and business not of the State. It was an ingenious device to tax commerce, passengers, mails, and troops in their transit across New Jersey, from State to State. Here is a confession, which will be found in the legislative journal of New Jersey, as long ago as 1841, in a document from the executive committee of the coalesced railroads, represented by the Camden and Amboy Company:

"It seems plain, from the acts incorporating these companies and the testimony of those best conversant with the history of their incorporations, that it was the policy of the State, taking advantage of the geographical position of New Jersey, between the large States and cities of the Union, to create a revenue by imposing tax or transit duty upon every person who should pass on the railroad across the State between those cities from the Delaware river to the Raritan bay; but that it was not their design to impose any tax upon citizens of their own State for traveling between intermediate places." * * * "Here, again, the policy and intention of the State is most clearly indicated in exempting her own citizens from the operation of this system of taxation."—Page 29.

And here are the words of another functionary equally frank, belonging to the same railroad connection:

"The company believe that a careful consideration of the whole matter, as well from the provisions of the charter as from a recurrence to the period when it was granted, will produce the conviction that the transit duty was intended to be levied only on citizens of other States passing through New Jersey."

The spirit in which this tax has been laid will appear from another incident which cannot be without interest to the Senators from New York. The Erie railroad, which is so important to transportation in the great State which they represent on this floor, has been compelled, in addition to the usual tax on that part of the road in New Jersey, to pay an extra tax in the shape of "a transit duty of three cents on every passenger and two cents on every ton of goods, wares, and merchandise, except passengers and freight, transported exclusively within this State." This imposition was as late as 1862, and it is a part of that same system which constitutes the railroad Usurpation of New Jersey.

But the character of this Usurpation becomes still more apparent in the conduct adopted toward another railroad in New Jersey. It appears that a succession of railroads has been constructed, under charters of this State, from Raritan bay, opposite New York, to Camden, opposite Philadelphia, constituting a continuous line, suitable for transportation, across New Jersey and between the two great cities of New York and Philadelphia. This continuous line is known as the Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad. On the breaking out of the rebellion, when Washington was menaced by a wicked enemy, and the patriots of the land were aroused to sudden efforts, the Quartermaster General of the United States directed the transportation of troops, horses, baggage, and munitions of war, from New York to Philadelphia over this line. The other railroad, claiming a monopoly, filed a bill in equity, praying that the Raritan and Delaware Bay railroad "be decreed to desist and refrain" from such transportation, and also praying "that an account may be taken to ascertain the amount of damages." The counsel of the monopoly openly insisted that, by this transportation, the State was "robbed of her ten cents a passenger;" and then cried out, "I say it is no defense whatever if they have succeeded in obtaining an order of the Secretary of War, when we call upon them to give us the money they made by it; and that is one of our calls. They have no right to get an order to deprive the State of New Jersey of the right of transit duty, which is her adopted policy." Such was the argument of Mr. Stockton, counsel for the monopoly, November 12, 1863. The transit duty is vindicated as the adopted policy of New Jersey. Surely, in the face of such pretensions, it was time that something should be done by Congress.

Such, sir, are the pretensions of New Jersey to interfere with commerce, passengers, mails, and troops from other States, on their way, it may be, to the national capital, even with necessary succors at a moment of national peril. Such pretensions, persistently maintained and vindicated, constitute a Usurpation not only hostile to the public interests, but menacing to the Union itself. Here is no question of local taxation, or local immunities, under State laws; but an open assumption by a State to tax the commerce of the United States on its way from State to State.

From the nature of the case, and according to every rule of reason, there ought to be a remedy for such a grievance. No usurping monopoly ought to be allowed to establish itself in any State across the national highway, and, like a baron of the middle ages perched in his rocky fastness, levy tolls and tribute from all the wayfarers of business, pleasure, or duty. The nuisance should be abated. The Usurpation should be overthrown. And happily the powers are ample under the Constitution of the United States. Following unquestionable principles and authentic precedents, the committee have proposed a remedy which I now proceed to discuss.

The bill under consideration was originally introduced by me into the Senate. It was afterward adopted and passed by the other House as a substitute for a kindred bill which was pending there. Beyond the general interest which I take in the public business, this is my special reason for entering into this discussion.

The bill is arraigned as unconstitutional. But this objection is a common-place of opposition. When all other reasons fail, then is the Constitution invoked. Such an attempt on such an occasion attests to my mind the weakness of the cause. It is little better than the assertion of an alias in a criminal case.

The entire and unimpeachable constitutionality of the present measure is apparent in certain familiar precepts of the Constitution, which were brought to view in the title and preamble of the bill as introduced by me, but which have been omitted in the bill now before us. The title of the bill as introduced by me was, "to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States." This title opens the whole constitutional question. This was followed by a preamble, as follows:

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress, in express terms, the power to regulate commerce among the several States, to establish post roads, and to raise and support armies: Therefore, Be it enacted." In these few words three sources of power are clearly indicated, either of which is ample; but the three together constitute an overrunning fountain.

First. There is the power "to regulate commerce among the several States." Look at the Constitution and you will find these identical words. From the great sensitiveness of States this power has been always exercised by Congress with peculiar caution; but it still lives to be employed by an enfranchised Government.

In asserting this power I follow not only the text of the Constitution, but also the authoritative decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Perhaps there is no question in our constitutional history which has been more clearly illustrated by our greatest authority, Chief Justice Marshall. In the well-known case where the State of New York had undertaken to grant an exclusive right to navigate the waters of New York by vessels propelled by steam, the illustrious Chief Justice, speaking for the court, declared the restriction to be illegal, because it interfered with commerce between the States precisely as is now done by New Jersey. In his opinion commerce was something more than traffic or the transportation of property. It was also "the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches," and it embraced by necessary inference all inter-State communications and the whole subject of intercourse between the people of the several States. It was declared that the power of Congress over the subject was not limited by State lines, but that it was coextensive with commerce itself according to the enlarged signification of the term. Here are the words of Chief Justice Marshall:

"But in regulating commerce with foreign nations, the power of Congress does not stop at the jurisdictional lines of the several States. It would be a very useless power if it could not pass these lines. The commerce of the United States with foreign nations is that of the whole United States. Every district has a right to participate in it. The deep streams which penetrate our country in every direction pass through the interior of almost every State in the Union, and furnish the means for exercising this right. If Congress has the power to regulate it, that power must be exercised wherever the subject exists. If it exists within the States, if a foreign voyage may commence or terminate at a port within a State, then the power of Congress may be exercised within a State."—Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 196.

This important decision of the Supreme Court was before railroads. It grew out of an attempt to appropriate certain navigable thoroughfares of the Union. But it is equally applicable to these other thoroughfares of the Union, where the railroad is the substitute for water. It is according to the genius of jurisprudence, that a rule once established governs all cases which come within the original reason on which it was founded. Therefore I conclude confidently that the power of Congress over internal commerce by railroad is identical with that over internal commerce by water. But this decision does not stand alone.

Mr. Justice Story, who was a member of the Supreme Court at this time, in a later decision thus explains the extent of this power:

"It does not stop at the mere boundary line of a State; nor is it confined to acts done on the water, or in the necessary course of the navigation thereof. It extends to such acts done on land as interfere with, obstruct, or prevent the free exercise of the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the States."—United States vs. Coombs, 12 Peters, 78.

From various cases illustrating this power, I call attention to that known as the Passenger case, where the Supreme Court declared that the statutes of New York and Massachusetts imposing taxes upon alien passengers arriving at the ports of those States was in derogation of the Constitution. On this occasion Mr. Justice McLean said:

"Shall passengers, admitted by act of Congress without a tax, be taxed by a State? The supposition of such a power in a State is utterly inconsistent with a commercial power either paramount or exclusive in Congress."

Mr. Justice Grier said, with great point:

"To what purpose commit to Congress the power of regulating our intercourse with foreign nations and among the States, if these regulations may be changed at the discretion of each State?" "It is, therefore, not left to the discretion of each State of the Union either to refuse a right of passage to persons or property or to exact a duty on permission to exercise it."—7 Howard, 464.

But this is the very thing that is now done by New Jersey, which "exact a duty" from passengers across the State.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do I understand the Senator to be quoting from the passenger case?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. That was a case where the legislation of Massachusetts was brought before the court.

Mr. SUMNER. I have already stated that there were two States offenders at that time; there is now only one.

I call attention also to the case of the Wheeling bridge, where Congress, under peculiar circumstances, exercised this identical power. In this case the State of Pennsylvania claimed the power to limit and control the transit across the Ohio river to the State of Ohio, and this power was affirmed by the Supreme Court so long as Congress refrained from legislation on the subject. But under the pressure of a public demand, and in the exercise of the very powers which are now invoked, Congress has declared the Wheeling bridge to be a lawful structure, anything in any State law to the contrary notwithstanding. The Supreme Court, after the passage of this act, denied a motion to punish the owners of the bridge for a contempt in rebuilding it, and affirmed that the act declaring the Wheeling bridge a lawful structure was within the legitimate exercise by Congress of its constitutional power to regulate commerce. (13 Howard, 528.) But it is this very power which is here invoked in a case more important, and far more urgent, than that of the Wheeling bridge.

There is also another case where Congress has exercised this power precisely as is now proposed. I refer to the Steubenville bridge and Holiday's Cove railroad across the Ohio, in what is called the Panhandle of Virginia. This bridge was at first attempted under a charter granted by Virginia, but Congress at last interfered and enacted:

"That the bridge partly constructed across the Ohio river at Steubenville in the State of Ohio, abutting on the Virginia shore of said river, is hereby declared to be a lawful structure."

"That the said bridge and Holiday's Cove railroad are hereby declared a public highway and established a post road for the purpose of transmission of mails of the United States."—12 Statutes at Large, 559.

Such are the precedents of courts and of statutes showing how completely this power belongs to Congress in the regulation of internal commerce. The authorities are plain and explicit. They cannot be denied. They cannot be explained away. It would be superfluous to dwell on them. There they stand like so many granite columns, fit supports of that internal commerce which in itself is a chief support of the Union.

Secondly. There is also the power "to establish post roads," which is equally explicit. Here, too, the words are plain, and they have received an authoritative exposition. It is with reference to these words that Mr. Justice Story remarks that "constitutions of government do not turn upon ingenious subtleties, but are adapted to the business and exigencies of human society; and the powers given are understood, in a large sense, in order to secure the public interests. Common sense becomes the guide and prevents men from dealing with mere logical abstractions." (Story, Commentaries on Constitution, vol. 2, sec. 1134.) The same learned authority, in considering these words of the Constitution, seems to have anticipated the very question now under consideration. Here is a passage which may fitly close the argument on this head:

"Let a case be taken when State policy"—

As, for instance, in New Jersey at this time—"or State hostility shall lead the Legislature to close up or discontinue a road, the nearest and the best between two great States, rivals, perhaps, for the trade and intercourse of a third State; shall it be said that Congress has no right to make or repair a road for keeping open for the mail the best means of communication between those States? May the national Government be compelled to take the most inconvenient and indirect routes for the mail? In other words, have the States the power to say how, and upon what roads, the mails shall and shall not travel? If so, then, in relation to post roads, the States, and not the Union, are supreme."—Story, Commentaries on the Constitution, vol. 2, sec. 1144.

Thirdly. Then comes the power "to raise and support armies;" an unquestionable power lodged in Congress. But this grant carries with it, of course, all incidental powers necessary to the execution of the principal power. It would be absurd to suppose that Congress could raise an army, but could not authorize the agencies required for its transportation from place to place. Congress has not been guilty of any such absurdity. Already it has by formal act proceeded "to authorize the President of the United States in certain cases to take possession of railroads and telegraphs, and for other purposes." (12 Statutes at Large, p. 334.) By this act the President is empowered "to take possession of any or all the railroad lines in the United States, their rolling stock, their offices, shops, buildings, and all their appendages and appurtenances," and it is declared that any such railroad "shall be considered as a post road and a part of the military establishment of the United States." Here is the exercise of a broader power than any which is now proposed. The less must be contained in the greater.

Mr. President, such are the three sources of power in the Constitution, each and all applicable to the present case. Each is indisputable. Therefore the conclusion, which is sustained by each, is three times indisputable.

So plain is this power that it has been admitted by New Jersey in a legislative act, as follows:

"SEC. 6. Be it enacted, That when any other railroad or roads for the transportation of passengers and property between New York and Philadelphia across this State shall be constructed and used for that purpose under or by virtue of any law of this State or the United States authorizing or recognizing said road, that then and in that case the said dividends shall be no longer payable to the State, and the said stock shall be retransferred to the company by the treasurer of this State."

Thus, in formal words, has New Jersey actually anticipated the very measure now under consideration. All that is now proposed so far as New Jersey is concerned is simply to recognize other railroads for the transportation of passengers and property between New York and Philadelphia across this State.

Such is the argument in brief for the constitutionality of the present bill, whether it be regarded as a general measure applicable to all the railroads of the country, or only applicable to the railroads of New Jersey. The case is so plain and absolutely unassailable that I should leave it on this simple exhibition if the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who always brings to these questions the authority of professional reputation, had not most zealously argued the other way. According to him, the bill is unconstitutional. Let me say, however, that the conclusion of the learned Senator is only slightly sustained by the reasons which he assigns. Indeed his whole elaborate argument, if brought to the touchstone, will be found inconclusive and unsatisfactory.

The Senator opened with the proposition that the internal commerce of a State is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the State, and from this he argued that the present bill is unconstitutional. But the Senator will allow me to say that his proposition is not sufficiently broad for his conclusion. The present bill does not touch the internal commerce of a State, except so far as it may be a link in the chain of "commerce among States," which is committed by the Constitution to the jurisdiction of Congress. Mark this distinction, I pray you; for it is essential to a right understanding of the case.

From this inapplicable proposition the Senator passed to another equally inapplicable. He asserted that the jurisdiction of a State over all territory within its limits was exclusive, so that the United States cannot obtain jurisdiction over any portion thereof, except by assent of the State; and from this again he argued the unconstitutionality of the present bill. But this very illustration seems to have been anticipated by Mr. Justice Story in his learned Commentaries, where he shows conclusively, first, that it is inapplicable, and secondly, that so far as it is applicable, it is favorable to the power. Here are his words:

"The clause respecting cessions of territory for the seat of Government, and for forts, arsenals, dock-yards, &c., has nothing to do with the point. But if it had, it is favorable to the power."

"But surely it will not be pretended that Congress could not erect a fort or magazine in a place within a State unless the State should cede the territory. The only effect would be that the jurisdiction in such a case would not be exclusive. Suppose a State should prohibit a sale of any of the lands within its boundaries by its own citizens, for any public purposes indispensable for the Union, either military or civil, would not Congress possess a constitutional right to demand and appropriate land within the State for such purposes, making a just compensation? Exclusive jurisdiction over a road is one thing; the right to make it is quite another. A turnpike company may be authorized to make a road, and yet may have no jurisdiction, or at least no exclusive jurisdiction, over it."—2 Story on Constitution, sec. 1146.

Had the distinguished commentator anticipated the argument of the Senator from Maryland, he could not have answered it more completely.

Passing from these constitutional generalities the Senator came at once to an assumption, which, if it were sustained, would limit essentially the power of Congress with regard to post roads. According to him the words of the Constitution authorizing Congress "to establish post roads," mean only that it shall designate roads already existing; and in support of this assumption he relied upon the message of Mr. Monroe in 1822, on the Cumberland road. The learned Senator adds that this is "the received opinion uniformly acted upon and since recognized as the correct opinion by the judiciary." Of course his testimony on this point is important; but it is overruled at once by the authority I have already cited, which says that "the power to establish post offices and post roads has never been understood to include no more than the power to point out and designate post offices and post roads." (Story's Commentaries, vol. 2, sec. 1136.) In the face of Mr. Justice Story's dissent, expressed in his authoritative Commentaries, it is impossible to say that it is "the received opinion," as has been asserted by the Senator. But the learned commentator insists that "the Constitution itself uniformly uses the word establish in the general sense and never in this peculiar and narrow sense," and after enumerating various places where it occurs, says, "it is plain that to construe the word in any of these cases as equivalent to designate or point out would be absolutely absurd. The clear import of the word is to create and form and fix in a settled manner." "To establish post offices and post roads is to frame and pass laws, to erect, make, form, regulate, and preserve them. Whatever is necessary, whatever is appropriate to this purpose, is within the power." (Ibid., sec. 1131.) I might quote other words from the same authority; but this is enough to vindicate the power which the Senator has denied.

But here it is my duty to remind the Senate that the argument of the Senator from Maryland on this head is not only false in its assumption, but that the assumption, even if correct, is entirely inapplicable on the present occasion. The bill now before the Senate does not undertake to create, but simply to designate or point out, certain roads. Therefore it does not fall under the objection which the Senator has adduced. Even by his own admission it is constitutional.

But the Senator, not content with an erroneous assumption concerning post roads, which, even if correct, is entirely inapplicable, made another assumption concerning another clause of the Constitution which was equally erroneous and inapplicable. The Senator argued that the railroad charters in New Jersey were grants in the nature of a contract, and that they were protected by "the constitutional inhibition upon States interfering with contracts;" and here he referred to several decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not trouble you with the decisions. It will be enough if I call attention to the precise text of the Constitution, which is: "No State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts."

Look at these words, and it appears, in the first place, that this prohibition is addressed to the States and not to Congress, whose powers are not touched by it. Look still further at the railroad charters, and even admit that they were grants in the nature of a contract; but you cannot deny that the contract must be interpreted with reference to the Constitution of the United States. Learned judges have held that the law of the place where a contract is made not only regulates and governs it, but constitutes a part of the contract itself. (Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122.) But if the law constitutes a part of the contract, still more must the Constitution. Apply this principle and the case is clear. Every railroad charter has been framed subject to the exercise of the acknowledged powers of Congress, all of which are implied in the grant as essential conditions, not less than if they were set forth expressly. The Supreme Court has decided that "all contracts are made subject to the right of eminent domain, so that they cannot be considered as violated by the exercise of this right." (The West River Bridge vs. Dix, 6 Howard, 507.) But the powers of Congress, invoked on the present occasion to regulate commerce among the several States, to establish post roads, and to raise and equip armies, are in the nature of an eminent domain, to which all local charters are subject. Therefore, I repeat again, nothing is proposed "impairing the obligation of a contract," even if that well-known prohibition were applicable to Congress.

From these details of criticism the Senator jumped to a broader proposition. He asserted that the pending measure was destructive of the sovereignty of the States, and he even went so far as to say that it was the same as if you said that all State legislation is null and void. These, sir, were his exact words. How the Senator, even in any arduous advocacy, could have ventured on this assumption, it is difficult to comprehend. Here is a measure, which, as I have already demonstrated, is founded on three different texts of the Constitution, which is upheld by three unsailable supports, and which is in essential harmony with the Union itself; and yet we are told that it is destructive of the sovereignty of the States. Such an assumption seems uttered in the very wildest of unhesitating advocacy. If it is anything but a phrase, it must be condemned, not only as without foundation, but as hostile to the best interests of the country.

Sir, the pending measure is in no respect destructive of the sovereignty of the States; nor does it in any sense say that all State legislation is null and void. On the contrary, it simply asserts a plain and unquestionable power under the Constitution of the United States. If in any way it seems to touch what is invoked as State sovereignty, or to set aside any State legislation, it is only in pursuance of the Constitution. It is simply because the Constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, are the supreme law of the land.

But the assumptions of the Senator bring me back to the vital principle with which I began. After exhibiting the public convenience involved in the present question, I said that it concerned still more the unity of the Republic. It is in short that identical question, which has so often entered this Chamber, and which is now convulsing this land with bloody war. It is the question of the Union itself. In his arduous that vampire monopoly which, brooding over New Jersey, sucks the life-blood of the whole country, the Senator from Maryland sets up most dangerous pretensions in the name of State rights. Sir, the Senator flings into one scale the pretensions of State rights. Into the other scale I fling the Union itself.

Sir, the Senator from Maryland is a practiced lawyer, and he cannot have forgotten that Nathan Dane, whose name is an authority in our courts, tells us plainly that the terms "sovereign States," "State sovereignty," "State rights," and "rights of States," are not constitutional expressions. Others of equal weight in the early history of the country have said the same thing. Mr. Madison, in the Convention which framed the Constitution, said, "Some contend that States are sovereign, when, in fact, they are only political societies. The States never possessed the essential right of sovereignty. These were always vested in Congress." Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, in the same Convention, said: "It appears to me that the States never were independent. They had only corporate rights." General Pinckney, of South Carolina, said: "I hold it for a fundamental point, that an individual independence of the States is utterly irreconcilable with the idea of an aggregate sovereignty." (Madison Papers, page 631.) Both Patrick Henry and George Mason, in the Virginia convention, opposed the Constitution on the very ground that it superseded State rights.

But, perhaps, the true intention of the authors of the Constitution may be best found in the letter of General Washington, as President of the Convention, transmitting it to Congress. Here are his words:

"It is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of these States to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the safety of all. Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest." * * * "I call our deliberations we kept steadily in view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—THE CONSOLIDATION OF OUR UNION—in which is involved our prosperity, safety, perhaps our national existence." "GEORGE WASHINGTON."

I content myself on this head when I find myself with the support of this great name.

By the adoption of the Constitution the people of the United States constituted themselves a nation, one and indivisible, with all the unity and power of a nation. They were no longer a confederation, subject to the disturbing pretensions, prejudices, and whims of its component parts, but they became a body-politic, where every part was subordinate to the Constitution, as every part of the natural body is subordinate to the principle of life. The sovereignty then and there established was the sovereignty of the United States, where the States were only "parts of one stupendous whole." The powers then and there conferred upon the nation were supreme. And it is those very powers which I now invoke, in the name of the Union, and to the end that pretensions in the name of State rights may be overthrown.

I have already presented a picture of these intolerable pretensions. But they must be examined more minutely. They may be seen, first, in their character as a monopoly; and, secondly, in their character as a Usurpation under the Constitution of the United States. I need not say that in each they are equally indefensible.

If you go back to the earliest days of English history, you will find that monopolies have from the beginning been odious, as contrary to the ancient and fundamental laws of the realm. A writer, who is often quoted in the courts, says: "Monopolies by common law are void, as being against the freedom of trade and discouraging labor and industry, and putting it in the power of particular persons to set what prices they please on a commodity." (Hawkins's Pleas of Crown, vol. 1.) But without claiming that the present monopoly is void at common law, it is enough to show its inconsistency with the Constitution. And here I borrow Mr. Webster's language in his famous argument against the monopoly of steam navigation granted by the State of New York, as follows:

"Now I think it very reasonable to say that the Constitution never intended to leave with the States the power of granting monopolies either of trade or of navigation; and therefore, that as to this, the commercial power is exclusively in Congress."

Then again he says:

"I insist that the nature of the case and of the power did imperatively require that such important authority as that of granting monopolies of trade and navigation should not be considered as still retained by the States."

And then, again, he adduces an authority which ought to be conclusive on the present occasion. It is that of New Jersey at an earlier day:

"The New Jersey resolutions [on forming the Constitution of the United States] complain that the regulation of trade was within the power of the several States within their separate jurisdiction, to such a degree as to involve many difficulties and embarrassments; and they express an earnest opinion that the sole and exclusive power of regulating trade ought to be with Congress."

And yet, in the face of these principles we have a gigantic monopoly organized by New Jersey, composed of several confederate corporations, whose capital massed together is said to amount to more than $27,537,977—a capital not much inferior to that of the United States Bank, which once seemed to hold "divided empire" with the national Government itself. Divisum imperium cum Jove Cæsar habet. And this transcendent monopoly, thus vast in resources, undertakes to levy a toll on the commerce, the passengers, the mails, and the troops of the Union in their transit between two great cities, both of which are outside of New Jersey. In its attitude and in its pretension the grasping monopoly is not unlike Apollyon in Pilgrim's Progress, whose usurpation is thus described:

"But now in this Valley of Humiliation poor Christian was hard put to it; for he had gone but a little way before he espied a foul fiend coming over the field to meet him; his name was Apollyon. Then did Christian begin to be afraid, and to cast in his mind whether to go back or to stand his ground."

"Now, the monster was hideous to behold; he was clothed with scales like a fish, and they are his pride; he had wings like a dragon, feet like a bear, and out of his belly came fire and smoke, and his mouth was as the mouth of a lion. When he was come up to Christian, he beheld him with a disdainful countenance, and thus began to question him:

"APOLLYON. Whence come you, and whither are you bound?

"CHRISTIAN. I am come from the city of Destruction, which is the place of all evil, and am going to the city of Zion.

"APOLLYON. By this I perceive that thou art one of my subjects; for all that country is mine, and I am the prince and god of it."

New Jersey is the Valley of Humiliation through which all travelers north and south must pass; and the monopoly, like Apollyon, claims them all as "subjects," saying, "for all that country is mine, and I am the prince and god of it."

The enormity of this Usurpation may be seen in its natural consequences. New Jersey claims the right to levy a tax for State revenue on passengers and freight in transit across her territory from State to State; in other words, to levy a tax on "commerce among the several States." Of course the right to tax is the right to prohibit. The same power which can exact "ten cents from every passenger" according to the cry of the Camden and Amboy railroad, by the voice of its counsel, may exact ten dollars or any other sum, and thus effectively close this great avenue of communication.

But if New Jersey can play successfully this game of taxation, and compel tribute from the domestic commerce of the Union as it traverses her territory on the way from State to State, then may every other State do likewise. New York, with her central power, may build up an overshadowing monopoly and a boundless revenue, while all the products and population of the West traversing her territory on their way to the sea, and all the products and population of the East, with the contributions of foreign commerce, traversing her territory on their way to the West, are compelled to pay tribute. Pennsylvania, holding one of the great highways of the Union; Maryland, constituting an essential link in the chain of communication with the national capital; Ohio, spanning from lake to river, and forming a mighty ligament of States, East and West; Indiana, enjoying the same unsurpassed opportunities; Illinois, girdled by States with all of which it is dovetailed by railroads east and west, north and south; Kentucky, guarding the gates of the Southwest; and finally, any one of the States on the long line of the Pacific railroad may enter upon a similar career of unscrupulous exaction until anarchy sits supreme, and there are as many different tributes as there are States. If the Union should continue to exist, it would be only as a name. The national unity would be destroyed.

The taste of revenue is to a Government like the taste of blood to a wild beast, quickening and maddening the energies, so that it becomes too deaf to all suggestions of injustice; and the difficulties must increase where this taxation is enforced by a far-reaching monopoly. The State, once tasting this blood, sees only an easy way of obtaining the means it desires; and other States will yield to the same temptation. The poet, after picturing vice as a monster of frightful mien, tells us in familiar words—

"Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

A profitable Usurpation, like that of New Jersey, would be a tempting example to other States. "It is only the first step which costs." Let this Usurpation be sanctioned by Congress, and you hand over the domestic commerce of the Union to a succession of local imposts. Each State will be a tax gatherer at the expense of the Union. Each State will play the part of Don Quixote, and the Union will be Sancho Panza, compelled to receive on his bare back the lashes which were the penance of his master. If there be any single fruit of our national unity, if there be any single element of the Union, if there be any single triumph of the Constitution which may be placed above all others, it is the freedom of commerce among the States, under which that free trade, which is the aspiration of philosophers, is assured to all citizens of the Union, as they circulate through our whole broad country, without hinderance from any State. But this vital principle is now in jeopardy.

Do not forget that it is the tax imposed on commerce between New York and Philadelphia, two cities outside of the State of New Jersey, which I denounce. I have denounced it as hostile to the Union. I denounce it also as hostile to the spirit of the age, which is everywhere overturning the barriers of commerce. The robber castles, which once compelled the payment of toll on the Rhine, were long ago dismantled, and exist now only as monuments of picturesque beauty. Kindred pretensions in other places have been overthrown or trampled out. The duties levied by Denmark on all vessels passing through the Sound and the Belts; the duties levied by Hanover on the goods of all nations at Stade on the Elbe; the tolls exacted on the Danube in its protracted course; the tolls exacted by Holland on the busy waters of the Scheldt, and all transit imposts within the great Zoll-Verein of Germany, have all been abolished; and in this work of enfranchisement the Government of the United States led the way, insisting, in the words of President Pierce, in his annual message, "on the right of free transit into and from the Baltic." But the right of free transit across the States of the Union is now assailed. Strange that you should reach so far to secure free transit in the Baltic and should hesitate in its defense here at home!

Thank God! within the bounds of the Union, under the national Constitution, commerce is free. As the open sea is the highway of nations, so is this Union the highway of the States, with all their commerce, and no State can claim any exclusive property therein. The Union is a mare liberum beyond the power of any State; and not a mare clausum, subject to as many tyrannies as there are States. And yet the State of New Jersey now asserts the power of closing a highway of the Union.

Such a pretension, so irrational and destructive, cannot be dealt with tenderly. Like the serpent, it must be bruised on the head. Nor can there be any delay. Every moment of life yielded to such a Usurpation is like the concession once in an evil hour yielded to nullification, which was kindred in origin and character. The present pretension of New Jersey belongs to the same school with that abhorred and blood-bespattered pretension of South Carolina.

Perhaps, sir, it is not unnatural that the doctrines of South Carolina on State rights should obtain a shelter in New Jersey. Like seeks like. There is a common bond among the sciences, among the virtues, among the vices, and so, also, among the monopolies. The monopoly which was founded on the hideous pretension of property in man obtained a responsive sympathy in that other monopoly which was founded on the greed of unjust taxation, and both were naturally upheld in the name of State rights. Both must be overthrown in the name of the Union. South Carolina must cease to be a slave State; and so must New Jersey. All hail to the genius of universal emancipation! All hail to the Union, triumphant over the Rebellion, triumphant also over a Usurpation which menaces the unity of the Republic!

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, of course I am not prepared with an elaborate answer to the profound and critical speech that has just been made on this subject, but there are a few common-sense suggestions which I desire to make. In the first place, let me say that the image, beautiful as it was, appealing to every patriotic sentiment of every man in the Senate, of the different interests that were represented here was very fine; but I do not admit that it belongs entirely to the side of the question which has been argued by the Senator from Massachusetts. He represents the Union and commerce and peace and all the kindred arts as enlisted on one side, and monopoly on the other; and not content with the profundity of his own suggestions he goes to that old English classic, the Pilgrim's Progress, to illustrate the Heavenly City and the City of Destruction. Which he would represent as the City of Destruction and which the Heavenly City, I do not know; but I suppose from their names, Philadelphia would represent the Heavenly City, and New York must represent the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, like the Senator from Massachusetts, I could draw a picture, not so eloquent, but as truthful, representing the various interests that are contending here; and if I were to do so I might represent a railroad, a bad speculation, paying no dividends, nor even the interest on its bonds; its stock being worth nothing. I might represent such a railroad, by the magic influence of this act, short and simple as it is, raised to be one of the best stocks in the market. That, I think, would be as near the practical effect that would be brought about (not to say designed) by this bill as any which have been pictured by the Senator from Massachusetts. This would be the immediate and the tangible effects: the Raritan and Delaware Bay road, if that is the name of the corporation, would suddenly find themselves, from being below a fancy stock, raised to a considerable advance in the market; and, as one of the newspapers which advocate this bill says that there are at least twenty men in the Senate that make speeches for money, the wicked world outside perhaps would stop to inquire which side paid the most money.

Mr. President let me say that I want to put down this rebellion; I want this Union to succeed, I trust, with an ardor and a sincerity of conviction not second even to that which animates the Senator from Massachusetts; but when the war is over, as I believe it will be, when the rebellion is put down, as I have no doubt it will be; I want there to be something left of the Constitution for which we profess to be contending. I do not want to strike giant blows at the rebellion which, when they put that down shall annihilate the Constitution and all State rights, so that everything shall be consolidated into one despotism. I undertake to say that the right of controlling the railroads within their own limits is one, notwithstanding everything that has been said about it and a great many decisions that have been had, that has been always maintained, preserved, and protected by the Legislatures and by the courts of the several States, and by none more so than by the State of Massachusetts. If you pass this bill you strike a blow at the cherished policy of Massachusetts to-day as it exists upon her statute-books and is enforced by her judiciary.

It is easy to talk about the great rights of the Union on this subject; but, sir, what is our history? What is the history of Massachusetts? Let me take that State as an illustration. When the people of New Hampshire and Maine go to Boston, they generally go, at least from the eastern part of New Hampshire and all Maine, to Boston over the Charles river bridge. At first there was a ferry there. Massachusetts, from the earliest period of her history up to the time when the bridge was destroyed by the charter of a free bridge there, exacted toll from everybody that passed over, and those who passed over were principally persons from Maine and New Hampshire; and from the results of that toll she gave an annuity, I think, of £200 per annum to Cambridge College. When the ferry was abrogated and a toll bridge put up, the toll bridge was put there on the express condition that the £200 given to Cambridge College should be collected and paid, and it was paid until the bridge was destroyed by an act of the Legislature putting up a free bridge. Thus for years the people of New Hampshire and Maine were taxed by the State of Massachusetts when they wanted to go to Boston, to help to support Cambridge College.

There is existing at this moment a still more striking instance, and as it is a case which is parallel with the one before the Senate and illustrates it exactly, I hope I may be pardoned if I dwell on it at some length. The State of Massachusetts on the 5th of June, 1830, passed an act chartering a corporation called the Boston and Lowell Railroad Company, with the powers usually incident to such corporations, with the right to charge toll, and all the privileges and emoluments usually given, with this provision in the charter:

"SEC. 12. Be it further enacted, That no other railroad than the one hereby created shall within thirty years from and after the passage of this act be authorized to be made leading from Boston, Charlestown, or Cambridge, to Lowell, or from Boston, Charlestown, or Cambridge to any place within five miles of the northern termination of the railroad hereby authorized to be made."

The Boston and the Lowell railroad was just as much a road leading from State to State as the railroad spoken of in New Jersey.

Mr. SUMNER. I am familiar with that road; I am familiar with the bridges; they are all local;

there is no question of inter-State commerce that was ever raised there or considered applicable. Those roads do not go between two cities outside of Massachusetts.

Mr. HALE. Let us see how that is. I know that since this Administration has come into power, in the distribution of Federal officers all New England has been considered as part of Massachusetts, [laughter:] but I believe that is not geographically or logically true. Concord, New Hampshire, is outside of Massachusetts geographically if not politically, and the railroad from Boston to Lowell is a part of the road by which a great portion of the travel goes to New Hampshire, to northern Vermont, and to Canada; and the connecting roads, I think, so manage trade that freight can be put on at Boston, going on the Boston and Lowell railroad, without being broken or disturbed until it gets to Rouse's Point in New York, near the Canada line. So that the Boston and Lowell railroad is just as much a road for the transit of travel from State to State as any railroad in New Jersey.

The State of Massachusetts enacted by this provision that for thirty years all that travel should go over the Boston and Lowell railroad, and that there should be no other competing road created within thirty years. By and by the Legislature of Massachusetts chartered another railroad leading from Boston to Portland—that is outside of Massachusetts—called the Boston and Maine railroad, and that ran not exactly parallel, but diverging a little from the Boston and Lowell railroad. Subsequently the State of Massachusetts passed another railroad charter for a road running from Salem to Lowell, intersecting with the Boston and Maine railroad, and thus made another line to Lowell only about a mile and a half or a mile and six tenths longer than the Boston and Lowell railroad. By this junction between the Boston and Maine and the Salem and Lowell railroads a new route was created to Lowell, and passengers, of course, began to go over it. In that state of things the Boston and Lowell Railroad Company applied to the supreme court of Massachusetts for an order enjoining, prohibiting, and forbidding the new railroad thus created between Boston and Lowell by the new route from carrying passengers, upon the idea that it was in contravention of the right before granted by the Massachusetts Legislature to the Boston and Lowell Railroad Company. The case is found reported in the second volume of Gray's Reports at very considerable length, and anybody who wants to hear an answer to the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, by reading the decision in this case, and the rest of the Pilgrim's Progress, which is utterly at war with the doctrine he drew from it, [laughter:] will find the answer to the speech. And that, sir, is the law of Massachusetts to-day. I know it, because the Boston and Maine railroad runs through the city in which I live, and the people there are somewhat interested in it; and this source of revenue which that railroad had from carrying passengers to Lowell was taken away by the decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts, and is the law there to-day.

Massachusetts has not been alone in this policy. It is essential to every State that it should have the power to exercise this right. There is the great State of New York, what has been her action? She incorporated by a series of acts what is now known as the New York Central railroad, leading from Albany to Buffalo, a distance of between three and four hundred miles. That road was prohibited from carrying certain articles of merchandise, I think wheat, one of the great necessities of life—almost as necessary to life as paper, [laughter:] except upon condition that a certain toll was paid upon the wheat, and I think it was a toll equal to the amount of the whole freight received, to the Erie canal. That was the law of New York for a long time. It was a question of policy for the State of New York whether that prohibition should be continued or not; but I believe in all the discussions that took place between the advocates of the prohibition and those who were for its repeal, it was never suggested that it was a thing with which Congress had any right to meddle, with which Congress could interfere, in regard to which Congress had any right to exercise any power, but left it for the State of New York to settle for herself, and to settle exclusively as a question affecting her own State policy.

If this matter is argued upon the ground of military necessity, it seems that it is not wanted there, because, according to the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, the General Government have taken the right and have exercised it, and the Raritan railroad have carried troops and munitions of war for the Government of the United States. The Senator did not tell us what was the result of that application made to the court to compel them to account to the Camden and Amboy railroad. Does the Senator know what it was? The Senator from New Jersey thinks it was not sustained, but it makes no odds whether they were compelled to account or not; that was a matter between two corporations in the State of New Jersey, with which this General Government have nothing to do. Whenever the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company was wanted for the transportation of troops or munitions of war, the Government had it. The Secretary of War ordered the troops to be conveyed in that way, and they were conveyed; and whether they by that invaded any of the rights of the Camden and Amboy railroad for which they were compelled to account, is a matter with which the United States certainly have nothing to do, because the United States, with all their great powers, have not got to run a Quixotic expedition into every State in the Union to see that equal and exact justice is meted out by them to all their citizens and all their corporations. Whenever a State violates any grant or any right secured by the Constitution of the United States, then, and not till then, have the United States a right to interfere.

But what is this provision? The bill is very brief in its character. It provides:

That every railroad company in the United States whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, be, and is hereby, authorized to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all freight, property, mails, passengers, troops, and Government supplies on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor.

I should have no sort of objection to this bill if it confined itself to what its friends profess that it is, and that is a bill to enable the General Government to carry on and exercise the powers which the Constitution confers upon it. I should say that they should not only be authorized, but compelled, to carry "all freight, property, mails, passengers, troops, and Government supplies" that are necessary and requisite for the General Government to carry out the purposes for which it was created, and to exercise the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution; but it is manifest this looks beyond that; it looks beyond the public weal, beyond the public interest. It is not the post office that is concerned; it is not the transportation of troops, for that you have; it is not any or all of these interests combined; but the real gist of this bill is to raise the stock of a bankrupt corporation, to make it above par. That is the whole of it, and we might just as well look it in the face and call it by its right name as not. That is to be the effect, and that is what the interference of the General Government is invoked for; and it is invoked, and its exercise is called for, in a manner that will be utterly destructive of every doctrine that has ever been heretofore practiced upon in reference to corporations created by the States.

I know, sir, that there are certain general propositions which a wide and latitudinarian construction of the Constitution may so construe that there shall not be a single thing which can be proposed that Congress may not do. The "general welfare" clause of the Constitution is familiar to all. If somebody gets up and by some ingenious sophism demonstrates that in his judgment a particular thing might be for the general welfare, these broad constructionists may find that the Constitution gives them the power to do that thing for that reason.

Then there is the power to establish post offices and post roads. If you want to establish a post office or a post road, why not do so? Why not say that all these companies shall be compelled to carry the mail over their roads? Have they ever refused to do so? Is there anything in the provisions of the legislation of New Jersey that prohibits any of these railroads from carrying the mail? If there be anything which prohibits their carrying the troops of the United States, you have the evidence from the advocates of the bill that it has been utterly disregarded by the Government of the United States, and the Government has used the Raritan road for that purpose, and has transported troops over it.

So you may take the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes, and that may be carried to an indefinite extent. If that authorizes the interference proposed by this bill with every railroad in the United States, it is difficult to conceive anything that it would not reach; it would reach everything and swallow up every power that has been heretofore supposed to be vested in the States, and would leave nothing to the States, but make this a consolidated Government.

Mr. President, it may well be asked, if this be a power residing in the General Government, why in the whole history of the States and the Union has it not been invoked before? During the whole history of this Camden and Amboy monopoly, why has not the power of Congress been invoked until this time? Why was it not invoked in the State of Massachusetts? Why has it not been invoked in New York? Why was it not invoked somewhere else? Why, until the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company found that they had sunk thousands and hundreds of thousands in their road, and it was a losing concern, that they could not pay dividends on their stock or interest on their bonds, did not these patriotic gentlemen, governed by these public interests, these high motives, these great considerations relating to the Union, enlist the eloquence of my learned friend from Massachusetts to come in here with grandiloquent pæns in praise of the Union, and to excite public sentiment and public opinion in favor of the Union—

Mr. SUMNER. How have they "enlisted" me?

Mr. HALE. Why, Mr. President, in a hundred ways. They enlisted him by articles in the New York Tribune, [laughter:] they enlisted him by various articles scattered all over the country; they enlisted him by all the ways and means by which men that have a selfish and a private object to effect appeal to great objects, high considerations, and moral sentiments, and thus operate upon the judgment and the sympathies of the generous, the impulsive, and the unreflecting. [Laughter.] That is the way they enlisted him.

Mr. President, as I said before, I have not examined this measure in detail, though I have thought upon it somewhat. I should deprecate as one of the greatest evils that could grow out of our present controversy if we should deem it necessary to stretch forth our hand in this way and usurp to ourselves the control of all the railroads and other corporations in the United States; for the bill not only applies to railroads but to boats, bridges, ferries, everything—all are brought by one sweep, by the operation of this small bill, within the scope of Federal authority, Federal jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I have not been one of those who have been loud or strenuous or persevering in the assertion of the rights of the States; but I believe that the existence of the States and the proper preservation of State sovereignty, State rights, and State power are as necessary to the successful operation of the system of our Government as the Union; and if one or the other is to be destroyed, it had better be the Union than the States, because if the Union is destroyed and the States left, we then have civil government and institutions left for recuperating and reconstructing a Union; but if the States are destroyed and all swallowed up in one military despotism, there is nothing left, there is no nucleus around which the friends of free institutions may rally—

Mr. HOWARD. You speak only for yourself.

Mr. HALE. I am not in the habit of speaking for anybody on earth but myself; but I trust the sentiment I have just expressed commends itself to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD. No.

Mr. HALE. It certainly does to me; but I trust the time will never come when either the Senator or myself will have to choose either horn of that dilemma. The prosperity of the country depends upon the preservation of the just powers of each, and not encroaching on the other. We are in this rebellion mainly and principally owing to the encroachments of the States on the Union.

If we come out of this rebellion with an equal usurpation on the part of the Union on the States, we shall not have gained much by the result.

I hope that this bill, and all bills of a similar character growing out of the supposed necessities of the evil times in which we live, will not be passed in this hour, and at this time, to make examples and precedents for the coming future; but that we shall vindicate our Constitution from the reproach that was employed in a remark which was well made by the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] at the last session of Congress, in which he said—I am not quoting his words, but his sentiment—that if the Constitution of the United States is not competent to deal with the questions which are presented to us in this controversy; if the Constitution does not confer ample power to enable us to deal with the existing realities which this struggle presents to us, then our Government is a failure, and we have failed.

Sir, I apprehend there never was a time in the history of this Government, until the emergencies of this war had operated on public opinion, when a proposition like this would be tolerated—a proposition that goes at one swoop into all the States, and touches with the wand of Federal power every corporation owning a railroad, a bridge, a ferry-boat, or a canal, and subjects them all to the sweeping jurisdiction of the Federal Government. If the times have presented such a necessity as that, then I may say, and I will say, on the authority of the distinguished Senator from Vermont, that the Government is a failure; it has failed; and it has failed because it was necessary or adjudged necessary by those who administered the Government to trench upon those rights which heretofore have always been considered as belonging exclusively to the States.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Friday next at one o'clock. I understand it is probable that several Senators may speak upon it, perhaps on both sides of the question, and I do not know but that I shall say something myself on this subject, inasmuch as direct allusion has been made to my State pretty significantly, and inasmuch as the people of that State are directly interested in this question. I move a postponement until Friday at one o'clock, for the reason that I understand the death of our colleague, the Senator from Maryland, is to be announced to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest Thursday.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Yes; I mean Thursday.

Mr. WILSON. Before the motion is put, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill as a second section, which I should like to have read.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no citizen of the United States shall be excluded from travel upon any railroad or navigable water within the United States on account of or by reason of any State law or municipal ordinance, or of any regulation, or usage of any corporation, company, or person whatever; and all citizens of the United States shall be subject and amenable to the same laws, regulations, and usages; and any corporation, company, or person offending against the provisions of this act, shall, upon conviction in any court of the United States, be punished by a fine of not less than $500, and by imprisonment not less than six months: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall interfere with any executive order made under the laws of the United States.

Mr. HALE. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts provides that no one shall be excluded on account of any regulation of any State. They have a regulation on some of the railroads of my State that no intoxicated person shall be admitted. This amendment would abrogate that, for it would amount to that.

Mr. COWAN. Let me ask the Senator, do they allow people who have the small-pox to ride in his State?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill to and make it the special order of the day for Thursday next at one o'clock.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the motion will prevail, as I understand the death of the Senator from Maryland will be announced to-morrow; and let the amendment be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand we are to have an evening session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate stands adjourned until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock, p. m.; and, in accordance with the resolution adopted on Saturday last, setting apart Tuesday and Wednesday evenings of this week for executive business, proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to rescind so much of the resolution adopted on Saturday as provides for an evening session to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 14, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Dr. E. H. GRAY.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENLISTMENTS FOR UNEXPIRED TERMS.

Mr. ORTH. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire what legislation is necessary to secure the muster-out of such men as enlisted for the unexpired term of their respective regiments, in accordance with their understanding at the time of enlistment, and that the committee have leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the introduction of this resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not wish to object; but I desire that its language shall be made somewhat stronger, so that the committee shall be required to report at the earliest practicable moment. The subject is already before the committee.

The SPEAKER. The modification suggested will be made, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House the papers relating to the case of S. B. Colby.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

SHIP-CANAL IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. JULIAN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of Senate bill No. 241, an act granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public land to aid in the construction of a ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan, in said State. This bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands on the 9th instant, by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN.] After an amendment by the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin demanded the previous question, upon seconding which no quorum voted. The pending question is upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill—

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. McINDOE and MIDDLETON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 54, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Boyd, James S. Brown, Cole, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Garfield, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pomroy, William H. Randall, Scott, Shannon, Smithers, Townsend, Upson, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Windom, Worthington, and Yeaman—52.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Aucona, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Bliss, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Coffroth, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Edgerton, Eliot, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hale, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, John H. Hubbard, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kaibfeisch, Orlando Kellogg, King, Lazear, Long, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrill, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Radford, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Spalding, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweat, Thayer, William B. Washburn, Wilson, and Winfield—54.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Arnold, Ashley, Blair, Blow, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cox, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eden, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Coeh, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Julian, Kasson, Kernan, Knapp, Knox, Law, Loan, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, Monrothead, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Norton, Odell, Patterson, Perry, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Smith, Starr, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Thomas, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Webster, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—76.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. The demand comes too late.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move that leave of absence be granted to my colleague, Mr. W. J. ALLEN, on account of the death of his brother.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

CHARLES H. TITUS, AND OTHERS.

Mr. JULIAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, moved that that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Charles H. Titus, Thomas W. Faran, Peter Zinn, and others, asking Congress to devise some means for the sale of reserved mineral lands, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask, by unanimous consent, that House bill No. 730, in reference to the subdivision and sale of mineral lands, be set apart for consideration as a special order on Thursday next.

Objection was made.

PERE MARQUETTE AND FLINT RAILROAD.

Mr. DRIGGS, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back Senate joint resolution No. 42, to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road, with an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "and a railroad from Little Bay de Noquette to Marquette, and thence to Ontonagon."

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution only extends the grant to the Pere Marquette and Flint Railroad Company, made in 1856, for five years. It provides for no additional grant of lands. The road is now completed and running cars upon some forty miles of the road. It has received the sanction of the Committee on Public Lands. I think it is just, and I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Do I understand that this resolution makes no additional grant of lands?

Mr. DRIGGS. It makes no additional grant of lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. It only extends the time for the completion of this road?

Mr. DRIGGS. That is all.

Mr. LE BLOND. What is the road?

Mr. DRIGGS. It runs from Flint, in the State of Michigan, to Pere Marquette. The road is about one hundred and seventy-five miles long, and some forty miles have been completed.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. This resolution does no more than provide for the extension of time for the completion of the road.

Mr. DRIGGS. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MINNESOTA LAND-GRANT RAILROAD.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to extend the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I will only say that this bill merely extends the time for the completion of these roads.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would inquire whether they are not required to complete twenty miles each and every year.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. They are.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. If they do not construct twenty miles each year, what forfeiture is provided?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. A forfeiture of the land to the Government of the United States.

Mr. STEVENS. Are additional lands granted?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Four additional sections of land are granted, which is in accordance with the legislation of last year. It will be evident to the House, as it was to the committee, that since railroad iron, labor, and everything else has doubled in price, these roads could not be completed unless some additional grant of land was made.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought we provided for that when last year the House refused to increase the tax on railroad iron.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, unless there is some encouragement it is evident that we cannot induce foreign or eastern capitalists to invest in these roads. I think that the best interests of the Government will be subserved by this additional grant of lands.

Mr. SPALDING. How extensive were the grants in the first place, and how much is now added?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. We make it ten sections, whereas it was only six before. They do not get the whole ten sections in many cases, as they have been taken up by settlers. They are limited to within twenty miles of the road.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. Does this not relate exclusively to Minnesota roads?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. It does.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to say a single word upon this subject, and principally in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.] Originally six sections per mile were granted to these roads. The paper grant is very large; but owing to settlements the amount of land actually received is very small. On one road running from Winona westward they run one hundred and fifty miles before they received one hundred and thirty thousand acres of land; whereas the paper grant was six sections to the mile. I ask to have read a memorial from the Legislature of Minnesota. It is short.

Mr. SPALDING. This bill embraces one half of all the land we have in that section.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that many of these roads will not get as much land with this additional grant as they would have got if they could have received the whole original grant of six sections to the mile.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the memorial be now read.

The memorial was read, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The Legislature of the State of Minnesota would respectfully memorialize your honorable body to grant to this State additional lands to aid in the completion of the several lines of railroads and branches provided for by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1857, and by the joint resolution approved July 12, 1862, so as to make the quantity of land equal in all to two hundred sections for each twenty miles therein named, for the reasons following:

First. That although a large amount of work has been done, and iron rails and other materials procured for the construction of said roads and branches, and two of them have been put into actual operation for forty and fifty miles respectively, their extension or the further prosecution of work upon them has become impossible on account of the greatly enhanced prices of iron, and locomotives, and labor, and, in fact, of all the materials necessary for the construction and completion of railroads.

Second. That similar increased grants have been made to aid in the completion of other railroads in the northwestern States; their securities possess advantages in the money markets of the world as ten to six over those of the railroad lines in question.

Your memorialists, therefore, cannot for a moment entertain the belief that Congress would intentionally withhold the same relief for the aid of the various railroad lines in this State that it has granted to the lines in other States similarly situated.

It is equally important that the time limited for the completion of our roads should be extended, as it has now but two years to run.

Finally. Considering that this is a food-producing State, and that it has no connection by railroad with the system of railroads leading to the Atlantic States, and the avenues to our foodstuffs being thus locked up from the seaboard, except those consisting of wagon roads and six months uncertain navigation of the Mississippi of each year; and considering the financial revulsion of 1857, from which we had scarcely recovered when the rebellion called our not unwilling young men from home to aid in its suppression, your memorialists ask with confidence of your honorable body for the prompt consideration of this appeal.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

CHARLES D. SHERWOOD,

President of the Senate.

THOMAS H. ARMSTRONG,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved January 24, 1865.

S. MILLER.

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original, on file in this office.

Witness my hand, and the great seal of the State, this 30th day of January, A. D., 1865.

D. BLAKELY, Secretary of State.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not engrossed, and therefore it goes to the Speaker's table.

Mr. WINDOM, at a subsequent period, moved that the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed be reconsidered.

The motion was entered.

LAND-GRANT ROADS IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill (H. R. No. 710) relating to certain grants of lands made to the State of Michigan in the year 1865.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I call for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say a single word in reference to the purposes of this bill. They are, first, to extend the time for their completion five years, and also to adjust the conflict existing between the roads, beginning at Marquette, in the State of Michigan, by the land-grant act of 1856. Three of these roads had their beginning at Marquette. By this bill boundaries are fixed as to the extent of the grant to each road, with reference to the others, so that in the future there can be no conflict in addition to the provisions adjusting these differences. There is granted to the State of Michigan four additional sections per mile in alternate sections. The Committee were of opinion that this additional grant would enable these roads to progress with their roads, and thus develop the region through which they pass. The effect of this proposition is to make two land grants instead of four.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to know how many railroads this bill includes.

Mr. ALLISON. It includes only two roads. There were originally three roads, all beginning at the city of Marquette and extending, one to Bay de Noquette; another to Ontonagon; another to the mouth of the Menomonee river, at the State line dividing Wisconsin and Michigan; in addition to these, there is a grant to what is called the Peninsular railroad, extending along the shore of Green bay in the State of Wisconsin, and thence through Michigan to Lake Superior.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to know if it affects in any way more than two roads.

Mr. ALLISON. Only two roads at this time. There were originally four roads; now really consolidated into two, although nominally there are three roads, still affected by the bill.

Mr. SPALDING. Through what States do these roads run?

Mr. ALLISON. The North western road, extending through the States of Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, now owns in part a portion of this line. But the grant made by this bill is all in the State of Michigan; further time is given to that part of the road in Wisconsin, but no additional grant.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to know if for the benefit of any part of the Northwestern road.

Mr. ALLISON. It is.

Mr. SPALDING. Is not that one of the wealthiest companies in the Northwest?

Mr. ALLISON. It is a large corporation, how wealthy, I do not know. I do know that its stock is not worth more than thirty-five cents on the dollar.

Mr. SPALDING. How many States are affected by the grant contained in this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Really only one State is affected by the grant.

Mr. SPALDING. How is Iowa affected?

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all.

Mr. SPALDING. How much surplus land is granted by this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. It is impossible for me to say.

Mr. SPALDING. I want to know if four additional sections per mile are not given to these railroads.

Mr. ALLISON. I have already stated that four additional sections are given to this railroad in the State of Michigan.

Mr. SPALDING. Beyond the previous grant?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; but it is well known that very little land is obtained under the original grant, from the fact that the lands were taken up by settlers and by corporations of the State of Michigan.

Mr. ARNOLD. This bill is designed to enable the company to fill up a gap between two railroads already constructed, and the effect of this grant, so far as the Government is concerned, will be to enhance the value of the lands belonging to the Government immensely beyond the value of the lands granted by this bill. Those lands, as every gentleman well knows, are comparatively worthless to the Government, and will continue to be unless you open a way to the minerals, the timber, and other products of those lands by means of this railroad. This railroad will open communication from Lake Michigan to the Superior country and to the vast amount of Government lands which lie around that great inland sea. The amount of lands granted by this bill is comparatively small. I think that every gentleman who investigates the subject will readily acknowledge that the enhanced value of the Government lands lying around the lake in consequence of this grant will be of immensely more importance to the public Treasury than the value of the lands granted by the bill under consideration. I therefore hope that it will receive the favorable consideration of those who desire to enhance the value of the public domain in the Northwest and open direct communication with that vast territory.

Mr. ALLISON. Unless some gentleman desires some further explanation, I will move the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I should be indisposed to vote against this bill if I supposed that it was really intended for the good of the country through which the proposed railroads are to run; but I do happen, from certain circumstances, to conclude that this extra donation of four sections of land to the mile, through the whole peninsula of Michigan, is intended to help certain stock speculators rather than the people of the country through which the roads run. The gentleman from Iowa cannot even tell us the amount of this enormous grant.

Mr. ALLISON. I will state to the gentleman that the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad extends one hundred and thirty miles, and twenty miles of the road are already built.

Mr. HIGBY. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not yield any more. There are other reports to be made from the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The committee have two minutes and a half of their time left.

Mr. ALLISON. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I call for the yeas and nays on seconding the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House the yeas and nays cannot be had upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. Then I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the report of the commissioner appointed under the act of Congress of July 2, 1864; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORY OF WYOMING.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Territories a bill to establish a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming, for the purpose of having it printed.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Vermont yield to me for a moment to enable me to report a bill?

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I must object to any further yielding of the floor.

TAX BILL.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRILL's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 744, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question to be upon the amendment proposed yesterday by Mr. A. W. CLARK, on page 20, lines four hundred and sixty-one and four hundred and sixty-two, to strike out "exclusive of the boiler in case a duty has been paid thereon," and to insert in lieu thereof "and steam boilers," so that the clause will read:

By inserting after the words "steam engines" the words "and steam boilers."

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out lines four hundred and sixty, four hundred and sixty-one, and four hundred and sixty-two, as follows:

By inserting after the words "steam engines" the words "exclusive of the boiler in case a duty has been paid thereon;"—

And inserting in lieu thereof the following:

On steam locomotives and marine engines, including boilers and all other parts, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem. Provided, That when such boiler or part thereof shall have been once assessed and the duty previously paid thereon, the amount so paid shall be deducted from the finished engine.

On boilers of all kinds, water tanks, sugar tanks, oil stills, sewing machines, lathes, tools, planes, planing machines, shafting and gearing, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Vermont:

Add the following:

On iron railing, gates, fences, furniture, and statuary, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was adopted.

The question recurred on the substitute, as amended, and it was adopted.

The question recurred on Mr. A. W. CLARK's amendment, as amended, and it was adopted.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend by inserting after line five hundred and six, as follows:

And by striking out in the same paragraph all after the words "does not exceed the sum of," and inserting the words "$1,000 per annum shall be exempt from duty."

So that it will read:

By inserting in the paragraph relating to "ready-made clothing," after the word "dress," the words "not otherwise assessed and taxed as such;" and by striking out, &c.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the words "as such" have been inserted after the word "taxed." His amendment will come in after the words "as such."

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very well. I wish to call the attention of the committee to this fact. As the law now stands a manufacturer of clothing who makes for a gentleman a nice coat pays to the Government a duty of three per cent., while a manufacturer of ready-made clothing, such as pea-jackets and overalls for laboring men, pays a tax of five per cent., which is manifestly unjust. The object of my amendment is to remedy that inequality by putting a tax of five per cent. on clothing of all sorts, allowing those persons who make custom work exclusively, and whose annual product does not exceed $1,000, to be exempted altogether. These are the two effects of the amendment which I propose.

Mr. BOUTWELL's amendment was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. COBB, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 392) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

TAX BILL—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend, on line five hundred and thirty-two, by striking out the words "except as hereinafter otherwise provided for" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "of all kinds," and by striking out the following:

On smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems, and not mixed with leaf or stem, and on fine-cut, and shorts, and scraps of tobacco, the refuse of cigars manufactured, and also on all scraps or refuse of plug manufactured, when sold for smoking tobacco, or for consumption, or otherwise, twenty cents per pound.

So that it will read:

On smoking tobacco of all kinds, thirty-five cents per pound.

I will state the object of my amendment, so that it may be fully understood. The Committee of Ways and Means has endeavored, throughout this revision of duty on tobacco and its manufactures, to evade the great temptation to fraud and false swearing resulting from the numerous and unnecessary discriminations of quality to which different grades of tax are affixed. The second paragraph, which I propose to strike out, makes a new kind of smoking tobacco, to be taxed at a less rate, and in my judgment it will be found to embrace all the smoking tobacco manufactured when the returns come to be made to the assessors. The object of my amendment is, therefore, to impose, in the case of tobacco as in the case of cigars, a uniform rate of taxation, moderate but certain in amount, so that there shall be no temptation to fraud or false swearing except simply as to the amount of the tobacco produced. For that purpose the two paragraphs are confined in one, so as to read "on smoking tobacco of all kinds, thirty-five cents per pound."

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Iowa had proposed merely to strike out all of the description in the second paragraph in reference to smoking tobacco except that made exclusively from stems, I do not know that I would have objected. But I do believe that it is important that we allow this sort of tobacco—made of stems only—to go into consumption at a less rate than other sorts; otherwise it will be wasted. Before we levied so high a tax on tobacco, the stems were not used, or were used only as a manure for the ground on which tobacco is raised. But since the advance in price, stems are not only used here at home, but are shipped abroad. This amendment, if adopted, will compel the parties having any quantity of stems to ship them and not use them at home. I think there can be no difficulty about detecting frauds where the smoking tobacco is made exclusively of stems. If the gentleman will modify his amendment by striking out of the second paragraph all but that, I will not object to it.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Vermont whether there is not a mode of manufacturing the stems into smoking tobacco so as make it difficult to detect the manufactured article from the superior species of smoking tobacco.

Mr. MORRILL. I know that some tobaccoists are in the habit of coloring these stems and grinding them; but I believe it is not difficult for any expert to detect the difference between the two articles.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee at this point rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, several messages in writing were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary.

TAX BILL—AGAIN.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumed its session.

Mr. KASSON. As my colleague on the committee states that he believes there will be no difficulty in the discrimination, I will modify my amendment so that the first paragraph will read, "on smoking tobacco of all kinds not otherwise herein provided for, thirty-five cents per pound," and by striking out in the second paragraph all from the word "stem" in line five hundred and thirty-four to the word "otherwise" in line five hundred and thirty-nine.

Mr. MALLORY. I cannot understand the propriety of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will permit me to state that the object of the entire amendment is to enable the assessors to have a correct report in reference to smoking tobacco, and to prevent the temptation to false swearing which would result from an unnecessary discrimination in the quality of the smoking tobacco. To accomplish this purpose, I proposed in the first instance to make the rate uniform on all kinds of smoking tobacco. But since my colleague from Vermont has stated that there is no difficulty in detecting smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems, I think that this kind ought to be subject to a lower rate of taxation, in order that the manufacture may be continued, and I have modified my amendment so as to make the second paragraph read: "on smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems, twenty cents per pound."

Mr. MALLORY. If that is the amendment proposed, I submit that it is no amendment at all. It is provided in lines five hundred and thirty-two and five hundred and thirty-three: "on smoking tobacco, except as hereinafter otherwise provided for, thirty-five cents per pound." Now it is proposed to strike out the words "except as hereinafter otherwise provided for." Then the tax on stem tobacco in the next paragraph is left precisely as it stands now—twenty cents per pound.

Mr. KASSON. This amendment confines the lower rate exclusively to the stem tobacco. The other did not. I preferred a uniform rate, but yielded to the opinion of my colleague.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I submit my objection becomes stronger. For what will become of these scraps and other refuse materials? Does the gentleman propose that these shall be thrown away? They cannot be manufactured, if the tobacco made from them is to be taxed thirty-five cents per pound. Does the gentleman propose such a rate of taxation?

Mr. KASSON. I think that the price of tobacco to the consumer should be determined alone by the grade of the tobacco, and that the tax should be as far as possible uniform. The consumer pays high in proportion to the purity of the tobacco, and low in proportion to its adulteration. By making the rate uniform you obviate the temptation to put in a little of the inferior article, and then swear that the tobacco is adulterated to the lower grade.

Mr. MALLORY. Let me state what I think will be the effect of the amendment.

If it is proposed to tax tobacco to such an extent as to raise from it a large revenue, I do not know that I have any right to object. We now tax cigars very high. Cigars are smoked by the wealthy classes; and perhaps, if any description of smoking tobacco is to be taxed high, it should be cigars. But the other article, smoking tobacco, in the common acceptance of the term, as understood in the market, is used by the great mass of the people of the country; by those who do not smoke cigars, not being able to indulge in that luxury. And I submit that the lowest rate of tax we can impose upon this article the better it will be for the interest in the country and for the revenue of the Government. If you tax it so high, you will stop the practice of smoking which now prevails so extensively in the country, and which uses up this sort of tobacco. If you tax it so high, men who use no cigars and who use this, will stop using it, and the result will be that the Government will derive no revenue from it. I think that it is better for the producer, better for the manufacturer, and better for the Treasury of the United States, to impose upon every description of smoking tobacco made from stems, scraps, &c., the lowest rate of taxation. By reducing the tax from twenty cents to ten cents, I think that we will procure more revenue, and I believe that the consumption of the article would be ten times as great as it is now.

Now, one other remark before I sit down.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KASSON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the great discrimination between cigars and smoking tobacco is cutting us off from revenue.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the amendment has been exhausted, and the gentleman is not in order.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to strike out the last line of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is the discrimination between tobacco made from stems and tobacco made from fine leaf. I submit that the discrimination is very easy to be made. I doubt whether there is an inspector in the United States who will hesitate in reference to the character of tobacco as to what is made from stems and scraps and what is made from leaf. Tobacco made from scraps and tobacco made from leaf can easily be discriminated. One is of such inferior quality that it can be distinguished at once. In my judgment there is no difficulty in making a discrimination under this bill. I hope that the distinction will be reserved; and I hope that the tax will be reduced from twenty cents to ten cents per pound.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I would be content to have the bill remain as it is, without amendment, but believing there was something in the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa; that is to obtain a uniform system, and as far as possible to put it out of the power of the manufacturer to practice fraud or evasion, I was willing for one to accept his proposition with the modification suggested by myself. I do believe that so far as it is made of scraps and refuse of cigars, and scraps and refuse of plug tobacco, there may be a door open for considerable fraud. At the same time I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that this kind of tobacco is much superior and worth more per pound than stems. It is good tobacco, but not in good shape. I think that the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa is a safe and practicable one.

Mr. MALLORY, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "ten."

The CHAIRMAN. That is not now in order.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope that the gentleman from Illinois will move to reduce the tax from twenty cents to ten cents per pound.

The CHAIRMAN. That paragraph is not now before the committee.

Mr. KASSON's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move to strike out the words, "and not mixed with leaf or leaf and stems, and on fine-cut, and shorts, and scraps of tobacco, the refuse of cigars manufactured, and also on all scraps or refuse of plug manufactured, when sold for smoking tobacco, or for consumption, or otherwise;" so that the paragraph will read: "On smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems, twenty cents per pound."

Mr. MALLORY. I move to amend the original text by inserting "fifteen" instead of "twenty."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the House received a message from the Senate, by Mr. COBB, one of their clerks, announcing that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 141) reducing the duty on printing paper, unsized, and used for books and newspapers exclusively, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

TAX BILL—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the question should first be taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to strike out.

The question being put, and no quorum voting—Mr. MALLORY demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KASSON and MALLORY were appointed.

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw my call for a division, as I see a majority are in favor of the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by striking out "fifteen" and inserting "five," so that it will read "five cents a pound." This is the lowest grade of tobacco manufactured; in fact, it is so low that it has no grade. It seems to me that twenty cents a pound is too large a tax to put upon this quality of tobacco. Those who use this quality are a class of people who are not able to buy the better qualities, owing to the high price of the better grades. It is the poor man who buys this grade, and he does this from necessity; he prefers the best, but cannot afford to buy it. Smoking is to the poor man a luxury of which I do not desire to see him deprived; and I can imagine for him no greater luxury, which costs so little, than, after a day of toil at a dollar and a half or two dollars a day, he comes home, and, after the evening repast is over, he smokes his pipe by his cheerful fireside, with his wife and little ones around him. While you may be realizing all the anticipations of youth, this poor man, with the wreaths of smoke ascending and circling above him, only hopes to see happier and brighter days; but those hopes turn to ashes in the bowl, and this vision of happier and brighter days vanishes with the smoke. I hope this quality of tobacco will not be taxed more than five cents per pound. I would rather see it free, so that the poor man can enjoy this one comfort without feeling the burden of taxation. Let us not take away from the poor man this luxury, when at best he is permitted to enjoy so few.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "five" and inserting "ten." I think that anybody that wishes to smoke can afford to pay a ten-cent tax a pound. I understand it is a very delicious luxury, and I know, from what I have heard about this House, that everybody is anxious to be taxed, and that there is very great complaint that we do not tax enough. If, therefore, the gentleman will say ten cents, that will include stems, and then the old women of the country, making their pipes out of corn-cobs, can use it by paying only ten cents. This is a great reduction from what we proposed, and I am almost afraid the committee will be reproached if we refuse to impose a proper tax.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist upon his amendment, but accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. This description of tobacco is comparatively worthless; it is very little better than that which is made of the stalks after the tobacco leaf is stripped off; and that, I suggest to the gentleman, is left entirely untaxed by this bill; and if he is determined to hunt up tobacco of every form to impose a tax on, he should tax the stalk. Yes, and walking-canes are made of the stalks, and he should tax them.

I think, however, that this stem tobacco should be left with a tax of only five cents at highest. I do not believe it will now, if untaxed, sell for that much in the market. This is the only anomaly in the bill of an article being taxed more than it is worth. Gentlemen have set free a very large class of people in our country—I will not call them niggers, for fear of offending somebody—but a large class of people whose almost entire solace—I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL,] in order to finish his picture of the smoking wretch—is derived from smoking this lowest grade of tobacco; and now, in the very beginning, you propose to take from the downtrodden African almost the only pleasure and solace left since you have made him a freedman.

Mr. STEVENS. Our object is to correct his taste and elevate him, so that he may equal his master in—smoking tobacco. [Laughter.]

Mr. MALLORY. That remark proves that the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to make the freedmen superior to the common laboring men of the country who have to confine themselves to the use of common tobacco. They must be invested at once with the pecuniary power of purchasing and using the very finest description of tobacco sold at the highest price.

Mr. INGERSOLL. One word more. As the gentleman has put a finish upon my picture, I desire to improve the color of his.

Mr. MALLORY. Mine was colored sufficiently.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to tone it down by suggesting that there are five hundred thousand of our soldiers around their camp-fires who constantly use tobacco, and I would not compel them to pay ten cents a pound.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me suggest to the gentleman that a tax of ten cents a pound, considering the time a pound of tobacco will last, will not be a mill a day to the person who smokes it.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. STEVENS, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "twenty-five cents" in place of "five cents." I offer the amendment pro forma, for I desire to have the clause remain as it is. This subject was very fully considered by the Committee of Ways and Means. All the experts who were before the committee were persuaded that an infinite amount of fraud would arise under this section unless the tax was very considerable, and it was under the idea that it would prevent frauds and that the article would bear this amount of tax that the twenty cents was inserted. This is but about half the amount that we impose upon regularly manufactured smoking tobacco. The price of the article, in the first instance, is very much below that of good tobacco, and we impose only a little more than half the tax. I submit, therefore, that we have given sufficient consideration, not only to our soldiers, but to the colored friends of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY,] about whom he manifests such great solicitude. I hope that we shall allow the amount of the tax to remain as it is in the bill.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment for the simple reason that a cheap luxury in crowded communities is an absolute necessity. It is impossible that the laboring classes in our crowded cities can do without the ordinary stimulants which make life tolerable under the excessive burdens of taxation which we impose upon them. The laboring classes in our cities find it almost impossible now to furnish fuel and clothing for themselves and families, and they need as much as any of us the solace of a stimulant. By this excessive taxation you will drive them to the use of an injurious, and, it may be, fatal system of stimulants, and by which our revenue will be lessened.

It is a well-known fact that the records of the efforts for temperance in the cities show that with the exclusion of spirituous liquors they introduced the excessive use of opium, and men and women who are forced to work many more hours a day than laboring men in the country districts, are forced, as the books of the apothecaries in the populous sections of New York city show, to take for a stimulant a liquor made up principally of opium. If you lay an excessive tax upon this cheap article of tobacco, the result may be that the poorer classes will be forced into the adoption of a vice which has become national in some countries, and the use of opium may be the fate of the laborers of this country. With regard to the fraud on the revenue just alluded to, I have only to say you have already forced those who sell cigars to cheat you by putting false stamps upon their boxes of cigars and selling them at an increased price, while at the same time the Government loses its revenue. I appeal, therefore, to the Committee of Ways and Means not to take this further step in the same direction by over-taxing this cheap and popular luxury.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment, and in order to accommodate all parties, as there seems to be a disposition to make a little change in this provision, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky by inserting fifteen cents instead of five.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to—aye 47, nays 46.

Mr. MALLORY's amendment, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. MALLORY. I move an amendment that the tax on cigars be reduced from fifty to forty cents per pound. I have no hope, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will prevail, because I know it is the purpose of members to load this product of our country with the very heaviest tax that they think it can possibly bear. I believe that they have gone so far toward the attainment of this object as to have now loaded it with a tax that it cannot bear. I believe that the product will break down under the tax. If I thought it possible to achieve my purpose I would have moved an amendment reducing the tax on manufactured tobacco in every form in which it is spoken of in this bill, because my conviction is fixed—and I believe the operation of the law will prove the correctness of that view—that the rate of taxation now imposed on tobacco in its various forms will result in diminishing its production to an extent so large as to lessen the revenue materially that would be derived from a tax on this product at a much lower rate than the committee proposes to impose upon it. I merely protest now against the system which, it seems, is to be fixed on this country, of taxing whisky and tobacco, the two great products of the growing and flourishing West, at a rate greater than the products of any other section of the Union are taxed.

I know that when an individual or country is supposed to be able to bear a good deal, a good deal is apt to be imposed upon him or it. Gentlemen seem to rely on the fertility of that great western region, on the industry and energy of its people, as being sufficient to redeem them from the consequences of any amount of taxation inflicted on them by this bill. But I suggest to gentlemen that it is the last feather that breaks the camel's back, and that they may, in this practice, go so far as to render patience no longer a virtue on our part. The time will come when the strength of that region will give it the preponderance in the Halls of Congress. And I admonish gentlemen who are now so busy in inflicting on us every species of burden and oppression, to beware of the day when our strength will enable us to turn upon them and revenge ourselves for the injury which they are now inflicting upon us. I had rather that this system were abandoned. I had rather that fairness, equality, and justice should characterize our legislation, so that that people, when they attain this degree of power which they will reach, will look upon you with kindness and regard, will have nothing to retort upon you, will have no injury to redress, no rankling wrongs to remember. I admonish the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that the time will come when the great West, having legislative power in these Halls, will perhaps lay a stronger hand upon iron than he is disposed to have done, or upon coal, or upon petroleum, although we are using the latter so much in the West that I do not think we should punish you as much as ourselves by taxing it heavily.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish that this discrimination shall be persevered in. I have no hope, however, of seeing it abandoned. But I must be permitted, nevertheless, to enter my solemn protest against it here.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I am very sorry that my friend from Kentucky has got into the minatory humor this morning. It always makes me feel bad to hear threats.

Mr. MALLORY. I beg to correct the gentleman. I am in a minatory humor, not a minatory one. My remarks were simply minatory.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, sir, the gentleman's words are sometimes strong. When Jove nodded everything trembled; but lesser deities had to strike several times.

But, sir, the gentleman is mistaken in supposing that we are over-taxing the products of the West. Tobacco is becoming a product of every portion of our country. It is a large and increasing product in my own district. Last year, according to the accounts that I have, my county raised and sold over two million dollars' worth of tobacco. Connecticut raises a very large quantity of tobacco in proportion to her other crops—much larger than her wheat crop.

The gentleman must see that the system of taxation all over the world reduces the taxes to the fewest possible number of articles, and those generally articles of luxury. England now raises her vast revenue, not from five or six hundred articles of taxation, but from seventy or eighty. Is tobacco heavily taxed by this bill? The highest rate is sixty cents a pound. The tax on tobacco in England is $2 25 per pound. The tax now on cigars ranges from eight dollars per thousand, which is the lowest practical amount, up to forty dollars per thousand. This bill reduces the tax to ten dollars per thousand on the average. To be sure, it includes a certain class of cigars not included in our present tax; that is, Havana cigars, the foreign article; for we were of opinion that, without some such system as this, the frauds which are now practiced to such an extent as almost to render the tax a nullity, could not well be avoided. We have, therefore, reduced very materially the tax upon cigars from its present amount; yet we believe that this reduced rate of taxation will produce three or four times the amount of our present revenue from this source. We do not see how it will be possible to escape the payment of this taxation, where no frauds in counting can occur, where the question is simply one of weight. Under the present law, large quantities of cigars manufactured in this country are passed off as Havana cigars.

We believe, therefore, that the system proposed in this bill will produce, not perhaps as much revenue as the present system would if it could be enforced, but vastly more than we can ever realize under the present system. We believe that we have reduced the rate to the lowest figure possible, if we are to raise sufficient revenue to carry on this war and pay the interest on the public debt.

I am sure that the gentleman from Kentucky is willing that the products of his section shall pay their full proportion of taxation. I do not object that my constituents, largely engaged in tobacco raising, should bear their full proportion, nor do I believe that they will complain or think themselves unjustly burdened because many of the States raise no tobacco at all.

Mr. MALLORY. The distinguished chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in replying to what I had the rashness to say a few moments ago, spoke of Jove giving his nod. I do not suppose the gentleman could have alluded to me when he made that remark. He knows that he is regarded by the House and the country as the Jupiter Tonans of this body. The time was when he "Shook his ambrosial curls and gave his nod,

The stamp of fate, the sanction of a god."

He did have an influence in this House, and it trembled before him. But I must say that I think that time is passing away. I observed the other day an intimation from the distinguished gentleman himself which showed that the power of Jove was diminishing. I saw, too, that his nod had ceased to produce its accustomed effect in this House when the gold bill failed here so remarkably. If, therefore, the appellation used by the gentleman was intended for anybody, it must have been for himself. It must have been one of those lessons which, I have no doubt, the gentleman often gives himself to correct his ways, if those ways need correction.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the true theory of taxation is to impose taxes upon one or two articles for the purpose of raising revenue.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not say that. I said upon the fewest number.

Mr. MALLORY. Well, the fewest number. I take issue with the distinguished gentleman on that subject. The great purpose of taxation should be to make it equal and uniform; to distribute it as largely as possible throughout the whole land, and make it operate as far as possible upon every individual in proportion to his ability. That I regard as the true theory of the Government. For his protection by the Government, he must support the Government by his contribution in the shape of taxes. That is my theory of taxation.

I never go to England, sir, to borrow philosophy on this subject. If I did, I would fail to impose upon any production of this kind any tax at all. That is the English system. Tobacco is taxed enormously in England, some $2 45 per pound; but the gentleman must recollect that tobacco is not raised in England. Spirits and wines in all forms are taxed high in England, but they are not produced there. There is a high tax upon whisky, brandy, and wines. They contribute for that reason largely to the revenue of the Government.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman say that they do not produce whisky in England?

Mr. MALLORY. They do to a limited extent. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that England does not produce to a sufficient extent the material out of which whisky is made, for the population cannot spare it, as they need it for food.

Mr. STEVENS. The excise duty upon the domestic article there is very high now.

Mr. MALLORY. That results from the enormous excise imposed upon small quantities.

The gentleman supposes that Pennsylvania will become a large producer of tobacco. He says that it is a large producer now. Let me say to him that that will not continue long, because everybody knows that tobacco is an exhaustive crop. You cannot continue to raise tobacco in a region where cereals are valuable. When labor in his State becomes dearer and land higher in price, the production of tobacco will be abandoned. It will only be produced where the land is fertile and where the deterioration of it is not so objectionable as it is in Pennsylvania.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. L. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] but in reality rise more for the purpose of asking the Committee of Ways and Means a question upon a subject of great interest to the people, before we have passed by the section altogether. I am surprised that the matter has not been mentioned before.

There is a general belief that the interests of the Government would be best subserved in this particular by levying a tax upon tobacco in the leaf. Such a tax would in a great measure avoid the large frauds on the revenue, which it is on all hands admitted have been practiced under the present law, and which the bill before us evidently contemplates will again be attempted—frauds which injure the honest manufacturer as well as the Government. It would obviate the need of passing a multiplicity of taxes on tobacco in its various forms, and a multiplicity of regulations which the assessor and inspector will find it difficult to carry out successfully; and still further, it would enable us to repeal a section which imposes upon cigar makers an obligation not required of any other class of employes. I allude to the provision requiring cigar makers to return monthly, upon oath and under severe penalties, an account of all cigars made by them as employes or otherwise. It is contended that this business cannot be assimilated to any other, and that to prevent fraud the paragraph must stand. A tax upon the raw tobacco will certainly enable us to do away with it, and as I believe, its assessment, with the establishment of bonded warehouses to receive this product, and an allowance of a drawback equivalent to the tax upon all leaf tobacco exported, will add to the revenue. I now ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] why the many recommendations for such a tax have passed by unheeded.

Mr. BROOKS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. I renew it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania inquires why the Committee of Ways and Means have not responded to the call of the country, which he seems to regard as almost unanimous, to lay the tobacco tax on the leaf. I will state to the gentleman, in the first place, that we were not so well satisfied as he is that that call is unanimous. Nor do I believe it is at all extensive when you compare it with the call made upon us by the country not to tax the leaf. The Committee of Ways and Means in coming to the decision to which they arrived, consulted the purchasers of tobacco, the manufacturers of tobacco, and the inspectors and collectors of the Government all over the country; and I will state as the result of that inquiry that the impression was made upon the committee that it was impossible so to impose a tax upon the leaf as to derive as much revenue to the Government as would be derived by laying the tax upon the manufactured article.

Mr. L. MYERS. Of course in case of exportation there would be a drawback allowed equivalent to the amount of the tax.

Mr. MALLORY. Even allowing a drawback, the difficulty of going to the producer of tobacco, of counting the number of plants, of inquiring, when cut, whether the producer had disposed of any of it in order to evade the tax, the following the tobacco to the stripping-house and the press-house, seemed so insuperable to the committee that they abandoned the idea of taxing in the leaf.

The principle of the bill now before the House, and which the committee wished to follow and preserve, as far as they could, intact, was to place the tax as far from the producer of every article as possible, and in no instance, if it could be prevented with anything like justice to the revenue, to impose a tax to be paid by the producer before the article is exposed in the market. Various means were suggested to get over this difficulty, but none of them were deemed by the Committee of Ways and Means practicable. The committee were of the opinion that, if the planter were compelled from his own pocket to pay the tax upon the tobacco before he was allowed to expose it for sale and consumption in market, the annoyance, trouble, and vexation would be so great as to compel him to abandon the cultivation and engage in some other of the profitable pursuits opened to farmers and planters. They believed that a tax on the leaf would lessen the production of the article in the country, and in that way not only injure the general prosperity of the country, but diminish the revenue of the Government expected to be derived from this article. These, so far as I know, were the reasons which compelled the committee to take one of the wisest steps the committee did take in respect to the tax on tobacco, and that was not to tax in the leaf.

Mr. KASSON. Before submitting the motion that the committee rise, since this proposition of taxing the leaf has been raised, I desire briefly to state the converse of the views now presented by the gentleman from Kentucky. I concur in the action of the Committee of Ways and Means not at this time to amend the law by transferring the tax to the article in the leaf; but I am equally unwilling that my colleague upon the committee [Mr. MALLORY] should present the other view and send it forth to the country against any future change by the Committee of Ways and Means upon this question without having an opportunity to state briefly the advantage of the other system. And let me therefore say to him, and to the committee, that the burden upon the producer does not consist in the stage between consumption and production where you put the tax, but in the amount of the tax imposed, and its conformity or non-conformity with the customs and usages of commerce. If the consumer gets his article at so much cost, whether smoking or chewing tobacco, or cigars, it is immaterial to him in what stage between the producer and the consumer the tax is imposed. The consumer will buy if the article does not cost too much. If it does cost too much the consumer will stop or diminish the consumption. I am anxious, therefore, that the planters should further consider this question against another meeting of Congress; and they may possibly find that by the course we are now pursuing we more endanger the amount of consumption, and the market they now have for their tobacco, than by the course proposed by the friends of taxation on the leaf. Transfer the tax to the leaf without interference with the ordinary course of trade and you will find the market more uniform. The large manufacturers who furnish a reliable market to the producer, often accumulating large stocks, are restored, instead of being nearly ruined as now, and driven from the market by fraudulent dealers who evade the law without benefit either to the producer or the Government. You impose the tax solely upon the manufactured article, subject to all the frauds that characterize the collection of that tax at this day, and you practically prohibit the large manufacturers from the purchase of the large amounts which they formerly assumed even when the market was overburdened, and thus relieved the producer from the accumulation of stock on his hands.

I maintain, therefore, not that you should tax the producer—by no means—but, as proposed in one of the bills offered in the House and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, that you should take the ordinary channels of trade, and collect the tax after the article passes from the producer's hands for consumption, placing it in warehouses if necessary in the mean time. In that way you do not count the number of plants raised by the producer, nor require permits to produce, nor in any way embarrass production; you collect no tax from the producer; you simply say that after it gets into the market, and before consumption, the tax shall then be paid before manufacture, thus making it uniform on all manufacturers.

Having said so much by way of reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, I now, at the request of my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRILL], move that the committee do now rise for the purpose of closing debate on this paragraph.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the tax bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRILL moved that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the pending paragraph of the tax bill be closed in three minutes after the committee should resume the consideration of the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the tax bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two in relation to the subject which has just been discussed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] and the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON], the expediency of taxing leaf tobacco on hand. I know that the difficulties now are very great, and that such a provision could not be carried into effect without imposing upon the country a vast amount of expenditure, for we should have to establish warehouses and appoint inspectors in almost every town and county in the country. Such a system as that over our country would involve a vast amount of expense, for this article is not only cultivated in Pennsylvania and Connecticut, but there is not a single State in the Union where it is not now cultivated, and cultivated profitably.

A MEMBER. Do they cultivate it in Vermont?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, even in Vermont.

Mr. Chairman, there is another great objection to the system which will be found in practice. In a country like England, where all of this article is imported, they can, of course, levy any amount of duty on the article; but in our own country, where every one may produce it if he pleases, if he merely owns a garden patch, it would be almost impossible to make every individual in the country render an accurate account of all that he produces; and if you interfere with this article by compelling the producer to carry this produce from the place of production to some place where it must be warehoused and inspected, in my judgment you will cripple the production of it.

[Here the hammer fell, the time allowed for debate having expired.]

Mr. MALLORY's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew my amendment to insert after line five hundred and eighty-one, at the close of this paragraph, the following:

On vinegar, or acetic acid, there shall be levied and paid a tax of six cents per gallon: Provided, That no duty shall be levied on the material from which the vinegar shall be made.

Mr. MORRILL. I am aware that that amendment in some form has received the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means, but believing, as I do, that it will be very mischievous, I hope that it will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order. All debate upon this paragraph has been closed by the order of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. With all due deference to the Chair, I think that this amendment comes in at a point subsequent to that paragraph upon which debate was closed. It is upon an entirely different subject—is an independent proposition, and it is therefore in order to debate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment, if adopted, would form part of the paragraph.

Mr. MORRILL. I then hold that it is not in order, not being germane to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That the Chair cannot tell, because he does not know what is in the section of the original law.

Mr. MORRILL. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not apply to any thing in the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot determine that, because the Chair does not know what is in the original section.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw my amendment. Mr. THAYER. I move to amend by striking out the following:

By inserting in the last paragraph relating to cigars, after the words "imprisonment not exceeding thirty days," the words, "and any person furnished with such permit may apply to the assistant assessor or inspector of the district to have any cigars of their own manufacture weighed; and on receiving a certificate of the weight, for which such fee as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be paid by the owner thereof, may sell and deliver such cigars to any purchaser, in the presence of said assistant assessor or inspector, in bulk or unpacked, without payment of the duty. A copy of the certificate shall be retained by the assistant assessor, and an inspector shall return the same to the assistant assessor of the district. The purchaser shall pack such cigars in boxes, and have the same inspected and marked or stamped according to the provisions of this act, and shall make a return of the same as inspected to the assistant assessor of the district, and, unless removed to a bonded warehouse, shall pay the duties on such cigars within five days after purchasing them, and before the same have been removed from the store or building of such purchaser or from his possession; and any such purchaser who shall neglect for more than five days to pack and have such cigars duly inspected, and pay the duties thereon according to this act, or who shall purchase any cigars from any person not holding such permit, the duties thereon not having been paid, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court, and the cigars shall be forfeited and sold, one fourth for the benefit of the informer, one fourth for the officer who seized or had them condemned, and one half shall be paid to the Government."

There is a very good reason for this, as the Treasury would find, but as the committee has cut off debate, I cannot state it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THAYER. I move to amend by inserting in line five hundred and sixty-nine, after the word "them," the words "to the collector of the district wherein they were manufactured," so that it will read, "and shall make a return of the same, as inspected, to the assistant assessor of the district; and, unless removed to a bonded warehouse, shall pay the duties on such cigars within five days after purchasing them, to the collector of the district wherein they were manufactured."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew my amendment:

On vinegar, or acetic acid, there shall be levied and paid a tax of six cents per gallon: Provided, That no duty shall be levied on the material from which the vinegar shall be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on the pending paragraph.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move it as a new paragraph.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting in the proviso "and vinegar made from apples and grapes." I want to exclude that description of vinegar from taxation altogether.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by striking out the first word.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order on the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Under the ruling of the Chair, which I dare say is right, I am disposed to withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read the next paragraph of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew my amend-

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 51.

ment, to insert it at the commencement of the paragraph. I offer it for this reason: a large quantity of vinegar is made out of what is called "singlings," a coarse kind of distillation, which is used for nothing else. Upon that article, which is afterward converted into vinegar, a duty of two dollars per gallon is levied, calling it "whisky." When it is converted into vinegar, it sells at thirty-three cents a gallon. Hence any one can see that in large distilleries no vinegar can be possibly made. It is to prevent the consequent enormous waste and breaking up of business that I have offered my amendment. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] thinks it would open the door for fraud. I cannot see that. I cannot see how that article can be used in any other way than in the manufacture of vinegar. Hence it is that I have proposed to tax vinegar, but not to tax the second time the material out of which it is manufactured.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says he cannot see how frauds will be practiced under the proposed amendment which he has offered. I will endeavor to show to the committee how they will be practiced, even though the gentleman from Pennsylvania may fail to see it. Under the amendment which he proposes the material from which the vinegar is made is not to be taxed. Of course, any person who holds a quantity of singlings has only to say, whether truly or falsely, that he holds it for the purpose of manufacturing vinegar, which will leave it exempt from taxation. It travels free, and cannot afterward be traced or followed. I think that, under these circumstances, we should have a great many vinegar manufacturers. The Committee of Ways and Means, in this bill, have already proposed that these singlings, if used for this purpose, shall be subject to duty only according to their actual proof, instead of paying a tax of two dollars per gallon; that is to say, if the singlings contain only thirty or forty per cent. of whisky, instead of the usual proof, they shall be subject to a pro rata duty, and not a duty of two dollars per gallon. That is all the relief that the Committee of Ways and Means at first thought it wise to give to this article; and all that I think it is now safe to give.

Now, let me state how fraud may be practiced in another way in this article. The committee will understand that it may be redistilled and made into whisky. Parties may therefore hold it for the very purpose of redistilling and making it into whisky; while to the collector and assessor they disavow or do not disclose any such purpose.

Mr. PENDLETON. If it is redistilled, does it not pay the tax of two dollars?

Mr. MORRILL. I conceive that, if parties be thus enabled to hold it for such a purpose, while disguising that purpose, we thereby lose the control of it. Once beyond our control, it will be impossible to recover it. Under the present circumstances, we have the control of it.

Then, again, Mr. Chairman, we are not only opening a wide door for the perpetration of frauds, but we are establishing a precedent, and a bad one. If one manufacturer has the right to demand that his whisky shall be exempted from tax, so has another. The vinegar manufacturer has no more right to demand that this article shall be free of tax than the maker of hats, who uses a large quantity of alcohol or whisky for the purpose of dissolving the gum employed in stiffening hats. So I might specify a large number of uses to which it is now devoted, and which equally demand relief, if any is given. I would, if it were practicable, cheerfully adopt some means by which we could relieve all who use it for another and a different manufacture. But, under the circumstances, I do think that scarcely anything would open so wide a door to frauds and evasions of all kinds as the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. L. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to oppose the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague; but I trust that he will accept the amendment which I shall send to the Clerk's desk; otherwise I shall offer it as an independent proposition. It covers, I think, the whole ground of what was originally intended. I do not know whether my colleague's amendment will be adopted; but if it should be I desire that my proposition shall be incorporated with it.

My colleague's amendment proposes to tax this vinegar directly. Probably it is the fairest way. Then the gentleman adds a proviso that the article from which the vinegar is made shall not be taxed. But, sir, there is a new process by which vinegar is manufactured from corn; and in view of this I think that the amendment would leave a loophole for misconstruction hereafter. The article from which the vinegar is made, the corn, would not be taxed; but the Commissioner of Internal Revenue would in all probability decide that under the law the fluid generated in the process of distillation in making this vinegar would be liable to be taxed. In the process of what has been termed by the Commissioner distillation, there is produced what he calls a "low wine," which has scarcely an appreciable relation to whisky—not further certainly than one and a half or two to fifty-five. It is an article useless for any other purpose, and which in reality should not be taxed. But by a previous section of this bill we have provided that the duties on it "shall be collected on the basis of the actual proof." I agree with my colleague that this is really in no degree a spirit or whisky which should be taxed. I hope, therefore, that his amendment will prevail if it includes in it what I suppose he meant, that neither the article from which this vinegar is made nor the fluid produced in the process of manufacture shall be taxed.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. L. MYERS] whether this article could not be obtained from distilleries at this low proof, then mixed with other liquor of very high proof, and sold as whisky, without having paid any duty at all on the low proof.

Mr. L. MYERS. In reply to the gentleman I would state that this is in reality not spirits. It is, in fact, a different article—more like rain water than spirits. True, it was adjudged by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to be a distillation, but it is not spirits within the intent of the term, is only produced in the process of this manufacture, and it is useless to suppose could be obtained from distilleries and mixed with liquors of high proof. Such a course would not benefit the party taking it, for it is not proposed to exempt this fluid where not made in the manufacture of vinegar, and the fraud would be detected and punished. Beside this, if distilled further or mixed with other distillations to make it spirits or whisky the tax upon it as such would have to be paid. I only desire to prevent the misconstruction which might arise hereafter, should we pass the amendment exempting the article from which vinegar is made, and not the fluid produced in the manufacture.

Mr. STEVENS. I see no objection, and will accept the amendment of my colleague, [Mr. L. MYERS.]

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state a difficulty which it seems to me may arise under this amendment. Suppose a person applies to a distiller for the purchase of a large amount of whisky which he alleges he intends to convert into vinegar. If the sale is made for the purpose of having that whisky converted into vinegar no tax is paid. When it has passed into the hands of the purchaser and he sells it without converting it into vinegar, who is to pay the tax?

Mr. L. MYERS. I will answer the gentleman. He is wrong in his premises, and therefore wrong in his conclusions. It is not in this instance made from whisky. It is made from corn and other articles.

Mr. WILSON. My question was more to the gentleman's colleague than to himself. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, exempts all material used in the manufacture of vinegar. The manufacturer may purchase from the distiller a large amount of whisky, alleging that it is for the purpose of making vinegar, and he will pay no tax upon it. If, then, instead of putting it into the market as vinegar, he puts it there as whisky, nobody pays a tax upon it. It seems to me that there is a difficulty which does open the door to fraud wider than the gentleman from Vermont has indicated.

Mr. STEVENS. In order to avoid that difficulty I will withdraw my amendment. Instead of saying the materials out of which it is made I will say "singlings."

The question recurred on Mr. STEVENS's amendment.

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS and MORRILL were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read, as follows:

That section ninety-six be amended by inserting, after the words "concentrated milk," the words "cider, sugar, and molasses, made from other articles than the sugar-cane."

The ninety-sixth section is as follows:

Sec. 96. And be it further enacted, That newspapers, boards, shingles, laths, and other lumber, staves, hoops, shooks, headings, and timber partially wrought and unfinished for chairs, tubs, pails, hubs, spokes, felloes, snaths, lasts, shovel and fork handles, match-wood, umbrella stretchers, alcohol made or manufactured of spirits or materials upon which the duties imposed by law shall have been paid, bone dust, plaster or gypsum, malt, burning fluid, printers' ink, flax prepared for textile or felting purposes until actually woven, marble and slate or other building stones in block, rough and unwrought, charcoal, coke, all flour and meal made from grain, bread, and breadstuffs, butter, cheese, concentrated milk, paraffine, whale and fish oil, value of the bullion used in the manufacture of silver ware, silver bullion rolled or prepared for platers' use exclusively, materials prepared for the manufacture of hoop skirts exclusively and unfit for other use, (such as cut tapes and small wares for joining hoops together,) shall be, and hereby are, exempt from duty. And also all goods, wares, and merchandise, and articles made or manufactured from materials which have been subject to and upon which internal duties have been actually paid, or materials imported upon which duties have been paid or upon which no duties have been imposed by law, where the increased value of such goods, wares, or merchandise, and articles so made or manufactured, shall not exceed the amount of five per cent. ad valorem, shall be, and hereby are, exempt from duty.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to strike out "sugar and," and insert "cider vinegar, sugar, or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to refund to the persons entitled to receive the same the taxes which have been collected from manufacturers of molasses from sorghum, under the act to which this is an amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to say yesterday that the principal object was to exempt molasses made from sorghum, or imphee, and that that was effected by the act of July, 1864. There is no question whatever but the gentleman from Vermont is correct. Section ninety-three provides that molasses produced from sugar-cane, and not from sorghum or imphee, shall pay a tax of five cents per gallon. In spite of this clear exception, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has construed the act, and imposed this duty of five cents upon it, and it has been paid all over the country. These manufacturers have been required to pay it. Whatever the Commissioner may suppose to be the law, undoubtedly will be carried out. In this there has been a clear misapprehension of the law, and I think that the tax which has been collected ought to be refunded.

I know of no interest which under the circumstances is entitled to so much encouragement. I indorse the views expressed by the gentleman from Vermont in reference to a tax upon maple sugar. It was most ridiculous to suggest it, and I think that it was rather suggested for amusement than otherwise. Yet there is tenfold the reason for the encouragement of the manufacture of this article, which enters so largely into the social and domestic necessities. It needs encouragement, not by direct means, but by relieving it as far as may be from the burdens of taxation. I hope we will do what is right in this matter, and refund the money which has been improperly paid.

Mr. MORRILL. I think if we were to go into the matter of executing the law, we should find plenty of business on our hands. In this case, as in all others, parties paying the tax have their proper remedy. They can appeal from the decision to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I trust the gentleman will not persist in his proposition, and if he does that the committee will vote it down. I think, however, that the parties to whom the gentleman alludes, as well as all others, will be entirely content if the law shall be so fixed that they shall not hereafter pay a tax upon this article.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following clause:

That section one hundred and three be amended by inserting, after the words "foreign port," the words "and the amount actually paid for canal tolls by any person or company owning or possessing or having the care or management of any canal-boat or other vessel shall be deducted from their gross receipts," and by inserting, after the word "fare" wherever it occurs in the proviso to said section, the words "or freight."

Mr. STROUSE. I move to amend that clause by striking out all after the words "foreign port," the words "down to and including the word "freight," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

And the amount actually paid for canal tolls, towing, and expenses of running or sailing any canal-boat, barge, or other vessel, shall be deducted from their gross receipts.

I offer this amendment for the purpose of doing justice to a very meritorious class of our citizens. I had the honor of introducing a resolution, which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, some time ago, embodying the principles of this amendment. The committee reported to some extent favorably upon it; but I believe they labored under some misapprehension in regard to it. I cannot better or more forcibly bring this matter to the attention of the committee than by having read one of the many memorials received by me from men engaged in boating upon our internal waters, but received too late to have them referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Clerk read the memorial, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned owners or lessees of boats engaged in the business of carrying coal on the waters of the Schuylkill canal, in Pennsylvania, respectfully represent, that under the provisions of section one hundred and three of the act of Congress, approved June 30, 1834, entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," (the section referring to railroads, steamboats, ferry-boats, and bridges,) and the construction placed upon the same by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the tax imposed upon them is unduly burdensome, and in their view disproportionate with other subjects of taxation specified in said act, and operates greatly against the owners and lessees of canal-boats.

Those engaged in the business of carrying in canal-boats, for hire, are subject to the following expenses:

First. The investment in boat, mules, and gearing. Second. An annual taxation of ten cents per ton on the tonnage of the boat, payable at the custom-house in Philadelphia. Third. The expense of keeping the boat in repair; the feed and care of the mules or horses; the cost of loading, unloading, and wharfage; in trips to New York, the cost of towage and the expense and hire of workmen and boatmen to run the boat. Fourth. The toll due the canal company. Fifth. The general State and United States taxes.

Your petitioners represent that they do not object to a just and reasonable tax upon their earnings, but that under the provisions of said act, and the construction thereof by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, they are compelled to pay a tax of two and one half per cent. on the gross amount which they collect, including all expenses of running the boat, loading and unloading, the amount of tolls and towage.

Your petitioners further represent that such taxation operates in such manner as to increase their tax in proportion to the increase of their expenses, a principle of taxation which they believe to be unjust. Your petitioners make the following estimate average of receipts and expenses of a canal barge of from one hundred and seventy-five to one hundred and eighty tons for the year 1864:

From Pottsville to New York about eight trips can be made in one season.
For this the boatmen receive, per trip, about.....$550 00
Expenses of tolls, wharfage, labor, &c..... 485 00

Making net, per trip..... 65 00
Which would make for eight trips, gross.....4,400 00
And for eight trips, net..... 520 00
But the internal revenue, two and a half per cent.
on $4,400, is..... 110 00

Which would make, for eight trips, net..... $410 00

The cost of a canal barge of one hundred and seventy-five to one hundred and eighty tons is from $2,300 to $2,600.

The above sum of $410 includes the personal services of the owner or lessee in running the boat. The wear and tear of the boat is not included in the above estimate.

Your petitioners therefore pray your honorable bodies to repeal the said section one hundred and three in said act, and to make such other just and reasonable legislation in lieu thereof as will not operate as against them.
And we will ever pray, &c.

Mr. STROUSE. I do not know that I can add anything to this truthful statement made by the memorialists to the House and Senate. Although the memorial I have had read comes to me from the State of Pennsylvania, the statement of their complaints and grievances applies not only to Pennsylvania, but equally to the New York canal, the Ohio river, the Northwest, and the East.

It will be observed that, under the present law, the captain, the owner, or the contractor of the boat, pays two and a half per cent. upon the gross earnings of the boat; that is the entire amount, not excluding the amount paid out for tolls, for the hands, the bowman, the steersman, the driver, and other employes. Thus he is taxed two and a half per cent. upon money which is not his earnings, but which is paid out for the purpose of keeping the vessel in a condition to carry freight. Such an act is unjust, and I seek by my amendment simply to have the tax paid upon the net earnings only of the boat.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move a substitute for the entire amendment; I move to amend section one hundred and three of the tax bill, to which the pending clause refers, by striking out the words "shall be subject to and pay a duty of two and one half per cent. upon the gross receipts," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "shall be subject to an income tax of five per cent. upon the net receipts." I will explain my object. I have received numerous communications from the owners of vessels in my own State—and I know similar complaints are made elsewhere—that under the provision of the law by which you tax the gross receipts of vessels, you frequently tax parties who really derive no profit from the use of such vessels. The owner of a vessel may receive $10,000 a year from its use as his gross receipts, and yet there may not be a single dollar of profits. A case of that kind was related to me in connection with this very provision.

Now, it seems to me that the taxation should be upon the profits derived from the use of the vessel. A man makes $10,000 during the summer season perhaps, but in the fall his vessel encounters a storm and is partially wrecked. The repairs will eat up all his profits, and it will be adopting a new principle to refuse to deduct such charges and expenses.

I will change the language of my amendment, so as to make the words to be inserted read, "shall be subject to an income tax of two and a half per cent. upon all net receipts under $3,000, and five per cent. upon all net receipts over $3,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the amendment proposed by him is not in order, as there are no such words as those he proposes to strike out.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. The amendment in the bill relates to section one hundred and three of the tax bill, and I move an entire substitute for that amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STROUSE] and the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWN] are both designed to reach ultimately the same purpose. We have already made the experiment of trying to collect some revenue upon the net receipts of canal-boats, steamboats, &c., and found it a failure; we could not collect any considerable amount of revenue. The law was, therefore, changed so as to impose a tax of a smaller amount upon the gross receipts. The same principle was adopted in relation to railroads. The Committee of Ways and Means, upon representations from various parts of the country, thought that to include the tolls which these canal-boats actually pay was rather oppressive; and they have therefore proposed to relieve them from that part of the tax, and they do not propose to go further and include the various expenditures which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has included in his amendment. I think the parties generally will be satisfied with the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I hope that neither of the amendments will prevail.

Mr. PIKE. I appeal to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWN] to withdraw his amendment until we can take a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STROUSE], and then I will offer a proposition repealing the duty on gross receipts altogether.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I will withdraw my amendment for that purpose.

The question now being on Mr. STROUSE's amendment,

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL and STROUSE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE. I now move to insert after the words "foreign ports," in line five hundred and ninety-eight, the words "nor upon the receipts of any vessel subject to tonnage duty." The act of July last provided for a tax of two and a half per cent. on the gross receipts of coasting vessels. I am told that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STROUSE] embraces my amendment. I would like to have the clause read as it now stands.

The Clerk read the clause as amended.

Mr. PIKE. That does not answer my purpose. My proposition is entirely different. The proposition which has been adopted by the committee is to tax the net receipts. My proposition is to exempt coasting vessels altogether from the taxation of two and a half per cent., in order to have the tax placed upon tonnage as a tonnage duty. The present tax of two and a half per cent. upon the earnings of coasting vessels does not apply to foreign vessels. The provincial vessels which come into our markets with similar cargoes to our coasting vessels do not pay the two and a half per cent., while our vessels running alongside of them have to pay the two and a half per cent. On the river upon the banks of which I live a vessel casts off from the wharf on one side of the river and carries her cargo to Boston or New York, and she pays a duty of two and a half per cent. upon her freight; but a vessel which casts off from the other side of the river does not pay it. It is consequently a bounty to provincial vessels. A large amount of foreign shipping, made so by transferring American shipping to the amount of five hundred thousand tons, is, by the act of July last, exempt from taxation. My proposition is that it shall pay a tonnage tax, and in that way we shall obtain more revenue than under the present system, and lay the tax upon foreign as well as upon domestic tonnage.

Of course in this bill we cannot lay a tonnage tax; but the Committee of Ways and Means propose to bring in a bill to revise the tariff, and in that way we can lay a tonnage tax. It is a matter of considerable moment. A tonnage tax of twenty cents a ton would yield $3,500,000 annually. I am not satisfied of the amount that this two and a half per cent. tax will yield; but I have no idea that it will yield one third that amount, for, according to the decision of the Commissioner, this result comes to pass: if a man owns the vessel and cargo he pays no tonnage tax, because the Commissioner decides that the vessel does not earn money separately from the ownership, and that consequently she is not liable to be taxed. But if a man does not happen to own both vessel and cargo, and he sends his vessel abroad for hire, he is obliged to pay a tonnage tax.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment, and for this reason: an act was passed at the last session of Congress regulating the admeasurement of vessels, and the effect of it has been that many of our screw-propeller freight vessels on the lakes, that would carry perhaps four hundred and fifty tons of freight, are made to measure eighteen hundred or two thousand tons; and now, if this tax be laid on the tonnage, we shall be "jumping from the frying-pan into the fire."

I would not object to the tax on tonnage if the tonnage were made up under the old law. I believe that the evils under which transportation companies labor are remedied by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STROUSE], and, as representing the commercial interests of the lakes, I am content with that.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to add a single word, Mr. Chairman, in support of the pending amendment, and I shall consume the brief time allowed me in illustrating the point at issue by a practical example, the details of which are personally known to me.

During the past summer a ship-owner in my district—a highly responsible and intelligent gentleman—chartered to Government a vessel of four hundred and fifty tons to carry a cargo of coal from Philadelphia to New Orleans, for the gross sum of $6,000. For the vessel's disbursements in Philadelphia for painting, calking, repair of sails, manning, provisions, and port charges, the captain drew on the owners for $3,075 35. For the vessel's disbursements in New Orleans for various charges the captain drew for a further sum of $1,410 70. Procuring no business in New Orleans she was compelled to proceed to Boston in ballast, where to pay off her crew and meet other expenses there was a further disbursement of $1,176. At Boston the vessel chartered to go to Philadelphia in ballast for cargo, and at Philadelphia, before a dollar of the new charter was available or even earned the captain again drew for $576. Total disbursements from time of leaving Philadelphia to return for another cargo, $6,238 05.

At this point the Government paid the $6,000 in certificates of indebtedness, then selling at ninety-four, the owners thus receiving but $5,640 in cash for the period during which the actual disbursements in cash were $6,238 05, showing a net cash loss for the time of about six hundred dollars, or, to be precisely accurate, $598 05, besides the interest on advance, nearly two hundred dollars more.

And now, sir, after this melancholy experience the tax collector came forward and demanded of the owner of the vessel two and a half per cent. on the $6,000 which the Government paid as above, and on top of all losses already incurred actually compelled him to pay $150 under that section of the internal revenue law which we are now seeking to amend. And the example I have given, sir, is by no means solitary. The experiences of very many ship-owners engaged in the coasting trade would show similar dismal results, and the conviction among that entire class of men—as honorable and patriotic citizens as the Republican boast—is that the law is oppressive in the extreme and based on radically erroneous principles of taxation.

There is no analogy between this tax on the gross receipts of vessels and the tax on the gross receipts of railroad companies. In the case of the railroads the law allows them to add the tax directly upon the regular rates of fare, and many of the companies have construed this in the scriptural sense of liberality—being asked for one mile, they readily go the "twain." But this mode of relief, or of shifting the burden upon the general public, is not practicable in the case of vessels. There is no way in which it can be evaded or dodged or placed on other shoulders or divided between other parties. It comes remorselessly upon the enterprising ship-owner, and whether his voyage has been a profit or a loss, whether it enriches or impoverishes him, the tax is all the same, without discrimination and without mercy. A man's profit in business affords a fair basis of taxation; but it is a cruel mockery of one's misfortune to assess a tax upon losses. I trust, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that this unwise and unjust tax will be repealed, and that the commercial men of the country who do so much to sustain our finances and our honor will be relieved from its oppressive exactions.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I move an amendment in the nature of a substitute, to strike out the whole clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That section one hundred and three be amended by striking out the words "two and a half per cent. upon gross receipts" and inserting "two and a half per cent. upon the net receipts under $3,000, and five per cent. upon the excess."

The amendment of the gentleman from Maine, in favor of which I withdrew my substitute, does not reach the evil as regards the lakes. The evil, as the gentleman from Maine has just remarked, is that the vessel-owners pay a tax upon their losses and also upon their expenses; whereas the true foundation of the tax should be the net earnings. I propose, in my amendment, to adopt the principle of taxing the net earnings of those vessels; and this obviates as well the objection which the gentleman from Maine raises as applied to coasting vessels, as the objection raised by the vessel-owners on the lakes.

Mr. BLAINE withdrew his amendment.

The amendment of Mr. PIKE was agreed to.

The substitute of Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, was adopted.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I move to amend by adding the following:

That section one hundred and three be amended by adding the following after the word "vehicle:"

Provided, That this section shall not apply to those teams, wagons, and vehicles used in transporting logs for lumber from the forests to the place or places of manufacture, or to the teams or vehicles used in the transportation of ores from the mines where the same are excavated to the place where they are reduced or worked.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment to obviate any difficulty that might arise from the uncertainty of the phraseology of section one hundred and three of the law of 1864. The revenue officers in the State of Nevada are already collecting from the teamsters and those engaged in hauling logs as well as mineral ores a general tax of one half of one per cent. upon the gross proceeds, necessarily collectible only after the reduction of the ores. This operates as a hardship, and if continued will involve the suspension of that sort of business; for it is frequently a greater percentage than the teamsters receive for their labor. No one can know the value of the rock until after its reduction. Very often rock that is considered valuable fails to pay the necessary expenses of reduction.

I do not suppose that the imposition of this tax was contemplated when the act was passed; but as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has decided that this tax is properly levied in such cases, I think it eminently just that this amendment should be adopted, in order to remedy the hardship that now exists.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to amend by inserting, after line six hundred and ten, the following:

That section one hundred and ten be amended by inserting after the words "1st day of July, 1864," the words, "Provided, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1865, in lieu of the rates of duty on circulation prescribed by this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of one quarter of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person; and from and after the 1st day of January, 1866, a duty of one half of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of such circulation as aforesaid. And whenever the outstanding circulation of any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, shall be reduced to an amount not exceeding five per cent. of the chartered or declared capital, said circulation shall be free from taxation. And whenever any State bank or banking association has been converted into a national banking association, and such national banking association has assumed the liabilities of such State bank or banking association, including the redemption of its circulation; or, in case a national banking association shall become the owner or possessor of the assets, or liable for the redemption of the circulation of any State bank that has surrendered its charter or ceased to exist, such national banking association shall be held to make the required return and payment on the circulation outstanding, so long as such circulation shall exceed five per cent. of the capital of such State bank or banking association."

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. My point is, that this is not properly an amendment to the pending bill, but is an amendment to the original act. I submit that it is not germane to any provision of the bill now before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I very respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] proposes to insert at the end of line six hundred and ten an amendment to section one hundred and ten of the original act. Upon that the gentleman from Indiana raises the point of order that section one hundred and ten not being embraced within the amendments presented by the committee, it is not now in order to amend that section of the original act. The Chair holds that the pending bill brings up the whole of the original act, and therefore he overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Indiana appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say, in regard to that amendment, that it has been prepared with some care to carry out the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, and also the recommendation of the Comptroller of the Currency. One object is to put a tax upon the circulation of the State banks which have been converted into national banks, or which have gone out of existence and their circulation assumed by the national banks, which shall be sufficient to put a stop to their circulation. The other, and I may say the principal object, is to bring about one system of currency or bank paper throughout the country. So long as State banks continue to issue circulation it is intended to put a larger and disproportionate tax upon it. Another object is to require national banks which have assumed the circulation of State banks that have gone out of existence to make returns, as there seems no one now required by law to make such returns.

Mr. WILSON. I propose the following as a substitute:

That section one hundred and ten be amended by inserting after the words "1st day of July, 1864," the words, "Provided, That on and after the 1st day of April, 1865, in lieu of the rates of duty on circulation prescribed by this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of one half of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of circulation issued by any bank, association, corporation, company, or person; and from and after the 1st day of September, 1865, a duty of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of such circulation as aforesaid. And whenever the outstanding circulation of any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, shall be reduced to an amount not exceeding five per cent. of the chartered or declared capital said circulation shall be free from taxation. And whenever any State bank or banking association has been converted into a national banking association, and such national banking association has assumed the liabilities of such State bank or banking association, including the redemption of its circulation; or, in case a national banking association shall become the owner or possessor of the assets or liable for the redemption of the circulation of any State bank that has surrendered its charter or ceased to exist, such national banking association shall be held to make the required return and payment on the circulation outstanding, so long as such circulation shall exceed five per cent. of the capital before such conversion of such State bank or banking association; and no national banking association after it shall have received from the Comptroller of the Currency any of its notes for circulation, shall pay out the notes of any State bank or banking association; and no State bank or banking association shall issue for circulation any notes of its own or of any other State bank or banking association after the 1st day of April, 1865."

Mr. Chairman, I was not one of those who in the Thirty-Seventh Congress voted for the adoption of the present national banking law. I did not believe that it was for the interest of the country to adopt that system of banking. I did, however, vote for the amendatory act because I thought that was an improvement of the original one. But it is now the established policy of the Government, and I think that it should be made the exclusive policy of the country so far as banks of issue are concerned. In order to arrive at that end I propose by this substitute to prohibit State banks or banking associations issuing notes for circulation after the 1st day of April, 1865.

I regard as next in importance to taxation the reduction of the volume of the currency, because it will make our taxes of greater value, although the same in amount, and reduce the price of everything the Government has to purchase. Now, sir, I do not think that it is owing to the issue of paper currency that the price of everything in the country is so inflated, for I presume that a like amount of gold and silver in circulation would produce the same effect. We have an example of the effect produced in California where the circulation is gold and silver. I will read, in illustration of this idea, an extract from a work on foreign and domestic commerce:

"It is contended by the commercial journals of San Francisco that the currency of California, which is mostly coin, is more abundant in proportion to population and wealth than that of the Atlantic States. The Mercantile Gazette of February 12, 1864, represents the amount in circulation on the Pacific coast at $25,000,000; that the population of California with adjoining State (of Oregon) and Territories is six hundred thousand; which gives $41 60 per capita. The total value of real and personal property on the Pacific coast is estimated by the Gazette to be $340,000,000, of which $25,000,000 is about seven percent. The currency of the loyal States east of the mountains, notwithstanding its expansion to meet the exigencies of the nation, is below those ratios to population and property. The population of the loyal States and of the insurrectionary districts which are held by the Army (in June, 1864) is twenty-four million. If the currency was at the California standard—forty-one dollars per capita—its aggregate amount would be $984,000,000; and a proportion of seven per cent. upon the total valuation of property would give an equal aggregate."

This shows that the amount of specie circulation on the Pacific coast is greater per capita than is the paper circulation in the remainder of the loyal States. The effect on prices produced by an inflated specie currency in the Pacific States is the same as that produced by the expansion of a paper circulation in the Atlantic States. When we have too much money, of whatever kind, prices will advance. It is not the kind of circulation, but the quantity, of whatever kind, which produces the effect which it is our duty to remedy. I have in my possession a list of prices, showing the cost of almost every article which enters into the consumption of every family in the markets of San Francisco, and which illustrates the effect of an expansion of the specie currency better than I could do by any argument which I could present to the committee. The statement is as follows:

"I will give you a list of the prices of the leading articles in our family markets at the present time, to enable your readers to form an idea of the cost of living in San Francisco: Porter-house steaks, 20 cents; sirloin steaks, 15 cents; pork, 15 cents; flour, per barrel, $12; potatoes, 5 cents per pound; California butter, choice fresh, $1 per pound; in rolls, 75, 60, and 50 cents per pound, for Nos. 1 and 2; Oregon butter, 40 to 45 cents, as in quality; Isthusus butter, 40 to 50 cents for choice Orange county, New York, and 37½ to 45 cents for cooking butter. Lard, 25 cents per pound for city rendered, and 20 cents for old Eastern. Cheese, 30 cents per pound for all grades ordinary, and 35 cents for choice dairies. Sage, 50 cents per pound. Eggs, 80 cents per dozen for good. Honey, 40 cents per pound for old, and 50 cents for new comb and strained. Cranberries, 35 cents for Eastern, and 30 cents per quart for new crop Oregon. Oysters, 50 cents per can, or $5 per dozen for McMurray's. Hams, 20 cents; bacon, 20 cents; and dried beef, 20 cents per pound. Chickens, so poor that they could not be given away in Chicago, 75 cents to $1 each. Brent geese, (wild), 37½ cents each. Swans, $1 each. Canada geese, (wild), 75 cents each. Ducks, (wild), 25 to 37½ cents each. Quail, $2 25 to $3 50 per dozen. Turkeys, 25 to 30 cents per pound, live weight. Tame ducks, $1 25 each. Apples, $1 50 to $2 50 per box of 50 pounds; No. 1, 5 to 8 cents per pound; pears, cooking, $1 50 to $2 50 per box; pears, table, 4 to 10 cents per pound; dried plums, 10 to 25 cents per pound; dried peaches, 10 to 15 cents per pound; quinces, 6 to 9 cents per pound; California grapes 4 to 10 cents per pound; foreign do, 15 to 37½ cents per pound; figs, 6 to 15 cents per pound; strawberries, 40 to 75 cents per pound; codfish, 6 cents per pound; rockfish, 6 cents per pound; snicels, 6 cents per pound; tomcods, 18½ cents per pound; sturgeon, 3 cents per pound; sea bass, 5 cents per pound; flounders, 15 cents per pound; shrimps, 10 cents per pound; salmon, 10 cents per pound; halibut, 25 cents per pound; herrings, 5 cents per pound; perch, 6 cents per pound; whole sea bass, weighing 25 to 50 pounds each, $1 each.

"These prices, it must be borne in mind, are for coin, not paper money, and the price of the fish is only one half what it usually is, owing to a strike of the Italian fishermen, who have risen en masse recently against the regular markets, and have established one of their own, in which they sell as above, in order to drive their opponents out of business. Wood is $11 to $12 per cord, and coal in proportion."

Now, I find that those prices correspond with the prices we have in Washington, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, and other eastern cities, showing that the same effect is produced in California by the expansion of gold that is produced in the eastern States by the use of paper. The only remedy we can have is a reduction of the volume of the currency in order that it may be brought down to the standard required by the legitimate demand of the business of the country. This remedy we ought to apply without delay, and in the most effective way. Every interest demands this at our hands.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DONNELLY. I offer the following amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Hooper:]

Provided, That banks incorporated under State authority, with a less capital than $50,000, whose circulating notes are secured wholly by deposit of bonds of the United States, at their par value, to the amount of ten per cent. beyond the amount of their circulating notes, shall be taxed upon their circulation and deposits in the same manner, and at the same rates, as are or may be prescribed for the taxation of national banks.

The purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts is to compel a demand for the purchase of United States bonds. The banking law, however, fixes the limit of the amount of capital necessary for one of these banks at $100,000, with a proviso that banks with a capital of $50,000 may be established upon special permission being granted by the Secretary of the Treasury. That permission is, however, very difficult to obtain. I offer this amendment because in our western States, particularly in such States as Wisconsin and Minnesota, where banking associations are necessary for the convenience of the people and for the movement of our grain crops to the eastern markets, capital is necessarily scarce; and it is difficult to procure in our smaller towns a sufficient amount to establish a bank under the requirements of our national banking law. Our State banking system, however, requires a deposit of United States stocks or State stocks, with a margin of ten per cent. beyond the amount of circulation. Most of our banks are established upon United States stocks, and their capital does not usually exceed, for each bank, $25,000.

It is impossible in the condition of our country—and this remark applies equally to Wisconsin, Iowa, and other western States—to obtain in the smaller towns capital enough to comply with the national banking law. Therefore the failure of these banks to become national banks does not spring from any resistance to the national banking law, but from the circumstances of the case. It seems to me that if these banks are founded, as nearly all of them are in my State, upon United States stocks, they afford to that extent a market for these bonds, and they should not be discriminated against in our tax laws. In other words, their not entering under the national banking law is due to the difficulties which surround the circumstances of the case, and which pertain to all new communities, sparsely settled and with little capital; and I take it that if they comply as fully as they can by the purchase of United States stocks with the spirit of the national banking law, they should not be discriminated against in the matter of taxation. They do not strictly come within the intention of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which is to force out of existence banks founded upon State stocks, and to compel them to purchase the stocks of the United States and establish national banks.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to oppose the amendment. I think that might be a proper amendment, if offered to the national banking law, but not to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Now, sir, as I remarked when my time expired, I think it our duty to reduce, so far as we can, the volume of the currency now in the country, which has led to the enormous inflation of prices of all commodities. While we are imposing burdens upon our people by taxation, and sorely afflicting many of the industrial interests of the country, I think we should accompany such legislation with some provision which will tend to increase the value of the money we are using for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of the Government and the trade and commerce of the country in every department. I know of no other way than to prohibit the issue of notes for circulation by the local banks of the States. National banking associations are increasing every day, and in this way millions are being added to the circulation. This will go on until notes representing the entire $300,000,000 of national banking capital shall be put in circulation. We must, then, look to a destruction of the issues of the State banks as the only remedy we can apply at the present time.

Certainly there can be no question about our power to do this under the power conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce, and to do whatever is necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers delegated to the legislative department of the Government. From that power we derived the authority to establish a system of national banking; and having assumed jurisdiction with reference to the currency of the country, we have a right to prohibit the States from authorizing the issuance of bank notes, as a means necessary to preserve the value of the circulating medium authorized by Congress. I think the sooner we apply the remedy the better it will be for all concerned; and instead of postponing, as the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes, the operation of the tax until the 1st of January next, increase the rate, shorten the time, and prohibit new issues, as my substitute contemplates. The Government and the people need relief now, not next year.

In order to make the remedy more perfect than that proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I have somewhat modified his amendment, and added thereto the provision that after the 1st of April, 1865, those State banks shall issue no notes of their own or the notes of other State banks. That will drive home all the issues of State banks and relieve us to the extent of the amount of currency now in circulation and issued by the State banks. If this amendment should be adopted now, the provision of the section establishing the tax upon circulation would have but little to operate on, for the reason that all local and national banks being prohibited from paying out the currency of State banks, it will be driven home for redemption, and in a few months all this class of notes will have disappeared from circulation.

Mr. CLAY. I would ask the gentleman if his mode of relieving the currency is to kill one State bank in my town and start three national banks in its place?

Mr. WILSON. The question which the gentleman propounds only opens up a broader field, exhibiting the difficulties under which the nation is now laboring more fully than I have yet presented. Of course there may be banks created in the town in which the gentleman resides under the national banking system whether we prohibit the issue of notes for circulation by local banks or not. The only question is, whether, having determined to establish national banks, we will not do something to curtail the volume of the currency, instead of increasing the number of banks and thereby increasing the volume of the currency, without any check on the local State institutions.

I will suggest also that the bank to which the gentleman from Kentucky refers may change its organization and carry on its operations under the national banking law. This amendment offers them a choice between operating under the charter granted by the State and organizing under the national banking system. If they continue under the State charter, under the provisions of this amendment, they will be prohibited, after the 1st of April next, from issuing notes under and by virtue of the powers they derive from the State. My sole purpose is to reduce the volume of the currency of the country, thereby adding to the value of that which is left; not to make war upon any bank or any banking system, but simply to apply a remedy which shall reduce the volume which is now disastrously affecting every interest in the whole country. While I am voting taxes on the people I want to make the money worth something more than it is, so as to prevent as far as practicable an unnecessary accumulation of the national debt.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOPER. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Wilson.] I concur entirely in the views of the gentleman, but I think his measure is too sharp upon the banks; that more time should be given to them to draw in their circulation before this law takes effect upon them. If the gentleman would change the dates in his amendment, so as to make them the same as those in mine, I should be better satisfied with it, although I think that both the times and the rates in the original amendment are quite sufficient to answer the purpose that he has in view as well as myself.

Mr. STEVENS. Is an amendment to the text still in order?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the substitute is still in order.

Mr. STEVENS. Not to the text?

The CHAIRMAN. Not to the text. There is an amendment to the amendment already pending.

Mr. STEVENS. I supposed that an amendment to the text would be in order, as the pending amendment is to strike out the whole text.

The CHAIRMAN. Not at the present stage.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, as it is nearly half past four o'clock, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the tax bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I intend to offer at the end of this bill some additional sections to regulate the course of the planets. [Laughter.] I ask that my amendments may be printed.

It was so ordered.

EVENING SESSION DISPENSED WITH.

Mr. MALLORY moved that the evening session be dispensed with for to-day.

Mr. ASHLEY demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARFIELD and MALLORY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 40.

Mr. MORRILL demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COX. Can we conclude the call of the roll before the time for taking the recess arrives?

The SPEAKER. The usage always is that if a roll-call is commenced it has to be completed. If the vote results in dispensing with the evening session, then the House will be ready to adjourn forthwith; if it should not be dispensed with, the House would immediately, on the completion of the call, take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. KASSON. Will it be in order to state to the House that to-morrow our session will necessarily be interrupted? [Cries of "I object!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 70, nays 56, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eckley, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finkel, Frank, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Mallory, McKimney, Middleton, William H. Miller, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Smithers, Spalding, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Townsend, Tracy, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Williams, and Winfield—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, Cole, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Garfield, Gooch, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Shannon, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Worthington—56.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Arnold, Blaine, Blair, Bliss, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Coffroth, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dumont, Eden, English, Grinnell, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Jencks, William Johnson, Francis W. Kellogg, Keruan, King, Knapp, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, Morrison, Noble, Norton, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Scofield, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stuart, Thomas, Voorhes, Elihu B. Washburne, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—58.

So the evening session was dispensed with.

CORRECTION OF ERROR.

Mr. BEAMAN, by unanimous consent, offered a resolution directing the Clerk to request the Senate to return to this House the joint resolution (S. No. 42) in order to correct an error in the engrossment of an amendment thereto; which was read, considered, and agreed to.

TERRITORY OF WYOMING.

Mr. ASHLEY, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Territories a bill to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

BRIDGE OVER THE OHIO.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill No. 413, to establish a bridge across the Ohio river at Cincinnati, Ohio, a post road, was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The question was taken, and the vote was reconsidered.

The question recurring on referring the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, Mr. HOLMAN said: I hope the bill will not be referred, but that the House will pass it now. The motion to refer was not agreed to.

The bill was then read the third time.

Mr. ALLEY. I desire to say that the subject has been under consideration in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and that the passage of the bill is recommended.

Mr. HOLMAN moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under its operation the bill was passed.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MORRILL. As the House will be able to sit but a short time to-morrow, in consequence of an obituary announcement, I ask, at the request of several gentlemen, that, by unanimous consent, we meet to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. COX. I object.

TRANSFER OF DISABLED SURGEONS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for the transfer of regimental surgeons, who have been disabled while in the line of their duty, to duty as post and hospital surgeons; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the legislative appropriation bill, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

WAR-VESSELS ON THE LAKES.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to purchase or construct one or more vessels of war on the northern and northwestern lakes.

Objection being made, the resolution was not received.

BUREAU OF LIFE INSURANCE.

Mr. ALLEY. I move that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of C. B. Smith and others, for the establishment of a Bureau of Life Insurance, and that said petition be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I move that the petition be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE AT LOUISVILLE.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask that, by unanimous consent, the House take from the Speaker's table and consider Senate bill No. 392, an act supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads."

There being no objection, the bill was read a first and second time. It authorizes the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and the Jeffersonville Railroad Company, stockholders in the Louisville Bridge Company, to construct a bridge over the Ohio river at the head falls of the Ohio, and specifies the conditions and restrictions under which the work shall be executed. It also provides that the bridge when erected shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MALLORY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. ELDRIDGE, the House (at a quarter before five o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 15, 1865.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR HICKS.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, it is my painful duty to announce to the Senate the death of my late colleague and friend, THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS. The sad event occurred at his lodgings in this city on Monday morning, the 13th instant, at seven o'clock. A few days of indisposition, so apparently slight as to give his friends no uneasiness, was, without any seeming premonition, followed on the Friday before his death by a sudden attack of paralysis, so severe that its fatal result was at once seen to be inevitable and near at hand. It rendered him speechless, but did not so affect his mind but that he recognized the friends around him, and by whom, to the last, he was carefully and affectionately attended, until within a few hours of his decease. Governor HICKS (a title by which he is best known and will be ever gratefully remembered, not only by Maryland but by the nation) was born in Dorchester county, Maryland, on the 2d of September, 1798. His parents were highly respectable, but with a large family and limited means they were unable to give their son a collegiate education. What he was taught was merely rudimental, and this was acquired in one of the common schools of the county.

His father being a farmer, Governor HICKS assisted him in that occupation until his minority terminated, when he commenced a career of his own. With manners and disposition that were native to him, and well calculated to win esteem and confidence, he was at an early age made a constable of his county, an office humble but trustworthy, and discharged its duties so satisfactorily that in 1824, at the early age of twenty-six, he was elected its sheriff, an office of high grade and of much importance and responsibility. This office also he conducted with an intelligence and integrity that commanded general approval, and gave him even a stronger hold on the popular judgment. Its term expired, he engaged in mercantile business in Vienna, a village in his county, and in this position his diligence and integrity were again exhibited. In 1836 he was elected a member of the electoral college which at that period appointed the Senators of the State, and in the proceedings which ensued, and which for a time filled our citizens with solicitude, and attracted the attention of the whole country, he conducted himself with his accustomed discretion and firmness, and evinced his inherent love of law and order. He was at one time one of the Governor's Council, a station of the greatest trust and honor, and for several years was elected by the people of Dorchester a member of the House of Delegates of the State; and on each occasion so discharged his duties as to retain their confidence. In 1838 he was appointed by the Governor register of wills of the county, and when the office was made elective by the people he was twice elected to it, and would have been a third time if he had not declined it. In this official and important trust he again displayed business capacity and perfect integrity. In 1849 and 1850, by the choice of his uniformly confiding constituents, he was elected to the constitutional convention of the State, and discharged its duties faithfully and with ability. He was afterward chosen by popular vote Governor of the State, and held that station when the present rebellion commenced and until 1862.

It is his official conduct in that office that has made his name so well and favorably known to every loyal man in the Union.

During this period his responsibility was such as to task his firmness and his judgment, and to test his patriotism. They proved equal to the emergency. With a people whose feelings, from their locality and sameness of habits and institutions, were so well calculated to cause them to sympathize with our southern brethren, and who were sensitively alive to any interference with that particular institution they had known and possessed from the colonization of the States, and in which their pecuniary means were largely invested, with business and social relations closely binding them to the South, it was not surprising that they should for a time forget the paramount duty which they owed to the General Government, or be blind to the consequences that were sure to follow an attempt to dissolve the Union which that Government created, and was wisely designed, and endowed with powers amply adequate, if properly exerted, to preserve forever.

In this interval of temporary forgetfulness an excitement amounting to madness threatened the State with a fraternal war, and with driving her into the rebellion, that would have made her soil the battle-ground of the strife which has deluged every seceding State in blood, and would certainly have involved her in ruin. Against every effort that ignorance or ambition could essay to effect the insane and wicked purpose, Governor

Hicks interposed the whole power of his office, and succeeded in defeating it. Nor was this accomplished without personal peril. In April, 1861, when the blood of the loyal soldiers of Massachusetts was treasonably shed in the streets of our chief city, and its power for some days was wielded by men who, for the most part, were resolved on rushing the State into rebellion, it was obvious to those who witnessed the scenes of the day, and moved among the parties who engaged in them, that Governor Hicks was an object of such intense animosity that his safety was not assured. This is not the occasion to dwell on these events. It is consoling to her loyal sons, to whom the good name of the State and city is so dear, that they terminated without effecting their design; and gladly would they have them forever forgotten. In these trying moments the Governor was true to his duty. Throughout his term of office he devoted himself with untiring industry and an ever-watchful patriotism, by every legal means, to crush out the spirit of secession and to retain the State in her allegiance to the Union; and he succeeded. When he ceased to be her Governor she was loyal in all the departments of her government, and the people, by a voice approaching unanimity, proclaimed their fixed resolve to stand by the Union, not only as a matter of almost holy duty, but as indispensable to their safety and prosperity; and so she and they have been ever since. It is not going too far to declare that this result is in a great measure to be referred to the conduct of Governor Hicks. Had he listened to those who counseled a different policy; had he lent the power of his office to accomplish their object; had he even failed to devote it entirely to their frustration, Maryland might this day have been a desert, and her name dishonored in the estimation of all good and wise men. To lose such a citizen at any time would be cause of general sorrow; to lose him now, before the rebellion is terminated, is to be the more lamented, even on his own account. Who can fail to regret that a public servant so faithful, so patriotic, and so efficient in his efforts to maintain the authority of the Union in his own State, had not been permitted to survive until that authority had been securely extended over every other State?

Such was his own prayer. In an address to the people of the State, of the 7th of January, 1861, he said:

"In the course of nature I cannot have long to live, and I fervently trust to be allowed to end my days a citizen of this glorious Union. But should I be compelled to witness the downfall of that Government inherited from our fathers, established as it were by the special favor of God, I will at least have the consolation at my dying hour that I neither by word or deed assisted in hastening its disruption."

His prayer was not granted; but his last days of intelligence on earth were cheered by the sanguine hope that the time was fast approaching when we should all be again citizens of that glorious Union; and if he apprehended that that hope might be defeated and the Union destroyed, he certainly had the consolation, so faithfully secured to himself, that no word or deed of his could have assisted or hastened the catastrophe. To this body it is unnecessary to say anything of his official conduct as one of its members. Ever courteous, kind, and attentive, he possessed the esteem and confidence of us all. Endowed with a sound judgment and animated by a fervent patriotism, he supported every measure that promised, in his opinion, to benefit the country in its existing emergency. In private life, too, he was always highly appreciated; and by those who knew him intimately, loved as a brother. By the society of his country his loss especially will be long and keenly felt, and to his immediate family be irreparable. Their consolation will be in knowing that he leaves behind him an unstained name that will ever live and be honored, and that his last thoughts were devoted to that religious faith on which he relied with humble but Christian confidence for future happiness.

I move the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of Hon. THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS, deceased, a Senator from the State of Maryland, will go into mourning for the residue of the present session by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved unanimously, That the members of the Senate will attend the funeral of the deceased from the Senate Chamber at two o'clock p. m. to-day, and that the committee of arrangements superintend the same.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives, with the request that that House unite in the ceremonies of this occasion.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, one of the effects of that civil strife which now afflicts and rends our unhappy country is found in the indifference to human suffering, and to death itself, consequent upon the frequency and rapidity with which our daily narrative of blood presents to our view scenes of carnage and slaughter such as the history of the world has not hitherto disclosed.

As the panorama moves on, we are only relieved from the contemplation of the mangled limbs and mutilated bodies of the dead and the dying by the appalling spectacle of our more unfortunate brethren languishing and dying in the hopeless and helpless condition of prisoners of war, where manhood is worn out, hope crushed, and life destroyed by the cruel and heartless privation of the necessary provision of that scanty supply of food and clothing by which human life can be sustained.

It is a most melancholy and humiliating fact that pictures such as these, sketched from no creation of the imagination, but drawn in the crimson hues of the best blood of our bravest and best, and proclaimed to us on every breeze from the South in the agonizing cry of our languishing brethren, reëchoed by the wail of the widow and the orphan in our midst, have failed to move our hearts as but a little while since they would have been, even had they been representations of what was occurring among strangers of another country, and we look upon them almost as the natural and necessary consequences of the war we are waging for our national life.

To-day we are called upon to witness another phase of human experience by which it would seem that divine Providence would try upon us the experiment of a more quiet, and, if it may be so expressed, a more unobtrusive exhibition of the frailty of life and the certainty of death than in the havoc and destruction of battle. Death has now come, not clothed in the pomp and circumstance of war, numbering his victims by hundreds and thousands; but in the peace, the quiet and serenity of a sick chamber, an old man, full of years and of honors, has gone to his reward.

But, although his years were not few, still they were not so many that friendship might not have reasonably hoped that they might have been extended yet longer, and he been permitted to have witnessed in the future history of his country which he had loved and served so well the fruits of his labors and sacrifices.

When the history of our great struggle shall be written, when the story of the toils, the sufferings, the sacrifices, and the efforts by which our political salvation was attained shall be told, and impartial posterity shall inscribe on immortal tablets the illustrious names of those by whose clear sagacity, unshaken firmness, and patriotic devotion to duty in a great crisis of our country's history, her integrity was preserved and her ultimate triumph secured, second to none on that proud roll of fame shall stand the name of THOMAS HICKS, late Governor of Maryland.

The political and especially the geographical position of his State was such as to give preëminent consequence at that very critical period of our history to the course which she might take. The intense interest which was excited all over the country in regard to the position of affairs in Maryland cannot have escaped the recollection of those who hear me. The extremely doubtful character of her Legislature, to say the least, and the position to which her people might be driven by popular appeals of disloyal men to her prejudices and her supposed interests, filled the hearts of patriots throughout the land with the most painful solicitude. Whatever may be thought now, it is not too much to say that at that time it was felt and feared that upon the decision which she might make between loyalty and treason, in no small degree depended the safety and salvation of the Republic. In saying this, I entirely disclaim any impeachment of the loyalty and integrity of the great masses of the people of Maryland. I have no doubt they are true and loyal now, and that they were so then; neither have I the slightest doubt that that was equally true then of the great body of the people in numbers of those States that are now, and for nearly four years have been, in open rebellion against the Government of the country; but by the bold and decisive action of bad men, forgetting the claims of country, the obligations of loyalty, and the duty of patriotism, they were driven in an evil hour into the vortex of treason, the crime of rebellion, and the horrors of civil war.

From such a state of things it was the good fortune of the people of Maryland to be saved in no small degree by the peculiar sagacity and devoted patriotism of her most excellent Governor whose death we are now called upon to deplore. It was most providential and fortunate, both for the State and the Union, that Maryland at that time had a Governor fully equal to the emergencies of the hour. He saw and comprehended the danger from a distance, and although we may not all of us approve the wisdom of every step which he took and every measure which he recommended, yet no one, it is believed, will now doubt the unsullied integrity of his conduct, the purity of his motives, or the entire devotion of his patriotism.

Like the prophet standing on Mount Carmel, he saw the cloud yet a great way off, while it was no bigger than a man's hand, and did not wait till its portentous blackness had shrouded the whole heavens in its gloom. Of him, and in reference to his conduct in that hour, it may with emphasis be said that "Peace hath her victories

No less renowned than war."

Such in brief was the course of our friend in that interesting and momentous period of our country. His must be an overweening ambition that will not be satisfied with such a record.

Of the early history of Governor Hicks, of the discipline and experience which formed the character so admirably and exactly fitted for the extraordinary part which Providence assigned him to perform in the great drama of his country, I have no knowledge. My personal acquaintance with him commenced about the time of the beginning of those troubles which have culminated in the present civil war; and I hope I may be permitted, without the imputation of unwarrantable egotism, to add that that acquaintance originated in a request communicated to me by his direction on the occasion of a visit on his part to this city, that I would call and consult and confer with him on the engrossing questions of the day. That acquaintance thus commenced continued without interruption to the day of his death.

When he was elected to this body, by the action of the Senate he was assigned to a place on the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which I was then chairman.

Our intercourse from that circumstance became more intimate and familiar, and I will add that, in the course of a life now numbering many years, I have never met a more kind, genial, and courteous gentleman.

No man more sincerely sympathized with that awakened philanthropy which seeks in overthrowing the rebellion also to destroy its cause, than he. But he entertained such a deep faith in the humanity and Christianity of his own people that he preferred to have the work done by them, unawed and uninfluenced by any outside interference. Still, I speak from perfect knowledge derived from frequent interviews and conversations with him, when I say that the abolition of African slavery had no more sincere supporter.

Such was our friend. As death approached, no retrospect of misspent time, of neglected opportunities for good, cast fearful shadows on the future, but with a consciousness that he had been permitted in the good providence of God to do something, yea much, for a great and good cause, to have his name written among the benefactors of his country, and by his influence to add strength to the cause of the weak, the oppressed, and the humble, at peace with the world, and, as we humbly and trustfully hope, with his God, he has gone to his rest.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, I had no personal acquaintance with Governor Hicks until he took his seat as a member of this body. But I had learned to honor and respect him before I knew him. During the session of the Virginia convention which passed the unfortunate ordinance which assumed to renounce the allegiance due from that State to the national Government, the noble position maintained by Governor Hicks as the Chief Magistrate of Maryland won the confidence and admiration of the loyal people of Virginia. Especially did we of West Virginia feel grateful to him; for, if Maryland had seceded, it would, we well knew, have greatly increased our perils and embarrassed our efforts to preserve our integrity.

I shall not, Mr. President, attempt to review the connection of Governor Hicks with the events of that dark day in our country's history. The distinguished colleague of the deceased has appropriately and eloquently done so. Suffice it for me to say that the page on which those events shall be recorded will be illustrious in the history of Maryland, and will entitle the name of Governor Hicks to be honored and revered as long as that State or the nation endures.

It has been my privilege to occupy a seat by the side of Governor Hicks ever since he entered this Hall. I had, therefore, an opportunity not only to witness his course in relation to public affairs, but also to observe more closely the spirit and principles, the heart and motive (so to speak) which seemed to prompt and control his conduct. And I declare to you, sir, that I never knew a man whose simplicity and singleness of purpose—whose evident sincerity, purity, and unselfishness of aim to promote the honor and welfare of his country, commanded more of my confidence and respect. I know not if he ever aspired to win the personal distinction and renown which men of great intellectual parts sometimes seem to seek with an ardor hardly secondary to the promotion of the national welfare; but to me he ever appeared to forget himself in the higher and holier purpose of securing the public good.

When he resumed his seat here in the earlier part of this session, the ravages of disease upon him were painfully apparent; and in conversation with him on different occasions, he more than intimated to me his presentiment that death was at his door. And, sir, you will allow me to express my gratification that in his zeal for his country he did not forget his obligations to his Creator. And here, I think, we shall find the explanation of his singular conscientiousness in the discharge of his duty. He feared God; and therefore he was true to his country. Therefore it was that the hand so affectingly raised by him in the dying hour, in token of the favor and friendship of Heaven, refused, while strong with vigor of health and manhood, to strike at the life of the nation when surrounded by both friends and foes, vehemently urging him to perpetrate the deed.

Mr. President, I am a believer in the assertion that pure and practical Christianity is a political necessity under our form of Government. I believe that it is essential to the perpetuity of our free institutions. Christian morality is the only sure basis of our civil liberties; and I trust I may be pardoned for saying that the Christian statesman is the only safe guardian of the people's rights. Had the spirit and power of the gospel controlled the conduct of the eminent and highly accomplished men who occupied the seats immediately surrounding me in 1861, I feel assured that the horrors of the present civil war would never have cursed the land.

I therefore think it is the highest tribute which could be paid to the memory of the deceased to say, here in this high place of the nation, that he was a conscientious, Christian statesman.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

At two o'clock the corpse, attended by the committee of arrangements, pall-bearers, mourners, and escort of Knights Templar, was removed from the late residence of the deceased, the Metropolitan Hotel, and placed in the area in the center of the Senate Chamber, where seats were provided for the remaining Senator and Representatives from Maryland. The judges and officers of the Supreme Court of the United States, the President of the United States, and heads of the various Departments, the members of the House of Representatives, preceded by their Speaker and officers, the Governor and aids, Lieutenant Governor, Senate and House of Delegates and Court of Appeals of Maryland, and the Mayor and City Councils of the city of Baltimore, entered the Senate Chamber at intervals, and were conducted to the seats assigned to them.

On the entrance of the corpse into the Senate

Chamber, Rev. Dr. McMurdy, Chaplain of the Order of Knights Templar, read the ritual for the dead of that Order, the responses being made by the Knights, who were in full regalia. Prayer was then offered up by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate. Rev. B. H. Nadal delivered a discourse from the text, 2 Samuel, third chapter, thirty-eighth verse: "And the king said unto his servants, know ye not that there is a prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?" Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., closed the ceremonies by an impressive prayer, and after a dirge from the band of the Knights Templar the funeral procession left the Senate Chamber to convey the body to the place of interment in the following order:

The Chaplains of Congress for the occasion.
The Physicians who attended the deceased.

Committee of Arrangements.

Mr. FOOT, Mr. BUCKALEW,
Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. MORGAN,
Mr. WILLEY, Mr. WADE.

MINOR CHILDREN OF DECEASED SOLDIERS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

LAND-GRANT RAILROADS IN MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the bill (H. R. No. 710) to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads, to which land grants have been made, in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin. Yesterday, when the Clerk was about to read the engrossed bill, the morning hour expired. The bill will be read.

The Clerk then read the engrossed bill.

Mr. ALLISON demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the previous question will not be called upon a bill which appropriates over two million acres of the public land.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that at least opportunity will be afforded to us to move an amendment. I am willing to grant the extension of time for the completion of the roads, but I want to strike out that part of the bill which makes a grant of additional lands. We ought to do that or repeal the homestead law.

The SPEAKER. The bill has passed beyond the point when it can be amended.

Mr. HOLMAN. It can be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ALLISON. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 44; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. ALLISON and DAWSON.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 49.

The SPEAKER voted in the affirmative.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 54, nays 60, not voting 68; as follows:

DEATH OF SENATOR HICKS.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, in reference to the death of THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS, a Senator from the State of Maryland.

The message was read, as follows:

Resolved unanimously, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of Hon. THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS, deceased, a Senator from the State of Maryland, will go into mourning for the residue of the present session, by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved unanimously, That the members of the Senate will attend the funeral of the deceased from the Senate Chamber at two o'clock p. m. to-day, and that the committee of arrangements superintend the same.

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate these proceedings to the House of Representatives, with the request that that House unite in the ceremonies of this occasion.

Mr. WEBSTER. I desire to say, preceding my remarks on this sad occasion, that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is detained from the House by indisposition; otherwise he would take part in these proceedings.

Mr. Speaker, it becomes my painful duty to announce to the House of Representatives the death of Hon. THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS, a Senator in Congress from the State of Maryland. He died at the Metropolitan Hotel, in this city, on Monday last, February 13, 1865.

In the winter of 1864 Mr. Hicks received a severe injury to his left ankle, which, a few weeks later, compelled the amputation of his foot above the ankle joint. From the effects of this loss he never entirely recovered, and though he continued to attend to the laborious duties of his position, yet his friends perceived that much of his former physical vigor was gone, and that he was greatly overtaxing his strength. About two weeks before his death he ceased to occupy his seat in the Senate Chamber, and a skillful physician was called to see him. His friends still believed that rest and quiet would restore to a considerable degree his strength, and fondly hoped that his life might be spared for many years to come. But on Friday morning last he was entirely prostrated by an attack of paralysis, and though he maintained his consciousness until within a few hours of his death, yet all hope of his recovery was then abandoned. From this time he sank gradually until the hour of his dissolution, when calmly, without a struggle or a groan, his spirit passed from earth.

It will be consoling to his afflicted children who were unable to reach this city before his death, as well as his numberless friends, to know that loving hearts and skillful hands assiduously ministered to all his wants, and strove, as far as human agency could, to alleviate all his sufferings. Nor were the consolations of our holy religion wanting. An eminent divine and his personal friend (Rev. Dr. Nadal) piously attended at his bedside and pointed his thoughts to "the world that is to come." To him my dying and lamented friend, even after the power of speech was gone, by hand upraised to heaven, and face glowing with celestial light, unmistakably declared his faith in a crucified Redeemer, and his implicit trust in His promises and atonement.

Governor Hicks was born in Dorchester county, Maryland, September 2, 1798. His father was a respectable farmer, with limited means and a large family, able to give his son little advantages of education. As a boy, he attended the common country schools of the neighborhood, then even more indifferent than now. As a youth, he assisted his father in the cultivation of the farm; and when manhood came, he went forth from the paternal roof to struggle unaided against the rude buffetings of the world, and by the fierce contests he thus waged with the pride and prejudices and position of those around him, to fit himself for that fiercer contest which he was long after to wage with the passions and prejudices of the enemies of his country. Shortly after arriving at his majority he was appointed a constable, and so diligently, so faithfully, and with such uprightness did he discharge the duties of this humble office, that in 1824, then in the twenty-sixth year of his age, he was elected sheriff of his native county, a position of importance and respectability, which he filled much to his own credit and to the entire satisfaction of the community.

After this he was several times elected to the Legislature of his State, and in 1836 was chosen a member of the senatorial electoral college of Maryland. He took a prominent part in the efforts to organize that body, which attracted so much attention throughout the country. Shortly afterward he was selected as one of the members of Governor Vezey's Council, and in 1838 was appointed by that gentleman the register of wills for Dorchester county. This office, under the testamentary system of Maryland one of great importance, he occupied for nearly twenty years, being reappointed by Governor Pratt in 1844, and elected by the people in 1850. Never did a faithful officer more ably discharge the responsible duties of this position. The widow and the orphan always found in him a friend, who spared no labor to protect their interests and defend them from injustice and wrong. He soon became perfectly familiar with the testamentary laws of the State, and so completely did the people of his county rely upon the wisdom of his official decisions, and the purity and fairness of his friendly counsels, that it was rare indeed that litigation grew out of his settlement of the estates of deceased persons. In 1850 he took part in the constitutional convention of Maryland, which framed the constitution of that date, and was known as a laborious and influential member of that body.

His reputation had now extended over his entire State, and in 1857 he was elected Governor of Maryland, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of this high office in January, 1858. For four years he occupied the gubernatorial chair. A few months after the conclusion of his term, in December, 1862, by the death of the late lamented James A. Pearce, a vacancy occurred from the State of Maryland in the Senate of the United States. To this, Governor Bradford, representing the wishes of the Union people of the State, appointed Governor Hicks, and a year later, on the assembling of the Legislature, he was elected to fill the balance of the unexpired term ending March 4, 1867.

This, in brief, is the history of my late lamented colleague. There is one portion of his life, however, that deserves, ay demands, at my hands more extended notice. It was during his term as Governor of Maryland that the present wicked rebellion was inaugurated; and well was it for Maryland and her people, well was it for the capital of the nation, and the national honor, if not life, that THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS was then the Governor of Maryland. Sir, as I sat in grief by his dying bedside, and saw "the strong man bowed," palsied with disease and helpless as an infant, in my inmost soul I thanked God that that divine visitation had not come while his hand yet held the helm of my native and beloved State. What scenes of anarchy, of confusion, of bloodshed, and desolation to her fair fields would have followed my heart sickens to contemplate. But his natural vigor was not then abated. The lessons of self-reliance which he had learned in his early and maturer manhood, that decision of character and firmness of purpose which had become a part of his nature, and above all his instinctive and unquenchable love of country—that country under whose benign institutions he had risen, and all others might rise, from the humblest walks of life—had fitted and prepared him to resist all efforts, coming from what quarter soever, which looked to a disruption of the Union and placing Maryland by the side of her rebellious sisters. Any one who will recall the history of the four months which immediately preceded Mr. Lincoln's inauguration in 1861 will remember how repeated and persistent these efforts were.

The plan of the original conspirators, as has since become apparent, was to unite, if possible, all the slaveholding States in one common movement, seize the capital and the public archives before the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln, overthrow the Government, establish a southern confederacy, and then admit such of the non-slaveholding States as might be willing to introduce the institutions of the South among them.

It was essentially necessary to secure the coöperation of Maryland to succeed in these infamous purposes. The capital stood upon the ancient soil of that State, and according to the peculiar views of these conspirators, Maryland had the right not only to sever her connection with the Union, but also to reclaim her grant of the District of Columbia. This would have given them color of authority in holding on to the capital, establishing here the seat of their government, and demanding recognition from foreign Powers. It was also of the first importance to these conspirators that their friends in Maryland should be organized and armed, ready for the emergency, that when the time for action came they might swoop down upon the capital before assistance could be obtained from the northern States. All this could only be done through the Legislature of that State. Fortunately the sessions of the Legislature were biennial. It had been in session the winter before, and would not again assemble until January, 1862.

The great majority of this Legislature was known to be in sympathy with the southern leaders. At its session in 1860 it had passed the most obnoxious law on the subject of slavery ever placed on the statute-books of Maryland. Contrary to the wishes of a great majority of the people, contrary to their practices from time immemorial, and contrary to their conscientious convictions of right, they enacted that thereafter no slaves should ever be emancipated by their owners in that State. More than this. Taking advantage of the excitement produced by John Brown's invasion of Virginia, they had appropriated $70,000 for the purchase of arms, and provided for their distribution throughout the State. I repeat, a great majority of this Legislature was known to be in favor of Maryland taking her position with the other slaveholding States.

In Maryland the Governor has no power of veto, so that when assembled the Legislature is entirely beyond his control; but he alone had the authority to assemble it in special session. It was then of the highest importance to the conspirators that he should exercise this authority. Soon after Mr. Lincoln's election in 1860, the public efforts to induce him to take this step began to be made. Some of the most prominent men in that part of the State in which Annapolis, the capital of the State, is situated, assembled in that city and requested that this should be done. Governor Hicks emphatically declined. Public meetings were then called in those portions of the State where the slaveholding interest predominated, demanding the assembling of the Legislature. Governor Hicks refused to notice their demands. Shortly afterward the President of the Senate of Maryland and the Speaker of the House of Delegates, for themselves and in the name of their respective bodies, addressed him, urging that they should be convened. Governor Hicks stood like adamant, declaring that he saw no good reason for such action, and that Maryland was, and would be forever, for the Union. While thus beset at home he was also approached from beyond the limits of the State. After the Congress assembled here in December, 1860, the leading southern men who had seats in these Halls used all their efforts to inflame the minds of the people of Maryland to compel the Governor to assemble the Legislature. Commissioners were sent to him directly from the States of Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina, all urging that Maryland should move in the same column with them; but to no purpose. The polar star to Governor Hicks was his country, the union of these States. The waves of sectional strife rose higher and higher. State after State fell away from its allegiance. He stood firm. The day of the inauguration came. President Lincoln assumed the robes of office, and entered upon the discharge of the high duties of the Chief Magistrate of the United States. From many hearts in the loyal States, as well as from the loyal people of his own State, earnestly watching his course, and full of apprehensions, there rose up the prayer, "God bless Governor Hicks." The capital was still in the hands of the friends of the Union. The noble ship which soon was to drive into the storm and tempest of civil war, which have not and shall not destroy her, then, indeed, had made her most narrow escape from destruction on the hidden rocks of treachery and of treason. Sir, I doubt not that the impartial historian who shall hereafter write the story of the perils of the Republic will declare that the most critical period in its history was that which immediately preceded the inauguration of President Lincoln; that THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS, by the blessing of God at that time the Governor of Maryland, did more than any other man to save it from destruction.

I am aware, sir, that a few weeks later, when an infuriated mob, excited by rebel emissaries, and armed, took possession of the city of Baltimore, murdering the soldiers of the United States passing through to the capital, and raising a great commotion throughout the State, that Governor Hicks, having gone to that city to secure the peaceful passage through it of these troops, found himself in the power of this mob, and seemed to yield for a time in part to their demands. But never, even then, for a moment did he give up his devotion to his country, or counsel resistance to its laws. True, for a few days he besought the President not to pass troops through the State. This was done alone through apprehension that the scenes of that bloody day just passed would be again reenacted while he was powerless to prevent it, and that his beloved State and city would be laid waste with fire and sword, destroying the innocent with the guilty. I confess he was in error. I may safely say that subsequent events convinced him that he was in error; but it was an error of judgment only; and who is infallible? Never for the briefest space of time did he desire to aid the cause of the rebels, or intend to do ought to injure his country, or resist its laws. It is true, too, that he then convened the Legislature of Maryland; but this was done only after a revolutionary call for it to assemble in the city of Baltimore, similar to that which put the State of Texas into the attitude of rebellion, had been issued by one of the most influential members of the State Legislature, Coleman Yellott, now in the rebel confederacy. Governor Hicks, to prevent this revolutionary session which would have taken place in Baltimore, then in the hands of the secessionists, convened the Legislature at Frederick city, in the midst of a loyal population thoroughly roused, and with a local organized military force of nearly four hundred muskets. I have always thought that the assembling of the Legislature at that time and under those circumstances was a wise exercise of executive authority. It at once produced quiet in Maryland. It gave time for many who had been swept away by the first fierce gust of passion to indulge in "the sober second thought," and to return to their allegiance. The Legislature, too, was powerless for mischief. They dared not, even if they had desired, while the loyal citizens of western Maryland thronged in their halls, and scowled defiance in their faces, put the State of Maryland into an attitude of hostility to the General Government. As my venerable colleague who sits behind me [Governor THOMAS] once said in this House, they would have been hurled from their windows upon the glistening bayonets below; and well they knew it.

Within ten days after the massacre of the troops in Baltimore Governor Hicks was in cordial and earnest cooperation with the national authorities in this city, and a few days later issued his proclamation calling for four Maryland regiments to march to its defense.

Mr. Speaker, however much others may have doubted or may now doubt the loyalty of Governor Hicks because of this one error during that terrible week, the Union-loving people of Maryland, who knew him well, never for one moment lost confidence in his patriotism. No man, since the days of the Revolution, has lived in Maryland who has had so entirely the confidence and affection of the patriotic people of that State as Governor Hicks. They have loved him with a pure and an ardent affection. They have trusted him without an apprehension or a doubt. He was their pilot in the hour of deepest gloom and most threatening danger. They gathered around him as the exponent of their principles and the worthy representative of their love of country; and when the sad news went out from this city that he was no more there were thousands of eyes in his native State, that had never seen him, dimmed with tears, and thousands of hearts filled with sorrow for his loss. And to-day the Governor and Legislature of his State, as well as the corporate authorities of its great metropolis, fully representing the people in their action, are here in the Capitol of the nation to pay the last tribute of respect to his memory, not as a matter of form, not to join in an empty pageant, but as exhibiting the love and reverence of the entire people of the State for his character and their sincere sorrow for his death. With them I desire to pay my humble tribute to his worth, and to drop a sorrowing tear on his grave.

A few words more in regard to the character of my colleague and I am done. Governor Hicks was entirely a self-made man. He toiled up the mountain-side unaided, and reached height after height through his own manly exertions; but never did he break the bond which bound him to the people on the plain. He was essentially a man of the people; of them and from them, his instincts, his sympathies, his affections, were all with them, and his exertions and labors in their behalf. The poorest and most friendless boy received from him as kindly a welcome as the men who held the most influential and important stations. The last note that I ever received from him, only a few days before his death, was written to ask my aid for a poor man, a sailor disabled in the service of his country, and in which he regretted that his health would not permit him personally to render him such assistance as he desired. Governor Hicks, from the character of his early pursuits, had no opportunity for cultivating a taste for books, and was consequently not a man of general reading or information; yet he possessed great natural sagacity, had a broad and well-balanced mind, and easily mastered any subject to which he turned his attention. He thoroughly understood the political history of the country. There was nothing narrow or illiberal in his character, and his catholic spirit showed itself in almost every action of his life. He was generous and sincere, quick to forgive, and never cherished resentments. Though his mind was not quick in its perceptions and conclusions, yet when he had reached such conclusion, he was as firm as a rock, fixed as the hills. No word of suspicion has ever been breathed against his integrity. He was an honest man,

"The noblest work of God."

That, however, which has most distinguished him and endeared him to the people of Maryland was his unselfish and unyielding patriotism. In him was illustrated that patriotism which burned so purely in the hearts of the men of '76. There was no personal sacrifice which he deemed too great to be made for his country. This was particularly illustrated in his course on the question of emancipation. Though holding a considerable number of slaves at the breaking out of the rebellion, and entering into the war with the impression that it ought to be so conducted as not to interfere with slavery, yet when he became convinced, as he afterward did, that the most vulnerable point in the rebellion was slavery, and that if we would crush the rebellion we must strike at and crush slavery, he did not hesitate to favor this policy both by the General Government and by his own State. A year ago he favored the constitutional amendment lately passed abolishing slavery throughout the United States, and was the earnest friend of immediate emancipation in Maryland, voting himself for the free constitution and urging others to unite with him in its support.

But he has gone, never to return. To-day the grave will close on his mortal remains. For the monument which shall rise above his remains, he has prepared his own epitaph. Addressing the people of Maryland by proclamation, in the midst of the dangers which encircled them in June, 1861, he said:

"In the course of nature I cannot have long to live, and I fervently trust to be allowed to end my days a citizen of this glorious Union. But should I be compelled to witness the downfall of that Government inherited from our fathers, established as it were by the special favor of God, I will at least have the consolation at my dying hour that I neither by word nor deed assisted in hastening its disruption."

Sir, let this sublime paragraph be engraved on his tomb. It shall live when the marble shall have crumbled and mingled with his dust. And let us, the living, learn lessons of patriotism from his proud example, for though dead he yet liveth.

I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS, a Senator in Congress from the State of Maryland.

Resolved, That as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, the members and officers of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this House, in relation to the death of Hon. THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS, be communicated to the family of the deceased by the Clerk.

Resolved, That this House will, as a body, repair to the Senate Chamber to attend the funeral of the deceased, and upon its return to the Hall that the Speaker declare the House adjourned.

Mr. CRESWELL. Mr. Speaker, duty imposes no unwilling task when it demands my humble tribute to the memory of the lamented deceased. The praises due to a long career of honor and usefulness are always freely lavished upon the grave. The stranger in seeking to give utterance only to his admiration for the public life and character of the dead, will be content with the employment of merely formal and conventional terms of respect. But the hand of affection in its anxious desire to keep fresh and green a cherished memory, would fain pluck from heaven a sprig of the immortal amaranth, and plant it upon the grave where the loved one sleeps, in the hope, fond though vain, that even the tomb may be thus clothed with the freshness and the bloom of eternal beauty.

My colleague, who has preceded me, has spoken of what Governor Hicks has accomplished for his State and country. It is eminently proper that the record of his public life should on this occasion be reviewed and commended. But mine is a more sacred office. I represent the county of his nativity, wherein he spent his long life, surrounded by the friends and associations of his youth. Among my constituents are those who were captivated by his generous heart long before the days of his political triumphs; those who regarded him, when living, with unselfish love, and who, now that death has stricken him down, will receive the sad tidings with tears of profound regret. It is my duty to attempt in some measure to soothe the grief and to mitigate the sorrow of his family and personal friends.

I have not known Governor Hicks as long as my friend who to-day has made the formal announcement of his decease. My personal acquaintance began late in the year 1861, but long before the day of his death, notwithstanding our disparity in years, his many generous qualities, combined with his fervent patriotism, had won my affection and sincere esteem. I am not ashamed to confess to the humblest of his friends that I, too, have wept over his unexpected and painful death.

We who knew him well, who freely mingled with him in social intercourse, who think we understood his nature and fairly appreciated his faults as well as his virtues, are unwilling that posterity, in making an estimate of the character of Governor Hicks, shall be confined to the dry details of the historian.

"History preserves only the fleshless bones
Of what we are, and by the mocking skull
The would-be wise pretend to guess the features!
Without the roundness and the glow of life
How hideous is the skeleton! Without
The colorings and humanities that clothe
Our errors, the anatomists of schools
Can make our memory hideous."

THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS was no scholar, no orator. Notwithstanding the many disadvantages under which he labored, it is safe to say that no man has exerted a greater influence on the politics of Maryland, or has accomplished more for the good of his State and fellow-citizens in his day and generation than he. He chose his party because of his approval of the principles which it proclaimed, and then gave it his entire and cordial support. A disciple of Henry Clay, he accepted the teachings of the Sage of Ashland as the axioms of his political creed. He was first a Democrat of the old school, then a Whig, then an American, and on the formation of the Union party he threw his whole soul into that movement and labored unceasingly to promote its success. To all the parties to which he was successively attached he rendered the most important services. He was always looked up to as a leader, and always did the work of a leader.

Yet he was not a brilliant man in any respect. His great distinguishing mental characteristic was his intuitive knowledge of human nature, and his great capacity for the management of men. His mind was eminently practical, and he dealt with men and things as they were. He sometimes entered into public discussions on the hustings, and frequently exhibited great tact and astuteness in debate. He proclaimed his sentiments everywhere, and never ceased to inculcate what he believed to be the truth. But the great arena of his triumphs was the social circle. Wheresoever known, he had so completely the confidence of men of every position in life, high as well as low, that his views were often quoted as having the weight of authority. The people of his own county seemed to hang with pleasure on his words and to delight in paying him honor.

His house at Appleby was open to all the world, and especially was it the refuge of the afflicted. He was the friend and counselor of all in trouble. His purse was open to every meritorious demand for assistance. Although free from all ostentation and for many years in receipt of a respectable income, his boundless charities and his disposition to aid others kept him continually in straitened circumstances. He was in truth the friend and benefactor of the poor, not only ministering to their wants, but ever lending them a willing sympathy.

"When that the poor have cried, Cæsar hath wept."

Even his political enemies acknowledged his manifold and unwearied kindnesses, and his excellent qualities as a man and a neighbor. So clear and pure was he in all the relations of private life that even malice was compelled to bear witness to his exalted worth.

THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS was Governor of his native State in the early stages of the rebellion. His management of State affairs during that period has been subjected to the severest scrutiny and to the most unfair criticism. It has been the habit to talk of him and his conduct as if he had nothing to do but to call his friends around him and summon the military of the State to the defense of the national capital. Alas! in that hour of sore trial his friends were beyond the sound of his voice, and the military were in arms against their country. Those who clustered about him to proffer advice were his life-long enemies. The host which gathered at his hotel was a hooting mob, yelling like demons and threatening to hang him to the nearest lamp-post. Blood had already been shed; treason was rife; civil war was flagrant. The dead of a sister State, foully slain by traitors in the streets of Baltimore, had been counted as the first mangled and blood-stained victims of rebellion. Secession was fully armed. Much of the machinery of government was in the hands of rebels. Everything was uncertain. Men in high places were no longer to be trusted. The Union sentiment was utterly without organization and was taken totally by surprise. The Governor stood alone among his foes. Then the tempters said to him, "Let us avoid bloodshed among Marylanders, let us prevent war in our streets, let us have peace among ourselves." He cared not for himself, and they knew it; but they appealed to his love for his people, and exhorted him to quiet the excitement and prevent further strife and massacre. It was a time of great doubt and peril, such as comes but once in centuries. He postponed the demands of the national Government until the loyal sentiment of the people should gain confidence and find its voice. Of all those who censure him, who would have done better? Our sturdy old Governor never for a single moment sympathized with treason in any form, or even doubted as to the plain path of duty. His was never the heart of a traitor. The best evidence of his fidelity may be found in the unwavering devotion of all his life. He had not a hope for himself, his children, his friends, or his country, that was not based upon the integrity and perpetuity of the Union. If it be true that the eye when glazing in death is endowed with prophetic vision, I doubt not that his dying moments were cheered by the joyful prospect, soon to be revealed to us, of peace and happiness won by valor and restored by victory.

His days are numbered. The whole of his career is before the world. Men may now pass judgment upon another fellow-mortal who has gone from earth. If we approach his bier and look down upon the mortal remains of THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS, and then recount the whole story of his life and death, we must in justice say,

"Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wait
Or knock the breast; no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise, or blame; nothing but well and fair,
And what may quiet us in a death so noble."

MR. SMITHERS. Mr. Speaker, a good man has been gathered unto his fathers, and it is meet that I should lay upon his bier a simple testimonial of respect and gratitude.

Though it may not be permitted me to call him great, yet if incorruptible integrity, unostentatious piety, and unwavering devotion to his country be worthy to be imitated or admired, then may it be truly said that THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS has not lived in vain. Born with no accidental advantage of wealth, blessed with no culture of liberal education, he so demeaned himself in all the relations of life as to secure the affection and confidence of his fellow-men, who having committed to him the discharge of minor official duties, elevated him to the position of Governor of Maryland; and in the darkest hour of the peril of the Republic he held in his hands the welfare of his native State.

How well he executed his trust, how faithfully he administered his high office, the appreciation of the living manifests, and the approval of posterity will attest. Had he yielded to the blandishments of base conspirators, had he blenched before the storm of indignation that assailed him, no human power could have averted from Maryland the miseries of civil strife. His fidelity baffled the designs of domestic traitors and checked the progress of rebellion; his temporizing policy held treason in suspense, and gave opportunity to the loyal North to rush to the succor of this threatened capital; and that we sit here to-day, in this Council Chamber of the nation, is due, perhaps, under the favor of the Almighty, to the faithfulness of him whom we mourn. Over the grave of such a man it is pardonable to linger with unwonted regret; but while we pay this tribute of honor to his memory, let us rest in confidence that history will record his virtues, and in assurance that, after a well-spent life, he has calmly passed to the enjoyment of a Christian immortality.

MR. KELLEY. It has, by their kindness, been my privilege to participate with some frequency in the protracted and sometimes intense struggle of the people of Maryland for the Union and freedom; and my State is largely indebted to the late Senator THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS. It has therefore been thought fitting that I should add my humble word to what has been so appropriately said on this occasion.

In my many visits to Maryland during this trying period I became somewhat familiar with Senator, or Governor HICKS, as he was when I first knew him. I found him ever frank and courteous to his peers, and kind, kind but without condescension, to the young, the poor, and the humble. His intercourse with all was easy and natural, and his manners were but the fit expression of his manly nature. This is well attested by the constancy with which honors attended him. He whose death we mourn, dying as a Senator of the United States, was once a constable, and doubtless proud of the confidence in him exhibited by his fellow-citizens in electing him to this humble office; and from the day he entered upon its duties to the moment in which he breathed his last, and passed gladly to the bosom of his Maker, the badge of office attested how fully he enjoyed the confidence, the increasing confidence, of the people among whom he lived. It has been said, and I apprehend with perfect truth, that during this long career no man ever doubted his integrity.

It seemed to me, sir, as I listened to the rapid sketch of his biography, that he was a chosen instrument in the hands of Providence for our good. The Almighty sees the end from the beginning. It is not so with men; and the wealthy, the powerful, the arrogant, and the aristocratic land and slave owners among whom this poor child was born did not foresee, when they gave him their confidence, and made him first constable, then sheriff, and then promoted him from stage to stage, that they were qualifying him to be the power to curb their aspirations and control the destiny of their descendants. They did not foresee that they were training in that honest farmer boy a man who, by his will, should contravene their ambitious purposes and determine whether the capital of the country should remain so, or become the capital of a foreign and despotic confederacy. Yet more potent than any hundreds of men was Governor HICKS in the decision of that question.

It is said that he wavered about the time that that question was pending in nicest balance. No man will say that his loyalty yielded. The utmost that can be said is, that in a period of revolutionary excitement, when the armed men around him were all the foes of his cause, when those whom the people of his State had invested with power and indicated as his counselors all entertained views different from his, and when those who loved the Union came to him with multiplied and diverse counsels, his judgment was for a moment bewildered. His instincts, his purposes, were ever true and patriotic. His caution, his courage, his will, his devotion to the cause, saved Maryland to the Union, in the crisis, and so secured the inauguration of the President of the country in its capital, and enabled the North to maintain him there without interval. In doing this he saved Maryland, Delaware, and southeastern Pennsylvania from becoming the Belgium of this terrible war; and his name will be dear to the future people of Pennsylvania and of Delaware, as it is to-day to those of his native State.

I shall not attempt a sketch of his biography. I shall utter no formal words of eulogy. His life, his character, his deeds, are among the richest treasures of his native State. Let them be faithfully told. History has been to me through life valuable only as it gave me an insight into the characters and motives of its actors. Let Maryland tell with pride the story of THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS. Let her speak of his humble origin. Let her say that slavery denied him the advantages even of the cheap country school. And let her show how, in spite of all the curses inflicted on man by that institution, he became what he was; and she will not only illustrate the beneficence of our republican institutions, but gladden the heart of many a poor father and mother and quicken the pulse and embolden the spirit of the poor and aspiring boy through countless generations. THOMAS HOLLIDAY HICKS was a poor farmer's boy. He entered on his official career a constable. He died a Senator; and a grateful nation mourns his death. I apprehend that rhetoric can add no force and eulogy no power to these brief words.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, by the operation of the resolutions, there will be no evening session to-day. The Chair is requested by the committee of arrangements on the part of the Senate to state that carriages have been provided for all the members of the House who may desire to go to the Cemetery to perform the last sad rites to the deceased Senator from Maryland.

Thereupon the members of the House, headed by the Speaker and Clerk, and preceded by the Sergeant-at-Arms, marched, two by two, to the Senate Chamber.

After the return from the Cemetery the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 16, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 19, 1864, copies of reports made by Major General Herron of inspections in the department of Arkansas; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES. I present a petition signed by Rear Admiral David D. Porter and divers and sundry lieutenant commanders and commanders on the active list of the United States Navy, who represent that the pay of their respective grades and duties as established by law for a naval peace establishment, prior to and at the beginning of the present war with rebels, was greatly reduced by the act of Congress approved July 16, 1862, which was passed while they, or nearly all of them, were engaged in the arduous duties consequent upon an extended blockade, or in active hostilities with the enemy. They therefore pray that so much of the act of Congress to "establish and equalize the grades of the line officers of the Navy," approved July 16, 1862, as relates to the pay of captains and commanders, and of the pay at sea of lieutenant commanders, (previously recognized as lieutenants commanding,) may be repealed so as to restore to their respective grades and duties the pay to which they were entitled and received prior to the passage of that act. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I present the petition of Richard Foster, a colored man, who represents that he has been in the United States service for two or three years and has lost a leg, but he was never mustered into the service, so that he cannot claim a pension; but he asks for some compensation in order that he may be able to procure a cork leg; and he also asks for a further consideration to enable him to go to school. I move that the petition be referred to the committee on slavery and freedmen.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I present a memorial from the State convention of Missouri, asking Congress to make an appropriation to pay the amount expended by the State of Missouri in military equipments. I will state in presenting this memorial that a bill to that effect has already passed the Senate, and I therefore move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a petition of citizens of New York, in which they respectfully pray for the enactment of a law preferring for appointments to all inferior offices persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service of the United States, who shall have served for a period of three years during the present rebellion, or who shall have suffered permanent disability while in the service, or who shall be held one year as prisoners of war, and that the tenure of such office be for life or during good behavior. This petition is signed by General Winfield Scott, Peter Cooper, General Dix, and three thousand six hundred other persons in the city of New York. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota in favor of a mail route from Rochester via Salem, Union Springs, Ashland, and Oak Glen, to Geneva, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of citizens of Suffolk county, New York, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Manorville, via Eastport and Speonk, to Westhampton; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a memorial of citizens of the State of Missouri praying for the establishment of a fort or garrison near the southwest corner of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a memorial of the constitutional convention of the State of Missouri in favor of the payment by the General Government of the military debt of that State incurred in the defense of the General Government; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of manufacturers of paper, praying for a reduction of the duty upon all imported articles entering into the manufacture of paper equal to that on printing paper; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. POMEROY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Irwin P. Long, on behalf of the Wyandotte Indians, praying for an allowance for discount and interest on bonds held by the United States in trust for that tribe, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 362) to amend the third section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1864, to report it without amendment, and to move that it be indefinitely postponed, inasmuch as it is provided for in the House bill which I have just reported.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 143) to facilitate the adjustment of certain accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of recaptured Africans in Liberia, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that it pass. As I presume there can be no objection to it—it is simply to direct the Secretary of the Interior to audit certain accounts—I ask that it may be acted upon at once.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which directs the Secretary of the Interior to adjust and settle the accounts of the American Colonization Society for the support of recaptured Africans in Liberia, under contracts made for that purpose, under the authority of an act of Congress, approved June 16, 1860, on the principles of equity.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORT OF PHILADELPHIA.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce to be strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That the port of entry and delivery for the district of Philadelphia shall be bounded on the river Delaware by the present existing corporate limits of the city of Philadelphia, anything in any former law to the contrary notwithstanding.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the port of entry and delivery for the district of Philadelphia shall be bounded on the river Delaware by Frankford creek on the north and Broad street on the south. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts conflicting with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

No. 42) to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Pere Marquette to Flint, and for the completion of said road, for the purpose of correcting an error in the engrossment of the amendment of the House to the joint resolution.

The Secretary was directed to return the resolution, in conformity with the request of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had rejected the bill (S. No. 241) granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public land to aid in the construction of a ship-canal at the head of Sturgeon bay in the county of Door, in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan, in said State.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 392) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads;" and

A bill (S. No. 413) to establish a bridge across the Ohio river at Cincinnati, Ohio, a post road.

COURTS IN NEVADA.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 640, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a bill providing for a district and circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes. There are special reasons why it should be considered at once.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to say to my friend from Connecticut that I intended this morning, during the morning hour, to call up two or three Indian bills. I do not wish to occupy any more time than is necessary; but there are some matters relating to the Indians of pressing importance.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say, in regard to this bill, that it is one that ought to be acted upon, because there are causes now pending in the Supreme Court which have been postponed by the court twice already, and are now postponed to the 27th of this month, which will drop unless we have this legislation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will not object to it; but I wish to notify the Senate that I desire, after the passage of this bill, to occupy its attention for a very short time with Indian bills.

Mr. STEWART. When this bill is taken up there are various matters connected with it upon which I wish to be heard, and it will take some little time. It is a matter of great importance to the locality where we reside; it affects our State materially; but I presume there is no objection to its being taken up now.

The motion of Mr. FOSTER was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes. It provides that the State of Nevada shall hereafter constitute one judicial district, to be called the district of Nevada; and a district judge, a marshal, and a district attorney of the United States are to be appointed for the district. The district of Nevada is to be attached to and constitute a part of the tenth circuit. A term of the circuit court of the United States for the district is to be held in the city of Carson, in the State of Nevada, on the first Monday of March, and on the first Monday of August, and on the first Monday of December of each year. A term of the district court of the United States for the district is to be held at the city of Carson on the first Monday of February, and on the first Monday of May, and on the first Monday of October of each year.

The district court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and the judge thereof, are to possess the same powers and jurisdiction possessed by the other district courts and district judges of the United States, and be governed by the same laws and regulations. The circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and the judge thereof, are to possess the same powers and jurisdiction in the district which are possessed by them in the other districts of the tenth circuit. Whenever the circuit judge of the tenth circuit is absent or from any cause is unable to hold in any district of his circuit a term of the circuit court appointed by law, it is to be the duty of the district judge of the district to hold such term; and the circuit courts held by the district judges are to possess the same jurisdiction and powers in all respects as when held by the circuit judge; but they are not to possess any jurisdiction to hear and determine any case or matter on appeal or writ of error, or transferred from the district court or any proceedings therein.

The district judge appointed for the district of Nevada is to receive as his compensation the sum of $3,500 a year, payable in four equal installments, on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October, of each year. The marshal and district attorney of the United States for the district of Nevada, and also for the district of Oregon, are severally to be entitled to charge and receive for the services they may perform double the fees and compensation allowed by the act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes, approved February 26, 1853; but the aggregate compensation allowed them is not to exceed the amount provided for such officers by that act. The third, fourth, and fifth sections of the act of February 19, 1864, entitled "An act amendatory of and supplementary to an act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, are to be applicable to the appointment of special sessions of the circuit courts in the districts of Nevada, and to the appointment of clerks and deputy clerks of the circuit courts of the districts of Nevada and Oregon. The clerk of the circuit court in the districts of Nevada, Oregon, and California is to be also clerk of the district court in those districts, and receive for like services the same fees and compensation which are allowed by law to the clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States for California; but the clerk in each of those districts is to be allowed by the Secretary of the Interior to retain of the fees and emoluments received by him as clerk of both courts, over and above the necessary expenses of his offices and necessary clerk hire included, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, only such sum per annum as is now allowed by law to the clerk of one of those courts, and is to pay the remainder into the public Treasury, under oath, in the manner and under the regulations now prescribed by law. This act is to take effect on the 1st day of April next.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment of the committee was in section four, line four, to strike out the words "which are possessed by them," and to insert "which are vested in said court and said judge," so that the section will read:

That the circuit court of the United States for the said district of Nevada, and the judge thereof, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction in said district which are vested in said court and said judge in the other districts of the tenth circuit.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I am opposed to all the amendments reported by the committee. So far as this one is concerned, it is a mere matter of verbiage; I think the bill as it came from the House of Representatives is as near perfect as we shall be able to get it, and the amendments are so unimportant that I think it unnecessary to send the bill back to the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be read.

Mr. STEWART. Did the Chair declare the first amendment adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It did; but it will come up again in the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. That will necessarily confine the discussion that may be had to the terms of the amendment that has been adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The whole bill will come up afterward in the Senate, and will be open for discussion in every point as it progresses.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that the Senator from Nevada was on the floor before the Chair had declared the result.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had declared it; but the Chair will put the question again if it is desired.

Mr. CONNESS. I feel some interest in this bill, and I prefer that the discussion should take place upon it before the vote shall be taken upon the adoption of the amendments reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will regard the vote on the first amendment as reconsidered, and it is now open for discussion.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I should like to hear from the members of the committee who have reported these amendments their reasons for wishing to change the original bill in such important particulars. I should like to know the reasons, so that we may have some further light on the subject, because the amendments seem to me liable to grave objection. I do not think the bill is improved by the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the first amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be quite impossible for me to satisfy the honorable Senator from Nevada that either one of these amendments ought to be adopted. As it regards the one now before the Senate, which is to amend the fourth section by striking out the words "which are possessed by them," and inserting in lieu of them the words "which are vested in said court and said judge," I can only say that any gentleman who had in his early life an opportunity of reading a book called Lindley Murray's Grammar, will see, I think, the great propriety of that amendment. The section now reads thus:

That the circuit court of the United States for the said district of Nevada, and the judge thereof, shall possess the same powers and jurisdiction in said district which are possessed by them in the other districts of the tenth circuit.

I believe the distinguished author to whom I have referred—Lindley Murray—does not consider that good grammar; and to strike out the words "which are possessed by them" and insert in lieu thereof "which are vested in said court and said judge" of the other districts of the tenth circuit, will make it good grammar, and will make it mean precisely what the writer intended it to mean when he wrote it as it stands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out sections five, six, seven, eight, and nine, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever the circuit judge of the tenth circuit is absent or from any cause is unable to hold in any district of his circuit a term of the circuit court appointed by law, it shall be the duty of the district judge of the district to hold such term; and the circuit courts held by the district judges shall possess the same jurisdiction and powers in all respects as when held by the circuit judge: Provided, That they shall not possess any jurisdiction to hear and determine any case or matter on appeal or writ of error, or transferred from the district court, or any proceedings therein.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the district judge appointed for the district of Nevada shall receive as his compensation the sum of $3,500 a year, payable in four equal installments, on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October, of each year.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the marshal and district attorney of the United States for said district of Nevada, and also for the district of Oregon, shall severally be entitled to charge and receive for the services they may perform double the fees and compensation allowed by the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853: Provided, That the aggregate compensation allowed said officers shall not exceed the amount provided for such officers by said act.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the third, fourth, and fifth sections of the act of February 19, 1864, entitled "An act amendatory of, and supplementary to, an act to provide circuit courts for the districts of California and Oregon, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall be applicable to the appointment of special sessions of the circuit courts in the districts of Nevada, and to the appointment of clerks and deputy clerks of the circuit courts of the districts of Nevada and Oregon. And that the clerk of the circuit court in the districts of Nevada, Oregon, and California shall be also clerk of the district court in said districts, and shall receive for like services the same fees and compensation which are allowed by law to the clerks of the circuit and district courts of the United States for California: Provided, That the clerk in each of said districts shall be allowed by the Secretary of the Interior to retain of the fees and emoluments received by him as clerk of both courts, over and above the necessary expenses of his offices and necessary clerk hire included, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, only such sum per annum as is now allowed by law to the clerk of one of said courts, and shall pay the remainder into the public Treasury, under oath, in the manner and under the regulations now prescribed by law.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect on the 1st day of April next.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the salary of the district judge for the district of Nevada shall be $3,500 per annum, payable in four equal installments on the 1st days of January, April, July, and October of each year; and the marshal and district attorney of the United States for said district shall severally be entitled to charge and receive, for the services they may perform, the fees and compensation now allowed by law, to wit, by the act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853, for similar services. The clerks of the said district and circuit courts shall be appointed in the manner now prescribed by law for the appointment of such officers. They shall be subject to the same rules and regulations, shall perform the same duties, and be entitled to charge and receive the same fees and compensation as officers of like character in the other districts and circuits of the United States for like services.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Nevada, may be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the district court of the United States for the district of Nevada, or to the supreme court of the State of Nevada, as the nature of said appeal or writ of error may require, and each of these courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of Nevada Territory as to all such cases, with full power to hear and determine the same, and to award mesne or final process thereon. And from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory of Nevada, prior to its admission into the Union as a State, the parties to said judgments and decrees shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Federal courts as they would have had under the laws of the United States if this act had been passed simultaneously with the act admitting said State into the Union.

Mr. FOSTER. In regard to these amendments, the Committee on the Judiciary recommend the striking out of the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth sections of the bill as it came from the other House, and to insert in lieu thereof two other sections, which added to the first four sections of the bill will in the judgment of the committee make the bill fit and proper for the purpose for which it was intended. The fifth section, one of those which they propose to strike out, provides that whenever the circuit judge of the tenth circuit is absent and cannot hold the circuit court for the term, the judge of the district court shall hold the circuit court in lieu of the circuit judge. That is provided for by the general law. That is the law now. In regard to all the circuits in the United States, if the judge of the circuit court is unable to attend, the district judge holds the circuit court; so that the fifth section is unnecessary, because the law now is the same as it will be if that section stands.

The sixth section, which it is proposed to strike out, provides for the salary of the district judge, but that is provided for by the amendment and put in another connection; it is not necessary, therefore, that that section should stand. It was stricken out merely for the purpose of having the sections together stricken out, and not because the committee do not embody the same provision in the amendment which they report. The salary is provided for in the amendment in the same manner precisely that it is in the sixth section.

Then the seventh section, which the committee propose to strike out, provides that the marshal and district attorney of the United States for the district of Nevada and also for the district of Oregon shall severally be entitled to charge and receive for the services they may perform double the fees and compensation allowed by the act "to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853. The committee were not satisfied with the marshal and district attorney of the United States for the district of Nevada should be entitled to double the fees provided for those officers in the other portions of the United States. No doubt to some extent the expenses of living in that State are greater than they are in some other States of the Union; but the committee thought that it was not now a good time to increase salaries, even where it might be necessary to increase them, and especially that it was not a good time to put such a provision as that into this bill, it being very desirable that this bill should pass without having in it matter which would provoke discussion. It also was objectionable to the committee on the ground that it provides this same thing for the district of Oregon. We saw no reason why the affairs of the State of Nevada, so far as the district and circuit courts are concerned, should be mingled with any question about the fees which should be charged by the marshal and district attorney for the district of Oregon. We thought it was matter not germane to this bill, and that it ought not to be in it. That was the reason why we thought the seventh section ought to be stricken out.

The eighth section provides that certain sections of a prior law, which are enumerated and described, shall be made applicable to the clerks and deputy clerks of the circuit court and district courts of Nevada and Oregon, and makes some other provisions in regard to the fees of these officers; but inasmuch as the committee thought that the fees of these officers should be the same as the fees of like officers in the other States, there was no occasion for that section to stand in the bill, and therefore they recommend that it be stricken out.

Then the only remaining section is the ninth, which provides that the act shall take effect on the 1st day of April next. We thought it exceedingly objectionable, because, as I have suggested, there are causes now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States coming from the territorial courts of Nevada, which, the State having been admitted, have expired judicially; and if this act does not take effect until April next, all these causes must fall.

I have thus stated the reasons why the committee thought these several sections should be stricken out, and I come now to explain the sections which we recommend in lieu of them. These two sections will make the fifth and sixth sections of the bill if they shall be acceptable to the Senate, and if the bill shall pass.

The proposed fifth section provides for the district judge a salary of $3,500, the amount which is provided in the House bill. It then provides for the fees of the marshal and district attorney, declaring that they shall be entitled to charge and receive for the services they may perform the fees and compensation now allowed by law to officers of the same character in the other districts and States of the United States, and the same in regard to the clerks of the district and circuit courts; that these officers shall be subject to the same rules and regulations, and perform the same duties and be entitled to charge the same fees as officers of like character in the other districts and circuits of the United States for like services.

Then the new sixth section provides that all cases of appeal or writs of error heretofore prosecuted and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon any record from the supreme court of the Territory of Nevada, may be heard and determined by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the mandate of execution or of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the district court of the United States for the district of Nevada, or to the supreme court of the State of Nevada, as the nature of the appeal or writ of error may require. This section further provides that from all judgments and decrees of the supreme court of the Territory of Nevada prior to the admission of that Territory into the Union as a State, the parties to those judgments and decrees shall have the same right to prosecute appeals and writs of error to the Federal courts as they would have had under the laws of the United States if this act had been passed simultaneously with the act admitting the State of Nevada into the Union.

These are in substance the two sections recommended by the committee in lieu of those stricken out, and to some extent these two sections introduce new matter into the bill. It is, however, in regard to causes now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, in reference to which the House of Representatives passed a bill some weeks since and sent it to us, the provisions of which bill we propose to embody in this, and to go somewhat further, thinking that the House bill providing that the Supreme Court of the United States might go on and hear and determine causes pending until United States courts were created in Nevada would not by any means give to parties their rights. In this bill we propose to create the proper district and circuit courts for that State, and then provide that the causes now pending in the Supreme Court may be proceeded with according to law, and remanded either to the district court of the United States or to the supreme court of the State of Nevada as the necessities of the case may require; and it is also provided in the amendment, which was not provided for by the House bill, that the parties to judgments or decrees which have been rendered or passed by the former territorial courts, although they have not yet taken a writ of error or made an appeal, may, notwithstanding the fact that they have not yet availed themselves of their right in that particular, still avail themselves of that right as if these courts had been created in the bill which admitted Nevada as a State; because, without this legislation, parties who have had their causes tried and disposed of in the territorial courts would not have any right to bring a writ of error or take an appeal from those courts, but their judgments would be final. The law of the United States is that parties have a certain period of time, in some cases some years, to prosecute a writ of error or an appeal; and the committee saw no reason why the parties to judgments or decrees in the territorial courts of Nevada should not have the same right and the same privilege. It was the fault of Congress (in which, of course, the Senate had its share) in not giving to the State of Nevada a district and circuit court when the Territory ceased to be a Territory and became a State. It was an inadvertence, an omission; and the State ought not to suffer, neither ought parties who have been litigating their rights in the Territory to suffer by this omission or inadvertence on the part of Congress. The committee deemed it but simple justice that the causes which are pending and now in court should be provided for, and also that the rights of parties as existing under the law over the country everywhere else should be made the same within this State, and that they should have their rights during the same period of time to prosecute appeals and writs of error.

That, Mr. President, is the bill, and the whole bill, as it now stands. It is disembarrassed of any question as regards any other State. It gives to this State the same district and circuit courts that are given to every other State in the Union. It gives the same officers to those courts. It gives to those officers the same fees and emoluments, and subjects them to the same laws and regulations. It lets Oregon alone; it lets California alone; it is a simple bill unconnected with any other thing than simply the creation of a district and circuit court, providing for the officers of those courts and their salaries; and simply adding to that a provision that the causes pending in the Supreme Court of the United States may be proceeded with, and that the rights of parties to prosecute appeals or writs of error from judgments that would otherwise be final shall not be lost to them. That is all there is of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, in regard to the statement that this bill interferes with California and Oregon, I will only say that the delegations from both those States are desirous that the bill should be passed as it came from the House of Representatives; the Pacific delegation, I believe, is unanimous in this desire, so that the matter may be entirely disembarrassed from that consideration.

As to the fifth section, it is proposed to strike it out, because it is said that it is not necessary, inasmuch as it is now the duty of the district judges in the absence of the circuit judge to hold the respective circuit courts. Perhaps it would be unnecessary, so far as giving that power is concerned, to insert the fifth section; but there is an important matter in the section which in connection with that provision makes it very proper to retain the section, and reenact what the Senator says is now the law. The proviso to that section is as follows:

Provided, That they shall not possess jurisdiction to hear and determine any case or matter on appeal, or writ of error, or transferred from the district court, or any proceeding therein.

It may be said that that is the law as it now stands, that it is not contemplated by the law that a judge shall hear on appeal a case that has been tried before him; but in answer to that, we say we are informed that that very thing has occurred, that the judge who presided over the court and tried the cause has been found making orders in the same cause on appeal. I am confident that it is not the law; but it has been so construed, and it is well to make it entirely plain. There can be no objection to that; it certainly avoids a difficulty that exists now in the city of San Francisco. I am informed by the delegation from California that such is the fact. That is a full answer, it seems to me, to the proposition to strike out that section.

As to the sixth section, that simply fixes the judge's salary, and the same provision is put into the amendment. Of course it may as well be here as in another form in the amendment reported by the committee.

The seventh section involves the question of the compensation of the marshal and district attorney. That is a question purely local in its character. It has been suggested that we want uniformity in our judicial acts. Of course we do. We want uniformity in the administration of all the departments of the Government; for instance, in the administration of the military department I presume; but yet I suppose it would not be contended that the supplies for the Government should be furnished at all points at the same price. I do not suppose that by legislation here we can make flour or pork sell for the same in Nevada as in Connecticut. In employing persons to discharge duties which are paid by fees, it is necessary to give such a compensation as will enable them to discharge the duties. We are the best judges of that. We know best what it costs to live in that country. The delegations from those different States understand that proposition perfectly well. There can be no law passed by Congress that will compel a storekeeper to furnish provisions at less than the market rates.

The seventh and eighth sections but reenact and make applicable to Nevada a law which was passed last winter, allowing to the clerks, marshals, and district attorneys of the courts in California and Oregon double the fees allowed to the same officers in the other districts of the United States. The delegations from California and Oregon agree to these sections; they desire them to be passed. Even now, with double fees, the compensation is extremely meager. In order that the clerk shall live, it will be necessary that he be made master in chancery and commissioner, and have all the duties assigned to him that can be assigned. The marshal is not situated as that officer is in the city of New York; he has no great sales to make; there is no shipping interest there from which he may derive fees. He has very little to do. It is doubtful whether even with this provision we can support a marshal. I do not see why gentlemen should object to litigants in the courts there being charged what we deem necessary to support the officers. Uniformity in that respect is not now observed; an exception has already been made with regard to California and Oregon; and I do not see that this is an innovation, or that anybody has a right to complain of it.

Again, the eighth section contains a provision that the district court clerk and the circuit court clerk shall be the same person. In this there is a great saving of expense. It will not be necessary to rent more than one clerk's office. The rent of a clerk's office is a matter of considerable importance there. It will cost $100 a month in gold to get a decent clerk's office. Consolidate the two offices, and one man can attend to both with perfect ease. Give the compensation we ask for here, and the office can be attended to properly, and in a manner satisfactory to all. No harm can be done by it; it is no innovation on what has already occurred. It is only doing what ought to be done in different sections of the country; because I say it is unjust and unfair to charge the same fees in the city of New York—where with a very small compensation in each case the office of marshal would be worth a large amount of money, figuring up among the thousands, forty or fifty thousand dollars, perhaps, a very lucrative office—as in a country where there is but little litigation, and where living is extremely expensive.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada will pause. It becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. TEN EYCK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope we may be allowed to proceed with the bill which has been discussed this morning, unless the Senator from New Jersey prefers to go on.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I should prefer to go on if it is agreeable to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from New Jersey will allow me to state that after he has addressed the Senate I shall endeavor to get up the naval appropriation bill for the purpose of having action on it to-day.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate is very unassuming in its dimensions, consisting of only about eight or nine lines, but it involves questions of the utmost magnitude and importance. It is true they are presented in a shape somewhat novel; yet they are in fact as old as the Government itself. They agitated the Convention which framed the Constitution, and they may be traced down all along the pathway of our history to the present time. They are questions of power as between the national and State Governments worthy of our calmest and gravest consideration. They are contested, controverted, and delicate. They are not questions of mere expediency, of policy, of politics, nor are they confined to a mere locality; but they are questions of law, constitutional, organic law, broad and extensive as the country itself. They are not questions merely for to-day and for ourselves, but for all time and for our posterity. No interest should control them; no passion should affect them; they will continue to exist after the causes now disturbing them shall have passed away, when passion shall have found new forms in which to flash its heat, and interest new food on which to feed itself.

This bill is in the following words: it is short, and I prefer to read it as preliminary to my remarks. It is entitled "An act to regulate commerce among the several States:"

That every railroad company in the United States whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, he, and is hereby authorized to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all freight, property, mails, passengers, troops, and Government supplies on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor.

Sir, it authorizes every railroad company in the United States whose road is operated by steam to carry over and upon its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, from one State to another, and to receive therefor compensation—first, all mails; second, troops and Government supplies; third, property, freight, and passengers. Now, sir, the question is whether the bill shall receive the sanction of Congress for the purposes declared in its body. I shall consider shortly, very shortly, the two first objects named, and the third object more at length.

Is this bill necessary to authorize the carrying of the mails over all the railroads in the United States operated by steam? It is not necessary for me to discuss the constitutional question involved in this. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] if I understood him aright, stated that he deemed the passage of this bill necessary for this purpose. I do not so regard it. He states that there is no doubt about the power, and he refers to acts of Congress in which the power has been declared and the authority conferred. Without stopping to argue the constitutional question involved in this point of the case, I say there is no necessity for the passage of this bill for this purpose. I beg leave to refer very shortly indeed to the statute passed on this subject, simply to refer to it in order that it may be incorporated in my remarks. By an act passed on the 3d of March, 1853, in addition to a former act passed on the subject—it is to be found in the Statutes at Large, volume ten, page 255—it is provided that—

"All railroads and parts of railroads which are now or hereafter may be in operation, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be post roads; and the Postmaster General may contract for carrying the mails thereon according to existing laws."

If the power were undisputed, and I do not stop to question it either one way or the other, it is unnecessary to pass this bill, because we have a statute full and complete on that subject now upon the statute-book, and the Government is using these roads for the purpose of the transportation of the mails throughout the length and breadth of the Union. It is not necessary to spread any such statute as this among our laws for the purpose of doing or authorizing that to be done which now is authorized by law and is not disputed at the present time.

How is it with respect to carrying troops and Government supplies? Is the passage of this bill necessary for this purpose? By an act of Congress passed on the 30th of January, 1862, to be found in the Statutes at Large, volume twelve, page 334, it has been declared by Congress "that the President of the United States, when in his judgment the public safety may require it, be, and he is hereby, authorized to take possession of any or all the railroad lines of the United States, so that they shall be considered post roads and part of the military establishment of the United States." It is unnecessary to pass this bill for the purpose of authorizing the Government to transport troops and munitions of war over these railroads, because we have an act now passed authorizing that to be done. Under the provisions of that act, troops and munitions of war are being transported over railroads throughout the length and breadth of the land, even over the railroads of New Jersey, whether they are entitled to exclusive privileges or not, each and all of them, leading from the city of New York toward the capital of the Union. It would be a work of supererogation to pass this bill for either of the two purposes to which I have referred.

Then, sir, how is it with regard to the third object, the authority sought to be conferred on every railroad in the United States operated by steam, to carry passengers, property, and freight in the way proposed? This is the grand and absorbing question, the real and only object of this bill. The other purposes, if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to borrow a word frequently used by him on the day before yesterday, are mere "pretenses" for the exercise of the power of Congress as invoked in this bill. Sir, before authorizing this to be done I, at least, consider it proper to inquire first what rights and interests are involved in it; and second, what rights and interests will be invaded by it. I deem them to be as sacred and important as the Government itself, or at least as important as the existence of the State governments themselves. Pass this bill, and it will confer on railroad companies chartered by the States authority to do that which by the laws of the States creating them they have no right to do, which laws, in fact, constitute a part of their contracts with the States, and were accepted by them as such when they took their charters from the States.

State railroad charters I understand to be contracts entered into by the companies with the States creating them, and by which not only the companies themselves but the States creating them are bound—contracts as solemn and as obligatory on the parties thus contracting as any other contracts between any other and different parties. Sir, the object of this bill is to discharge State railroad corporations from the obligations they are under to the States creating them, and to which they owe their very being. This, I submit most respectfully and emphatically, Congress, in all the plenitude of its power, has no right or authority to do under either of the three powers referred to by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and especially under the power to regulate commerce between the several States, to which he has especially adverted.

I do not propose to enter into an elaborate discussion of the constitutional question involved in this bill. I think the argument submitted by the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. Johnson] some two or three weeks ago was complete and sufficient upon that subject; and if the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to use the expression, notwithstanding the air of triumph with which he seemed to consider that he had overthrown the argument of the Senator from Maryland, I do not think that he touched it in any material point. I think he failed utterly in attempting to refute the positions assumed and taken by the Senator from Maryland. I have too much respect for the opinions and for the patience of this body to undertake to repeat and reiterate the discussion in full upon that subject. But, sir, I may be permitted perhaps to call the attention of the Senate to some of the phases involved in this question. I have no feeling about it; I can have no personal feeling on this subject, although much has been said about my State, and although the question involves the interests of the people of my State. I know that the people of my State are divided, from Sussex to Cape May, upon this subject. I know there is a great, wide, and radical difference of opinion between them in relation to this measure, so far as my own State is concerned, and I think it but frank, manly, and fair in me to give the opinions which I entertain and which will influence me in giving the vote I expect to give, let the consequences be to me as they may, or to any conflicting interest that may be running wild in the State from which I come, and which I honor and reverence.

Mr. President, I hold that Congress cannot absolve a State corporation from the conditions, limitations, and restrictions imposed upon it by the State creating it, and involved in its very charter, in a matter solely within the jurisdiction of the State, as I claim it to be in the case of the State more particularly interested in the question now before the Senate. I admit that Congress may pass laws establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy, under the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States, and thus discharge pecuniary obligations; but where is the power enabling it to authorize a corporation created by a State, with conditions, limitations, and restrictions on its franchise, to accept and use the charter not only without regard to those restrictions, limitations, and conditions, but in utter violation of them? Congress cannot abridge or enlarge the franchises of a State charter; it is not within the powers conferred upon it. If so, I should like to see where the authority is to be found; I should like to have it referred to by some of the advocates of the bill now before the Senate.

This is not a bill to authorize the construction of a new road by the Government of the United States. That is not the question now before the Senate. It is a bill to authorize the seizure of charters granted by the States, and their conversion to other purposes different from those for which they were granted, and to arm the managers of State corporations with a power antagonistic to and in contravention of the very law of their existence. This cannot be done; it is against both law and reason. It has been uniformly held that Congress cannot build a road within the limits of a State without the consent of that State. What has been the history of our Government on that subject? I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate for a few minutes to the history and action of Congress on the subject of constructing public improvements within the limits of the several States of the Union.

Shortly after the commencement of the present century this movement was set on foot, and it was agitated more or less by Congress and the General Government down to a period as late as 1830. About the year 1806 the great question which agitated Congress was not whether Congress could make internal improvements contrary to the wishes of the several States through which it was proposed they should be made or constructed, but whether the Government of the United States had the power to make internal improvements at all; whether it was within the power of Congress; whether it was constitutional. A reference to the State Papers will show the opinions of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison on that point. There was great doubt entertained; that was the battle; that was the controversy. About that year Congress stood somewhat committed to the doctrine of internal improvements in the case of the Cumberland road, but that road was established by and with the consent of the State of Maryland, through which it was constructed. The controversy was not whether it could be constructed with or without the consent of the State, but whether it was within the power of the General Government to construct this work of internal improvement at all. However, it was determined to do so, the consent of the State being obtained for that purpose. In 1822 this road got out of repair and Congress passed a law to erect toll-gates on it for the purpose of collecting toll in order that it might be repaired. This brought up the question of internal police, whether the Government of the United States had the right and power to police the road. A controversy grew out of that, and eventually the road was abandoned; it returned to the use of the State, the Government of the United States having relinquished all control over it as a public road and surrendered its right to levy toll for the purpose of keeping it in repair.

Proceeding in the short and concise history I am giving, in 1825 Congress subscribed money for building the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, and so far as that went stood committed to the aid of internal improvements within the States. But this was not in opposition to the wishes of the States through which this public work ran. Subsequently to that, General Jackson vetoed the famous Maysville road bill, which seemed to settle the policy of the Government in relation to this matter, and from that time there has been no great work of public improvement in this country carried on under the fostering care and protection of the Government of the United States; and about that time, from 1830 to 1833, that system of internal improvements which has brought out and developed the resources of this country in the shape of railroads and canals sprang into existence, under the fostering care and aid of the States and the people of the several States. It was at that time that the policy of public improvements was surrendered, so to speak, by the General Government, and taken up by the several States; and we have seen the glorious results everywhere arising from wise, judicious, public-spirited, and patriotic action on the part of the individual citizens of the several States, who could better understand and better regulate and manage the affairs of public improvements within their own borders and within their own limits.

And, Mr. President, the Pacific railroad bill goes upon this same principle, and recognizes this right of the States to construct works of public improvement by themselves within their own limits, because by the very charter we have passed incorporating the Pacific Railroad Company we have taken especial care and pains to confine its beginning, its termination, and its passage, to the Territories of the United States, and not to invade the limits of either of the States of this Union; privilege being of course afforded and some assistance also held out to the several States in the construction of branch roads to run in like so many smaller streams to supply the great current which is to unlock for the purposes of trade and commerce the recesses of the great center to the eastern and to the western coasts of this country.

But, sir, the bill before us is vastly different from this. It is, as I said, to seize the charter of a State and alter its provisions, and to absolve the corporation from its contract with the State creating it and the contract entered into by it with the State when it was created. Now, sir, I ask you what effect this will have upon a State charter. Pass this bill and what effect will it have upon State charters? Will it be an amendment to State railroad charters? Will it be a repeal of State railroad charters, or will it be a new charter for these companies, or partly both? What kind of corporation will it be, State or national? It will be a kind of hybrid, with a foundation resting upon State authority, and its superstructure authorized and erected by Federal authority.

Again, of all who are carried away by the splendid pageant of Federal supremacy, I would ask, what effect will it have on the amenability of such corporations to the States creating them? They have duties to perform and liabilities to meet. Will the passage of this bill make them creatures independent of their creator, and authorize them to cast themselves loose from all the bonds they voluntarily assumed when they entered into their contract, which they did on the acceptance of their charter? How as to taxes which they are required to pay by the terms of their charter upon their acceptance? How as to the repeal of this charter, most of them having terms in their acts of incorporation authorizing the Legislature of the State to withdraw the chartered rights and privileges conferred on them by the charter? How are they to be answerable for abuse of their franchise? Is the great remedy of quo warranto to be withdrawn? May they not be called upon in any way to respond for misfeasance, malfeasance, non-user, or abuse? According to the theory of gentlemen who are the advocates of this extreme Federal power, it would seem so. Sir, grant that the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts is to be carried to the extent that it plainly implies, these creatures of State authority may flaunt the very power which gave them a body if it did not confer upon them a soul. Under this bill, I ask, what may these State corporations not do? The Pennsylvania Central, the New York and Erie, the Raritan and Delaware Bay, with limitations, and with termini fixed in their charters, to convey passengers and freight between certain points, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia in the one instance, Lake Erie and New York in the other, or from a little place on the Raritan bay called Port Monmouth down to Cape May, may start a line of steamers in connection with their roads, send them across the ocean, or around the world. These companies are authorized to build a road in one locality; by the pretension set up they may build it in another. They are authorized to carry passengers and freight between two points; they may, according to this pretension, carry them between other and different points. They are restricted by their charters to charge certain prices for transportation; by this pretension they may charge any other price for transportation or passage that they may see fit, unless restricted by this bill, and there is no restriction upon the face of it with respect to charge. They are limited and required by their charters to do a particular kind of business prescribed; if Congress has power to authorize what is now asked, they may be authorized to do another kind of business than that prescribed, and in any other way. Sir, to what will this lead, and where will it end? It will lead to the destruction of the internal improvements of every State in this Union or several of the States of this Union, or may do it, and it will tend to the ruin and bankruptcy of tens of thousands of true and loyal citizens, men, women, widows, children, whose estates have been invested in incorporated companies of this kind, under the plighted faith of the several States within the limits of which they are citizens.

Now, sir, how will it operate more particularly in practice? The States of this Union have each a railroad system of their own. I will refer to my own State by way of illustration. I do not know that a reference to that State and to the injury and evil which may be inflicted upon her will have any influence upon the mind of the Senator from Massachusetts. During the discussion of this question of constitutional authority, that Senator indulged in strong, if not violent, terms of denunciation against my State. I infer that he has but little love for her. He likens her to the State of South Carolina; "like," he says, "begets like;" and this "pretense," as he calls it, on the part of my State he characterizes as a species of nullification like nullification in the State of South Carolina. Sir, he undertakes to say that of a State whose children have shed their blood upon almost every battle-field of this rebellion. He has pronounced her conduct as a usurpation and a pretense!

It was my intention to dwell somewhat at length on that branch of the subject, but the Senator from Massachusetts will excuse me when I say that knowing that my State is alike indifferent to his censure and his praise, I shall not enter into any unseemly contest of that kind on this occasion. This bill is meant to bear upon my State and to trample her rights under foot. It has so been declared by the Senator from Massachusetts, not in so many words, but he claims that it was a usurpation and a pretense on her part to do what she has done. Permit me to examine this question a little. I am compelled to ask the indulgence of the Senate while I investigate it, and, as shortly as I possibly can, lay before the Senate the true history of this contest in my State for the purpose of calling upon the judgment of the Senate for their opinion as to the propriety as well as the legality of the measure now asked to be enforced against that State.

The bill now before the Senate is a House bill, House bill No. 307; it is identically the same as Senate bill No. 102, introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts. It is the same in effect as is the original House bill No. 307, and the present bill was proposed in the other House by Mr. Wilson, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of that House, as a substitute for that bill, making it in its general terms applicable to all the States, instead of confining it to the State of New Jersey. For the purpose of making my remarks more understandable, and as the original bill is not long, I desire to refer to it. This is the way in which the measure was first introduced, this is the key that unlocks the object and purpose of the bill now before the Senate. It is entitled "A bill to declare certain roads military and post roads, and to regulate commerce," and it goes on to say:

Be it enacted, &c., That the railroad of the Camden and Atlantic Rail Company, and the branches thereof, built and to be built, and the railroad of the Raritan and Delaware Bay Rail Company, and the branches thereof, built and to be built, are hereby declared to be lawful structures and public highways of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said railroads and branches, with a ferry or ferries from Camden, in the State of New Jersey, to Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, and steamboats and other vessels from Port Monmouth, in the State of New Jersey, to the city of New York, running in connection with said roads, are hereby established as a post route, military road, and public highway of the United States for the purpose of transmission of the mails, troops, and munitions of war of the United States, and for the transportation of goods, wares, and merchandise of foreign growth across the State of New Jersey, under permits granted by the collectors of ports of the United States authorized to grant the same, and for commerce among and between the several States of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Camden and Atlantic Railroad Company, and the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company, chartered by the State of New Jersey, or either of them, or their assigns, are hereby authorized and empowered to complete, maintain, and operate the said railroads and branches, and to establish, maintain, and run the said ferries, steamboats, and other vessels, as a line of transportation for goods, wares, and merchandise of all descriptions, and passengers between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, and between the intermediate places and said cities, respectively, and for commerce between and among the several States of the United States, anything in any law or laws of the above-named States to the contrary notwithstanding.

That shows the object, clear, distinct, and well defined, which was in view at the time of the introduction of that original bill. I may be allowed to say that that bill was introduced at the instance of the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company. It was introduced upon the presentation of their petition, which was referred to the several Committees on Commerce who had charge of these measures. The General Government tasked for the passage of no such bill. In a report made by the Postmaster General, a year or two ago, it was stated that no additional postal facilities were required between the city of Washington and the city of New York. The House of Representatives regarded this as a measure striking at the State of New Jersey, and the State of New Jersey alone. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, in a discussion before the House on that subject, stated:

"I shall be willing to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Wilson,] because that commends itself to many gentlemen here on account of the general character of the legislation it proposes. But if that substitute should fail, I will go with equal cheerfulness for the original bill, with a view to the correction of the particular evil at which that is aimed."

"I look at this matter as the committee looked at it, from an outside point of view. I look at it as a citizen of Ohio or of any other State than New Jersey, and for that reason I will be drawn into no argument here in relation to the rights of natural or artificial persons as they exist under and by virtue of the laws of New Jersey. I care nothing about what questions may have been raised in the Legislature of New Jersey. I care not what may have been the different opinions of the courts of New Jersey. It is not for me, if the people of New Jersey are willing to submit to the dictation and rule of a selfish corporation, to interfere for the protection of that people. They must take care of themselves. They must be left to their own Legislature and their own courts."

It would seem that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner] cares as little about the decision of the courts of my State or the action of its Legislature as the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives. That was the object; that was the design. It was to interfere with what they are pleased to call an odious monopoly and a usurpation of my State as against the rights and privileges of the other States of this Union.

Sir, I make no apology, I make no excuse for my State. I stand here as her humble representative on this floor and simply ask that I may be permitted to present the facts as they are. If she stands in the light of an enlightened public judgment, she will stand; if she falls in the view of an enlightened public judgment, she must fall. My feeble arm can neither hold her up, nor perhaps aid in casting her down.

Mr. President, suffer me to say, to run back through a period of some thirty or forty years, that New Jersey was among the first, if not the very first State in this Union to establish a railroad of chief magnitude and importance in this country. Railroadage was then in its infancy. It was undetermined whether it was to be a success or not. The project was a new one. It was regarded by the majority of the people of my State, and I know not but by the majority of the people of the United States, as chimerical. Although young then, I have a lively recollection of hearing it said, that the men who invested their capital in the stock of this company were silly and were casting away the patrimony that their fathers had bestowed upon them. About the year 1830 the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company was incorporated; and among other things it was invested with all the rights, powers, and privileges necessary to perfect an expeditious and complete line of communication from Philadelphia to New York; and for that purpose to lay out and construct a railroad or roads from the Delaware river, between Cooper's and Newton's creek, which is on the New Jersey side of the Delaware river, to Raritan bay, a distance of some twenty or twenty-five miles from the city of New York, and to provide suitable steam or other vessels at either extremity for the transportation of passengers and produce from city to city.

That was the extent of the charter, and that declared the termini of the road. In 1831, this same road and the Delaware and Raritan canal, which had been incorporated about the same time, were united and formed into a joint-stock company, it having been discovered that the stock of the two, separately, could not receive the favorable consideration of the money market. The Senator from Massachusetts spoke of "confederated railroads." I know of no confederated railroads in New Jersey. I do know of the consolidation of this Railroad and Canal Company by an act which is familiarly known in the State of New Jersey as the marriage act. After that union of the two corporations, both were proceeded in and resulted in a successful completion. In 1832, the Legislature of New Jersey passed the act containing the exclusive privilege granted to the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts the day before yesterday. In order to be certain, I will read the terms of that act. By that act of 1832 it was enacted:

"That it shall not be lawful, at any time during the said railroad charter, (to wit, the Camden and Amboy,) to construct any other railroads in this State without the consent of the said company, which shall be intended or used for the transportation of passengers or merchandise between the cities of New York and Philadelphia, or to compete in business with the railroad authorized by the act to which this supplement is relative."

I state the act in its length and in its breadth in the way the Senator from Massachusetts stated it, in order that the friends of this bill may have the full benefit of it in this discussion, and also when they come to vote upon the question.

Now, Mr. President, the question at this time is not whether that grant of the exclusive privilege to the Camden and Amboy Company was wise or unwise, whether it was politic or impolitic. It makes, I may be permitted to remark, a great difference when you judge from different standpoints, or different periods of time. Standing here at this day I have not the slightest idea that the Legislature of New Jersey in 1865 would have granted an exclusive privilege of that kind to any company to construct a railroad across that State; but, sir, if we go back to 1830, in the infancy of this measure, when it was an experiment, when the men who embarked in it, and who had the bold and hazardous enterprise to risk their fortunes in it were denounced as hair-brained and madmen, we may find some little reason for it growing out of the desire of the Legislature of that State to procure the establishment of internal improvements there, at the nick of time when the General Government, under the veto by General Jackson of the Maysville road bill, had declared they did not intend to embark in any such enterprise any more. It was desirable for the purposes of commerce and trade and the transportation of passengers at that early day that there should be such lines of communication even across the insignificant State of New Jersey, as the Senator from Massachusetts would have it.

I may be permitted to remark here that this exclusive privilege granted to the Camden and Amboy Company will expire in 1869. It is now the year of grace 1865; and if this exclusive privilege has had a long life it is approaching its last sands. The limit will expire in 1869, and then I doubt not it will end, and end forever.

The road was built and put in operation more or less successfully, and so matters stood until 1852, a period of twenty years, without impeachment, without rivalry, without question, without particular complaint, so far as I know, from anybody. In 1852 the Camden and Atlantic—not the Camden and Amboy—Railroad Company was chartered by the Legislature of New Jersey. This was twenty years subsequent to the grant of this exclusive privilege to the Camden and Amboy Company. By their charter this company was authorized to construct a railroad from Camden, opposite the city of Philadelphia, in a southeasterly direction to a place called Absecon, on the sea-coast, on the Atlantic ocean, running at right angles with the route of the Camden and Amboy railroad between Philadelphia and New York. This company was authorized, in addition to the construction of a direct line of railroad between these points, to build two little lateral branches, one to a place called Batsto, which is about half way down the line of the road, about six miles northerly, and another to a place called May's Landing, about six miles south of the road, toward Cape May, southerly. That road was built, and its corporate powers were limited to the right to carry passengers and trade between those two points and upon these lateral branches. Now you will observe that this charter was granted in 1852 to this Camden and Atlantic Company, and accepted by them with full knowledge of, and subject to, the exclusive privilege which had been granted twenty years before to the Camden and Amboy Company; and it was not designed, from its route, and the privilege conferred upon it, to interfere in any way with the privileges conferred upon that company.

On the 3d of March, 1854, the Raritan and Delaware Bay Railroad Company was incorporated.
